BOOK XIX.

Containing the first ten Years of the Reign of CHARLES I. from 1625 to 1636.

Conſiderations on the Authors who have written the Hiſtory of CHARLES I.

THE civil war between Charles I. and the parliament, gave birth to two parties, who contended for victory till the battle of Nazeby. By this battle the parliament acquired a ſuperiority, which enabled them to hold the king's party, or the cavaliers, in a ſort of ſlavery, from which they were not delivered till 1660, by the reſtoration of Charles II. After the reſtoration, the royaliſts in their turn became ſo ſuperior, that the other party durſt no longer hold up their heads. This continued till the end of the reign of James II. during the ſpace of twenty-ſeven or twenty-eight years. In one or other of theſe two intervals were penned moſt of the works, wherein the authors undertake to give an exact account of the troubles of England in the reign of Charles I. with the grounds and cauſes of the ſame. From the concluſion of the war, to the reſtoration of Charles II. the friends of the parliament had free ſcope to write and publiſh whatever they pleaſed, whilſt the king's adherents durſt not ſet their names to their writings. In this interval were publiſhed numberleſs polemical papers, with ſuch animoſity, ſo many reproaches and invectives, that it is not eaſy for a man, who is in ſearch after truth, to diſcern, in all theſe writings, the proofs which may have ſome ſolidity, and ſeparate them from the preſumptions, falſe conſequences, artful ſuppoſitions, and invectives, wherewith they abound.

One of the moſt conſiderable writings of thoſe days was Eikon Baſiliké, or the king's portraiture, publiſhed in 1649. It can hardly be doubted, that Charles I. was himſelf the author [a]. He undertakes in this work to vindicate himſelf upon all the articles laid to his charge. It is properly an abſtract of the reaſons he had before publiſhed in ſeveral papers printed by his order, or addreſſed to both houſes of parliament. I have not quoted this book in the hiſtory of his reign, becauſe it contains nothing with regard to the facts or proofs, but what is more fully expreſſed in the king's meſſages, anſwers, and declarations. An anſwer was publiſhed to this book, pretending to ſhew, the king had not ſpoken with ſincerity; and preſently after appeared a reply to this anſwer. This treatiſe has been highly eſteemed, becauſe it contains all the principal arguments in favour of the king. It may be eaſily preſumed, the king forgot nothing material, ſince no man could know his affairs better than himſelf. Accordingly, this book has ſerved for foundation to whatever has been ſince penned in his favour.

Another very conſiderable work, publiſhed a little after the death of Oliver Cromwel, and dedicated to his ſon Richard, whilſt protector, was Ruſhworth's Collections. This work may very juſtly be conſidered as a continuation of Rymer's Fœdera, of which I have made great uſe in this hiſtory. It is a collection of all that paſſed, with reſpect to the public affairs, from the year 1618, to the death of Charles I. not by way of narration, but affording materials to compoſe a regular hiſtory. It contains all the tranſactions at court and in the parliament; the king's proclamations upon ſundry matters; his ſpeeches to both houſes, and thoſe that were made by his order; the addreſſes or petitions preſented to the king by the parliament; his majeſty's anſwers; the petitions preſented to both houſes, the ſpeeches in the houſe of commons, as well as in the courts of juſtice; the votes or reſolves of the two houſes, and their conferences upon divers ſubjects; the king's meſſages to the parliament, with the anſwers; the impeachments of the commons brought before the lords againſt ſeveral illuſtrious perſons; the anſwers of the parties accuſed; the ſentences; the petitions of the commons and both houſes to the king, concerning religion, tunnage and poundage, the affairs of the militia, breaches of privilege, the affair of Hull; the king's anſwers and his ſeveral meſſages upon theſe affairs; the king's and the parliament's manifeſtos; all the events of the war; the accounts of the ſkirmiſhes, ſieges, and battles; the negotiations for peace; a great number of papers, which give a perfect knowledge of the differences between the king and his Scotch ſubjects, and of thoſe between the army and parliament, with the negotiations between the king and both houſes, after his majeſty's impriſonment; the violence exerciſed by the army upon the parliament; the king's condemnation and death. Theſe materials are the more valuable, as the author draws no conſequence from what he relates, and very ſeldom endeavours to prejudice his reader by reaſonings; ſo that every man is free to make what uſe of them he thinks fit, according to his own principles. I ſhall ſpeak a little more fully of theſe Collections hereafter.

From the reſtoration of Charles II. to the end of his reign, two other works were publiſhed upon the ſame ſubject, I mean, upon the reign of Charles I. and a third was compoſed at the ſame time, though publiſhed later.

The firſt is entitled, The Annals of King James and King Charles I. It is ſaid to be compoſed by Dr. Franklin, who has not thought fit to put his name to it. He begins his Annals at the year 1612, and continues them through the reſt of the reign of James I. and from the death of that prince to the year 1642, during the firſt eighteen years of the reign of Charles I.

The ſecond, publiſhed in 1682, was compoſed by John Nalſon, doctor in law. It is entitled, An Impartial Collection of the great Affairs of State, from the Beginning of the Scotch Rebellion to the Murder of King Charles I. This Collection begins only at the year 1639, and though probably the author intended to continue it to king Charles's death, as appears by the title, he left it imperfect, and brought it no lower than January 1641-2, in two volumes in folio.

The third is, The Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, written by the earl of Clarendon. This hiſtory was penned before Nalſon's, though it appeared not till queen Anne's reign. It begins properly with the parliament of November the 3d, 1640, the whole firſt book being a ſort of introduction, where the author gives a general account of what paſſed from the laſt years of James I. to that parliament. This hiſtory reaches to the reſtoration of Charles II. in 1660.

The three laſt works were compoſed in the reign of Charles II. at a time when that prince had carried the royal authority much higher than the king his father had ever done; at a time when thoſe who had been adherents of the long parliament, or were in the ſame principles, were cruelly perſecuted, and when it was more dangerous to be a preſbyterian than an atheiſt.

I ſhall not ſpeak here of many leſs conſiderable writings, moſt of which aſcribe to the king an unlimited power, and conſequently repreſent the war of the parliament againſt Charles I. as the blackeſt and moſt evident rebellion.

Whoever intends to write the hiſtory of the reign of Charles I. muſt take his materials from ſome one of the works I have mentioned, or from all. For this reaſon I think myſelf obliged to ſpeak a little more fully of them, to the end it may not be thought ſtrange that I have not adopted without examination whatever they contain. Was there among the

[a] This ſeems to be ſaid without ſufficient ground, for whoever reads what Dr. Walker, and Toland in his Amyntor, have publiſhed on this ſubject, muſt be inclined to believe, that the king could not poſſibly be the author. Indeed it is almoſt demonſtrable that biſhop Gauden wrote that treatiſe. See on one ſide, the aforeſaid Dr. Walker, and Toland, and alſo Ludlow, and Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Time; and on the other ſide, Dr. Hollingworth, Mr. Wagſtaffe, &c.

Engliſh ſome good neuter hiſtorian, it would be he that ſhould be taken for guide; but I know not of any. He therefore that undertakes to write at this time the hiſtory of Charles I. muſt endeavour to diſcover the truth in even the moſt partial hiſtorians, and be extremely careful to avoid the continual ſnares they lay for their readers, to favour the cauſe they maintain. One muſt know what was their deſign in writing, what ſyſtem they followed, and the artifices they uſed to engage in their principles ſuch as make but few reflections in reading a hiſtory, and are apt to be eaſily drawn into the prejudices of the hiſtorian. I ſhall begin with Ruſhworth, who was the firſt writer.

There is no hiſtorian that can appear at firſt ſight more impartial than he that contents himſelf with furniſhing materials for a hiſtory, without drawing any conſequences himſelf, and without reaſoning upon the papers he exhibits, either for or againſt what they contain. It is, however, certain, that even in this he may ſhew very great partiality; as for inſtance, in giving forged papers, in curtailing or altering thoſe that are true, in giving ſuch only as may be advantageous to the party he would favour. Ruſhworth, who was moſt certainly a friend to the parliament, clerk-aſſiſtant to the houſe of commons, and ſecretary to general Fairfax, is accuſed of three things by the contrary party. It is pretended, 1. That he has given falſe papers. 2. That he has curtailed others, under colour of abridging them. 3. That he has affected to give all thoſe that are favourable to the parliament, and to omit ſeveral which might ſerve to ſhew the king's innocence. 4. Laſtly, that not declaring from whence he received his materials, we have only his authority for what he relates. This is a general accuſation, which, were it well proved upon any important and deciſive facts, is ſufficient to ſhake the credit of the collector. The reader will judge, whether this charge is made good with regard to the particular caſes on which he is accuſed, and whether theſe caſes are of ſuch a nature, that they ought to determine the diſintereſted to neglect the generality of his collections. I ſhall take theſe particular accuſations from Nalſon's introduction, wherein his chief aim was to diſcredit Ruſhworth, and perſuade his readers that they ought not to believe any thing he advances. It is very likely, Nalſon has forgot nothing upon this ſubject. I ſhall begin with the falſe papers he accuſes Ruſhworth of inſerting in his Collections.

The firſt paper forged by Ruſhworth, according to Nalſon, is a ſpeech of king James to the parliament, the 30th of January 1620. Inſtead of giving this ſpeech entire, Ruſhworth inſerts only an abſtract. And therefore Nalſon takes care to print the true ſpeech, and Ruſhworth's abſtract in ſeparate columns, that they may be the more eaſily compared. He adds, that the whole ſpeech was communicated by William Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury. Upon comparing Ruſhworth's abſtract with the entire ſpeech, there appears but one material paſſage which could give occaſion to charge Ruſhworth with unfaithfulneſs. And that is, where it is ſaid in the ſpeech, "A parliament is an aſſembly compoſed of a head and a body; the monarch is the head, and the three eſtates the body." Whereas it is ſaid in the abſtract, "the parliament is a thing compoſed of a head and a body, the monarch and the two eſtates." This induces Nalſon to exclaim again Ruſhworth, for reducing by his own authority the three eſtates, namely, the lords ſpiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons, to two eſtates, meaning thereby, that the houſe of peers made but one eſtate.

This queſtion was debated with great warmth, when the excluſion of the biſhops out of the upper houſe was in agitation. For if the biſhops were one of the three eſtates of parliament, it was evident they could not be excluded without altering the conſtitution. But this opinion was not generally received. The commons pretended, that the biſhops with the peers made but one eſtate. Nalſon pretends therefore, that Ruſhworth, to countenance the commons opinion, and juſtify the excluſion of the biſhops, makes king James ſay what he did not. To prove this, beſides the whole ſpeech, communicated by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he alleges ſeveral things to ſhew, there have always been three eſtates acknowledged in the parliament beſides the king. He anſwers the objection drawn from Charles the firſt's confeſſion, after the excluſion of the biſhops, that himſelf was one of the three eſtates of parliament, and concludes that James I. could not ſpeak in his ſpeech of two, but of three eſtates.

A ſecond inſtance of Ruſhworth's unfaithfulneſs is, that he gives only an abſtract of a letter to the king from an unknown hand, tending to ſhew, that the parliament attacked the king himſelf, in attacking the duke of Buckingham. This charge conſiſts wholly in the ſuppoſition that Ruſhworth abridged this letter to hinder his readers from perceiving all its force.

The third inſtance of Ruſhworth's unfaithfulneſs, is, that he has publiſhed in his appendix a ſcandalous paper, called, "A Propoſition for his Majeſty's Service to bridle the Impertinence of Parliaments." It is true, Ruſhworth ſays, this paper was queſtioned in the ſtar-chamber. But Nalſon pretends, this is not ſufficient to excuſe Ruſhworth, who, he ſays, ought to have ſhewn upon what grounds it was queſtioned, which he does himſelf very largely.

A fourth inſtance of Ruſhworth's unfaithfulneſs, is, that he inſerts in his Collections, a pretended letter of archbiſhop Abbot to James I. to diſſuade him from granting a toleration to the papiſts, when he was upon the point of concluding the prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh infanta. Nalſon ſays upon this ſubject, that the archbiſhop being then out of favour, and having nothing to do with the management of counſels, could have no other foundation, but either his own conjecture, or the common rumour, both equally liable to deceive and be deceived. He does not poſitively ſay, however, that the letter is forged, but contents himſelf with inſinuating it, becauſe Ruſhworth not having ſaid how he came by the letter, the credit of it reſts ſolely upon his fidelity.

But the fifth and moſt crying unfaithfulneſs of Ruſhworth, according to Nalſon, are the private articles of prince Charles's marriage with the infanta of Spain. He pretends they are all forged, on purpoſe to blacken the king and prince, by intimating that their deſign was to reſtore the catholic religion in England, and alleges ſeveral arguments to prove the forgery.

1. It is not probable, the king and prince ſhould promiſe what they knew was not in their power to perform, conſidering the ſtrength and conſtitution of the Engliſh laws againſt popery, and that the Engliſh nation would never have ſuffered it. This is not one of the moſt convincing arguments.

2. The parliament never taxed Charles I. with theſe private articles, not even in the declaration, where they collected all the reaſons which could juſtify their reſolution of not preſenting any more addreſſes to his majeſty. This is a much ſtronger argument than the former.

3. In the Memoirs of Deageant it is ſaid, the king of France hearing of king James's death, ſays to the archbiſhop of Ambrun, "All our hopes of England are loſt." Which ſhews, that Charles had no intention to reſtore the catholic religion. One would think Nalſon ſhould not have alleged this reaſon, which, in clearing this prince, caſts a great blemiſh on James I.

4. He ſays, Ruſhworth, by inſinuating that Charles I. intended to reſtore the catholic religion, contradicts himſelf, ſince he tells us in another place, that the prince being in Spain, remained ſtedfaſt in his religion, what endeavours ſoever were uſed to ſeduce him.

5. Ruſhworth produces no other authority for the truth of theſe private articles, but his own, and, in all appearance, the French Mercury is his author.

The ſixth inſtance of unfaithfulneſs laid by Nalſon to Ruſhworth's charge, is, the pope's letter to the prince when in Spain, and the prince's anſwer. 1. Becauſe it was a thing of mere ceremony. 2. In his circumſtances it was no more than what common prudence and policy obliged him to, in order to get out of the king of Spain's hands. This excuſe ſhews Nalſon was not thoroughly convinced of the forgery of theſe letters. He inſinuates, however, that they might be counterfeit, by reaſon Ruſhworth alleges no other authority than his own. It is true, he ſays the copies of theſe letters were preſerved by ſome who were then at Madrid, but names no body. This made Nalſon believe, Ruſhworth took the letters out of the French Mercury.

I come now to the charge againſt Ruſhworth, of inſerting in his Collections only what was advantageous to the parliament, omitting whatever was favourable to the king. Nalſon gives three inſtances in three particular caſes.

The firſt is, that in the affair of impriſoning the members of parliament, ſeveral of the judges gave their opinions, to ſhew that the king's conduct was not againſt law. Nalſon ſays, Ruſhworth is contented to mention the ſpeeches of two judges, namely, Whitelock's and Doderidge's, which were in favour of the king, and to ſay that Hide and Jones delivered their opinions to the ſame purpoſe. This charge therefore conſiſts, in that Ruſhworth, after giving the ſpeeches of two of the judges, thought not proper to inſert thoſe of the reſt who were for the king upon the ſame principles. But Nalſon pretends, he ſhould likewiſe have given Hide's and Jones's ſpeeches, and does it himſelf. Indeed Ruſhworth may be guilty of ſome partiality in omitting the two laſt, if it be true that they are ſtronger, and better ſupported than the others, of which I cannot judge.

The

The ſecond caſe is, that Ruſhworth, ſpeaking of ſerjeant Aſhley's ſpeech in the houſe of lords, ſays, he advanced the following propoſition, for which he was committed to cuſtody, and afterwards recanted: "That the lords muſt allow the king to govern by acts of ſtate, otherwiſe he is a king without a council, or a council without power." Nalſon makes it a crime in Ruſhworth, not to have given Aſhley's whole ſpeech, which would have ſhewn that the ſerjeant's fault was rather ſtemming the popular tide, than any other offence; that is, according to Nalſon, Aſhley very juſtly maintained this maxim, that the king muſt be allowed to govern by acts of ſtate. Such a charge can do no great injury to Ruſhworth.

The third caſe relates to the famous ſir Edward Coke, who, when judge, was of opinion, that if the privy-council commit a man, he is not bailable by any court of juſtice. But afterwards, being turned out of his office, and choſen member of parliament, he maintained the contrary opinion. Nalſon accuſes Ruſhworth of concealing this change in Coke, by caſtrating and abridging his ſpeeches, for fear his readers ſhould perceive that Coke, who was odious to the court, acted out of revenge, in maintaining an opinion contrary to his aſſertion when judge.

This is all Ruſhworth has been charged with. But I queſtion whether the equitable and diſintereſted will be convinced, that theſe particular accuſations ought to make him forfeit all his credit. His work is in eight volumes in folio, and contain ſo great a number of facts, votes, public ſpeeches, and papers of all kinds, that it would be a ſort of miracle to meet with nothing to cenſure. However, all poſſible endeavours have been uſed to diſcredit him, by general charges of partiality, unfaithfulneſs, and inſincerity. And it was this that induced me to ſay what I have ſaid, in order to ſhew what theſe general accuſations amounted to, when reduced to particular caſes.

It is however very certain, that Ruſhworth's aim and deſign, in publiſhing his Collections, was to diſparage the king's conduct, and favour the parliament's cauſe. But Ruſhworth's intention ſignifies nothing, to the knowing whether a man may ſafely make uſe of his Collections. The only queſtion is, whether his papers are true or falſe. If they are true, however injurious they be to the king's cauſe, whoever will write an impartial hiſtory of this reign, is not obliged to reject them for that reaſon. This is ſo true, that even the moſt devoted hiſtorians to Charles I. have been forced to make uſe of theſe papers [b], and take them for granted, becauſe otherwiſe it would be impoſſible to compoſe the hiſtory of this reign, which conſiſts only of the materials furniſhed by Ruſhworth. Had he begun his Collections no higher than with the affairs of the parliament of November the 3d 1640, the king's friends would doubtleſs have readily forgiven him. But the papers of the twenty foregoing years are too hard of digeſtion, becauſe they ill-agree with the hypotheſis of the royal party, of which I ſhall ſpeak preſently, and too clearly diſcover, that Charles I. deſigned to introduce arbitrary power, and conſequently, the long parliament had ſtrong reaſons to hinder the entire execution of ſuch a deſign.

I do not ſee therefore any reaſon for rejecting the papers inſerted by Ruſhworth in his Collections, eſpecially as both parties have equally made uſe of them, though in a very different manner. Some produce them in favour of the parliament, and others, to ſupport the king's cauſe. But even in this, both have owned, they were not only uſeful, but abſolutely neceſſary. If there are any paſſages combated or forged, they are very few; and it is ſtrange, that after ſo many exclamations againſt Ruſhworth's concealments and omiſſions, there appear in the writings of the king's favourers ſo few material papers that are not in his Collections.

I proceed now to thoſe who wrote in vindication of the king's cauſe, as Franklin, Nalſon, and the earl of Clarendon, omitting the other authors of leſs note, to avoid being tedious.

Theſe, in compiling the hiſtory of this reign, have formed two ſyſtems, directly contrary to thoſe of the friends of the parliament, though they have made uſe of Ruſhworth's materials. As theſe books were compoſed at a time when the regal authority was higher than ever, they have not ſcrupled to build upon the ſuppoſition of the king's having an abſolute power. Though they uſe not the word, there is hardly a page in their writings where this principle is not maintained or ſuppoſed. Hence it follows, that on the parliament's ſide, the civil war was a manifeſt rebellion. So, the proceedings of the parliament, which ſome repreſent as abſolutely neceſſary for the preſervation of the government, are accounted by others as rebellions and treaſons, and tending to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution of the ſtate, without any neceſſity of diſcovering the facts.

The ſecond ſyſtem of the king's party is no leſs contrary to that of the favourers of the parliament. Theſe pretend, that the parliament being ſufficiently convinced by undeniable proofs of the king's deſigns to eſtabliſh arbitrary power, and alter the conſtitution, thought themſelves obliged to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevent the execution of that project. This was their ſyſtem. The king's adherents form another, entirely different. They call the king's pretended efforts to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government, a chimera, affirming what was termed abſolute power, was preciſely what the laws allowed the king. Indeed this was the principle of James I. Charles I. Charles II. and James II. Conſequently, they pretend, that to hinder the king from exerciſing ſuch a power, was oppoſing the laws of the land. But as it evidently appeared in the reign of Charles I. that the parliament and the people were not of this opinion, it was neceſſary to give ſome plauſible reaſons of the troubles cauſed by this diſpute in that reign. To this end, they have eſtabliſhed a ſyſtem, which with the principle of the king's abſolute power, is the baſis and foundation of whatever they have written. And that is, the oppoſition king Charles met with, proceeded not from the people's belief that the king had exceeded the bounds of his power, but from a project long ſince formed, to alter the conſtitution of the church. That the preſbyterians, authors of this project, knowing the king's ſtedfaſtneſs upon that head, judged there was no other way to execute it than by ruining the king, and depriving him of his prerogatives. That to attain their ends, they inſtilled into the reſt of the parliament and nation, groundleſs ſuſpicions and jealouſies, which they took care to cheriſh by all imaginable means, till they came at length to an entire breach, and to a war which proved ſo fatal to the king, and gave them opportunity to eſtabliſh preſbytery on the ruins of the church of England.

The fault in theſe two ſyſtems is, that neither contains the whole truth. The parliament's ſyſtem aſcribes all the proceedings of both houſes, ſolely to the deſign of redreſſing paſt grievances, and preventing an arbitrary government. It is however certain, that ſeveral members of both houſes joined with that deſign the intention of altering the government of the church, which could not be done but by the king's ruin. The ſyſtem of the royaliſts has the ſame fault; they impute to the parliament but one ſingle view, namely, to alter the government of the church; and counting as nothing the deſign to prevent the eſtabliſhing of abſolute power, they pretend it was only a contrivance or excuſe, to arrive with more eaſe to the principal end, which was to eſtabliſh preſbyterian government.

After having thus ſhewn theſe two different ſyſtems, I think it needleſs to explain particularly in what manner Franklin, Nalſon, and the earl of Clarendon, apply theirs to the facts agreed on by all. I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that they omit no occaſion to combat the principles of the parliament, or to impute to them motives entirely different from thoſe they pretended to act by. Herein their aim was to hinder their readers from being poſſeſſed with a belief, that the parliament intended the good of their country, or had any other views than thoſe they aſcribe to them.

It is eaſy to perceive, by what has been ſaid, how the hiſtorians of the reign of Charles I. may be different, nay, contrary, according as the authors have cloſely followed one or other of theſe two ſyſtems. And this is what has actually happened. The hiſtories of the two parties, though founded upon the ſame facts, are ſo oppoſite to one another, that a reader, who is not very attentive, or wants leiſure, to examine what is propoſed to him, knows not where he is when he ſees this diſagreement.

For my part, who am not engaged in either of the parties, and aim only at truth, I do not think myſelf obliged blindly to follow one or other of the two ſyſtems; but have eſtabliſhed a third, compoſed of both, by ſupplying their defects. I leave it to the reader to judge, whether it be ſufficiently coherent to give him a diſtinct knowledge of the affairs of this reign. If I ſometimes ſeem to incline to one ſide, it is becauſe I have no reaſon to ſwerve from the truth, and am perſuaded, that the king and the parliament were both very much in wrong, though not always, nor on the ſame occaſions.

This has induced me to cite, throughout the hiſtory of this reign, ſcarce any author but Ruſhworth, though no reign has more writers. My reaſon was, becauſe Ruſhworth has formed no ſyſtem, but contented himſelf with furniſhing materials common to both parties, and of which both have made great uſe. But though I have carefully read and collated the works of Franklin, Nalſon, and the earl of Clarendon, I did not think proper to quote them, becauſe they ſcarce let fact or paper paſs without applying it to their ſyſtem, which is not always agreeable to mine. It would therefore very much embarraſs the reader, to quote, in proof of what I advance, facts or papers that are always followed with reaſonings, often directly contrary to my ſyſtem. I thought proper to ſay thus much in juſtification of the manner in which I have compoſed the hiſtory of this reign [c].

[b] As particularly Nalſon himſelf, and Franklin; the main of whoſe collections is taken out of Ruſhworth.

King

[c] It does not appear that Rapin ever ſaw Whitelock's Memorials, of which doubtleſs, he would have made great uſe, ſince they contain many things that never would have come to light, at leaſt, not without ſome preparation and adjuſtment. For as the author never intended his work for the public, nor meant otherwiſe by it than as a book for his memory and private uſe, he had not any temptations to prevaricate, nor can be well ſuſpected of a deſign to repreſent things otherwiſe than faithfully to himſelf. All is naked there, and the party more likely to ſuffer by the truth, than the truth to have any violence in favour of a party. His book is entitled, "Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, or an Hiſtorical Account of what paſſed from the beginning of the Reign of Charles I. to King Charles II.'s happy Reſtoration, containing the public Tranſactions, Civil and Military, together with the private Conſultations and Secrets of the Cabinet." It is wrote by way of diary, though ſo much was the author upon the ſtage during all the time of action, that the particulars of his diary go very far towards a perfect hiſtory of thoſe times.

25. CHARLES I.

[1625.] CHARLES I. ſon and ſucceſſor of James I. was tinctured from his infancy with the principles concerning the regal authority and prerogative royal, which were ſo much inculcated by the deceaſed king during his life. He had the ſame favourite, the ſame council, the ſame miniſters, and all the places at court, and in the kingdom, continued in the hands of the duke of Buckingham's creatures. So there was nothing new but the king's perſon. Charles's journey to Spain had ſo endeared the duke of Buckingham to him, that king James's affection for that favourite was nothing, as I may ſay, in compariſon of the new king's. It was thought, and it is not unlikely, if James had lived, he would have diſcarded the duke, with whom he was diſpleaſed for ſeveral reaſons: 1. Becauſe of the journey into Spain, of which he was the ſole adviſer, and which had expoſed the king to the cenſure of all Europe. 2. On account of the breach of the Spaniſh match without any juſt cauſe. 3. For the duke's engaging him, as it were againſt his will, to break with Spain. 4. For cauſing, by the prince's credit, and his intereſt with the parliament, the lord-treaſurer Middleſex to be condemned, in ſpite of the king himſelf, who did his utmoſt to ſave him, and even ſued the prince and the duke for his pardon, without being able to obtain it. Thus James died very ſeaſonably for the favourite, who, probably, to ſupport himſelf, muſt have ſet the prince at variance with his father, which might have had terrible conſequences. This raiſed ſtrong ſuſpicions of the duke, which were farther confirmed by his preſuming to apply a plaiſter to the king's ſide, and giving him, with his own hand, a portion to drink, without the advice of his phyſicians. Indeed, the duke could not be directly accuſed of haſtening the king his benefactor's death, by the remedies he gave him. But when the time and circumſtances of this unexpected death, cauſed by a tertian ague, not uſually very dangerous in the ſpring, were jointly conſidered, with the embarraſſments it delivered the favourite from, and the advantages it procured him, it was difficult not to ſuſpect him. And yet, on the other hand, when the new king was ſeen to have an entire affection for the duke, it could not be imagined that he doubted his innocence in that reſpect. However this be, the duke of Buckingham was the ſon's favourite, as he had been the father's, with ſtill greater power and credit than he had enjoyed in the foregoing reign.

Charles I. at his acceſſion to the throne, formed two projects equally difficult to be executed. The firſt was, to wreſt from the emperor and the duke of Bavaria, both the Palatinates which had been taken from his brother-in-law the elector Palatine. The ſecond, to carry the regal authority much higher than the king his father, or any of his predeceſſors had done. Theſe two projects, which ſeparately would, in all appearance, meet with great obſtacles, became almoſt impracticable, when joined together. Nevertheleſs, Charles believed they mutually ſupported each other: that under colour of the Palatinate war, he ſhould put the parliament upon a foot not to refuſe him any thing: that in time, he ſhould have both houſes at command, and after rendering himſelf independent, diſpoſe as he pleaſed of the riches of the kingdom, in executing his deſigns in favour of the king of Bohemia. As theſe two ſchemes are the ſubject of the firſt fifteen years of this reign, it will be neceſſary to ſet them in a clear light, that the ſequel may be the better underſtood.

As to the firſt, I mean that of wreſting the two Palatinates from the emperor and the duke of Bavaria, I think it needleſs to repeat what has been ſaid in the reign of James I. It will be ſufficient to put the reader in mind, that it was by the intrigues of the prince and the duke of Buckingham, and by the duke's wrong information of what paſſed in Spain, that the parliament was induced to adviſe the king to break the treaties, which were in effect broken already, and promiſe to ſupport the war, which this breach would probably cauſe. This was the prince's and the duke's real aim in diſguiſing the truth. Afterwards the prince, when king, miſſed no opportunity to take advantage of the parliament's haſty advice and promiſe, as if the parliament had really been the ſole author of the breach, and prime cauſe of the war for the recovery of the Palatinate. King James was the firſt victim of theſe artifices. He was made to break a treaty which he had been labouring ſeven years, and to loſe the portion he had reaſon to expect for the prince's marriage with the infanta. He was engaged againſt his will and inclination, in a war with the houſe of Auſtria [d], and, what he deemed the greateſt misfortune, compelled to have recourſe to a parliament; he that was ſo diſſatisfied with the two former, that, probably, he would never have called another, had it not been for this breach. The duke of Buckingham was the ſecond victim. As ſoon as the truth was known, he became the object of the public hatred, though, before his contrivances were diſcovered, he had been conſidered as a guardian-angel, for breaking the intended match. Finally, the prince having mounted the throne, reſolved to ſupport the war, in which the parliament had unadviſely engaged. But becauſe he found not in the houſe of commons that readineſs to aſſiſt him which he expected, he diſſolved ſeveral parliaments merely for that very reaſon. This bred in the minds of his ſubjects jealouſy and diſcontent, which being enflamed by other cauſes, brought him in the end to the greateſt misfortune that can befal a king. Hitherto the prince's and the duke's real motive in breaking the treaty with Spain is unknown. It is not conceived how, after the loſs of the Palatinate, they could imagine it more eaſy to recover that country from the emperor and the duke of Bavaria, by force of arms, than by managing the king of Spain's friendſhip, by means of the marriage already concluded. But the uſe the prince, now become king, intended to make of this war, adviſed by the parliament, can be no ſecret, namely, to accuſtom the houſe of commons, under pretence of the urgent neceſſity of the war, to ſupply him in a few days with the money he demanded, without conſidering any other affair. This will evidently appear in the ſequel. But before I deſcend to the particulars of the ſecond ſcheme, it is neceſſary to premiſe ſome remarks on the ſubject.

I have ſhewn in the reign of James I. that this firſt monarch of Great Britain, laboured as long as his monarchy laſted, that is, while he was king of England, to extend the prerogative-royal. This was not only in ſome points, and on certain occaſions, but by general principles, which being once admitted, would, by neceſſary conſequences, clothe the ſovereign with an unlimited authority. Whatever had been ſaid by the moſt zealous ſticklers for the abſolute power of ſovereigns, he readily applied to the kings of England, without ever examining whether the power of a king admitted of degrees, according to the ſeveral ſtates, or according to the conſtitution of the government whereof he was head. And yet this was the point in queſtion. Otherwiſe, it followed from his principles, that the regal power was the ſame every where, and a king of Poland, for inſtance, ought to be as abſolute as a king of Perſia. This was in effect what he always ſuppoſed in the affair of Bohemia, and what hindered him to eſpouſe his ſon-in-law's quarrel. So long as he was ſatisfied with inſinuating ſuch maxims, by certain expreſſions in his public ſpeeches, the people, and even the parliament, took no great notice of them. But when he meant to practiſe

[d] King James, upon his death-bed, exhorted his ſon the prince, to take ſpecial care of the elector Palatine's children, and to endeavour to reſtore them to the eſtate and dignities of their father. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 155.

the various conſequences which might thence be naturally drawn, he met with ſtrong oppoſition, which obliged him to diſſolve ſeveral parliaments, becauſe they were not ſo apt as he wiſhed to imbibe his inſtructions. This oppoſition provoked him. Nay, he began to ſpeak plainer, and aſſert, that parliaments owed their being to the royal conceſſion, and that this conceſſion might be revoked when they became unworthy of it, juſt as a charter granted to a corporation on certain expreſs terms, might be taken away, if the terms were not complied with. But the parliament would never allow of ſuch a principle. It was readily agreed, that the king had power to call, prorogue, and diſſolve the parliament: nay, that he might forbear ſummoning it for ſome time. But that England might, or ought to be governed without parliaments, if the king thought proper, is what could not be allowed, much leſs that the king could diſpenſe with, or act contrary to the laws. And yet to this height would James I. have carried his prerogative, an ambiguous term, by which he meant an abſolute power, or ſomething very near it. But the Engliſh, for the moſt part, underſtood by that word, only a power in the perſon of the ſovereign, to command or act in matters not repugnant to the law, or for which the law had not provided, and certain acts of grace and favour, which the king might exerciſe with regard to ſome private perſons, provided theſe acts were not very prejudicial to the reſt of the nation. This was the conſtant occaſion of the quarrels between James I. and the parliament. It could not be ſaid exactly, wherein conſiſted the king's prerogatives, and the people's privileges, becauſe there had never been any expreſs determination on that ſubject. Thoſe kings, who were reckoned the wiſeſt and moſt prudent, avoided as rocks ſuch ſort of diſputes, which can only breed hatred and animoſity between the king and people. On the other hand, former parliaments choſe rather to ſee the prerogative royal ſtretched ſometimes beyond its due bounds, than debate ſuch difficult points, which in caſe of obſtinacy on both ſides, muſt have been decided by arms, ſince there was no higher tribunal to appeal to. Beſides, ſince Richard II. whoſe attempt coſt him his crown and life, there had been no king who had endeavoured to carry the prerogative royal ſo far as to claim a power to act directly contrary to the laws. If there were any who, on ſome occaſions, attempted to go beyond bounds, the parliaments were under no concern, for one of theſe three reaſons: 1. Becauſe it was in things of little importance. 2. Becauſe, having a perfect confidence in their ſovereign, they believed he would not make an ill uſe of their indulgence. 3. Becauſe they ſaw the king's aim and motive were advantageous, or at leaſt not very prejudicial to the nation.

But James I. was no ſooner on the throne of England, but queſtions about the prerogative royal became frequent and abſolutely neceſſary. That monarch was continually endeavouring to eſtabliſh principles, the conſequences whereof tended to no leſs than to ſubvert the conſtitution of the government. I ſhall relate ſome that have already appeared in the hiſtory of his reign, but which it is the more neceſſary to repeat here, as Charles I. exactly followed his father's ſteps, and as it is not poſſible to have too clear an idea of theſe things, ſince they are the chief ſubject of this reign.

From the principle, that the parliament owed its being to the conceſſion of the kings, and that this conceſſion might be revoked, it followed of courſe, that the king might govern without a parliament, and conſequently, tax the people as he thought proper, for the ſupport of the government. From the principle, that the king was above the laws, it neceſſarily followed, that there was no ſecurity for the ſubjects, and their honour, fortunes. liberty, and life itſelf, where at the king's diſpoſal. From the principle, that the parliament had no right to concern themſelves with the king's affairs when their advice was not aſked, it could not but be inferred, that the king was to be ſuffered to do whatever he pleaſed, even things moſt deſtructive to the nation. From the principle, that to complain of the adminiſtration, was want of reſpect to the king, it neceſſarily followed, that the parliament could take no grievances into conſideration, nor make any complaints, ſince grievances are generally acts of injuſtice committed by the king or his miniſters. From the principle, that the parliament had at moſt but a right to repreſent the grievances to the king, after which, the redreſs was patiently to be expected from the king himſelf, it followed, that the king might harraſs his ſubjects at his pleaſure, without being obliged to redreſs their ſufferings, any further than he thought convenient. From the principle, that to diſpute the extent of his prerogative, was wounding the king in the moſt ſenſible part, the conſequence muſt have been, that the prerogative was without bounds, or that it could be limited only by the king's wiſdom and goodneſs. All theſe principles, as it is eaſy to perceive, tended to eſtabliſh a deſpotic power. Had the king been ſatisfied with doing now and then ſome extraordinary act, founded upon any of theſe principles, it might have been thought of no conſequence. But he was ſeen, upon all occaſions, to endeavour to inſtil theſe principles into the minds of his ſubjects, and to eſtabliſh them upon inſtances taken from the conduct of ſome of his predeceſſors. He himſelf was ſeen to draw from thence by his actions the moſt extenſive conſequences, to fill the kingdom with monopolies, to compel his ſubjects to lend or give him money, to diſſolve the parliaments for not allowing his principles, to impriſon ſuch members as ventured to ſpeak freely, and even to declare publicly, he would call no more parliaments. There was therefore no medium: his pretenſions were either to be complied with, or oppoſed with open force.

James I. had the happineſs to die before this diviſion was carried any farther. The breach of the Spaniſh match ſerved to reconcile the king and parliament to each other. The king perceived he could not proceed without parliaments, and the people judged that while the king was engaged in a war with the houſe of Auſtria, he would be forced to have a regard to the liberties of the nation and the privileges of the parliament. Thus both ſides ſeemed inclined to a reconciliation, and to forget all occaſions of complaint.

James being dead, Charles I. his ſon and ſucceſſor, who had greatly improved by his inſtructions, mounted the throne, poſſeſſed with the ſame principles. But as he was young and his paſſions ſtrong, he could put no conſtraint upon himſelf, nor think of managing the affection of the parliament. He ſoon diſcovered by what maxims he meant to proceed in the government of his dominions. He not only refuſed to redreſs the grievances introduced during his father's reign, but alſo added others more intolerable. He affected to let his ſubjects ſee, not only that their grievances touched him not, but that it was an offence to petition a redreſs. In a word, he very plainly intimated, both in his ſpeeches and conduct, that he looked upon parliaments, only as aſſemblies ſolely deſigned to ſupply them with money, and in caſe of refuſal, he could proceed without their aſſiſtance. Accordingly, he diſſolved ſeveral parliaments, becauſe they did not readily grant the ſums he demanded; offered violence to many members; and extorted from his ſubjects what money he wanted, by forced loans or taxes impoſed by his own authority. This ought not to ſeem ſtrange, ſince beſides the leſſons taught him by his father, he had the ſame favourite, the ſame miniſters, and the ſame council.

It is my deſign to ſhew all theſe things clearly and diſtinctly, not by reaſonings and conſequences, but by undeniable facts, by authentic vouchers of what I ſhall advance, and laſtly, by the king's own conduct, which his moſt zealous friends have no otherwiſe undertaken to juſtify, than by an affected ſilence, or at leaſt, by a very ſlight account of the firſt fifteen years of his reign. My ſole aim in thus enlarging on theſe things is, to enable the reader to underſtand the true cauſes of the war which afterwards afflicted the kingdom.

As ſoon as the deceaſed king's funeral was ſolemnized [e], Charles ſpeedily ſent eight thouſand men to Plymouth [f], to be embarked for an expedition to Spain. As he had but little money in his coffers, the charge of coat and conduct was ordered to be diſburſed by the country, and the country to be repaid out of the exchequer at a more convenient ſeaſon. This was done after the precedent of former times, though the cuſtom had now been long diſuſed. Theſe troops having committed great diſorders in their march, the king granted a commiſſion for martial-law, to puniſh the offenders [g]. This was looked upon as an innovation, which took from the uſual judges the cognizance of crimes committed by the ſoldiery, and yet, in general, it was not much conſidered.

The king's marriage having been concluded in his father's life-time, was ſolemnized at Paris with great magnificence, on a theatre erected before the church of Notre Dame, the duke of Chevreuſe performing the office of proxy for the king of England. Preſently after, the duke of Buckingham was ſent into France to conduct the queen to the king her ſpouſe. She arrived June 12, at Dover, where the king met her the next morning, and that evening the marriage was conſummated at Canterbury [h]. The 16th of the ſame month the king and queen made their entry into London, and two days after, the parliament met. The king made the following ſpeech to both houſes at the opening of this firſt parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I thank God, that the buſineſs to be treated on at this time is of ſuch a nature, that it needs no eloquence to ſet it forth; for I am neither able to do it, neither doth it ſtand with my nature to ſpend much time in words. It is no new buſineſs, being already happily begun by my father of bleſſed memory, who is with God; therefore it needeth no narrative: I hope in God you will go on to maintain it, as freely as you adviſed my father to do it. It is true, he may ſeem to ſome to have been ſlack to begin ſo juſt and ſo glorious a work; but it was his wiſdom that made him loth to begin a work, until he might find a means to maintain it: but after that he ſaw how much he was abuſed in the confidence he had with other ſtates, and was confirmed by your advice to run the courſe we are in, with your engagement to maintain it. I need not preſs to prove how willingly he took your advice; for the preparations that are made are better able to declare it, than I to ſpeak it. The aſſiſtance of thoſe in Germany, the fleet that is ready for action, with the reſt of the preparations, which I have only followed my father in, do ſufficiently prove, that he entered into this action.

"My lords and gentlemen, I hope that you do remember that you were pleaſed to employ me to adviſe my father to break off theſe two treaties that were on foot; ſo that I cannot ſay, that I came hither a free unengaged man. It is true, I came into this buſineſs willingly and freely, like a young man, and conſequently raſhly; but it was by your intereſt, your engagement: ſo that though it were done like a young man, yet I cannot repent me of it, and I think none can blame me for it, knowing the love and fidelity you have borne to your king, having myſelf likewiſe ſome little experience of your affections. I pray you remember, that this being my firſt action, and begun by your advice and entreaty, what a great diſhonour it were to you and me, if this action, ſo begun, ſhould fail, for that aſſiſtance you are able to give me. Yet knowing the conſtancy of your love both to me and this buſineſs, I needed not to have ſaid this, but only to ſhew what care and ſenſe I have of your honours and mine own. I muſt entreat you likewiſe to conſider of the times we are in, how that I muſt adventure your lives [i] (which I ſhould be loth to do), ſhould I continue you here long; and you muſt venture the buſineſs, if you be ſlow in your reſolutions. Wherefore I hope you will take ſuch grave counſel, as you will expedite what you have in hand to do: which will do me and yourſelves an infinite deal of honour; you, in ſhewing your love to me; and me, that I may perfect that work which my father hath ſo happily begun.

"Laſt of all, becauſe ſome malicious men may, and, as I hear, have given out, that I am not ſo true a keeper and maintainer of the true religion that I profeſs; I aſſure you, that I may with St Paul ſay, that I have been trained up at Gamaliel's feet: and although I ſhall never be ſo arrogant as to aſſume unto myſelf the reſt, I ſhall ſo far ſhew the end of it, that all the world may ſee, that none hath been, nor ever ſhall be more deſirous to maintain the religion I profeſs, than I ſhall be.

"Now becauſe I am unfit for much ſpeaking, I mean to bring up the faſhion of my predeceſſors, to have my lord-keeper ſpeak for me in moſt things: therefore I have commanded him to ſpeak ſomething unto you at this time, which is more for formality, than any great matter he hath to ſay unto you."

Then the lord keeper Williams [k] declared, "That the king's main reaſon of calling the parliament, beſides the beholding of his ſubjects faces, was to mind them of the great engagements for the recovery of the Palatinate, impoſed on his majeſty by the late king his father, and by themſelves, who broke off the two treaties with Spain. Alſo to let them underſtand, that the ſucceeding treaties and alliances, the armies ſent into the Low-Countries, the repairing of the forts, and the fortifying of Ireland, do all meet in one centre, the Palatinate; and that the ſubſidies granted in the laſt parliament are herein already ſpent, whereof the account is ready, together with as much more of the king's own revenue." His lordſhip further commended three circumſtances:

"Firſt, the time; all Europe being at this day at the pool of Betheſda, the firſt ſtirring of the waters muſt be laid hold on: wherefore his majeſty deſires them to beſtow this meeting on him, or rather on their actions; and the next ſhall be theirs, as ſoon, and as long as they pleaſe for domeſtic buſineſs.

"Secondly, ſupply, if ſubſidies be thought too long and backward, his majeſty deſires to hear, and not to propound the way.

"Thirdly, the iſſue of action; which being the firſt, doth highly concern his majeſty's honour and reputation, for which he relies upon their loves, with the greateſt confidence that ever king had in his ſubjects; witneis his royal poeſy, AMOR CIVIUM REGIS MVNIMENTUM: and he doubts not, but as ſoon as he ſhall be known in Europe to be their king, ſo ſoon ſhall they be known to be a loving and loyal nation to him."

Though the king affirmed in his ſpeech, that no prince was ever more deſirous to maintain the religion he profeſſed, the parliament does not ſeem to have fully believed it, ſince, at the very firſt, both houſes joined in preſenting to him a petition againſt recuſants. The king returned a very gracious anſwer, ſaying, he was very glad to ſee their zeal for religion, and was ready to concur with them in whatever they ſhould propoſe on that head. He deferred however anſwering each particular article of the petition, till he had examined it.

Richard Montague, a clergyman, had lately printed a book, entitled, "An Appeal to Cæſar," wherein were ſeveral propoſitions tending to the diſturbance of church and ſtate [l]. It was complained of to the commons, who bringing the author to the bar of their houſe, and examining him, thought proper to refer him to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. The archbiſhop, who was looked upon with no good eye at court, becauſe he was ſuſpected of being a friend to the puritans, contented himſelf with exhorting him to write no more upon ſuch ſubjects. The proceedings of the commons diſpleaſed the king, for Montague being one of his chaplains, he pretended the bringing him to their bar was an incroachment upon his prerogative. He expreſſed his diſpleaſure with the commons, and took occaſion to bring the cauſe before the council. Every one ſuſpected, that as Moutague's book contained an Arminian doctrine, Laud, biſhop of St. David's [m], the king's moſt intimate counſellor for religious affairs, had done this, to ſtop the proſecution. Laud was conſidered by many as the head and protector of the Arminians, who were now very numerous in the kingdom. He had inſinuated himſelf into Buckingham's favour, and by that means into the king's, who readily followed his counſels in the affairs of religion.

The diſpleaſure expreſſed by the king againſt the commons, hindred not the houſe from granting him two ſubſidies. The king accepted them graciouſly, but withal intimated, this ſupply was far ſhort of what was neceſſary for the war [n] to which his father was adviſed by the parliament. The act for the two ſubſidies was no ſooner paſſed, than the king adjourned the parliament to Oxford, to meet again the 1ſt of Auguſt following, by reaſon of the plague which raged in London.

King James, a little before his death, promiſed to lend the king of France five or ſix ſhips to be employed againſt the Genoeſe. At leaſt they were borrowed on that pretence. But afterwards, Lewis XIII. wanting theſe ſhips for the ſiege of Rochel, prevailed with Charles I. by Buckingham's means, that he might employ them where he pleaſed, and accordingly they were ſent to Dieppe, under the command of vice-admiral Pennington [o]. The maſters or commanders of theſe ſhips diſcovering they were to go againſt Rochel, [l] Our author ſeems here to confound two diſtinct things. Montague (in 21 Jac.) publiſhed a book, which he called, A new Gag for an old Gooſe, being an anſwer to a popiſh book, entitled, A Gag for the new Goſpel: and for this book it was that he was queſtioned by the parliament, and committed to the archbiſhop; who diſmiſſed him with an admonition. Afterwards the biſhops of the Arminian party conſulting the propagation of the five articles condemned at the ſynod of Dort, concluded, that Montague ſhould publiſh his appeal to Cæſar, at firſt atteſted by their joint authorities, which they afterwards withdrew by ſubtilty. However, the book was printed and dedicated to king Charles. The houſe appointed a committee to examine the errors therein, and thanked the archbiſhop for his admonition formerly to the author, and voted his books to be contrary to the articles eſtabliſhed by the parliament, and took bond for his appearance. weighed anchor and ſailed back to England. Pennington informing the duke of Buckingham of it, received an expreſs order, confirmed by another from the king himſelf, to return to Dieppe with the ſhips, and put them into the hands of the French, which was done accordingly. But the mariners all deſerted, utterly refuſing to ſerve againſt Rochel.

This affair made great noiſe at Oxford, where the parliament was re-aſſembled. Buckingham's ill conduct in this and other reſpects was loudly complained of in the houſe of commons. It was ſaid, the money granted by the parliament to the late king had been miſapplied, and put to uſes very different from thoſe it was intended for: that the ſeas were ſo neglected, that the corſairs had done great damage to the Engliſh merchants: that popery and arminianiſm were countenanced by a ſtrong party in the kingdom. Neil, biſhop of Wincheſter [p], and Laud, biſhop of St. David's were chiefly looked upon as the heads and protectors of the Arminians [q], nay, as favourers of popery, by reaſon of their rigid and paſſionate zeal for all the ceremonies of the church of England, even for ſuch as ſeemed the leaſt neceſſary. This zeal appeared to many as myſterious as uncommon, and cauſed them to ſuſpect, that the two prelates, under colour of maintaining religion, had formed a project to reſtore popery. They could not imagine that men ſhould have ſo ſtrong an attachment to things in themſelves of ſo little moment without ſome hidden deſign. Wherefore Mr. Montague was ſummoned a ſecond time before the houſe of commons [r], and ſeverely reprimanded.

Mean while, the king ſeeing the parliament had ſpent the three or four firſt days of their ſeſſion in talking of grievances, without any mention of the money he expected for ſupporting the war, ſent for both houſes, and in Chriſt-church-hall ſpoke to them in the following manner:

"My lords, and you of the commons,

"WE all remember that from your deſires and advice, my father, now with God, brake off theſe two treaties with Spain that were then in hand: well you then foreſaw, that as well for regaining my diſpoſſeſſed brother's inheritance, as home defence, a war was likely to ſucceed: and that as your counſels had led my father into it, ſo your aſſiſtance in a parliamentary way to purſue it ſhould not be wanting. That aid you gave him by advice, was for ſuccour of his allies, the guarding of Ireland, and the home part, ſupply of munition, preparing and ſetting forth of his navy. A council you thought of, and appointed for the war, and treaſurers for iſſuing of the monies: and to begin this work of your advice, you gave three ſubſidies, and as many fifteenths, which with ſpeed were levied, and by direction of that council of war (in which the preparation of this navy was not the leaſt) diſburſed.

"It pleaſed God at the entrance of this preparation (by your advice begun) to call my father to his mercy, whereby I entered as well to the care of your deſign, as his crown. I did not then, as princes do of cuſtom and formality, re-aſſemble you, but that by your further advice and aid, I might be able to proceed in that which by your counſels my father was engaged in. Your love to me, and forwardneſs to further thoſe affairs, you expreſſed by a grant of two ſubſidies yet ungathered; although I muſt aſſure you, by myſelf and others, upon credit taken up, and aforehand diſburſed, and as far ſhort, as yet, to ſet forth that navy now preparing; as I have lately the eſtimate of thoſe of care, and who are ſtill employed about it, whoſe particular of all expences about this preparation ſhall be given you, when you pleaſe to take an account of it."

When the king had done ſpeaking, the lord Conway and ſir John Coke, ſecretaries of ſtate, made ſpeeches, the deſign whereof, like that of the king's, was to demonſtrate the abſolute neceſſity the commons were under, to grant his majeſty a large ſum for the war wherein he was engaged. They forgot not to repeat that the war was begun by the late king, by the advice of both houſes of parliament, for this was what the king conſidered as an unanſwerable reaſon. But the parliament being now better informed how the king and the duke procured that advice from the former parliament, theſe two ſpeeches produced no great effect. The commons being returned to their houſe, proceeded to examine grievances, and in the examination divers complaints were made againſt the duke of Buckingham. It was alſo complained, that popery was not only tolerated, but even countenanced, contrary to the king's expreſs promiſe: That pardons were granted to recuſants, ſigned by the lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, who pretended to be authoriſed by the king, and that theſe pardons ſtopped the courſe of juſtice, and the execution of the laws. Whereupon the king thought himſelf obliged to return poſitive anſwers to the petition preſented to him at London by the two houſes, to which he had hitherto only anſwered in general. It is abſolutely neceſſary to inſert the petition, with the king's anſwers to each article, that the reader may the better judge how the king's promiſes were afterwards performed.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"It being infallibly true, that nothing can more eſtabliſh the throne, and aſſure the peace and proſperity of the people, than the unity and ſincerity of religion; we your moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons of this preſent parliament aſſembled, hold ourſelves bound in conſcience and duty to repreſent the ſame to your ſacred majeſty, together with the dangerous conſequences of the increaſe of popery in this land, and what we conceive to be the principal cauſes thereof, and what may be the remedies.

The dangers appear in theſe particulars.

"I. In their deſperate ends, being, both the ſubverſion of the church and ſtate, and the reſtleſſneſs of their ſpirits to attain theſe ends; the doctrine of their teachers and leaders, perſuading them that therein they do God good ſervice.

"II. Their evident and ſtrict dependency upon ſuch foreign princes as no way affect the good of your majeſty and this ſtate.

"III. The opening a way of popularity to the ambition of any who ſhall adventure to make himſelf head of ſo great a party."

The principal cauſe of the increaſe of papiſts.

"I. The want of the due execution of the laws againſt jeſuits, ſeminary-prieſts, and popiſh recuſants; occaſioned partly by the connivency of the ſtate, partly by defects in the laws themſelves, and partly by the manifold abuſe of officers.

"II. The interpoſing of foreign princes by their embaſſadors and agents in favour of them.

"III. Their great concourſe to the city, and frequent conferences and conventicles there.

"IV. The open and uſual reſort to the houſes and chapels of foreign embaſſadors.

[q] Rapin, as well as moſt of our writers, eſpecially thoſe of the puritan party, ſeem to confound two things, which have no manner of relation to each other, viz. arminianiſm and highchurch-principles. The arminian doctrine, condemned by the ſynod of Dort, held in 1618, was in ſubſtance reduced to theſe five articles: I. God does not in an arbitrary manner predeſtinate any perſon to be ſaved or damned. II. Chriſt died for all men, that is, all are partakers of the benefits of Chriſt's paſſion, who ſincerely perform the goſpel-terms of faith and repentance. III. How neceſſary ſoever grace may be towards our good actions, yet, IV. It is not irreſiſtible, that is, we are ſtill free-agents; conſequently, V. The faithful may finally fall away, or depart from a ſtate of grace. Now nothing can be more evident, than that a man may embrace all theſe opinions without being one jot the more a friend to popery or arbitrary power. Wherefore, though the firſt aſſertors of arminianiſm happened likewiſe to be zealous ſticklers for ſomething like a deſpotic power in the king, yet is the one no conſequence at all of the other, as abundance of our hiſtorians would inſinuate. Doubtleſs, Laud, Neile, Montague, and the reſt, who were for ſetting the king above the laws, would have been of that mind, whether they had been Arminians or not. Even at this time, the five articles above, which are now generally received in the church of England, are believed by thouſands, who are not for carrying the authority of the king or church beyond its due bounds. The reaſon why arminianiſm was condemned in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was, becauſe our articles and homilies (in the points above mentioned) were generally underſtood in a calviniſtical ſenſe.

[r] According to the condition of his bond. Montague's cauſe was recommended to the duke of Buckingham, by Buckeridge biſhop of Rocheſter, Howſon biſhop of Oxford, and Laud of St. David's, who obſerved, that learned men ought to be left to abound in their own ſenſe, it being the great fault of the council of Trent, to require a ſubſcription to ſchool-opinions, &c. See Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 176.

The

The remedies againſt this outrageous diſeaſe we conceive to be theſe enſuing.

" I. That the youth of this realm be carefully educated by able and religious ſchool-maſters, and they to be enjoined to catechiſe and inſtruct their ſcholars in the grounds and principles of true religion. And whereas by many complaints from divers parts of the kingdom, it doth plainly appear, that ſundry popiſh ſcholars, diſſembling their religion, have craftily crept in, and obtained the places of teaching in divers counties, and thereby infected and perverted their ſcholars, and ſo fitted them to be tranſported to the popiſh ſeminaries beyond the ſeas; that therefore there be great care in choice and admitting ſchool-maſters, and that the ordinaries make diligent enquires of their demeanors, and proceed to the removing of ſuch as ſhall be faulty, or juſtly ſuſpected."

His majeſty's anſwer.

" This is well allowed of; and for the better performance of what is deſired, letters ſhall be written to the two archbiſhops, and from them, letters to go to all the ordinaries of their ſeveral provinces to ſee this done; the ſeveral ordinaries to give account of their doings herein to the archbiſhops reſpectively, and they to give account to his majeſty of their proceedings herein."

" II. That the antient diſcipline of the univerſities be reſtored, being the famous nurſeries of literature and virtue."

Anſwer. " This is approved by his majeſty, and the chancellor of each univerſity ſhall be required to cauſe due execution of it."

" III. That ſpecial care be taken to enlarge the word of God, throughout all the parts of your majeſty's dominions, as being the moſt powerful means for planting of true religion, and rooting out of the contrary: To which end, among other things, let it pleaſe your majeſty to adviſe your biſhops by fatherly intreaty and tender uſage, to reduce to the peaceable and orderly ſervice of the church, ſuch able miniſters as have been formerly ſilenced, that there may be a profitable uſe of their miniſtry in theſe needful and dangerous times; and that non-reſidency, pluralities and commendams, may be moderated. Where we cannot forbear, moſt humbly to thank your majeſty for diminiſhing the number of your own chaplains; not doubting of the like princely care for the well-beſtowing of the reſt of your beneſices, both to the comfort of the people, and the encouragement of the unverſities; being full of grave and able miniſters unfurniſhed of livings."

Anſwer. " This his majeſty likes well, ſo as it be applied to ſuch miniſters as are peaceable, orderly, and conformable to the church-government. For pluralities and non-reſidencies, they are now ſo moderated, that the archbiſhops affirm, there be now no diſpenſation for pluralities granted; nor no man now is allowed above two beneſices, and thoſe not above thirty miles diſtant: And for avoiding non-reſidence, the canon in that caſe provided, ſhall be duly put in execution. For commendams, they ſhall be ſparingly granted, only in ſuch caſe where the exility and ſmallneſs of the biſhopric requireth. Alſo his majeſty will cauſe that the beneſices belonging to him ſhall be well beſtowed. And for the better propagating of religion, his majeſty recommendeth to the houſe of parliament, that care may be taken, and proviſion made, that every pariſh ſhall allow a competent maintenance for an able miniſter; and that the owners of parſonages impropriate would allow to the vicars, curates, and miniſters in villages and places belonging to their parſonage, ſufficient ſtipend and allowances for preaching miniſters."

" IV. That there may be ſtrict proviſion againſt tranſporting Engliſh children to the ſeminaries beyond the ſeas, and for the recalling of them who are already there placed, and for the puniſhment of ſuch your ſubjects as are maintainers of thoſe ſeminaries, or of the ſcholars; conſidering, that beſides the ſeducing of your people, great ſums of money are yearly expended upon them, to the impoveriſhing of this kingdom."

Anſwer. " The law in this caſe ſhall be put in execution: And farther, there ſhall be letters written to the lord treaſurer, and alſo to the lord admiral, that all the ports of this realm, and the creeks and members thereof, be ſtrictly kept, and ſtrait ſearches made to this end: A proclamation ſhall be, to recall both the children of noblemen, and the children of any other men, and they to return by a day; alſo maintainers of ſeminaries of ſcholars there, ſhall be puniſhed according to law."

" V. That no popiſh recuſant be permitted to come within the court, unleſs your majeſty be pleaſed to call him upon ſpecial occaſion, agreeable to the ſtatute of 3 Jac. And whereas your majeſty, for preventing of apparent miſchiefs both to your majeſty and the ſtate, hath in your princely wiſdom taken order, that none of your naturalborn ſubjects, not profeſſing the true religion, as by law eſtabliſhed, be admitted into the ſervice of your royal conſort the queen. We give your majeſty moſt humble thanks, and deſire that your order herein may be obſerved."

Anſwer. " If his majeſty ſhall find, or be informed of any concourſe of recuſants to the court, the law ſhall be ſtrictly followed: And his majeſty is pleaſed, that by proclamation the Britiſh and Iriſh ſubjects ſhall be put in the ſame caſe. And as his majeſty hath provided in his treaty with France, ſo his purpoſe is to keep it, that none of his ſubjects ſhall be admitted into his ſervice, or into the ſervice of his royal conſort the queen, that are popiſh recuſants."

" VI. That all the laws now ſtanding in force againſt jeſuits, ſeminary prieſts, and others, having taken orders by authority derived from the ſee of Rome, be put in due execution. And to the intent they may not pretend to be ſurpriſed, that a ſpeedy and certain day be prefixed by your majeſty's proclamation, for their departure out of this realm, and all other your dominions, and not to return upon the ſevereſt penalties of the laws now in force againſt them; and that all your majeſty's ſubjects may be thereby admoniſhed, not to receive, comfort, entertain, or conceal any of them, upon the penalties which may be lawfully inflicted: And that all ſuch papiſts, jeſuits, and recuſants, who are and ſhall be impriſoned for recuſancy, or any other cauſe, may be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained, as that none ſhall have conference with them, thereby to avoid the contagion of their corrupt religion: And that no man that ſhall be ſuſpected of popery, be ſuffered to be a keeper of any of his majeſty's priſons."

Anſwer. " The law in this caſe ſhall be put in execution, and a proclamation ſhall be to the effect deſired: and ſuch reſtraint ſhall be made, as is deſired, and no man that is juſtly ſuſpected of popery, ſhall be ſuffered to be a keeper of any of his majeſty's priſons."

" VII. That your majeſty be pleaſed to take ſuch order as to your princely wiſdom ſhall be expedient, that no natural born ſubject, or ſtrange biſhops, nor any other by authority from the ſee of Rome, confer any eccleſiaſtical orders, to exerciſe any eccleſiaſtical function whatſoever, toward or upon your majeſty's natural ſubjects within your dominions."

Anſwer. " This is fit to be ordered according as is provided, and it ſhall be ſo publiſhed by proclamation."

" VIII. That your majeſty's learned council may receive order and commandment, to conſider of all former grants of recuſants lands, that ſuch of them may be avoided as are made to the recuſants uſe or intereſt, out of which the recuſant receiveth any benefit, which are either void or voidable by the law."

Anſwer. " The king will give order to his learned council, to conſider of the grants, and will do according as is deſired."

" IX. That your majeſty will be likewiſe pleaſed ſtrictly to command all your judges and miniſters of juſtice, eccleſiaſtical and temporal, to ſee the laws of this realm againſt popiſh recuſants, to be duly executed; and namely, that the cenſure of excommunication be declared and certified againſt them; and that they be not abſolved upon public ſatisfaction by yielding to conformity."

Anſwer. " His majeſty leaves the laws to their courſe, and will order in the point of excommunication as is deſired."

" X. That your majeſty will be pleaſed to remove from places of authority and government, all ſuch perſons as are either popiſh recuſants, or, according to direction of former acts of ſtate, to be juſtly ſuſpected."

Anſwer. " This his majeſty thinks fit, and will give order for it."

" XI. That the preſent order to be taken for diſarming all popiſh recuſants, legally convicted, or juſtly ſuſpected, according to the laws in that behalf, and the orders taken by his majeſty's privy council upon reaſon of ſtate."

Anſwer, " The laws and acts in this caſe ſhall be followed, and put in due execution."

" XII. That your majeſty be alſo pleaſed in reſpect to the great reſort of recuſants to and about London, to command forthwith, upon pain of your indignation, and ſevere execution of the laws, that they retire themſelves to their ſeveral countries, there to remain confined within five miles of their places."

Anſwer. " For this the laws in force ſhall be forthwith executed."

" XIII. And

"XIII. And whereas your majeſty hath ſtrictly commanded and taken order, that none of the natural born ſubjects repair to the hearing of maſſes, or other ſuperſtitious ſervices at the chapels, or houſes of foreign embaſſadors, or in any other places whatſoever; we give your majeſty moſt humble thanks, and deſire that your order and commandment therein may be continued and obſerved, and that the offenders herein may be puniſhed according to the laws."

Anſwer. "The king gives aſſent thereto, and will ſee that obſerved which herein hath been commanded by him."

"XIV. That all ſuch inſolencies, as any that are popiſhly affected, have lately committed, or ſhall hereafter commit, to the diſhonour of our religion, or to the wrong of the true profeſſors thereof, be exemplarily puniſhed."

Anſwer. "This ſhall be done as is deſired."

"XV. That the ſtatute of 1 Eliz. for the payment of twelve pence every Sunday, by ſuch as ſhall be abſent from divine ſervice in the church, without a lawful excuſe, may be put in due execution, the rather for that the penalty by law is given to the poor, and therefore not to be diſpenſed withal."

Anſwer. "It is fit that this ſtatute be executed, and the penalties ſhall not be diſpenſed withal."

"XVI. Laſtly, That your majeſty would be pleaſed to extend your princely care all over the kingdom of Ireland, that the like courſes may be there taken for the reſtoring and eſtabliſhing of true religion."

Anſwer. "His majeſty's cares are, and ſhall be, extended over the kingdom of Ireland; and he will do all that a religious king ſhould do for the reſtoring and eſtabliſhing of true religion there."

"And thus (moſt gracious ſovereign) according to our duty, and zeal to God and religion, to your majeſty and your ſafety, to the church and commonwealth, and their peace and proſperity, we have made a faithful declaration of the preſent eſtate, the cauſes and remedies of this encreaſing diſeaſe of popery; humbly offering the ſame to your princely care and wiſdom. The anſwer of your majeſty's father, our late ſovereign of famous memory, upon the like petition, did give us great comfort of reformation; but your majeſty's moſt gracious promiſes made in that kind, do give us confidence and aſſurance of the continual performance thereof. In which comfort and confidence repoſing ourſelves, we moſt humbly pray for your majeſty's long continuance in all princely felicity."

Theſe gracious anſwers of the king to the ſeveral articles of the petition of both houſes, wanted only the performance of the promiſes. But if it may be judged by the continual complaints of the parliament throughout this whole reign, concerning theſe articles, on which the king ſeems to have given entire ſatisfaction, it will eaſily be ſeen that Charles's promiſes were no better performed than his father's. The king expected, that his anſwers to the petition would gain him the affection of the commons. But theſe anſwers, though ſo gracious and poſitive, could not engage them to do what he deſired, that is, to lay aſide all other buſineſs, and think only of granting him money. He was engaged in a war, to which he pretended the parliament had induced his late majeſty, from whence he inferred, it was great injuſtice not to enable him ſpeedily to ſupport it. This was true in one ſenſe. The parliament adviſed king James to break off the treaties with Spain, and promiſed to aſſiſt him in caſe the breach ſhould occaſion a war, as it was very likely. But, on the other ſide, it was now no longer a ſecret in England, that the former parliament was moved to give ſuch advice to the king, by the duke of Buckingham's narrative, a narrative falſe in every particular, though atteſted by the late king and prince. So the former parliament's advice being grounded on a wrong foundation, and as I may ſay, extorted by a mere artifice, the preſent parliament did not think themſelves obliged to perform very punctually a promiſe which the court had obtained rather by art, than by fairly ſtating the caſe. Nevertheleſs, this promiſe ſtill ſubſiſted; and if the commons had ſhewn the public they were not obliged to keep it, they could not have done it without grievouſly affronting the king, by the diſcovery of the artifices he had uſed to procure it. Th y were willing to avoid that extremity. And therefore, letting the promiſe ſubſiſt without any diſobliging reflection on the king, their aim was to excuſe themſelves from granting him freſh ſupplies for a war raſhly undertaken, and without any likelihood of ſucceſs. At leaſt, if they ſhould be forced to give any more money, rather than enter into a diſcuſſion of the cauſes which had engaged the kingdom in this war, they intended the king ſhould purchaſe them, in ſome meaſure, with the redreſs of the grievances the nation groaned under. Wherefore, inſtead of the money-bill, as the king deſired, they began with examining and even inquiring after the grievances of the nation, and the ſtate of religion [s]. In this inquiry, the duke of Buckingham and the reſt of the miniſters were not ſpared.

The king ſeeing what courſe the commons were taking, was extremely offended. Firſt, As by their ſlowneſs they broke all his meaſures for the preſent campaign. Secondly, He deemed it a manifeſt affront and contempt of his perſon, to preſume openly to attack his favourite and miniſters, or rather himſelf under their name. So, perceiving no likelihood of a ſpeedy ſupply, which was the ſole end of calling the parliament, he was determined to diſſolve it. The commons having ſome notice of it, haſtily drew up the following declaration, in order to throw the blame of the diſſolution on the king, for fear he ſhould himſelf lay it on them, under colour that they were not very ready to perform their promiſe.

The Commons Declaration.

"We the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, of the commons houſe of parliament, being the repreſentative body of the whole commons of this realm, abundantly comforted in his majeſty's late gracious anſwer touching religion, and his meſſage for the care of our health, do ſolemnly proteſt and vow before God and the world, with one heart and voice, that we are all reſolved, and do hereby declare, that we will ever continue moſt loyal and obedient ſubjects to our moſt gracious ſovereign lord king Charles: and that we will be ready in convenient time, and in a parliamentary way, freely and dutifully to do our utmoſt endeavours, to diſcover and reform the abuſes and grievances of the realm and ſtate, and in like ſort to afford all neceſſary ſupply to his moſt excellent majeſty, upon his preſent, and all other his juſt occaſions and deſigns; moſt humbly beſeeching our moſt dear and dread ſovereign, in his princely wiſdom and goodneſs, to reſt aſſured of the true and hearty affections of his poor commons, and to eſteem the ſame to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greateſt worldly reputation and ſecurity that a juſt king can have; and to account all ſuch as ſlanderers of the people's affections, and enemies to the commonwealth, that ſhall dare to ſay the contrary."

It evidently appears in this declaration, that the commons aim was to intimate to the people, that they intended not to deny the king money for his juſt occaſions: but believed to have a right to demand firſt the redreſs of grievances as a condition, though they avoided uſing that term. This is the method conſtantly obſerved by the parliaments on the like occaſions, and which is ſo neceſſary, that otherwiſe they would never be ſure of procuring the people any ſatisfaction with reſpect to their grievances. For grievances being properly acts of injuſtice, and breaches of the laws committed by the king or his miniſters, the deſire of obtaining money from the parliament is commonly the only inducement to the court to deſiſt from injuring the people. Of this there are frequent examples in the hiſtory of England. But James I. and Charles I. took a different courſe from that of their predeceſſors. They choſe to diſſolve their parliaments, rather than yield to redreſs their grievances. This gave occaſion to aſcribe to them a formal deſign to free themſelves from the yoke of the parliaments, or confine the uſe of them to the granting ſupplies and aſſeſſing the people. They could not underſtand, that what flowed from the royal authority ſhould be accounted a grievance. This firſt parliament was therefore diſſolved for this ſole reaſon the 12th of Auguſt, not having ſat to do buſineſs above three weeks both at Weſtminſter and Oxford. The king pretended to diſſolve it on account of the ſpreading of the plague, but the true reaſon was, becauſe he found not in this parliament a compliance and diſpoſition fit for his purpoſe [t].

The diſſolution of the parliament hindered not the king from purſuing his deſign of continuing, or rather of beginning, the war with Spain. For though the late king had taken ſome meaſures tending to a war, there had been however no action ſince the breach of the treaty. The ſending of count Mansfeldt into the Low-Countries, in order to march into the Palatinate, was almoſt the only thing that could be conſidered as a declaration againſt Spain, though the project had miſcarried. Charles reſolving therefore to undertake this war, of which he was the principal author and promoter, ſent the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Holland to the [s] They reſolved, that religion ſhould have the firſt place in their debates; next the kingdom's ſafety; and then ſupplies. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 180.

[t] The few acts made in this ſhort parliament were theſe: 1. An act forbidding ſports and paſtimes, ſuch as bear or bull-baiting, plays, or other unlawful exerciſes, on Sundays. 2. An act for the farther reſtraint of tippling in inns, alehouſes, and victualling-houſes.—The clergy granted the king three entire ſubſidies, and the laity two. See Statut.

Hague, to negotiate a league with the United Provinces. In the mean time, a fleet was equipping in England to act againſt Spain. But as he wanted money, he found no ſpeedier or better method to raiſe it, than by borrowing of perſons able to lend, to whom he directed letters under his privy-ſeal, requiring by way of loan ſuch ſums as each were taxed at [u]. This was the firſt effect of the diſſolution of the parliament. Theſe forced loans, practiſed by ſome kings of England, have ever been conſidered as great grievances, and tended to render parliaments uſeleſs. It will hereafter appear, that the next parliament did not ſuffer theſe to paſs uncomplained of. However, to ſoften people's minds, and induce them to lend their money more freely, a proclamation was publiſhed, to call home all ſuch children as were now educating in foreign countries, as well as all the Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, in the ſervice of the houſe of Auſtria. On the other hand, the privy council iſſued out warrants to diſarm recuſants [w]. I do not know whether theſe warrants were ſtrictly executed: but it is certain however, that afterwards the houſe of commons frequently required the diſarming of the papiſts.

The fleet deſigned againſt Spain was not ready to ſail till the beginning of October, under the command of Edward Cecil [x], lately made viſcount Wimbleton, who had the earl of Eſſex for vice admiral. The fleet conſiſted of eighty ſail, with ten regiments on board. The intent of the expedition was to wait in ſome convenient place for the Spaniſh plate-fleet which was expected from the Indies in November. As the admiral had ſufficient time, he might have attacked a great number of ſhips in the Bay of Cadiz, but the difficulty of the enterpriſe, or ſome other reaſon, cauſed him to neglect that advantage. He was contented with landing ſir John Burroughs with ſome troops, who meeting no oppoſition, only plundered ſome villages, and abuſed themſelves with wine, to their own, more than to their enemies prejudice. Whereupon they were forced to be re-embarked with all ſpeed. After that, the contagion ſpreading among the troops, the fleet returned to England in November, without the king's reaping any benefit from this armament, which had been very chargeable to him. This ill ſucceſs did great injury to the king as well as to Buckingham, who was looked upon as the contriver and director of the court-projects.

The king, finding himſelf without money, and conſequently unable to continue the war, reſolved at length to call a new parliament. But to avoid the inconvenience of ſeeing in the lower houſe ſuch members as had moſt oppoſed him and exclaimed againſt the duke in the late parliament, the court invented this ſtratagem. All theſe perſons were made ſheriffs, and ſo could not be choſen members of parliament. Sir Edward Coke was of this number: but, however, he and ſome others were choſen, preferring the ſervice they owed their country in parliament to that which they could render it as ſheriffs [y]. The parliament was ſummoned to meet on the 6th of February 1625-6, and on the 2d, being Candlemas-day, the king was crowned by archbiſhop Abbot; William Laud biſhop of Bath and Wells, the king's favourite biſhop, officiating as dean of Weſtminſter, in the room of biſhop Williams, who, through the king's diſfavour, was ſequeſtered from that ſervice [z]. Before the coronation, the king ordered by proclamation all ſuch as had forty pounds a year or more, and were not yet knights, to come and receive the order of knighthood. This was conſidered as a new grievance, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. It ſuffices to ſay at preſent, that when this cuſtom was firſt authoriſed by an act of parliament, with regard to ſuch as had twenty pounds a year in land, twenty pounds then were equal to three hundred at the time I am ſpeaking of. But the king thought it a favour to his ſubjects to include ſuch only in his order as had forty pounds a year.

The coronation was performed with the uſual ceremonies. But when all was over, the king being ſeated on his throne ready to receive the homages of the lords, Laud approached him, and read an extraordinary paſſage, of which there appeared no inſtance in former coronations. It contained the following words:

"Stand and hold faſt, from henceforth, the place to which you have been heir by the ſucceſſion of your forefathers, being now delivered to you by the authority of almighty God, and by the hands of us, and all the biſhops and ſervants of God: and as you ſee the clergy to come nearer to the altar than others, ſo remember that (in all places convenient) you give them greater honour, that the mediator of God and man may eſtabliſh you in the kingly throne to be a mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity, and that you may reign for ever with Jeſus Chriſt, the King of kings, and Lord of lords."

The parliament being aſſembled on the 6th of February, the lord keeper Coventry ſpoke thus to both houſes in the king's name:

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

"YOU are here aſſembled by his majeſty's writs and royal authority to hold a new parliament, the general, antient, and powerful council of this renowned kingdom; whereof if we conſider aright, and think of that incomparable diſtance between the ſupreme height and majeſty of a mighty monarch, and the ſubmiſſive awe and lowlineſs of a loyal ſubject, we cannot but receive exceeding comfort and contentment in the frame and conſtitution of this higheſt court; wherein not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but the commons of all degrees have their part, and wherein that high majeſty doth deſcend to admit, or rather to invite the humbleſt of his ſubjects to conference and council with him, of the great, weighty, and difficult affairs of the king and kingdom; a benefit and favour whereof we cannot be too ſenſible and thankful; for ſure I am, that all good hearts would be both ſenſible and ſorrowful, if we did want it; and therefore it behoveth all, with united hearts and minds, free from diſtraction and diverſion, to fix their thoughts upon counſels and conſultations worthy of ſuch an aſſembly; remembering, that in it is preſented the majeſty and greatneſs, the authority and power, the wiſdom and knowledge, of this great and famous nation; and it behoveth us to magnify and bleſs God, that hath put the power of aſſembling parliaments in the hands of him, the virtue of whoſe perſon doth ſtrive with the greatneſs of his princely lineage and deſcent, whether he ſhould be accounted major or melior, a greater king, or a better man; and of whom you have had ſo much trial and experience, that he doth as affectionately love, as he doth exactly know and underſtand the true uſe of parliaments; witneſs his daily and unwearied acceſs to this houſe, before his acceſs to the crown; his gracious readineſs to all conferences of importance; his frequent and effectual interceſſion to his bleſſed father of never-dying memory, for the good of the kingdom, with ſo happy ſucceſs, that both this and future generations ſhall feel it, and have cauſe to rejoice at the ſucceſs of his majeſty's interceſſion. And when the royal diadem deſcended upon himſelf preſently, in the midſt of his tears and ſighs for the departure of his moſt dear and royal father, in the very firſt conſultation with his privy council, was reſolved to meet his people in parliament: and no ſooner did the heavy hand of that deſtroying angel

[u] The method was thus: firſt, the king wrote to the lord-lieutenants of the counties, to ſend him in the names of ſuch perſons as were of ability to furniſh him with money, and what ſums they thought they could ſpare. Then the comptroller of the king's houſhold, by the council's order, iſſued forth letters in the king's name, under the privy-ſeal, to the ſeveral perſons returned for the loan of money, in form as follows: "Truſty and well-beloved, &c. having obſerved in the cuſtoms of former times, that all the kings of this realm, upon extraordinary occaſions, have uſed either to reſort to thoſe contributions, which ariſe from the generality of ſubjects, or to private helps of ſome well-affected in particular, by way of loan.—As we are enforced to proceed in the latter courſe—we doubt not but we ſhall receive ſuch a teſtimony of your good affection from you, and that with ſuch alacrity as may make the ſame ſo much more acceptable, eſpecially ſeeing we require but that ſum which few men would deny a friend—The ſum we require of you by theſe preſents is----which we promiſe in the name of us, our heirs, &c. to repay to you or your aſſigns, within eighteen months after payment thereof," &c. Purſuant to this privy-ſeal, the monies required were generally according to this proportion following, viz. for the Weſt-riding of Yorkſhire, ſir Thomas Wentworth 20l. ſir John Jackſon 20l. ſir Edward Oſborn 30l. Godfrey Copley, eſq; 15l. George Weſtby, eſq; 10l. ſir Henry Savil 30l. ſir John Savil 15l. Urſula Wentworth 10l. &c. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p 193.

[z] Biſhop Laud had the chief hand in compiling the form of the coronation, and officiated as dean of Weſtminſter, but did not crown the king, as Rapin ſays, by miſtake. The abbots of Weſtminſter, it ſeems, had formerly, and afterwards the deans, a conſiderable ſhare in the ſolemnities of the coronation. They had among other things, the cuſtody of the old regalia, that is, the crown, the ſword, the ſceptre, the ſpurs, &c. of king Edward the confeſſor. Theſe things it was the dean's buſineſs to prepare and ſet in order. Laud finding an old crucifix among the regalia, took care to place it upon the altar. Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. tom. II. p. 736.—He was afterwards charged of having made ſome alterations in the coronation oath; but ſee what anſwer he makes to this, in State-trials, tom. I. p. 866, &c.

He

forbear thoſe deadly ſtrokes, which for ſome time did make this place inacceſſible [a], but his majeſty preſently reſolved to recall it, and hath now brought you together, and in a happy time I truſt, to treat and conſult, with uniform deſires and united affections, of thoſe things that concern the general good.

"And now being thus aſſembled, his majeſty hath commanded me to let you know, that his love and affection to the public moved him to call this parliament; and looking into the danger, and the ſpreading of that mortality, and weighing the multitude of his majeſty's preſſing occaſions, and urging affairs of ſtate, both at home and abroad, much importing the ſafety and ſtate of this kingdom; the ſame affection that moved him to call it, doth forbid him to prolong the ſitting of this parliament: and therefore his majeſty reſolving to confine this meeting to a ſhort time, hath confined me to a ſhort errand; and that is, that as a thing moſt agreeable to the kingly office, to the example of the beſt times, and to the frame of modern affairs, his majeſty hath called you together to conſult and to adviſe of provident and good laws, profitable for the public, and fitting for the preſent times and actions: for upon ſuch depends the aſſurance of religion, and of juſtice, which are the ſureſt pillars and buttreſſes of good government in a kingdom: for his majeſty doth conſider, that the royal throne, on which God out of his mercy to us hath ſet him, is the fountain of all juſtice, and that good laws are the ſtreams and quits by which the benefit and uſe of this fountain is diſperſed to his people; and it is his majeſty's care and ſtudy, that his people may ſee with comfort and joy of heart, that this fountain is not dry, but that they and their poſterity may reſt aſſured and confident in his time, to receive as ample benefit from this fountain, by his majeſty's mercy and juſtice, as ever ſubjects did in the time of the moſt eminent princes amongſt his noble progenitors; wherein as his majeſty ſhews himſelf moſt ſenſible of the good of the public, ſo were it an injury to this great and honourable aſſembly, if it ſhould be but doubted, that they ſhall not be as ſenſible of any thing that may add to his majeſty's honour; which cannot but receive a high degree of love and affection, if his majeſty ſucceeding ſo many religious, wiſe, and renowned princes, ſhould begin his reign with ſome additions unto thoſe good laws which their happy and glorious times have afforded. And this his majeſty hath cauſed me to deſire, at this time eſpecially above others; for his majeſty having at his royal coronation lately ſolemnized the ſacred rites of that bleſſed marriage between his people and him; and therein by a moſt holy oath vowed the protection of the laws and maintenance of peace, both to church and people, no time can be ſo fit for his majeſty to adviſe and conſult at large with his people, as at this preſent time, wherein ſo lately his majeſty hath vowed protection to his people, and they have proteſted their allegiance and ſervice to him.

"This is the ſum of that charge which I have received from his majeſty to deliver unto you; wherein you ſee his majeſty's intent to the public: and therefore his deſire is, that according to that conveniency of time which his affairs may afford, you may apply yourſelves to diſpatch the buſineſs of this parliament."

Though it did not appear in this ſpeech, that the king intended to aſk a ſupply of the commons, that was however, as was afterwards ſeen, the real motive of calling the parliament. But the commons did not think themſelves obliged to gueſs the king's intention, or prevent his demand. So, after chuſing their ſpeaker [b], the firſt care was to thank the king for his gracious anſwer to the petition againſt recuſants, preſented to him at Oxford. Then they ſpent ſome days in examining the public grievances, amongſt which were reckoned the miſcarriage of the fleet to Cadiz, evil counſellors about the king, and the miſemployment of the three ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, granted to the late king, for the recovery of the Palatinate. To examine the grievances with more order and clearneſs, committees were appointed, one for ſecret affairs, another for grievances, and another for religion. The laſt, whereof Mr. Pym was chairman, called in queſtion again Montague's books, intitled, An Anſwer to the late Gagg of Proteſtants, An Appeal to Cæſar, and A Treatiſe of the Invocation of Saints, and reported to the houſe, the falſe, erroneous, papiſtical, Arminian, opinions found therein, repugnant to the articles of the church of England. For inſtance, "That the church of Rome hath ever remained firm upon the ſame foundation of ſacraments and doctrines inſtituted by God. That the controverted points between the church of England and the church of Rome are of a leſſer and inferior nature, of which a man may be ignorant without any danger of his ſoul at all. That images may be uſed for the inſtruction of the ignorant, and the excitation of devotion. That there are tutelar ſaints as well as angels. That men juſtified may fall away and depart from the ſtate of grace; and ſome other Arminian tenets."

[1625-6] The king ſeeing the commons bent upon the examination of religious matters, ordered his attorney general to acquaint the judges of the circuit, that it was his pleaſure they ſhould proceed with rigour againſt recuſants. He had promiſed this ſix months before, in his anſwer to the former parliament's petition: but, in all appearance, this article had been neglected by the court, or by thoſe who were commiſſioned to execute the orders. It is certain, during this reign, ſuch kind of orders were never punctually executed.

The king had demanded a ſupply of money to carry on the war; but the commons were in no haſte to grant it. On the contrary, they ſtill proceeded in the examination of grievances, and, among others, of certain repriſals made upon France with two much precipitation, to the great damage of the Engliſh merchants [c]. The council of war, appointed by the parliament to manage the three ſubſidies granted to king James, were alſo obliged to give an account of their conduct.

The king bearing this delay very impatiently, preſſed the commons to conſider of the ſupply. The lords alſo endeavoured to perſuade them to it, in a conference which they deſired on that occaſion; but it was to no purpoſe. On the contrary, they heard the report of the committee concerning the nation's grievances, wherein they had always the duke of Buckingham in view, and even cauſed him to be informed of the articles on which the complaints againſt him were grounded. Whereupon the king ſent a letter to the ſpeaker, with a meſſage to the houſe by ſir Richard Weſton.

"Truſty and well-beloved,

"HAVING aſſembled the parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs: and having of late, not only by meſſage, but alſo of ourſelf, put our houſe of commons in mind of our preſſing occaſions, and of the preſent eſtate of Chriſtendom, wherein they have equal intereſt with us, as well in reſpect of their own former engagements, as of the common cauſe: we ſhall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have in the midſt of our neceſſities attended their reſolutions; but becauſe their unreaſonable ſlowneſs may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole eſtate of things abroad; we have thought fit by you the ſpeaker, to let them know, that without more loſs of time, we look for a full and perfect anſwer of what they will give for our ſupply, according to our expectation, and their promiſes; wherein, as we preſs for nothing beyond the preſent ſtate and condition of our ſubjects, ſo we accept no leſs than is proportionable to the greatneſs and goodneſs of the cauſe: neither do we preſs them to a preſent reſolution in this, with a purpoſe to precipitate their counſels, much leſs to enter upon their privileges, but to ſhew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Chriſtendom may break in upon us upon the ſudden, to our diſhonour, and the ſhame of this nation. And for the buſineſs at home, we command you to promiſe them in our name, that after they have ſatisfied us in this our reaſonable demand, we ſhall not only continue them together at this time, ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, but call them ſhortly again to perfect thoſe neceſſary buſineſſes which ſhall be now left undone; and now we ſhall willingly apply fit and ſeaſonable remedies to ſuch juſt grievances which they ſhall preſent unto us in a dutiful and mannerly way, without throwing an ill odour upon our preſent government, or upon the government of our late bleſſed father. And if there be yet who deſire to find fault, we ſhall think him the wiſeſt reprehender of errors paſt, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counſel how to ſettle the preſent eſtate of things, and to provide for the future ſafety and honour of the kingdom."

The meſſage brought at the ſame time and delivered to the houſe by Weſton, contained five articles of expence to be provided for, namely,

[a] He means the plague, of which there died this year, in London and the out-pariſhes, thirty-five thouſand four hundred and ſeven perſons. Whitlock, p. 3.

[b] Sir Heneage Finch.

[c] It ſeems a report was made to the houſe, that the reaſon why our merchant ſhips and goods were ſeized in France, was, becauſe ſir James Bagg, vice-admiral of Cornwal, and others, had ſeized upon the goods of the French in our ports, particularly a ſhip called the Peter of Newhaven, by Buckingham's order, after the king and council had ordered the ſhip to be reſtored upon a juſt claim. That twenty-three bags of ſilver, and eight of gold, were by ſir Francis Steward delivered to the duke, who ſaid, he would juſtify the ſtay of the ſhip by order from the king. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 213.

Sir

" 1. That his majeſty's fleet being returned, and the victuals ſpent, the men muſt of neceſſity be diſcharged, and their wages paid, or elſe an aſſured mutiny will follow, which may be many ways dangerous at this time.

" 2. That his majeſty hath made ready about forty ſhips, to be ſet forth on a ſecond voyage, to hinder the enemy, which want only victuals and ſome men, which, without preſent ſupply of money, cannot be ſet forth and kept together.

" 3. That the army which is appointed in every coaſt, muſt preſently be diſbanded, if they be not preſently ſupplied with victuals and clothes.

" 4. That if the companies of Ireland, lately ſent thither, be not provided for, inſtead of defending that country, they will prove the authors of rebellion.

" 5. That the ſeaſon of providing healthful victuals will be paſt, if this month be neglected.

" And therefore his majeſty commandeth me to tell you, that he deſired to know without further delaying of time, what ſupply you will give him for theſe his preſent occaſions, that he may accordingly frame his courſe and counſel."

The commons were not very well pleaſed with the letter or meſſage, wherein were ſeveral things they could not approve. 1. The manner of demanding a ſupply, which ſhewed it to be not ſo much a free gift on their part as an obligation. 2. The king ſet them a time, by ordering it to be done without delay, and before all other things. 3. He would not accept of leſs than was neceſſary, and this could relate only to the five articles of expence, which was properly ſpecifying to them the ſum they were to give. 4. The king demanded money with an extraordinary and unprecedented haughtineſs. 5. The king grounded his demands upon the parliament's engagement to king James, an engagement fraudulently obtained by the duke of Buckingham's falſe narration. 6. The war, for which ſo much money was to be given, had been raſhly undertaken, at a time when there was no proſpect of ſucceſs; and the king and the duke of Buckingham were known to be the authors of it, though the king perpetually inſiſted upon the parliament's advice to his father. Had it been undertaken, at the beginning of the quarrel between the king of Bohemia and the emperor, or even before the loſs of the Palatinate, when there was room to hope for the aſſiſtance of the proteſtant princes, it might have been expected to be crowned with ſucceſs. But it was begun at a time, when all the princes of Germany were either ſubdued by or united to the emperor; at a time when there was not a ſingle place left that might afford the Engliſh entrance into the Palatinate, or could poſſibly be approached by them. How then could it be expected to wreſt the two Palatinates from the emperor and the duke of Bavaria? The whole therefore was reduced to the attacking of the Spaniard. Upon what account? It was either to oblige him to uſe his intereſt for the reſtitution of the Palatinate, in which caſe a war was needleſs, ſince he had promiſed his mediation, and even engaged to render it effectual, before the breach of the marriage: or elſe to conſtrain him to employ his arms in wreſting the Palatinates from the two princes in poſſeſſion, a project which appeared extravagant, and would have drained England of men and money to no purpoſe. Beſides, the late expedition of the fleet, was no great encouragement to proſecute that undertaking. 7. Finally, though the commons did not care openly to enter into all theſe diſcuſſions, they were willing however to ſhew the king, they did not mean to be amuſed with a promiſe extorted by a mere artifice, and, if they granted him money, would reap at leaſt the advantage of procuring the redreſs of the national grievances. But the king took care to ſhut that door againſt them, by deferring the redreſs of the grievances to another time. As they perceived, and the king himſelf intimated to them, that the deſired ſupply would not be the laſt, they could not be ſure, but in the next ſeſſion of parliament the king would again expect the money-bill to paſs before the grievances, and ſo there would be no end. Theſe were the true reaſons of the tardineſs of the commons, and their little ardour for the king's affairs, though they would not openly declare them for fear of engaging in debates offenſive to his majeſty. Nevertheleſs they were willing to intimate them to him, and, very likely, he perceived them well enough, though it was thought proper on both ſides to conceal them from the public. For this cauſe the commons reſolved to ſend an anſwer to the king's meſſage, full of reſpect, ſubmiſſion, expreſſions of zeal for his ſervice, and even promiſes of aiding him in his wants, though in a general manner. But withal, they artfully intimated to him, that redreſs of grievances ought to precede the ſupply they intended to grant him. Their anſwer was as follows:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" Your majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons now aſſembled in parliament, in all humility, preſent unto your royal wiſdom, this their loyal anſwer to the meſſage, which your majeſty was pleaſed by the chancellor of the exchequer to ſend unto them, deſiring to know, without any further deferring of time, what ſupply they would give to your majeſty, for your preſent and extraordinary occaſions, that you might accordingly frame your courſes and counſels. Firſt of all, they moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, to know and reſt aſſured, that no king was ever dearer to his people than your majeſty; no people more zealous to maintain and advance the honour and greatneſs of their king than they; which, as upon all occaſions they ſhall be ready to expreſs, ſo eſpecially in the ſupport of that cauſe, wherein your majeſty and your allies are now juſtly engaged. And becauſe they cannot doubt, but your majeſty in your great wiſdom, even out of juſtice, and according to the example of your moſt famous predeceſſors, will be pleaſed graciouſly to accept the faithful and neceſſary information and advice of your parliament, which can have no end but the ſervice of your majeſty, and ſafety of your realm, in diſcovering the cauſes, and propoſing the remedies of theſe great evils, which have occaſioned your majeſty's wants, and your people's grief.

" They therefore in confidence and full aſſurance of redreſs therein, do with one conſent propoſe (though in former time ſuch courſe hath been unuſed) that they really intend to aſſiſt and ſupply your majeſty in ſuch a way, and in ſo ample a meaſure, as may make you ſafe at home, and feared abroad; for the diſpatch whereof they will uſe ſuch diligence as your majeſty's preſſing and preſent occaſions ſhall require."

The king fully perceived the intention of the houſe in ſending him this anſwer. But he had not the ſame reaſons as the commons to be reſerved in his expreſſions. It was rather his intereſt to ſpeak freely, for fear, by diſſembling his principles and pretenſions, he ſhould encourage the commons to attack the duke of Buckingham, who was counted the prime author of the grievances. His majeſty therefore makes this reply to the commons anſwer:

" Mr. Speaker,

" The anſwer of the commons delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and ſatisfactory anſwer, and I thank them for it, and I hope you will with all expedition take a courſe for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine; but for your clauſe therein, of preſenting of grievances, I take that but for a parentheſis in your ſpeech, and not a condition; and yet for anſwer to that part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear your grievances, as my predeceſſors have been, ſo that you will apply yourſelves to redreſs grievances, and not to enquire after grievances. I muſt let you know, that I will not allow any of my ſervants to be queſtioned amongſt you, much leſs ſuch as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old queſtion was, " What ſhall be done to the man whom the king will honour?" But now it hath been the labour of ſome, to ſeek what may be done againſt him whom the king thinks fit to honour. I ſee you ſpecially aim at the duke of Buckingham; I wonder what hath ſo altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the laſt parliament in my father's time, when he was the inſtrument to break the treaties, all of you (and yet I cannot ſay all, for I know ſome of you are changed, but yet the houſe of commons is always the ſame) did ſo much honour and reſpect him, that all the honour conferred on him was too little; and what he hath done ſince to alter and change your minds, I wot not; but can aſſure you, he hath not meddled or done any thing concerning the public or commonwealth, but by ſpecial directions and appointment, and as my ſervant; and is ſo far from gaining or improving his eſtate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the ſame. I would you would haſten for my ſupply, or elſe it will be worſe for yourſelves; for if any ill happen, I think I ſhall be the laſt ſhall feel it."

This letter hindered not the commons from proceeding in the examination of the duke of Buckingham's conduct, it being reſolved to impeach him in form. The queſtion was moved by Dr. Turner, a phyſician, " Whether common fame be a good ground of proceeding for the houſe?" The queſtion was decided in the affirmative, after conſulting ſome lawyers [d], at which the king was extremely offended, and ſhewed his diſpleaſure to the commons, demanding withal, that Turner might be puniſhed for moving ſuch a queſtion [e].

[d] Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Noy, Mr. Selden, and others. Whit. p. 3.

[e] The king, in his meſſage, demanded juſtice alſo againſt Mr. Clement Coke,

But this meſſage ſignified but little, and the houſe ſtill continuing to proceed againſt the duke, it was the general opinion of the members, that, in granting the king money, the redreſs of the grievances was not to be neglected.

Mean while, to take from the king the pretence which all theſe delays might furniſh him with, the commons unanimouſly voted him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, to which, a month after, was added a fourth ſubſidy. Moreover they fixed the payment of the firſt to the laſt day of June [f]. Nothing a is clearer evidence of the deſign aſcribed by me to the commons, namely, that in granting money to the king, they meant to render their liberality ſubſervient to the redreſs of grievances. By this expedient they ſhewed the public, how ready they were to aſſiſt the king in his neceſſities; but at the ſame time reſerved to themſelves the liberty of paſſing this vote into an act (without which it was of no uſe to the king) when they ſhould think fit. Now, according to their intention, this act was not to paſs till the grievances were preſented to, and anſwered by the king. Thus he was deprived of the pretence to complain of their delays, though indeed what they did for him could be advantageous to him, but on ſuppoſition he would regard their deſires. This greatly embarraſſed the king. He plainly ſaw the commons deſign, and was the more offended, as all their proceedings was levelled at the duke of Buckingham, or rather at the king himſelf, who had publicly declared, the duke had only followed his orders, without being able to prevail for his being left unmoleſted. As he found they acted with too little reſpect, he reſolved to let them know how much he was diſpleaſed with their proceedings, doubtleſs, to frighten them into another courſe. He ſent therefore for both houſes to Whitehall, where he made the following ſpeech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

[1626] "I have called you hither to-day, I mean both houſes of parliament; but it is for ſeveral and diſtinct reaſons: mylords, you of the upper houſe, to give you thanks for the care of the ſtate of the kingdom now; and not only for the care of your own proceedings, but enticing your fellow houſe of the commons, to take that into their conſideration. Therefore (my lords) I muſt not only give you thanks, but I muſt alſo avow, that if this parliament do not redound to the good of this kingdom (which I pray God it may) it is not your faults. And you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, I am ſorry that I may not juſtly give the ſame thanks to you; but that I muſt tell you, that I am come here to ſhew you your errors, and, as I may call it, unparliamentary proceedings in this parliament. But I do not deſpair, becauſe you ſhall ſee your faults ſo clearly by the lord keeper, that you may ſo amend your proceedings, that this parliament ſhall end comfortably and happily, though at the beginning it hath had ſome rubs."

Then the lord keeper, by the king's command, ſpoke next.

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

"YOU are here aſſembled by his majeſty's commandment, to receive a declaration of his royal pleaſure; which although it be intended only to the houſe of commons, yet his majeſty hath thought meet, the matter being of great weight and importance, it ſhould be delivered in the preſence of both houſes, and both houſes make one general council: and his majeſty is willing, that the lords ſhould be witneſſes of the honour and juſtice of his reſolutions. And therefore the errand, which by his majeſty's direction I muſt deliver, hath relation to the houſe of commons. I muſt addreſs myſelf therefore to you, Mr. Speaker, and the reſt of that houſe.

"And firſt, his majeſty would have you to underſtand, that there was never any king more loving to his people, or better affectioned to the right uſe of parliaments, than his majeſty hath approved himſelf to be, not only by his long patience ſince the ſitting down of this parliament, but by thoſe mild and calm directions which from time to time that houſe hath received by meſſage and letter, and from his royal mouth; when the irregular humours of ſome particular perſons wrought diverſions and diſtractions there, to the diſturbance of thoſe great and weighty affairs, which the neceſſity of the times, the honour and ſafety of the king and kingdom, called upon. And therefore his majeſty doth aſſure you, that when theſe great affairs are ſettled, and that his majeſty hath received ſatisfaction of his reaſonable demands, he will, as a juſt king, hear and anſwer your juſt grievances, which in a dutiful way ſhall be preſented unto him; and this his majeſty doth avow.

"Next his majeſty would have you know of a ſurety, That as never any king was more loving to his people, nor better affectioned to the right uſe of parliaments, ſo never king more jealous of his honour, nor more ſenſible of the neglect and contempt of his royal rights, which his majeſty will by no means ſuffer to be violated by any pretended colour of parliamentary liberty; wherein his majeſty doth not forget, that the parliament is his council, and therefore ought to have the liberty of a council; but his majeſty underſtands the difference betwixt council and controlling, and between liberty and the abuſe of liberty.

"This being ſet down in general, his majeſty hath commanded me to relate ſome particular paſſages and proceedings, whereat he finds himſelf aggrieved.

"Firſt, Whereas a ſeditious ſpeech was uttered amongſt you by Mr. Coke, the houſe did not as they ought to do, cenſure and correct him. And when his majeſty underſtanding it, did, by a meſſage by mr. chancellor of the exchequer, delivered to the houſe, require juſtice of you, his majeſty has ſince found nothing but protracting and delays. This his majeſty holds not agreeable to the wiſdom and the duty which he expected from the houſe of commons.

"Secondly, Whereas doctor Turner, in a ſtrange unparliamentary way, without any ground of knowledge in himſelf, or offering any particular proof of the houſe, did take upon him to adviſe the houſe to enquire upon ſundry articles againſt the duke of Buckingham, as he pretended, but in truth, to wound the honour and government of his majeſty, and of his renowned father; and his majeſty, firſt by a meſſage, and after by his own royal mouth, did declare, That that courſe of enquiry was an example which by no way he could ſuffer, though it were againſt his meaneſt ſervant, much leſs againſt one ſo near him; and that his majeſty did much wonder at the fooliſh inſolency of any man, that can think, that his majeſty ſhould be drawn out of any end to offer ſuch a ſacrifice, ſo unworthy of a king, or a good maſter; yet for all this, you have been ſo far from correcting the inſolency of Turner, that ever ſince that time your committees have walked in the ſteps of Turner, and proceeded in an unparliamentary inquiſition, running upon generals, and repeating that whereof you have made ſame the groundwork. Here his majeſty hath cauſe to be exceeding ſenſible, that upon every particular he finds the honour of his father ſtained and blemiſhed, and his own no leſs; and withal you have manifeſted a great forwardneſs, rather to pluck out of his boſom thoſe who are near about him, and whom his majeſty hath cauſe to affect, than to truſt his majeſty with the future reformation of theſe things which you ſeem to aim at: And yet you cannot deny but his majeſty hath wrought a greater reformation in matters of religion, execution of the laws, and concerning things of great importance, than the ſhortneſs of his reign (in which he hath been hindered, partly through ſickneſs, and the diſtraction of things, which we could have wiſhed had been otherwiſe) could produce.

"Concerning the duke of Buckingham, his majeſty hath commanded me to tell you, That himſelf doth better know than any man living, the ſincerity of the duke's proceedings; with what cautions of weight and diſcretion he hath been guided in his public employments, from his majeſty and his bleſſed father; what enemies he hath procured at home and abroad; what peril of his perſon, and hazard of his eſtate, he ran into, for the ſervice of his majeſty, and his ever-bleſſed father; and how forward he hath been in the ſervice of this houſe, many times ſince his return from Spain. And therefore his majeſty cannot believe, that the aim is at the duke of Buckingham, but findeth that theſe proceedings do directly wound the honour and judgment of himſelf and his father. It is therefore his majeſty's expreſs and final commandment, that you yield obedience unto thoſe directions which you have formerly received, and ceaſe this unparliamentary inquiſition, and commit unto his majeſty's care, and wiſdom, and juſtice, the future reformation of theſe things which you ſuppoſe to be otherwiſe than they ſhould be: And his majeſty is reſolved, that before the end of this ſeſſion, he will ſet ſuch a courſe, both for the amending of any thing that may be found amiſs, and for the ſettling of his own eſtate, as he doubteth not but will give you ample ſatisfaction and comfort.

"Next to this, his majeſty takes notice, that you have ſuffered the greateſt council of ſtate to be cenſured and traduced in the houſe, by men whoſe years and education cannot attain to that depth: That foreign buſineſſes have been entertained in the houſe, to the hindrance and diſadvantage of his majeſty's negotiations: That the ſame

Coke, ſir Edward's ſon, and member for Aileſbury, who ſaid in the houſe, "That it was better to die by an enemy than to ſuffer at home." Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 218.

[f] And the laſt of October. Idem. p. 221.

year, yea, the firſt day of his majeſty's inauguration, you ſuffered his council, government, and ſervants, to be paralleled with the times of moſt exception: That your committees have preſumed to examine the letters of ſecretaries of ſtate, nay, his own; and ſent a general warrant to his ſignet office, and commanded his officers, not only to produce and ſhew the records, but their books and private notes, which they made for his majeſty's ſervice. This his majeſty holds as unſufferable, and it was in former times unuſual.

"Next I am to ſpeak concerning your ſupply of three ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, which you have agreed to tender to his majeſty. You have been made acquainted with the greatneſs of his affairs, both at home and abroad, with the ſtrong preparation of the enemy, with the importance of upholding his allies, ſtrengthening and ſecuring both England and Ireland; beſides the encountering and annoying the enemy by a powerful fleet at ſea, and the charge of all: This having been calculated unto you, you have profeſſed unto his majeſty, by the mouth of your ſpeaker, your carefulneſs to ſupport the cauſe wherein his majeſty and his allies are juſtly engaged; your unanimous conſent and real intention to ſupply his majeſty in ſuch a meaſure as ſhould make him ſafe at home, and feared abroad; and that in the diſpatch hereof you would uſe ſuch diligence as his majeſty's preſſing and preſent occaſions did require.

"And now his majeſty having erected a proceeding ſuitable to this engagement, he doth obſerve, that in two days only of twelve, this buſineſs was thought of, and not begun till his majeſty by a meſſage put you in mind of it, whilſt your inquiſition againſt his majeſty's direction proceeded day by day.

"And for the meaſure of this ſupply, his majeſty findeth it ſo far from making himſelf ſafe at home, and feared abroad; as contrariwiſe it expoſeth him both to danger and diſeſteem; for his majeſty cannot expect, without better help, but that his allies muſt preſently diſband, and leave him alone to bear the fury of a provoked and powerful enemy: So as both he and you ſhall be unſafe at home, and aſhamed and deſpiſed abroad. And for the manner of the ſupply, it is in itſelf very diſhonourable, and full of diſtruſt; for although you have avoided the literal word of a condition, whereof his majeſty himſelf did warn you, when he told you of your parentheſis; yet you have put to it the effect of a condition, ſince the bill is not come into your houſe until your grievances be both preferred and anſwered. No ſuch thing was in that expreſſion and engagement delivered by your ſpeaker, for which his majeſty holdeth, that you have receded both in matter and manner, to his great diſadvantage and diſhonour. And therefore his majeſty commandeth, that you go together, and by Saturday next return your final anſwer, what further ſupply you will add to this you have already agreed on, and that to be without condition, either directly or indirectly, for the ſupply of theſe great and important affairs of his majeſty; which for the reaſons formerly made known unto you, can endure no longer delay; and if you ſhall not by that time reſolve on a more ample ſupply, his majeſty cannot expect a ſupply this way, nor promiſe you to ſit longer together; otherwiſe, if you do it, his majeſty is well content that you ſhould ſit ſo long as the ſeaſon of the year will permit; and doth aſſure you, that the preſent addition to your ſupply to ſet forward the work, ſhall be no hindrance to your ſpeedy acceſs again.

"His majeſty hath commanded me to add this, That therein he doth expect your cheerful obedience, which will put a happy iſſue to this meeting, and will enable his majeſty, not only to a defenſive war, but to employ his ſubjects in foreign actions, whereby will be added to them both experience, ſafety, and honour.

"Laſt of all, his majeſty hath commanded me, in explanation of the gracious goodneſs of his royal intention, to ſay unto you, That he doth well know, that there are among you many wiſe and well-tempered men, well affected to the public, and to his majeſty's ſervice; and that thoſe that are willingly faulty are not many: And for the reſt his majeſty doubteth not, but after his gracious admonition, they will in due time obſerve and follow the better ſort; which if they ſhall do, his majeſty is moſt ready to forget whatſoever is paſt."

Then his majeſty ſpoke again.

"I muſt withal put you in mind a little of times paſt; you may remember, that in the time of my bleſſed father, you did with your counſel and perſuaſion perſuade both my father and me to break off the treaties: I confeſs I was your inſtrument, for two reaſons: one was, the fitneſs of the time; the other was, becauſe I was ſeconded by ſo great and worthy a body, as the whole body of parliament: Then there was no body in ſo great favour with you as this man, whom you ſeem now to touch, but indeed my father's government and mine. Now that you have all things according to your wiſhes, and that I am ſo far engaged, that you think there is no retreat; now you begin to ſet the dice, and make your own game: But I pray you be not deceived, it is not a parliamentary way, nor it is not a way to deal with a king.

"Mr. Coke told you, It was better to be eaten up by a foreign enemy, than to be deſtroyed at home. Indeed I think it more honour for a king to be invaded, and almoſt deſtroyed by a foreign enemy, than to be deſpiſed by his own ſubjects.

"Remember, that parliaments are altogether in my power for their calling, ſitting, and diſſolution; therefore as I find the fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue, or not to be: And remember, that if in this time, inſtead of mending your errors, by delay you perſiſt in your errors, you make them greater and irreconcileable: whereas, on the other ſide, if you do go on cheerfully to mend them, and look to the diſtreſſed ſtate of Chriſtendom, and the affairs of the kingdom, as it lieth now by this great engagement, you will do yourſelves honour, you ſhall encourage me to go on with parliaments, and I hope all Chriſtendom ſhall feel the good of it."

The king's and keeper's ſpeeches were ſo plain, that they could not be miſunderſtood. The king's aim in general was to intimate to the parliament, they were only his council, whoſe advice he might follow or reject, and he could either not aſſemble this council, or govern without it. The commons immediately turned the houſe into a grand committee, ordering the doors to be locked, and no member to depart till the houſe came to a reſolution concerning theſe ſpeeches. His majeſty having notice thereof, and perceiving this could not but retard his affairs, ordered a conference between the two houſes, and commanded the duke of Buckingham to explain his intentions, and give his words a ſenſe leſs offenſive than what they obviouſly bore. The duke ſpoke in the manner following:

"WHEREAS it is objected by ſome, who wiſh good correſpondency betwixt the king and people, that to prefix a day to give or to break was an unuſual thing, and might expreſs an inclination to the king to break; to remove this, as his majeſty was free from ſuch thoughts, he hath deſcended to make this explanation.

"That as his majeſty would not have you condition with him directly or indirectly, ſo he will not lie to a day, for giving farther ſupply; but it was the preſſing occaſion of Chriſtendom that made him to pitch upon a day.

"His majeſty hath here a ſervant of the king of Denmark, and another from the duke of Weymer, and yeſterday received a letter from his ſiſter the queen of Bohemia; who ſignified, that the king of Denmark hath ſent an embaſſador, with power to perfect the contract which was made at the Hague; ſo it was not the king, but time, and the things themſelves that preſſed a time.

"Therefore his majeſty is pleaſed to give longer time, hoping you will not give him cauſe to put you in mind of it again; ſo that you have a greater latitude, if the buſineſs require to think further of it.

"I am commanded further to tell you, That if his majeſty ſhould accept of a leſs ſum than will ſuffice, it will deceive your expectations, diſappoint his allies, and conſume the treaſure of the kingdom: Whereas, if you give largely now, the buſineſs being at the criſis, it comes ſo ſeaſonably, it may give a turn to the affairs of Chriſtendom.

"But while we delay and ſuffer the time to paſs, others abroad will take advantage of it, as the king of Spain hath done, by concluding a peace, as it is thought, in Italy, for the Valtoline, whereby our work is become the greater, becauſe there can be no diverſion that way.

"As it was a good rule to fear all things and nothing, and to be liberal was ſometimes to be thrifty; ſo in this particular, if you give largely, you ſhall carry the war to the enemy's door, and keep that peace at home that hath been: Whereas, on the contrary, if you draw the war at home, it brings with it nothing but diſturbance and fear, all courſes of juſtice ſtopped, and each man's revenue leſſened, and nothing that can be profitable.

"Another explanation I am commanded to make, touching the grievances; wherein his majeſty means no way to interrupt your proceedings, but hopes you will proceed in the the antient way of your predeceſſors; and not ſo much ſeek faults, as the means to redreſs them.

"I am farther commanded to tell you, That his majeſty intends to elect a committee of both houſes, whom he will truſt, to take the view of his eſtate, the defects of which are not fit for the eyes of a multitude; and this committee will be for your eaſe, and may ſatisfy you, without caſting any ill odour on his government, or laying open any weakneſs that may bring ſhame upon us abroad. That which is propoſed is ſo little, that when the payment comes, it will bring him to a worſe eſtate than now he is in; therefore wiſhes you to enlarge it, but leaves the augmentation to yourſelves; but is ſorry, and touched in conſcience, that the burthen ſhould lie on the pooreſt, who want too much already; yet he will not preſcribe, but wiſh that you, who were the abettors and counſellors of this war, would take a greater part of the burthen to yourſelves; and any man that can find out that way, ſhall ſhew himſelf beſt affected, and do the beſt ſervice to the king and ſtate."

After the duke had thus ſpoken for the king, he made his addreſs to them in his own behalf, taking this occaſion to vindicate his conduct, or rather to extol the ſervice he had done the ſtate. The lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, ſpoke next, and pretended among other things, to ſhew, that the three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, granted to the late king, had been employed according to the parliament's intention, becauſe nothing was diſburſed but by the king's expreſs orders, a reaſon which muſt have appeared frivolous to the houſe of commons[g].

The explanation of the king's intentions ſeemed to pacify the commons a little. How great ſoever their diſcontent was, at what the king ſaid about parliaments, they did not think proper to cenſure it, whether they feared to enter into ſo dangerous a diſcuſſion, or expected that the lords would take the affair in hand, ſince they were no leſs concerned. The commons contented themſelves therefore with preſenting to the king a remonſtrance, to juſtify their proceedings. The remonſtrance was preceded by an addreſs on the ſame ſubject. But as the addreſs was only an abſtract of the remonſtrance they were preparing, I ſhall paſs it over in ſilence, and inſert only the remonſtrance, which was thus worded:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WHEREAS your majeſty hath been pleaſed of late at ſundry times, and by ſeveral means, to impart unto us your royal pleaſure, touching ſome paſſages and proceedings in this preſent parliament: We do firſt, with unſpeakable joy and comfort, acknowledge your majeſty's grace and favour, in that it hath pleaſed you to cauſe it to be delivered unto us by the lord keeper of the great ſeal, in your own royal preſence, and before both houſes of parliament, That never king was more loving to his people, nor better affected to the right uſe of parliaments; withal, profeſſing your moſt gracious reſolution, to hear and redreſs our juſt grievances. And with like comfort, we acknowledge your majeſty's goodneſs ſhining at the very entrance of your glorious reign, in commanding the execution of the laws eſtabliſhed to preſerve the true religion of Almighty God, in whoſe ſervice conſiſteth the happineſs of all kings and kingdoms.

"Yet let it not diſpleaſe your majeſty, that we alſo expreſs ſome ſenſe of juſt grief, intermixed with that great joy, to ſee the careful proceedings of our ſincere intentions ſo miſreported, as to have wrought effects unexpected, and we hope, undeſerved.

"Firſt, touching the charge againſt us in the matter concerning Mr. Coke, We all ſincerely proteſt, that neither the words mentioned in your majeſty's meſſage, nor any other of ſeditious effect, were ſpoken by him, as hath been reſolved by the houſe, without one negative voice. Howſoever, in a ſpeech occaſionally uttered, he let fall ſome few words, which might admit an ill conſtruction; whereat the houſe being diſpleaſed at the delivery of them, as was expreſſed by a general and inſtant check, he forthwith ſo explained himſelf and his intention, that, for the preſent, we did forbear to take them into conſideration, which ſince we have done: and the effect thereof had before this appeared, if by importunate buſineſs of your majeſty's ſervice we had not been interrupted.

"The like interruption did alſo befal us in the caſe of Dr. Turner; wherein the queſtion being formerly ſtated, a reſolution was ordered to have been taken that very day, on which we received your majeſty's command to attend you.

"But for our own proceedings, we humbly beſeech your majeſty to be truly informed, that before the overture from Dr. Turner (out of our great and neceſſary care for your honour, and welfare of your realm), we had taken into ſerious conſideration, the evils which now afflict your people, and the cauſes of them, that we might apply ourſelves unto the fitteſt remedies: in the purſuit whereof, our committees (whatſoever they might have done) have in no particular proceeded otherwiſe, than either upon ground of knowledge in themſelves, or proof by examination of witneſſes, or other evidence. In which courſe of ſervice for the public good, as we have not ſwerved from the parliamentary way of our predeceſſors, ſo we conceive, that the diſcovery, and reforming of errors, is ſo far from laying an aſperſion upon the preſent time and government, that it is rather a great honour and happineſs to both, yielding matter to great princes, wherein to exerciſe and illuſtrate their nobleſt virtues.

"And although the grievous complaints of the merchants from all parts, together with the common ſervice of the ſubjects well affected to thoſe who profeſs our religion, gave us occaſion to debate ſome buſineſſes that were partly foreign, and had no relation to affairs of ſtate; yet we beſeech your majeſty to reſt aſſured, it was exceeding far from our intention, either to traduce your counſellors, or diſadvantage your negotiations. And though ſome examples of great and potent miniſters of princes, heretofore queſtioned in parliament, have been alleged, yet was it without paralleling your majeſty's government or councils, to any times at all, much leſs to times of exception.

"Touching the letter of your majeſty's ſecretary, it was firſt alleged by your advocate for his own juſtification, and after, by the direction of the committee, produced to make good his allegation.

"And for the ſearch at the ſignet-office, the copy of a letter being divulged, as in your majeſty's name, with pregnant cauſe of ſuſpicion, both in the body and direction thereof, to be ſuppoſitious, the committee, out of deſire to be cleared therein, did by their order ſend ſome of themſelves to the ſignet-office, to ſearch whether there were any records of letters of that nature, without warrant to the officer for any, much leſs for a general ſearch.

"But touching public records, we have not forborne, as often as our buſineſſes have required, to make ſearch into them, wherein we have done nothing unwarranted by the laws of your realm, and the conſtant uſage of parliaments. And if, for the eaſe of their labours, any of our committees have deſired the help of the officers repertories, or breviates of direction, we conceive it is no more than any ſubject in his own affairs might have obtained for ordinary fees.

"Now concerning your majeſty's ſervants, and namely, the duke of Buckingham, we humbly beſeech your majeſty to be informed by us your faithful commons; who can have no private end but your majeſty's ſervice, and the good of your country; that it hath been the antient, conſtant, and undoubted right and uſage of parliaments, to queſtion and complain of all perſons of what degree ſoever, found grievous to the commonwealth, in abuſing the power and truſt committed to them by their ſovereign. A courſe approved not only by the examples in your father's days, of famous memory, but by frequent precedents in the beſt and moſt glorious reigns of your noble progenitors, appearing both in records and hiſtories; without which liberty in parliament, no private man, no ſervant to a king, perhaps no counſellor, without expoſing himſelf to the hazard of great enmity and prejudice, can be a means to call great officers into queſtion for their miſdemeanours, but the commonwealth might languiſh under their preſſures without redreſs; and whatſoever we ſhall do accordingly in this parliament, we doubt not but it ſhall redound to the honour of the crown, and welfare of your ſubjects.

"Laſtly, we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty graciouſly to conceive, that though it hath been the long cuſtom of parliaments to handle the matter of ſupply with the laſt of their buſineſſes, yet at this time, out of extraordinary reſpect to your perſon, and care of your affairs, we have taken the ſame into more ſpeedy conſideration, and moſt happily, on the very day of your majeſty's inauguration, with great alacrity and unanimous conſent: After a ſhort debate we grew to the reſolution for a preſent ſupply, well known to your majeſty.

"To which, if addition may be made of other great things for your ſervice, yet in conſultation amongſt us, we doubt not but it will appear, that we have not receded from the truth of our firſt intention, ſo to ſupply you, as to make you ſafe at home, and feared abroad, eſpecially

[g] He ſhewed, that there had been paid, for the four regiments in the Low-Countries; for the navy: for the ordnance and forts in England and Ireland; and for the ſervice under count Mansfeldt; in all, 278,479l. Ruſhworth. tom. I. p. 232.

At

if your majeſty ſhall be pleaſed to look upon the way intended in our promiſe, as well as to the meaſure of the gift agreed.

"With like humility we beſeech your majeſty, not to give ear to the officious reports of private perſons for their own ends, which hath occaſioned ſo much loſs of time, nor to judge our proceedings whilſt they are in agitation, but be pleaſed to expect the iſſue and concluſion of our labours, which we are confident will manifeſt and juſtify to your majeſty the ſincerity and loyalty of our hearts, who ſhall ever place in a high degree of happineſs, the performing of that duty and ſervice in parliament, which may moſt tend to your majeſty's honour, and the good of your kingdom."

By this remonſtrance it appears, the commons did not look upon Coke's offence as a crime deſerving ſo ſevere a puniſhment as the king imagined, eſpecially as the king had been miſinformed. Moreover, in ſhewing reſentment againſt Coke, they were afraid of diſcouraging their members, and hindering them from freely ſpeaking their minds, beſides that they ſhould thereby authorize the king to make continual complaints on the like pretences. But on the other hand, if they declared Coke entirely innocent, they were apprehenſive of engaging in a diſcuſſion they were willing to avoid. As for Turner, they could not condemn him, ſince his motion was approved by the houſe. So, they only evaded the king's demand, for fear of offending him by a refuſal, imagining, the king would underſtand them. But as to the duke of Buckingham, the caſe was different. The king having eſtabliſhed for a principle, that the commons had not power to accuſe any of his ſervants without his permiſſion, they could not ſpeak too plainly, by reaſon of the importance of the king's pretenſions, which tended to deprive the houſe of one of their greateſt privileges. As to the ſupply, it is very viſible, the commons did not intend the king ſhould have it in his power to preſcribe them terms, but were reſolved to preſerve the right of granting what they thought proper, and when they ſaw fit. Indeed, it is of ſo great conſequence to the commons, not to loſe this right, that ſhould they ſuffer the leaſt encroachment upon it, they would aſſuredly become an empty name without any authority.

The king did not think proper to anſwer the remonſtrance, or at leaſt required time to examine it. Mean while he deſired the commons to adjourn for a week, as the lords had done; and they did ſo accordingly.

The king was extremely embarraſſed. He wanted money, and the commons had voted him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, to which they had lately added a fourth ſubſidy. But it evidently appeared they meant not to paſs the bill, till the duke of Buckingham's affair was finiſhed. So, the king not being able to divert the charge againſt the duke, without hindering at the ſame time the ſubſidy-bill, conſented at length, that the houſe ſhould proceed in the examination of his favourite's conduct, but it was with intention to put a ſtop to it, if the affair was carried too far [h].

A few days after, the commons ſent word to the duke of Buckingham, that they were paſſing articles of accuſation againſt him, of which he might be informed by the clerk's book, and take a copy thereof, and that they expected his anſwer, if he pleaſed to ſend any [i]. Whereupon the duke applied to the lords for leave to anſwer. But the lords did not think it convenient to permit him, under colour that he would thereby give the commons occaſion to defer the ſubſidy-bill, which they were preſently to take into conſideration. But the commons, without regarding the reaſon alleged by the lords, which was ſignified to them by the duke, continued their proceedings. Nay, they reſolved to annex to the charge, an article concerning the plaiſter and portion applied and given by the duke to king James in his ſickneſs, without the advice of the phyſicians. The king hearing of this, ſent a meſſage to the commons, "That he having conſented to their proceedings againſt the duke of Buckingham, and hearing there is new matter intended to be brought againſt him, nevertheleſs leaves the houſe to their own way to preſent the buſineſs to him, or to the lords, withal adviſing them to conſider of the ſeaſon of the year, and to avoid all loſs of time." He would probably have been glad, as he was chiefly concerned in the article relating to the king his father's life, the commons would have left it to his determination. But they feigned not to underſtand him, and only thanked him for his meſſage.

Some interruption was given to the duke of Buckingham's accuſation, and conſequently to the ſubſidy-bill, by a new affair which unexpectedly aroſe, and which it will be neceſſary briefly to mention, though I deſign not here to deſcend to particulars. The earl of Briſtol, who had been embaſſador in Spain for the affair of the marriage, which he had at length almoſt brought to a concluſion according to king James's deſire, had however the misfortune to diſpleaſe the prince and duke. As their aim was to hinder the earl from giving the parliament an exact account of what paſſed in Spain, they ſo managed, that at his return he was confined to his houſe, and afterwards ſent to the Tower. King James was fully ſatisfied of the earl's innocence, but was ſo little maſter of his actions the two laſt years of his life, that he dared not openly protect him. So, the prince and duke conſtrained him, on divers pretences, to keep him in priſon, that he might not ſpeak with him. After king James's dath, the earl's caſe became ſo much the worſe, as the new king and favourite, his profeſſed enemies, were no longer obliged to uſe any ceremony. He remained therefore in priſon till this ſecond parliament, that is, about two years, without being brought to a trial, or even any charge entered againſt him. At laſt, knowing how the commons ſtood affected to the duke, he reſolved to embrace this opportunity, and try to recover his liberty. He wiſhed alſo to be in a condition to juſtify his conduct, which the duke had aſperſed in order to caſt on him the whole blame of what had paſſed in the negotiation of the prince's marriage with the infanta of Spain. He preſented therefore a petition to the houſe of lords, ſhewing, that being peer of the realm, he had received no ſummons to the parliament, deſiring them to intercede for him, that he might enjoy his privilege. Whereupon the lords prayed his majeſty to ſend a writ of ſummons as well to the earl of Briſtol as to ſome other peers, whoſe writs were alſo ſtopped, which the king granted. A ſummons was therefore ſent to the earl, but withal, he received a letter from the lord keeper [k], acquainting him, that his majeſty would have him forbear his perſonal attendance. Upon this, the earl ſent a ſecond petition to the lords with the keeper's letter, telling them, it was done by the duke of Buckingham's credit, whoſe aim was to prevent him from diſcovering his crimes. Moreover, he beſought the lords to permit him to bring an accuſation againſt the duke, wherein he would demonſtrate how much the duke had abuſed the late king, his preſent majeſty, the ſtate, and the parliament. The king was ſo offended with the earl of Briſtol's boldneſs, that he ſent a meſſage to the lords, declaring, he was determined to exhibit before them a charge of high-treaſon againſt the earl of Briſtol. After this declaration, the lords could not avoid putting the earl into the cuſtody of the black-rod. Some days after, the earl being brought to the bar of the houſe, the attorney general read the charge againſt him in the king's name, who had corrected it in ſeveral places with his own hand. Nevertheleſs, the lords received the accuſation entered by the earl of Briſtol againſt the duke of Buckingham and the lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate. The king's charge againſt the earl was divided into three heads: namely, his offences, before the prince's going to Spain; during the prince's being in Spain; and after the prince's return. But the earl made ſuch a defence, as covered his accuſers with confuſion. He plainly ſhewed, how much the duke of Buckingham had deceived the parliament in his narrative of what paſſed in Spain. This reflected on the king himſelf, who had not only atteſted the narration, but perſiſted ſtill to atteſt it as true. Wherefore he did not think fit to proſecute a ſentence againſt the earl. As the charge againſt the earl of Briſtol, his defence, and his accuſation againſt the duke of Buckingham and the lord Conway, relate rather to the reign of king James, than to that of king Charles, I think it unneceſſary to inſiſt any farther upon this affair, which would lead me too far. However, as this is a curious point: as in the earl's defence there is an exact account of what paſſed in Spain in the negotiation of the projected marriage: and as the character of James I. Charles I. and the duke of Buckingham, may be there clearly ſeen, I ſhall inſert at the end of this book ſeveral papers upon this ſubject, which to me ſeem worthy the curioſity of the public.

Some days after the earl of Briſtol had given his anſwer, and preſented his charge againſt the duke and the lord Conway, the commons brought up to the lords their declaration and impeachment againſt the duke of Buckingham. It contained thirteen articles, which were explained and aggravated by the managers appointed by the commons. It is cuſtomary for the commons on ſuch occaſions, to divide the taſk among ſeveral of their members, each of whom prepares to ſpeak to the article aſſigned him [l]. Sir Dudley Diggs, who was appointed to explain and ſupport the beginning of the charge, after a ſhort prologue, read the following preamble:

"For the ſpeedy redreſs of great evils and miſchiefs, and of the chief cauſe of theſe evils and miſchiefs which the kingdom of England now grievouſly ſuffereth, and of late years hath ſuffered; and to the honour and ſafety of our ſovereign lord the king, and of his crown and dignity; and to the good and welfare of his people, the commons in this preſent parliament, by the authority of our ſaid ſovereign lord the king, aſſembled, do, by this their bill, ſhew and declare againſt George, duke, marquis, and earl of Buckingham, earl of Coventry, viſcount Villiers, baron of Whaddon, great admiral of the kingdom of England and Ireland, and of the principality of Wales, and of the dominions and iſlands of the ſame, of the town of Calais, and of the marches of the ſame, and of Normandy, Gaſcoign, and Guienne, general governor of the ſeas and ſhips of the ſaid kingdom, lieutenant-general-admiral, captain-general and governor of his majeſty's royal fleet and army lately ſet forth, maſter of the horſe of our ſovereign lord the king, lord warden, chancellor, and admiral of the cinque-ports, and of the members thereof, conſtable of Dover-caſtle, juſtice in eyre of the foreſts and chaces on this ſide the river Trent, conſtable of the caſtle of Windſor, gentleman of his majeſty's bed-chamber, one of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council in his realms, both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and knight of the moſt honourable order of the garter: The miſdemeanours, miſpriſions, offences, crimes, and other matters, compriſed in the articles following; and him the ſaid duke do accuſe and impeach of the ſaid miſdemeanours, miſpriſions, offences, and crimes."

The preamble being read, ſir Dudley Diggs gave a general knowledge of the impeachment, without inſiſting upon any particular article. He only reduced the charge to four principal heads. In the firſt, he ſhewed the grievances which ſprung from ſo many offices conferred on a ſingle perſon, and pretended it was one of the chief cauſes of the evils which afflicted England, as decay of trade, loſſes at ſea, and the contempt the nation was fallen into. In the ſecond, he ſpoke in general of honours being ſold or procured by the duke for undeſerving perſons. In the third, he ſaid, as the duke had raiſed all his poor kindred to honours, ſo he had exhauſted and miſemployed his majeſty's lands and revenues. In the fourth, he ſpoke of the remedies applied and given to the late king in his laſt ſickneſs; but he only juſt mentioned them, becauſe that article was to be enlarged upon by another manager.

As this charge was never decided, I think it needleſs to relate the particulars, or give an account of what was ſaid by each of the managers on the ſeveral articles. But that the reader may ſee in general what the duke was accuſed of, I ſhall inſert an abſtract of each article.

I. He was accuſed of ingroſſing into his hands a great number of offices, ſome whereof could hardly be executed by a ſingle perſon: and of procuring them by ill means.

II. Of purchaſing the office of high-admiral of the earl of Nottingham, [for the ſum of 3000l. and an annuity of 1000l.]

III. Of buying the office of lord-warden of the cinque-ports, of the late lord Zouch, [for the ſum of 1000l. and an annuity of 500l.]

IV. Of having neglected to guard the ſeas and protect the merchants.

V. Of confiſcating a French ſhip, called the St. Peter of Newhaven, worth 40,000l. ſterling: Of detaining the ſaid ſhip, after the king's order to reſtore her to the owner, and of taking out ſeveral things for his uſe.

VI. Of oppreſſing the Eaſt India company, by detaining under falſe pretences their ſhips which were ready to ſail, and of compelling them to give him ten thouſand pounds, that they might not loſe their voyage.

VII. and VIII. Of delivering ſeveral merchant ſhips and a man of war into the hands of the French king, againſt the will of the owners, to ſerve at the ſiege of Rochel.

IX. Of conſtraining ſeveral perſons to purchaſe titles of honour [m].

X. Of ſelling the office of high-treaſurer (to Henry Montague viſcount Mandeville) for 20,000l. and the office of maſter of the wards and liveries, [to ſir Lionel Cranfield] for 6000l.

XI. Of procuring to his kindred and allies titles of baron, viſcount, earl, without their having done the ſtate any ſervice.

XII. Of embezzling and ingroſſing the king's money and lands.

XIII. Of applying a plaiſter to the late king's ſide in his laſt ſickneſs, and of giving him a potion with his own hand at ſeveral times, in the abſence, and without the order of the phyſicians.

Theſe articles were enlarged upon by the ſeveral managers [n], and ſir John Elliot was appointed to make the epilogue to the impeachment, wnerein he ſummed up what had been ſaid againſt the duke, and ſpoke of him in very offenſive terms, but however mentioned not the plaiſter or potion.

The ſame or the next day, Diggs and Elliot were by the king's command ſent to the Tower [o]; and two days after the king went to the houſe of lords, and ſpoke to them after the following manner:

"My lords,

"THE cauſe and only cauſe of my coming to you this day, is to expreſs the ſenſe I have of all your honours; for he that toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great meaſure. I have thought fit to take order for the puniſhing of ſome inſolent ſpeeches lately ſpoken. I have been too remiſs heretofore in puniſhing ſuch ſpeeches as concern myſelf; not that I was greedy of their monies, but that Buckingham, through his importunity, would not ſuffer me to take notice of them, leſt he might be thought to have ſet me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his trial. And to approve his innocency as touching the matters againſt him, I myſelf can be a witneſs to clear him in every one of them.

"I ſpeak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to ſhew the reaſon why I have not hitherto puniſhed thoſe inſolent ſpeeches againſt myſelf. And now I hope you will be as tender of my honour, when time ſhall ſerve, as I have been ſenſible of yours."

The king's aim in this ſpeech was, firſt, to perſuade the lords they were all concerned in the diſreſpectful things ſpoken by the managers againſt the duke of Buckingham and ſome other members of their houſe, and that he had committed Diggs and Elliot to the Tower on purpoſe to vindicate their injured honour: but he ſucceeded not in his deſign. Secondly, by offering to be a witneſs for the duke of Buckingham, and to clear his innocence in every article of his impeachment, he propoſed to the lords a kind of dilemma, which he thought they would not be able to get clear of; for they were either to declare the duke innocent upon the king's evidence, or, by condemning him, openly reject his royal teſtimony, to which he imagined they would not eaſily be perſuaded. But they were not impoſed upon by this artifice, as will hereafter appear.

The king was no ſooner departed from the houſe, but the commons ſent a meſſage to the lords, to deſire the duke of Buckingham might be taken into ſafe cuſtody; but the lords durſt not commit him for fear of offending the king.

Mean while the impriſonment of Diggs and Elliot made a terrible impreſſion in the houſe of commons, who conſidered it as an expreſs breach of their privileges. Sir Dudley Carleton, one of the court party, obſerving the unuſual, and, as he termed it, ſullen ſilence of the houſe, ſtood up and juſtified the king, ſaying, "his majeſty conceived that Diggs went beyond his commiſſion, when ſpeaking of the plaiſter and potion given to king James, he ſaid, That he did forbear to ſpeak farther in regard of the king's honour. And as for ſir John Elliot, he affected to ſpeak of the duke with great contempt, and in very injurious terms. What diſpleaſed the king moſt was, that Elliot, in ſpeaking of the plaiſter and potion, uſed expreſſions intimating as if there was ſomething hidden, which it was not proper to reveal, and in ſo doing exceeded the commiſſion he had received from the houſe."

[l] It was managed by eight members, and ſixteen more as aſſiſtants. The eight chief members were ſir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Pym, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Wandesford, and ſir John Elliot. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 302.

[o] Upon the impeachment of the duke, a paper was privately conveyed to the king, importing, that this great oppoſition againſt the duke was ſtirred up and maintained by ſuch as ſeek the deſtruction of this free monarchy. That ſince the time of Henry VI. theſe parliamentary diſcourſings might never be ſuffered, as being ſymptoms of rebellions, and dethroning our king, and no one patriot daring to oppoſe them, leſt he incur the reputation of a fool or coward in his country's cauſe. His majeſty therefore ſtrengthened himſelf ever with ſome favourite, as whom he might better truſt than many of the nobility, tainted with this oligarchy. It behoveth his majeſty to uphold the duke, who, if he be decourted, it will be the corner-ſtone, on which the demoliſhing of his monarchy will be built. For if they prevail in this, they will pull the other feathers of royalty: they will appoint him counſellors, ſervants, &c. That the king and his father are concerned in the duke's accuſation; and if he ſuffers for obeying his ſovereign, the next attempt will be to call the king to an account, &c. Idid.. p. 356.

Unhappily, there was nothing of truth in what was aſcribed to theſe two members, except the little reſpect they had ſhewn for the duke of Buckingham; for Elliot had not mentioned the plaiſter or potion, and Diggs had ſaid nothing like what he was accuſed of: wherefore the houſe of commons, taking advantage of theſe falſe charges, ordered that all the members there preſent ſhould ſign the following proteſtation:

"I proteſt before Almighty God and this houſe of parliament, that I never gave conſent that ſir Dudley Diggs ſhould ſpeak theſe words that he is now charged withal, or any words to that effect, and I have not affirmed to any that he did ſpeak ſuch words, or any to that effect."

Beſides this, thirty-ſix lords who were preſent at the conference, where the impeachment of the duke was preſented, atteſted under their hands, that they did not hear ſir Dudley Diggs ſpeak any ſuch words. It followed therefore from the teſtimony of the lords, and the proteſtation of the commons, either that the king was falſely and maliciouſly informed, or that the charge againſt Diggs was invented to have an opportunity of puniſhing him for ſpeaking of the duke in ſo diſreſpectful a manner.

Elliot's crime was of the ſame nature, that is, he had ſpoken of the duke in uncivil terms, though he was falſely accuſed of mentioning the plaiſter in terms injurious to the king. But the commons took care to clear their two members, by declaring publicly, that neither had exceeded his commiſſion. All this was not for the king's honour, who ſeeing no way to ſupport what he had done, cauſed the two impriſoned members to be releaſed: In all appearance, his deſign was to terrify the commons, but he was diſappointed.

The king's condeſcenſion to the commons drew upon him an affair of the like nature from the lords. He had ſent the earl of Arundel to the Tower for much the ſame crime as that of Diggs and Elliot, and the lords had not complained of it: but when they ſaw the commons had obtained the releaſe of their members by inſiſting upon their privileges, they thought proper to take this occaſion to maintain their rights alſo. They preſented therefore a petition to the king, praying him to releaſe the earl of Arundel, according to the tenour of their privileges. The king perceiving how prejudicial to him this petition was, the lords pretending by means of their privileges, to limit the prerogative royal; for which reaſon he long reſiſted before he granted the lords requeſt. There were ſeveral remonſtrances from the lords to the king, and ſeveral meſſages from the king to the lords: nay, the peers went ſo far as to declare it an expreſs breach of their privileges to impriſon any of their members, the parliament ſitting, without ſentence or order of their houſe[p], and to reſolve to take no other buſineſs into conſideration till they had received ſatisfaction. At laſt the king was forced to releaſe the priſoner, though againſt his will. As by the cuſtom of England, members of parliament are not privileged from arreſt in caſes of treaſon and felony, the king pretended the houſe of lords ought not to take exception at his having committed one of their members; his reaſon was, becauſe the priſoner might poſſibly be guilty of felony or treaſon, and conſequently the houſe ought to wait till it ſhould pleaſe the king to declare the cauſe of his impriſonment. But as under colour of this poſſibility, the king had ſent the earl of Arundel to the Tower, and had not yet declared the cauſe, the lords plainly ſaw the poſſibility alleged by the king, was but an artifice to evade their moſt undoubted privileges. So, the king affirmed, that as the untimely diſcovery of a treaſon might happen to be extremely prejudicial to the ſtate, he could not allow to this pretended privilege of the members of parliament, all the extent required by the lords; becauſe there were caſes, wherein, for the good of the ſtate, it was abſolutely neceſſary to limit it. But the lords replied, if, on pretence of ſuch caſes, which were very rare, the king could impriſon a peer without the conſent of the houſe and declaration of the cauſe, it would follow, that in all ſorts of caſes he might detain a peer in cuſtody as long as he pleaſed, and thereby abridge the lords of their privileges. If it is aſked, why this diſpute was never raiſed in the former reigns, the queſtion is eaſily anſwered: for if a king happened to ſend a peer to the Tower, the parliament ſitting, either the cauſe was known, or, if a ſecret, the houſe took no offence, becauſe the lords not miſtruſting the king, did not fear he would draw it into a precedent to aboliſh their privilege. But it was not the ſame in the reign of Charles I. Beſides, that the earl of Arundel was known to be ſent to the Tower only for ſpeaking too freely in the houſe[q], what the king's principles were concerning the privileges of the people was no ſecret, and it was manifeſt that upon a bare poſſibility he was endeavouring to eſtabliſh a principle which added to render the privilege in queſtion entirely uſeleſs; and therefore the lords being warranted by the example of the commons, would not omit this opportunity to maintain their privilege.

Before the duke of Buckingham had given in his anſwer to the commons impeachment, the chancellorſhip of the univerſity of Cambridge becoming void by the earl of Suffolk's death, the king cauſed the duke his favourite to be elected in the room of the late chancellor. The houſe of commons were extremely offended at this election, conſidering it as a manifeſt contempt, that the duke ſhould be choſen whilſt under an impeachment, and when one of the articles againſt him was plurality of offices. Beſides, they maintained, there was a ſort of contradiction in this choice, ſince the univerſity themſelves, by their repreſentatives in parliament, had given their conſent to the duke's impeachment. But the king openly ſupported the election in ſpite of the commons.

At length, on the 8th of June, the duke gave in his anſwer to the impeachment of the houſe of commons. As I have not given the particulars of the accuſation, it would be needleſs to inſert here the anſwers, which had a neceſſary reference to what was alleged againſt the duke. This affair having never been decided, it is eaſy to judge that as the accuſation was very much aggravated, ſo the anſwers were palliated with great care: the proofs and evidences of the facts, produced for or againſt, would be the only means to inform us of the truth; but the affair was not carried ſo far. It will ſuffice therefore to ſay, that the commons deſiring a copy of the anſwer, the next day the king wrote the following letter to the ſpeaker:

"Truſty and well-beloved, &c.

"OUR houſe of commons cannot forget how often and how earneſtly we have called upon them for the ſpeeding of that aid which they intended us for our great and weighty affairs, concerning the ſafety and honour of us and our kingdoms; and now the time being ſo far ſpent, that unleſs it be preſently concluded, it can neither bring us money nor credit by the time which themſelves have fixed, which is the laſt of this month, and being further deferred would be of little uſe, we being daily advertiſed from all parts, of the great preparations of the enemy ready to aſſail us; we hold it neceſſary by theſe our letters to give them our laſt and final admonition, and to let them know that we ſhall account all farther delays and excuſes to be expreſs denials. And therefore we will and require you to ſignify unto them, that we do expect that they forthwith bring in their bill of ſubſidy to be paſſed without delay or condition, ſo as it may fully paſs the houſe by the end of the next week at the fartheſt: which if they do not, it will force us to take other reſolutions. But let them know, if they finiſh this according to our deſire, that we are reſolved to let them ſit together for the diſpatch of their other affairs ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, and after their receſs to bring them together again the next winter. And if by their denial or delay, any thing of ill conſequence ſhall fall out either at home or abroad, we call God and man to witneſs, that we have done our part to prevent it, by calling our people together to adviſe with us, by opening the weight of our occaſions unto them, and by requiring their timely help and aſſiſtance in theſe actions wherein we ſtand engaged by their own counſels. And we will and command you that this letter be read publicly in the houſe."

It was manifeſt this letter, written at the time the duke of Buckingham was going to be tried, was but an artifice to evade it. For it was not poſſible, that if the ſubſidy bill was paſſed by the time fixed by the king, the duke's affair could be diſpatched by the ſame time. It is true, the king promiſed to let the parliament ſit "ſo long as the ſeaſon would permit." But by that very thing he reſerved to himſelf the liberty of proroguing it when he pleaſed, on pretence the ſeaſon was too far advanced to ſit any longer, eſpecially as he feigned to preſs the ſubſidy-bill purely out of fear of a pretended invaſion, which he ſaid the kingdom was threatened with. It was therefore to be expected, that the duke of Buckingham's affair would be dropped, and be forced to be

The commons not thinking fit to comply with the king's will, preſented a freſh petition to him againſt popiſh recuſants. This was to ſhew the public, the king's anſwer to the petition of the Oxford parliament contained only empty promiſes, without being followed by any effects: they had a mind alſo to ſhew that the duke of Buckingham's ill adminiſtration was not the only grievance they deſired to be redreſſed. The petition was as follows:

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"YOUR majeſty's moſt obedient and loyal ſubjects the commons, in this preſent parliament aſſembled, do with great comfort remember the many teſtimonies which your majeſty hath given of your ſincerity and zeal of the true religion eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, and in particular your gracious anſwer to both houſes of parliament at Oxford, upon their petition concerning the cauſes and remedies of the increaſe of popery; that your majeſty thought fit, and would give order to remove from all places of authority and government, all ſuch perſons as are either popiſh recuſants, or, according to the direction of former acts of ſtate, juſtly to be ſuſpected; which was then preſented as a great and principal cauſe of that miſchief. But not having received ſo full redreſs herein as may conduce to the peace of this church, and ſafety of this regal ſtate, they hold it their duty once more to reſort to your ſacred majeſty, humbly to inform you that upon examination, they find the perſons under-written to be either recuſants, papiſts, or juſtly ſuſpected according to the former acts of ſtate, who now do, or ſince the ſitting of the parliament, did remain in places of government and authority and truſt, in your ſeveral counties of this your realm of England, and dominion of Wales."

Then followed a liſt of fifty-nine recuſants and ſuſpected papiſts, who were in places of truſt and authority in ſeveral counties [r].

"Wherefore they humbly beſeech your majeſty not to ſuffer your loving ſubjects to continue any longer diſcouraged by the apparent ſenſe of that increaſe both in number and power, which by the favour and countenance of ſuch like ill-affected governors accrueth to the popiſh party; but that, according to your own wiſdom, goodneſs, and piety (whereof they reſt aſſured) you will be graciouſly pleaſed to command that anſwer of your majeſty's to be effectually obſerved, and the parties above named, and all ſuch others, to be put out of ſuch commiſſions and places of authority wherein they are now in your majeſty's realm of England, contrary to the acts and laws of ſtate in that behalf."

It was not for the king's honour to be preſſed ſo often to perform what he had ſo poſitively promiſed. But it muſt be conſidered, it was not eaſy for him to withſtand the ſollicitations and intrigues of the queen, of the duke of Buckingham, whoſe mother was a profeſſed papiſt, of ſir Richard Weſton his chief counſellor, and of the lord Conway ſecretary of ſtate, both likewiſe papiſts, ſince theſe were the men that were neareſt his perſon, and by whom he was in a manner beſet.

A few days after, the commons reſolved to wait upon the king, and preſent to him by their ſpeaker, a declaration of their conduct, ſerving for anſwer to his letter, and a petition to remove the duke of Buckingham from his perſon. The audience they had deſired being granted, the ſpeaker, before he preſented the anſwer, made the following ſpeech to him [s]:

"Moſt gracious and dread ſovereign,

"ACCORDING to that liberty of acceſs, and liberty of ſpeech, which your majeſty and your royal progenitors have ever vouchſafed to your houſe of commons, your majeſty's moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the commons now aſſembled in parliament, have been ſuitors for this acceſs to your royal throne.

"And out of their conſideration of the nature, and of the weight and importance of the buſineſs, they have thought the attendance of the whole houſe, with their ſpeaker, not too ſolemn; and yet they have not thought fit barely to commit thoſe words which expreſs their thoughts to the truſt of any man's ſpeech, but are bold to preſent them in writing to your gracious hands, that they may not vaniſh, but be more laſting than the moſt powerful words of a more able ſpeaker are like to be.

"I have much to read, and ſhall therefore, as little as I can, weary your majeſty with ſpeeches.

"This parchment contains two things: the one by way of declaration, to give your majeſty an account, and humble ſatisfaction of their clear and ſincere endeavours and intentions in your majeſty's ſervice; and the other an humble petition to your majeſty, for the removal of that great perſon the duke of Buckingham, from acceſs to your royal preſence.

"For the firſt, they beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty to believe, that no earthly thing is ſo dear and precious to them, as that your majeſty ſhould retain them in your grace and good opinion; and it is grief to them, beyond my expreſſion, that any miſinformation or miſinterpretation ſhould at any time render their words or proceedings offenſive to your majeſty.

"It is not proper for any one to hear the eccho of a voice, that hears not the voice; and if ecchos be ſometimes heard to double and redouble, the eccho of the eccho is ſtill fainter, and ſounds not louder.

"I need not make the application; words miſreported, though by an eccho, or but an eccho of an eccho, at a third or fourth hand, have oft a louder ſound than the voice itſelf, and may ſound diſloyalty, though the voice had nothing undutiful or illoyal in it.

"Such miſinformations, they fear, have begot thoſe interruptions and diverſions which have delayed the ripening and expediting of thoſe great counſels, which concern your majeſty's important ſervice, and have inforced this declaration.

"I paſs from that to the petition, in which my purpoſe is not to urge thoſe reaſons, which your majeſty may hear expreſſed in their own words in the language of the people.

"I am only directed to offer to your great wiſdom, and deep judgment, that this petition of theirs is ſuch, as may ſtand with your majeſty's honour and juſtice to grant.

"Your majeſty hath been pleaſed to give many royal teſtimonies and arguments to the world, how good and gracious a maſter you are; and that which the queen of Sheba once ſaid to the wiſeſt king, may without flattery be ſaid to your majeſty, 'Happy are thoſe ſervants which ſtand continually before you.'

"But the relations by which your majeſty ſtands in a gracious aſpect towards your people, do far tranſcend, and are more prevalent and binding, than any relation of a maſter towards a ſervant; and to hear and ſatisfy the juſt and neceſſary deſires of your people, is more honourable than any expreſſion of grace to a ſervant.

"To be a maſter to a ſervant, is communicable to many of your ſubjects; to be a king of people, is regal, and incommunicable to ſubjects.

"Your majeſty is truly ſtiled with that name, which the greateſt emperors, though they borrowed names and titles from thoſe countries which they gained by conqueſt, moſt delighted in, Pater Patriæ. And deſires of children are preferred before thoſe of ſervants, and the ſervant abideth not in the houſe for ever, but the ſon abideth ever.

"The government of a king was truly termed by your royal father, a politic marriage betwixt him and his people; and I may ſafely ſay, there was never a better union between a married pair, than is between your majeſty and your people."

Having ended his ſpeech, the ſpeaker put into the king's hands the declaration and petition, which his majeſty was ſo diſpleaſed with, that he determined to diſſolve the parliament. The commons having intimation of it, reſolved to preſent a remonſtrance to him, of which every member was ordered to have a copy. Whilſt the remonſtrance was preparing, the lords being informed by the king himſelf of his reſolution, preſented a petition to him to divert him from his purpoſe. But he would hearken to nothing; and, on the 15th of June, cauſed the parliament to be diſſolved by a commiſſion under the great ſeal.

It was not doubted that the duke of Buckingham's intereſt was the ſole cauſe of the diſſolution. The commons were ſo perſuaded of it, that they chiefly inſiſted upon the great prejudice of the duke's credit occaſioned to the kingdom, in the remonſtrance they had prepared, but were hindred from preſenting by the diſſolution of the parliament. It will not be amiſs however to inſert here this remonſtrance.

[s] Rapin, by miſtake, ſays two papers; but it was but one, as appears by the ſpeaker's ſpeech. Though the copy of this anſwer, containing a declaration and petition, is not to be found, it was ingroſſed and allowed of, and the ſubſtance was delivered by the ſpeaker ſir Heneage Finch. Mr.

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" WE your loyal and faithful ſubjects, the commons aſſembled by your majeſty's moſt royal authority in this preſent parliament, having with all dutiful affection, from the time of our firſt meeting, earneſtly endeavoured to proceed ſpeedily in thoſe affairs, that might beſt and ſooneſt conduce to our diſpatch of the intended ſupply, of your majeſty's great deſigns, to the enlargement of your ſupport, and to the enabling of ourſelves, and them whom we repreſent, to the full and timely performance of the ſame; have, notwithſtanding, by reaſon of divers informations, interruptions, and other preventions, been hitherto ſo retarded in the proſecution of theſe affairs, that we now thought it a neceſſary part of our moſt humble duties thus to declare, both thoſe interruptions and preventions, with the true original and continual cauſe of them; as alſo our moſt earneſt devotion of the parliamentary ſervice of your moſt excellent majeſty, and of the careful ſafety and defence of your dominions, crown, and dignity; and we moſt humbly therefore beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty, to be graciouſly pleaſed here to caſt your eye on ſome particulars, that have relation as well to your firſt parliament as to this; out of which we cannot doubt, but that your great goodneſs may receive an ample ſatisfaction, touching our moſt loyal and faithful intentions,

" In the firſt parliament of the firſt year of your majeſty's moſt happy reign over us, the commons then aſſembled, after they had cheerfully preſented to your majeſty, as the firſt-fruits of their affections, two entire ſubſidies, were exceedingly preſſed by the means of the duke of Buckingham, and for his own ends, as we conceive, to enlarge that ſupply: which when he conceived would not be there effected, he procured, for the ſame ends, from your majeſty, an adjournment of the parliament to the city of Oxford; where the commons then taking into juſt conſideration the great miſchiefs which this kingdom variouſly hath ſuffered, and that chiefly by reaſon of the exorbitant power and frequent miſdoings of the ſaid duke, were entering into a parliamentary courſe of examination of thoſe miſchiefs, power, and miſdoings: but no ſooner was there any mention made of his name to this purpoſe, but that he, fearing leſt his actions might ſo have been too much laid open to the view of your moſt excellent majeſty, and to the juſt cenſure that might have then followed, preſently, through his miſinformations to your majeſty, of the intentions of your commons (as we have juſt cauſe to believe) procured a diſſolution of the ſaid parliament: and afterwards alſo in the ſame year, through divers miſreports made to your majeſty in his behalf, touching ſome of the members of the ſaid commons, who had more particularly drawn his name into juſt queſtion, and juſtly profeſſed themſelves averſe to his ends there, procured (as we cannot but conceive) the ſaid members to be made the ſheriffs of ſeveral counties for this year that followed, to the end that they might have all been precluded from being choſen members of the preſent parliament, leſt they ſhould again have there queſtioned him; and by the like practice alſo (as we are perſuaded) he procured, ſoon after the ſaid diſſolution, another member of the ſaid houſe[t], becauſe he had juſtly profeſſed himſelf againſt his ends, to be ſent as ſecretary of your majeſty's laſt fleet, hereby indeed to puniſh him, by ſuch drawing him from his practice of the law, which was his profeſſion, under colour of an honourable employment.

" It pleaſed your majeſty afterwards, in February laſt, to call this preſent parliament, wherein though none of thoſe whom the ſaid duke had ſo procured to be made high-ſheriffs have ſat as members; yet we finding in ourſelves the like affection, firſt to the ſervice of your majeſty, and next to the good of the commonwealth, we took into ſerious conſideration ſeveral propoſitions, how far the ſafety and happineſs of your majeſty's kingdoms and allies, we might enlarge your ſupports, and add to the military ſtrength without charge to the poorer ſort of your ſubjects, and give a larger ſupply to your majeſty for your inſtant and preſſing occaſions, than hath ever yet but once been given in parliament: whereupon, for the enabling of ourſelves, and thoſe whom we repreſent, we conceive it firſt neceſſary to ſearch into the cauſes of thoſe miſchiefs which this your kingdom ſuffereth, and divers of the grievances that overburden your ſubjects; without doing of which, we could neither be faithful to your majeſty, nor to the country that doth truſt and employ us; as your royal father alſo, of bleſſed memory, admoniſhed the houſe of commons in the fourth ſeſſion of his firſt parliament. In this conſideration we found, that the moſt preſſing and comprehenſive miſchief and grievance that he ſuffered, was fundamentally ſettled in the vaſt power and enormous actions of the ſaid duke, being ſuch, that by reaſon of his plurality of offices, all gotten by ambition, and ſome for money, expreſly againſt the laws of your realm; his breach of truſt in not guarding the ſeas; his high injuſtice in the admiralty, his extortion; his delivering over the ſhips of this kingdom into the hands of a foreign prince; his procuring of the compulſory buying of honour for his own gain; his unexampled exhauſting of the treaſures and revenues of the kingdom; his tranſcendent preſumption of that unhappy applying of phyſic to your royal father of bleſſed memory, few days before his death; and ſome other his offences carefully and maturely examined by us, we made a parliamentary charge of the ſame matters and offences againſt him, to the lords, by your majeſty aſſembled in parliament, there expecting ſome remedy to a ſpeedy proceeding againſt him: but, may it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the ſame charge, we were diverſly interrupted and diverted by meſſages procured through miſinformation from your majeſty, which with moſt humble duty and reverence we did ever receive; whence it firſt fell out, that ſo not only much time was ſpent amongſt us, before the ſame charge was perfected, but alſo within two days next after the ſame charge was tranſmitted by us to the lords, upon untrue and malicious informations, privately and againſt the privilege of parliaments, given to your majeſty, of certain words ſuppoſed to have been ſpoken by ſir Dudley Diggs and ſir John Elliot, knights, two of the members of our houſe, in their ſervice of the tranſmitting of the ſaid charge, both of them having been eſpecially employed in the chairs of committees with us, about the examination of the ſaid matters and offences, they were both by your majeſty's command committed to cloſe impriſonment in the Tower of London, and their lodgings preſently ſearched, and their papers there found, preſently taken away; by reaſon whereof not only our known privileges of parliament were infringed, but we ourſelves, that, upon full hope of ſpeedy courſe of juſtice againſt the ſaid duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to the diſpatch of the ſupply, and other ſervices to your majeſty, were wholly, as the courſe and privilege of parliament binds us, diverted for divers days, to the taking only into conſideration ſome courſes for the ratifying and preſervation of the privileges ſo infringed; and we think it our duties, moſt gracious ſovereign, moſt rightly to inform hereby your moſt excellent majeſty, of the courſe held in the commitment of the two members: for, whereas by your majeſty's warrant to your meſſengers for the arreſting of them, you were pleaſed to command, that they ſhould repair to their lodgings, and there take them; your majeſty's principal ſecretary, the lord Conway, gave the ſaid meſſengers (as they affirmed) an expreſs command, contrary to the ſaid warrants, that they ſhould not go to their lodgings, but to the houſe of commons, and there take them; and if they found them not there, they ſhould ſtay until they were come into the houſe, and apprehend them whereſoever elſe they ſhould find them. Which, beſides that it is contrary to your majeſty's command, is an apparent teſtimony of ſome miſchievous intention there had againſt the whole houſe of commons, and againſt the ſervice intended to your majeſty. All which, with the ſeveral interruptions that preceded it, and the miſinformation that hath cauſed all of them, we cannot doubt but they were wrought and procured by the duke, to his own behoof, and for his advantage, eſpecially becauſe the ſaid interruptions have through miſinformation, come amongſt us, only at ſuch times wherein we have had the matters and offences charged againſt him in agitation; but your majeſty, out of your great goodneſs and juſtice, being afterwards informed truly of our privilege, and the demerit of the cauſe that concerned our two members, graciouſly commanded the delivery of them out of the Tower, for which we render unto your majeſty moſt humble thanks; and were then again, by reaſon of our hopes of the diſpatch of proceedings with the lords upon our charge againſt him the ſaid duke, in a cheerful purpoſe to go on with the matter of ſupply, and other ſervices to your majeſty, when again theſe hopes failed in us, by reaſon of ſome new exorbitances now lately ſhewed in the exerciſe of his ſo great power and ambition; for by ſuch his power and ambition, notwithſtanding our declaration againſt him for his ſo great plurality of offices, he alſo procured to himſelf, by the ſollicitation of his agents, and of ſuch as depended upon him, the office of chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge; whereas the ſame univerſity having two burgeſſes in parliament, did, by the ſame burgeſſes, a few weeks before, conſent with us in the charge againſt him for his ambition, for procuring ſuch a plurality of offices; ſuch was his ambition to ſue for it, ſuch was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what themſelves had agreed in parliament with all the commons of England. And he procured alſo the ſame office, by the ſpecial labours and endeavours (as we are informed) of a factious party, who adhereth to that dangerous innovation of religion, publiſhed in the ſeditious writings of one Richard Montague, clerk; of whom it is thence alſo, and heretofore upon other reaſons it hath been, conceived, that the ſaid duke is, and long hath been, an abetter and protector.

"Theſe actions of the ſaid duke have thus among us hindered the ſervice of your majeſty, by reaſon both of the interruptions that have ſo neceſſarily accompanied them, and of the prevention of our cheerfulneſs, which otherwiſe had long ſince been moſt effectually ſhewed in us, that having nothing elſe in our cares, next our duty to God, but the loyal ſervice of your majeſty, the ſafety of your kingdom, and the ſubſiſtence of ourſelves, and thoſe whom we repreſent, for the continuance of that ſervice and ſafety which we cannot hope for: and we beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty, graciouſly to receive this our humble and free proteſtation, that we cannot hope for it, ſo long as we thus ſuffer under the preſſures of the power and ambition of the ſaid duke, and the divers and falſe informations ſo given to your majeſty on his behalf, and for his advantage; eſpecially when we obſerve alſo, that in ſuch his greatneſs, he preventeth the giving of true information to your majeſty, in all things that may any ways reflect to his own miſdoings, to ſhew unto your majeſty, the true ſtate of your ſubjects and kingdoms, otherwiſe than as it may be repreſented for his own ends. And to that purpoſe alſo hath he procured ſo many perſons depending on him, either by alliance or advancement, to places of eminency near your ſacred perſon. Through his miſinformation of that kind alſo, and power, we have ſeen, to our great grief, both in the time of your majeſty's royal father of bleſſed memory, and of your majeſty, divers officers of the kingdom, ſo often by him diſplaced and altered, that within theſe few years paſt, ſince the beginning of his greatneſs, more ſuch diſplacings and alterations have by his means happened, than in many years before them: neither was there in the time of your royal father of bleſſed memory, any ſuch courſe held, before it was by the practice of the ſaid duke thus induced. And ſince that time, divers officers of the crown, not only in this your kingdom of England, but alſo in Ireland, as they have been made friends, or adverſe to the ſaid duke, have been either ſo commended, or miſrepreſented by him to his ſovereign, and by his procurement ſo placed or diſplaced, that he hath always herein, as much as in him lay, made his own ends and advantage the meaſure of the good or ill of your majeſty's kingdoms.

"But now at length, may it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, we have received from the lords, a copy of the ſaid duke's anſwer to our charge tranſmitted againſt him; whereupon we ſhall preſently in ſuch ſort reply, according to the laws of parliament, that unleſs his power and practice again undermine our proceedings, we do not doubt, but we ſhall upon the ſame have judgment againſt him.

"In the times alſo (moſt gracious ſovereign) of theſe interruptions which came amongſt us, by reaſon of the procurement of two of our members committed, a gracious meſſage was formerly received from your majeſty, wherein you had been pleaſed to let us know, that if you had not a timely ſupply, your majeſty would betake yourſelf to new counſels; which we cannot doubt were intended by your moſt excellent majeſty to be ſuch as ſtood with juſtice and the laws of this realm. But theſe words, New Counſels, were remembered in a ſpeech made amongſt us, by one of your majeſty's privy council, and lately a member of us [u], who in the ſame ſpeech told us, he had often thought of thoſe words, New Counſels; that in his conſideration of them, he remembered, that there were ſuch kinds of parliaments antiently among other nations, as are now in England; that in England he ſaw the country-people live in happineſs and plenty, but in theſe other nations he ſaw them poor both in perſons and habit, or to that effect; which ſtate and condition happened (as he ſaid) to them, where ſuch New Counſels were taken, as that the uſe of their parliaments ended.

"This intimation, may it pleaſe your majeſty, was ſuch, as alſo gave juſt cauſe to fear, there were ſome ill miniſters near your majeſty, that in behalf of the ſaid duke, and together with him, who is ſo ſtrangely powerful, were ſo much againſt the parliamentary courſe of this kingdom, as they might perhaps adviſe your moſt excellent majeſty ſuch new counſels as theſe, that fell under the memory and conſideration of that privy counſellor. And one eſpecial reaſon among others hath increaſed that fear among us, for that whereas the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, which determined upon the death of your moſt royal father, our late ſovereign, and were never payable to any of your majeſty's anceſtors, but only by a ſpecial act of parliament, and ought not to be levied without ſuch an act; yet ever ſince the beginning of your majeſty's happy reign over us, the ſaid ſubſidies have been levied by ſome of your majeſty's miniſters, as if they were ſtill due; although alſo one parliament hath been ſince then begun, and diſſolved by procurement of the ſaid duke, as is before ſhewed, wherein no act paſſed for the ſame ſubſidies. Which example is ſo much againſt the conſtant uſe of former times, and the known right and liberty of your ſubjects, that it is an apparent effect of ſome new counſels given againſt the ancient ſettled courſe of government of this your majeſty's kingdom, and chiefly againſt the right of your commons; as if there might be any ſubſidy, tax, or aid, levied upon them, without their conſent in parliament, or contrary to the ſettled laws of this kingdom. But if any ſuch do ſo ill an office, as by the miſ-repreſentation of the ſtate, and right of your majeſty's loyal ſubjects, adviſe any ſuch new counſels, as the levying any aid, tax, or ſubſidy, among your people, contrary to the ſettled laws of your kingdom, we cannot, moſt gracious ſovereign, but eſteem them that ſhall ſo adviſe, not only as vipers, but peſts to their king and commonwealth (as all ſuch were to both houſes of parliament, expreſly ſtiled by your moſt royal father), but alſo capital enemies, as well to your crown and dignity, as to the commonwealth. And we ſhall, for our parts, in parliament ſhew, as occaſion ſhall require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind, ſuch as that may be rewarded with the higheſt puniſhment, as your laws inflict on any offenders.

"Theſe, and ſome of theſe things, amongſt many other (moſt gracious ſovereign), are thoſe which have ſo much prevented a right underſtanding between your majeſty and us, and which have poſſeſſed the hearts of your people and loyal commons with unſpeakable ſorrow and grief, finding apparently all humble and hearty endeavours miſinterpreted, hindered, and now at laſt almoſt fruſtrated utterly, by the interpoſition of the exceſſive and abuſive power of one man; againſt whom we have juſt cauſe to proteſt, not only in regard of the particulars wherewith he hath been charged, which parliamentary way we are enforced to inſiſt upon, as matters which lie in our notice and proof, but alſo becauſe we apprehend him of ſo unbridled ambition, and ſo averſe to the good and tranquillity of the church and ſtate, that we verily believe him to be an enemy to both: And therefore unleſs we would betray our own duties to your majeſty, and thoſe from whom we are truſted, we cannot but expreſs our infinite grief, that he ſhould have ſo great power and intereſt in your princely affections, and under your majeſty, wholly in a manner to engroſs to himſelf the adminiſtration of your affairs of the kingdom, which by that means is drawn into a condition moſt miſerable and hazardous.

"Give us then leave, moſt dear ſovereign, in the name of all the commons of this your kingdom, proſtrate at the feet of your ſacred majeſty, moſt humbly to beſeech you, even for the honour of Almighty God, whoſe religion is directly undermined by the practice of that party whom this duke ſupports; for your honour, which will be much advanced in the relieving of your people, in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, ſafety, and welfare of your kingdom, which by this means is threatened with almoſt unavoidable dangers; and for the love which your majeſty, as a good and loving father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profeſs, in the preſence of Almighty God (the ſearcher of all hearts), you are as highly eſteemed and beloved as ever any of your predeceſſors were, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to remove this perſon from acceſs to your ſacred preſence, and that you would not balance this one man with all theſe things, and with the affairs of the chriſtian world, which do all ſuffer ſo far as they have relation to this kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we proteſt to your majeſty, and to the whole world, that until this great perſon be removed from intermeddling with the great affairs of ſtate, we are out of hope of any good ſucceſs; and do fear that any money we ſhall or can give, will, through his miſemployment, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of your kingdom, than otherwiſe, as by lamentable experience we have found, in thoſe large ſupplies we have formerly and lately given.

" But no ſooner ſhall we receive redreſs and relief in this (which, of all others, is our moſt inſupportable grievance), but we ſhall forthwith proceed to accompliſh your majeſty's own deſire, for ſupply, and likewiſe with all cheerfulneſs apply ourſelves to the perfecting of divers other great things, ſuch as we think no one parliament in one age can parallel, tending to the ſtability, wealth, and ſtrength, and honour, of this your kingdom, and the ſupport of your friends and allies abroad: And we doubt not but through God's bleſſing, as you are the beſt, ſo ſhall you ever be the beſt beloved, and greateſt monarch that ever ſat on the royal throne of this famous kingdom."

Having thus ſeen the complaints of the houſe of commons againſt the duke of Buckingham, or rather againſt the king himſelf, who was governed by his favourite, and had ſeveral times declared, that the duke did nothing without his orders, it is but juſt we ſhould now ſee the king's complaints againſt the commons, and the grounds and cauſes of his diſſolving this, and the former parliament. Though his declaration publiſhed on this occaſion be very long, as well as the foregoing remonſtrance, I believed it neceſſary to inſert the whole, that the reader, by comparing them together, may be able to form a clearer idea of the cauſes and origin of the diviſions between the king and the parliament, through the whole courſe of this reign.

The king's declaration, notifying the cauſes of aſſembling and diſſolving the two laſt parliaments.

" THE king's moſt excellent majeſty, ſince his happy acceſs to the imperial crown of this realm, having by his royal authority ſummoned and aſſembled two ſeveral parliaments; the firſt whereof was in Auguſt laſt, by adjournment held at Oxford, and there diſſolved; and the other begun in February laſt, and continued until the fifteenth day of this preſent month of June, and then, to the unſpeakable grief of himſelf, and (as he believeth) of all his good and well-affected ſubjects, diſſolved alſo: Although he well knoweth that the calling, adjourning, proroguing, and diſſolving of parliaments, being his great council of the kingdom, do peculiarly belong unto himſelf by an undoubted prerogative inſeparably united to his imperial crown; of which, as of his other royal actions, he is not bound to give an account to any but to God only, whoſe immediate lieutenant and vicegerent he is in theſe realms and dominions, by the divine providence committed to his charge and government: yet foraſmuch as by the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, his purpoſe is ſo to order himſelf and all his actions, eſpecially in the great and public actions of ſtate, concerning the weal of his kingdoms, as may juſtify themſelves, not only to his own conſcience, and to his own people, but to the whole world; his majeſty hath thought it fit and neceſſary, as the affairs now ſtand both at home and abroad, to make a true, plain, and clear declaration of the cauſes which moved his majeſty to aſſemble, and after enforced him to diſſolve theſe parliaments, that ſo the mouth of malice itſelf may be ſtopped, and the doubts and fears of his own good ſubjects at home, and of his friends and allies, abroad may be ſatisfied, and the deſerved blame of ſo unhappy accidents may juſtly light upon the authors thereof.

" When his majeſty, by the death of his dear and royal father of ever bleſſed memory, firſt came to the crown, he found himſelf engaged in a war with a potent enemy; not undertaken raſhly, nor without juſt and honourable grounds, but enforced for the neceſſary defence of himſelf and his dominions, for the ſupport of his friends and allies, for the redeeming of the ancient honour of this nation, for the recovery of the patrimony of his dear ſiſter, her conſort, and their children, injuriouſly, under colour of treaties and friendſhip, taken from them, and for the maintenance of the true religion, and invited thereunto, and encouraged therein, by the humble advice of both the houſes of parliament, and by the large promiſes and proteſtations to his late majeſty, to give him full and real aſſiſtance in thoſe enterpriſes, which were of ſo great importance to this realm, and to the general peace and ſafety of all his friends and allies: but when his majeſty entered into a view of his treaſure, he found how ill provided he was to proceed effectually with ſo great an action, unleſs he might be aſſured to receive ſuch ſupplies from his loving ſubjects, as might enable him to manage the ſame.

" Hereupon his majeſty, being willing to tread in the ſteps of his royal progenitors, for the making of good and wholeſome laws, for the better government of his people, for the right underſtanding of their true grievances, and for the ſupply of monies to be employed for thoſe public ſervices, he did reſolve to ſummon a parliament with all convenient ſpeed he might, and finding a former parliament already called in the life of his father, he was deſirous, for the ſpeedier diſpatch of his weighty affairs, and gaining time, to have continued the ſame without any alteration of the members thereof, had he not been adviſed to the contrary by his judges and council at law, which he deſired to avoid. But as ſoon as poſſible he could, he ſummoned a new parliament, which he did with much confidence and aſſurance of the love of his people, that thoſe (who had, not long before, with ſome importunity won his father to break off his former treaties with Spain, and to effect it, had uſed mediation of his now majeſty, being then prince, and a member of the parliament, and had promiſed in parliament their utmoſt aſſiſtance, for the enabling of his late majeſty to undergo the war, which they then foreſaw might follow) would aſſuredly have performed it to his now majeſty, and would not have ſuffered him, in his firſt enterpriſe of ſo great an expectation, to have run the leaſt hazard through their defaults.

" This parliament (after ſome adjournment, by reaſon of his majeſty's unavoidable occaſions interpoſing) being aſſembled on the 18th day of June, it is true, that his commons in parliament taking into their due and ſerious conſideration the manifold occaſions, which at his firſt entry did preſs his majeſty, and his moſt important affairs, which both at home and abroad were then in action, did with great readineſs and alacrity, as a pledge of their moſt bounden duty and thankfulneſs, and as the firſt-fruits of the moſt dutiful affections of his loving and loyal ſubjects, devoted to his ſervice, preſent his majeſty with the free and cheerful gift of two entire ſubſidies; which their gift, and much more the freeneſs and heartineſs expreſſed in the giving thereof, his majeſty did thankfully and lovingly accept: But when he had more narrowly entered into the conſideration of his great affairs, wherein he was embarqued, and from which he could not, without much diſhonour and diſadvantage, withdraw his hand, he found that this ſum of money was much ſhort of that which of neceſſity muſt be preſently expended, for the ſetting forward of thoſe great actions, which by advice of his council, he had undertaken, and were that ſummer to be purſued. This his majeſty imparted to his commons houſe of parliament; but before the ſame could receive that debate and due conſideration which was fit, the fearful viſitation of the plague in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter, where the lords and the principal gentlemen of quality of this whole kingdom were, for the time of this their ſervice, lodged and abiding, did ſo much increaſe, that his majeſty, without extreme peril to the lives of his good ſubjects, which were dear unto him, could not continue the parliament any longer in that place.

" His majeſty therefore on the 11th day of July then following, adjourned the parliament from Weſtminſter, until the 1ſt day of Auguſt then following, at the city of Oxford. And his highneſs was ſo careful to accommodate his lords and commons there, that as he made choice of that place, being then the freeſt of all others from the danger of that grievous ſickneſs, ſo he there fitted the parliament men with all things convenient for their entertainment; and his majeſty himſelf being in his own heart ſincere and free from all ends upon his people, which the ſearcher of hearts beſt knoweth, he little expected that any miſconſtruction of his actions would have been made as he there found. But when the parliament had been a while aſſembled, and his majeſty's affairs opened unto them, and a further ſupply deſired as neceſſity required, he found them ſo ſlow, and ſo full of delays and diverſions in their reſolutions, that before any thing could be determined, the fearful contagion daily increaſed, and was diſperſed into all parts of this kingdom, and came home even to their doors where they aſſembled. His majeſty therefore rather preferred the ſafety of his people from that preſent and viſible danger, than the providing for that which was more remote, but no leſs dangerous to the ſtate of this kingdom, and of the affairs of that part of Chriſtendom which then were, and yet are, in friendſhip and alliance with his majeſty. And thereupon his majeſty, not being then able to diſcern when it might pleaſe God to ſtay his hand of viſitation, nor what place might be more ſecure than other, at a time convenient for their re-aſſembling, his majeſty diſſolved that parliament.

" That parliament being now ended, his majeſty did not therewith caſt off his royal care of his great and important affairs; but by the advice of his privy council, and of his council of war, he continued his preparations and former reſolutions; and therein not only expended thoſe monies, which by the two ſubſidies aforeſaid were given unto him for his own private uſe, whereof he had too much occaſion, as he found the ſtate of his exchequer at his firſt entrance, but added much more of his own, as by his credit, and the credit of ſome of his ſervants, he was able to compaſs the ſame. At laſt, by much diſadvantage, by the retarding of proviſions, and uncertainty of the means, his navy was prepared and ſet to ſea, and the deſigns unto which they were ſent, and eſpecially directed, were ſo probable, and ſo well adviſed, that had they not miſcarried in the execution, his majeſty is well aſſured, they would have given good ſatisfaction, not only to his own people, but to all the world, that they were not lightly or unadviſedly undertaken and purſued. But it pleaſed God, who is the Lord of Hoſts, and unto whoſe providence and good pleaſure his majeſty doth, and ſhall ſubmit himſelf, and all his endeavours, not to give that ſucceſs which was deſired; and yet were thoſe attempts not altogether ſo fruitleſs, as the envy of the times hath apprehended, the enemy receiving thereby no ſmall loſs, nor our party no little advantage. And it would much avail to further his majeſty's great affairs, and the peace of Chriſtendom, which ought to be the true end of all hoſtility, were theſe firſt beginnings, which are moſt ſubject to miſcarry, well ſeconded and purſued, as his majeſty intended, and as in the judgment of all men, converſant in his actions of this nature, were fit not to have been neglected.

"Theſe things being thus acted, and God of his infinite goodneſs, beyond expectation, aſſwaging the rage of the peſtilence, and in a manner, of a ſudden reſtoring health and ſafety to the cities of London and Weſtminſter, which are the fitteſt places for the reſort of his majeſty, his lords and commons, to meet in parliament; his majeſty, in the depth of winter, no ſooner deſcried the probability of a ſafe aſſembling of his people, and in his princely wiſdom and providence foreſaw, that if the opportunity of ſeaſon ſhould be omitted, preparations both defenſive and offenſive could not be made in ſuch ſort, as was requiſite for their common ſafety, but he adviſed and reſolved of the ſummoning of a new parliament, where he might freely communicate the neceſſities of the ſtate, and the counſel and advice of the lords and commons in parliament, who were the repreſentative body of the whole kingdom, and the great council of the realm, might proceed in theſe enterpriſes, and be enabled thereunto, which concern the common good, ſafety, and honour, both of prince and people; and accordingly the 6th of February laſt, a new parliament was begun. At the firſt meeting, his majeſty did forbear to preſs them with any thing which might have the leaſt appearance of his own intereſt, but recommended unto them the care of making good laws, which are the ordinary ſubject for a parliament.

"His Majeſty believing, that they could not have ſuffered many days, much leſs many weeks, to have paſſed by, before the apprehenſion and care of the common ſafety of this kingdom, and the true religion profeſſed and maintained therein, and of our friends and allies, who muſt proſper or ſuffer with us, would have led them to a due and timely conſideration of all the means which might beſt conduce to thoſe ends; which the lords of the higher houſe, by a committee of that houſe, did timely and ſeaſonably conſider of, and invited the commons to a conference concerning that great buſineſs: At which conference, there were opened unto them the great occaſions which preſſed his majeſty, which making no impreſſion with them, his majeſty did, firſt by meſſage, and after by letters, put the houſe of commons in mind of that which was moſt neceſſary, the defence of the kingdom, and due and timely preparations for the ſame.

"The commons houſe after this, upon the 27th of March laſt, with one unanimous conſent at firſt, agreed to give unto his majeſty three entire ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, for a preſent ſupply unto him; and upon the 26th of April after, upon ſecond cogitations, they added a fourth ſubſidy, and ordered the days of payment for them all, whereof the firſt ſhould have been on the laſt day of this preſent June. Upon this, the king of Denmark, and other princes and ſtates, being engaged with his majeſty in this common cauſe, his majeſty fitted his occaſions according to the times which were appointed for the payment of thoſe ſubſidies and fifteenths, and haſted on the lords committees, and his council of war, to perfect their reſolutions for the ordering and ſettling of his deſigns; which they accordingly did, and brought them to that maturity, that they found no impediment to a final concluſion of their counſels, but want of money, to put things into action. His majeſty hereupon, who had with much patience expected the real performance of that which the commons had promiſed, finding the time of the year poſting away, and having intelligence not only from his own miniſters and ſubjects in foreign parts, but from all parts of Chriſtendom, of the great and powerful preparations of the king of Spain, and that his deſign was upon this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland, or both (and it is hard to determine which of them would be of worſe conſequence), he acquainted the houſe of commons therewith, and laid open unto them truly and clearly, how the ſtate of things then ſtood, and yet ſtand, and at ſeveral times and upon ſeveral occaſions reiterated the ſame: but that houſe being abuſed by the violent and ill-adviſed paſſions of a few members of the houſe, for private and perſonal ends, ill beſeeming public perſons, truſted by their country, as then they were, not only neglected, but wilfully refuſed to hearken to all the gentle admonitions which his majeſty could give them, and neither did nor would intend any thing, but the proſecution of one of the peers of this realm, and that in ſuch a diſordered manner, as being ſet at their own inſtance into a legal way, wherein the proofs on either part would have ruled the cauſe, which his majeſty allowed, they were not therewith content, but in their intemperate paſſions and deſires to ſeek for errors in another, fell into a greater error themſelves, and not only neglected to give juſt ſatisfaction to his majeſty in ſeveral caſes which happened concerning his regality, but wholly forgot their engagements to his majeſty for the public defence of the realm: whereupon his majeſty wrote the forementioned letter to the ſpeaker, dated the 9th day of June 1626.

"Notwithſtanding which letter read in the houſe, being a clear and gracious manifeſt of his majeſty's reſolutions, they never ſo much as admitted one reading to the bill of ſubſidies; but inſtead thereof, they prepared and voted a remonſtrance or declaration, which they intended to prefer to his majeſty, containing (though palliated with gloſſing terms) as well diſhonourable aſperſions upon his majeſty and upon the ſacred memory of his deceaſed father, as alſo dilatory excuſes for their not proceeding with the ſubſidies, adding thereto alſo coloured conditions, croſſing thereby his majeſty's direction; which his majeſty underſtanding, and eſteeming (as he had cauſe) to be a denial of the promiſed ſupply, and finding that no admonitions could move, no reaſons or perſuaſions could prevail, when the time was ſo far ſpent, that they had put an impoſſibility upon themſelves to perform their promiſes, which they eſteemed all gracious meſſages unto them to be but interruptions: his majeſty, upon mature adviſement, diſcerning that all further patience would prove fruitleſs, on the fifteenth day of this preſent month he hath diſſolved this unhappy parliament: the acting whereof, as it was to his majeſty an unexpreſſible grief, ſo the memory thereof doth renew the hearty ſorrow, which all his good and well-affected ſubjects will compaſſionate with him.

"Theſe paſſages his majeſty hath at the more length, and with the true circumſtances thereof, expreſſed and publiſhed to the world, leſt that which hath been unfortunate in itſelf, through the malice of the author of ſo great a miſchief, and the malevolent report of ſuch as are ill-affected to this ſtate, or the true religion here profeſſed, or the fears or jealouſies of friends and dutiful ſubjects, might be made more unfortunate in the conſequences of it, which may be of worſe effect than at the firſt can be well apprehended; and his majeſty being beſt privy to the integrity of his own heart, for the conſtant maintaining of the ſincerity and unity of the true religion profeſſed in the church of England, and to free it from the open contagion of popery, and ſecret infection of ſchiſm, of both which, by his public acts and actions, he hath given good teſtimony, and with a ſingle heart, as in the preſence of God, who can beſt judge thereof, purpoſeth reſolutely and conſtantly to proceed in the due execution of either; and obſerving the ſubtilty of the adverſe party, he cannot but believe, that the hand of Joab hath been in this diſaſter, that the common incendiaries of Chriſtendom have ſubtilly and ſecretly inſinuated thoſe things, which unhappily (and, as his majeſty hopeth, beyond the intentions of the actors) have cauſed theſe diverſions and diſtractions: And yet notwithſtanding, his moſt excellent majeſty, for the comfort of his good and well-affected ſubjects, in whoſe loves he doth repoſe himſelf with confidence, and eſteemeth it as his greateſt riches; for the aſſuring of his friends and allies, with whom, by God's aſſiſtance, he will not break in the ſubſtance of what he hath undertaken; for the diſcouraging of his adverſaries, and the adverſaries of his cauſe, and of his dominions, and religion, hath put on this reſolution, which he doth hereby publiſh to all the world, that as God hath made him king of this great people, and large dominions, famous in former ages both by land and ſea, and truſted him to be a father and protector both of their perſons and fortunes, and a defender of the faith and true religion; ſo he will go on cheerfully and conſtantly in the defence thereof, and (notwithſtanding ſo many difficulties and diſcouragements) will take his ſceptre and ſword into his hand, and not expoſe the perſons of the people committed to his charge, to the unſatiable deſires of the king of Spain, who hath long thirſted after the univerſal monarchy, nor their conſciences to the yoke of the pope of Rome: and that at home he will take that care to redreſs the juſt grievances of his good ſubjects, as ſhall be every way fit for a good king.

"And in the mean time his majeſty doth publiſh this to all his loving ſubjects, that they may know what to think with truth, and ſpeak with duty of his majeſty's actions and proceedings in theſe two laſt diſſolved parliaments.

"Given at his majeſty's palace at Whitehall, this 13th day of June, in the ſecond year of his majeſty's reign of Great Britain, France, and Ireland."

This declaration, which ſeems to be in the ſame ſtile with the lord-keeper Coventry's ſpeeches, full of long periods and parentheſis', contained, under a vaſt heap of words, but two things to the purpoſe, namely, the two reaſons which obliged the king to diſſolve the two laſt parliaments. It is ſaid there, the plague which approached Oxford, occaſioned the diſſolution of the firſt. But this reaſon, which ſeems plauſible, proves at moſt but a neceſſity to diſcontinue the parliament, which might have been done by prorogation, as eaſily as by an entire diſſolution. In the ſecond place, when this declaration was publiſhed, every one knew what the commons had ſaid in their remonſtrance, that the end of diſſolving the firſt was to preclude from the following parliament ſuch members as had been againſt the duke of Buckingham, by cauſing them to be made ſheriffs of their ſeveral counties. As to the diſſolution of the ſecond, it is wholly grounded in the declaration, upon the king's being pleaſed to conſider as an abſolute denial the commons delay to ſupply him with money, though they affirmed the contrary. But none were ſo blind as not to ſee that the commons demand, that the king would be pleaſed to remove the duke of Buckingham from his preſence, and the fear of the ill ſucceſs of the impeachment againſt the duke, were the true cauſes of this diſſolution. So, the declaration had no great effect among the people, who, beſides, were not apprehenſive of the pretended invaſion of England or Ireland by the Spaniards, though the king did his utmoſt to inſpire them with ſuch a dread. It was very extraordinary, that within little more than a year, the war which was undertaken for the recovery of the Palatinate, ſhould be changed into a defenſive war for the preſervation of the king's dominions, and ſupport of the church of England, though the Engliſh had not yet received any check.

A few days after the declaration was publiſhed, two proclamations appeared, which afforded ample matter of diſcourſe to ſuch as were not of the court party. By the firſt, the king commanded all perſons who had any copies of the commons remonſtrance to burn the ſame, on pain of his higheſt diſpleaſure. But ſuch precautions ſerve generally only to cauſe the prohibited writings to be more carefully preſerved. The king's injunction could not hinder the remonſtrance from being tranſmitted to poſterity.

The ſecond proclamation contained very expreſs commands, not to preach or diſpute upon the controverted points of Arminianiſm, either for or againſt them, under colour that ſuch ſort of diſputes ſerved only to breed contention. But many were of opinion, that Laud biſhop of London, and Neil biſhop of Wincheſter, had procured this injunction, to oppreſs the orthodox miniſters, who ſhould take the liberty to break it, whilſt the diſobedience of the contrary party ſhould be connived at. It is certain, the next parliament complained to the king, that the orthodox miniſters were ſilenced for diſobeying the proclamation, and the Arminians tolerated and countenanced. Theſe matters belonged to the high commiſſion, almoſt wholly compoſed of Laud's and Neil's creatures, the heads and protectors of the Arminians, or at leaſt they were reputed as ſuch.

Mean while, an information was preferred by the king's ſpecial command in the ſtar-chamber againſt the duke of Buckingham for applying the plaiſter to the late king. But withal, it was ſo ordered, that the cauſe came not to a hearing.

The king receiving no aid from the parliament, becauſe he was unwilling to purchaſe it at the rate ſet by the commons, was in great ſtraits[w]. He was to maintain a war againſt the houſe of Auſtria, to ſupply his allies with the promiſed ſuccours, and to put his kingdom in a poſture of defence. As all this could not be done by his ordinary revenues, recourſe was to be had to expedients to raiſe money. I ſhall mention ſome of them here, though they were not all uſed at the ſame time.

The firſt was a proclamation forbidding all perſons for two years to preſent or ſollicit any ſuit for any thing, tending to the diminution of the king's revenues.

The ſecond was a commiſſion directed to the archbiſhop of York and others, to compound with popiſh recuſants, not only for all forfeitures[x] due ſince the tenth year of king James, but alſo for ſuch as ſhall become due hereafter. This commiſſion was directed contrary to his promiſe to the parliament at Oxford. But, as he could not obtain money of the late parliament, only upon ſuch conditions as he did not think fit to comply with, he thought himſelf authoriſed to ſupply his occaſions ſome other way.

The third was a proclamation, declaring the king's reſolution to make his revenue certain, by granting his lands, as well holden in copy as otherwiſe, to be holden in fee-farm.

The fourth was a loan from every peer of a certain ſum for the defence of the kingdom. But his attempt to borrow a hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London did not ſucceed, the city deſiring to be excuſed.

The fifth was an impoſition upon the ſeveral ports, and maritime counties, to furniſh and ſet out a certain number of ſhips to protect the trade. The city of London having refuſed to lend the king money, was appointed to equip twenty ſhips, or at leaſt to find a ſum ſufficient for that purpoſe. As this tax was peculiar to the maritime towns, many of the inhabitants of ſuch places retired elſewhere: but they were commanded by proclamation to return to their reſpective towns.

Laſtly, the council ordered very ſtrictly that the payment of tonnage and poundage ſhould be continued, though the king had yet no grant from the parliament, though he had never demanded any ſuch thing, and though the commons had complained of the levying theſe impoſts as a grievance in the remonſtrance they had prepared.

But to let the people ſee, it was purely out of neceſſity that the king made uſe of theſe extraordinary methods to raiſe money, his majeſty ordered a general faſt to be held on the 5th of July, to divert the judgments of God ready to fall on the kingdom, by the pretended invaſion it was threatened with. This afforded him alſo a pretence to require the lords lieutenants of the ſeveral counties to muſter and arm the militia, and put them in condition to withſtand the invaſions of enemies from abroad, and quell the rebellion of ſubjects at home, if any ſhould happen[y]. For the court was under ſome fears of commotions[z].

The means hitherto uſed by the king to raiſe money, were not ſufficient to free him from a freſh incumbrance cauſed by an unexpected event. The king of Denmark his uncle, whom he had engaged in a war with the emperor, was defeated the 27th of Auguſt by count Tilly, with the loſs of all his baggage and train of artillery. This accident obliged Charles to find money to ſupport his uncle, who was in a very ill ſituation, and could not avoid making a peace with the emperor, unleſs ſpeedily relieved. The way which was thought moſt proper to raiſe money on this urgent occaſion, was by a general loan from the ſubject, according as every man was aſſeſſed in the rolls of the laſt ſubſidy. It is true the king gave his royal word, that all the money ſhould be repaid without fee or charge: but the performance of his promiſe, as afterwards appeared, was not relied on. The king himſelf as well as his council expected to meet with many obſtacles in executing this project, ſuch forced loans not being agreeable to the nation. It was feared beſides, that this way of raiſing money upon the ſubject, would in the end render parliaments uſeleſs. For this reaſon the council judged it proper to make uſe of three methods to ſucceed in their deſign: 1. Of ſome artifice to oblige the people as much as poſſible to lend freely: 2. Of fear, to terrify the irreſolute: 3. Of rigour, to compel the moſt obſtinate. Theſe were the grounds of the inſtructions the council gave the commiſſioners, who were appointed in the ſeveral counties to levy the loan. The inſtructions were to this effect:

" I. That they ſhould themſelves, for a good example to others, lend unto his majeſty the ſeveral ſums of money required of them, teſtifying it by their names, with their own hands, that when they ſhall in his majeſty's name require others to lend, they may diſcern the ſaid commiſſioners forwardneſs.

" II. To take for their guide thoſe rates, at which men were aſſeſſed in the book of the laſt ſubſidy, and to require the loan of ſo much money, as the entire rate and value comes to, at which they are rated and ſet; as (namely) he that is ſet an hundred pounds in goods, to lend an hundred marks; and he that is ſet an hundred pounds in land, to lend an hundred pounds in money; and ſo 'per rata' for a greater or leſſer ſum.

" III. To uſe all poſſible endeavours to cauſe every man willingly and cheerfully to lend, opening unto them, the neceſſity and unavoidableneſs of this courſe; the honour and reputation of the nation; the true religion, and common ſafety of prince and people, of our friends and allies engaged in the common cauſe; that there is no time now of diſputing but of acting.

" IV. That they appoint the days of payment to be within fourteen days, and perſwade ſuch as ſhall be able, to pay it at one entire payment, the better to accommodate his majeſty's occaſion; otherwiſe to accept of the one half at fourteen days, and the other to be paid before the 20th of December now next coming.

" V. That they treat apart with every one of thoſe that are to lend, and not in the preſence or hearing of any other, unleſs they ſee cauſe to the contrary. And if any ſhall refuſe to lend, and ſhall make delays or excuſes, and perſiſt in their obſtinacy, that they examine ſuch perſons upon oath, whether they have been dealt with to deny or refuſe to lend, or make any excuſe for not lending? Who hath dealt ſo with him, and what ſpeeches or perſuaſions he or they have uſed to him tending to that purpoſe? And that they ſhall alſo charge every ſuch perſon in his majeſty's name, upon his allegiance, not to diſcloſe to any other, what his anſwer was.

" VI. That they ſhew their diſcretion and affections, by making choice of ſuch to begin with, who are likely to give the beſt examples; and when they have a competent number of hands to the roll or liſt of the leaders, that they ſhew the ſame to others to lead them in like manner.

" VII. That they endeavour to diſcover, whether any, publicly or underhand, be workers or perſwaders of others to diſſent from, or diſlike of this courſe, or hinder the good diſpoſition of others. And that as much as they may, they hinder all diſcourſe about it, and certify to the privy council in writing, the names, qualities, and dwelling-places, of all ſuch refractory perſons, with all ſpeed, and eſpecially if they ſhall diſcover any combination or confederacy againſt theſe proceedings.

" VIII. That they let all men know whom it may concern, that his majeſty is well pleaſed upon lending theſe ſums required, to remit all that which by letters, in his name, was deſired upon the late benevolence for free grant; and whatever hath been already paid upon that account, ſhall be accepted for part of this loan; and if it exceed the ſum deſired, that the overplus ſhall be repaid without fee or charge; ſo likewiſe for privy ſeals, if any have been already paid; but if not, that the agreeing of the loan of the ſum required, be excuſed of the payment of the privy ſeal.

" IX. That they admit of no ſuit to be made, or reaſons to be given, for the abating of any ſum, the time and inſtant occaſion not admitting any ſuch diſpute, which would but diſturb and protract the ſheriff.

" Laſtly, Commiſſioners were required and commanded, upon their faith and allegiance to his majeſty, to keep ſecret to themſelves, and not impart or diſcloſe theſe inſtructions to others."

For the advancement of the loan, care was taken to publiſh a liſt of ſuch as had freely ſubſcribed, for a good example to others; and all the peers and gentlemen were ordered to repair to their country ſeats, that their abſence might cauſe no delay or obſtacle to the ſubſcriptions. Sir Randolf Crew, lord chief juſtice, ſhewing no zeal for advancing the loan, was removed from his place, which was given to ſir Nicholas Hide[b]. The king believing it neceſſary to ſhew by this example, that he would admit of no excuſe[c].

Beſides this example, the court uſed, to promote the loan, ſome other ways, which, probably, would not be leſs effectual. The firſt was, the billeting of ſoldiers upon private houſes, contrary to the conſtant cuſtom of England, where all, but ſuch as keep public houſes, have the privilege of not being obliged to lodge ſoldiers againſt their wills. It is eaſy to perceive, that thoſe who ſhewed any reluctance to lend the king money, were not ſpared on this occaſion, and that the ſoldiers quartered upon them, took care to let them ſee what they expoſed themſelves to by diſobeying the king. Moreover, ſuch as were ſufferers by theſe troubleſome gueſts, could not ſummon them before the uſual judges; but by the king's expreſs orders, they were obliged to apply to a council of war, ſo that the officers were the ſole judges of their ſoldiers. This is never practiſed in England, where councils of war have no juriſdiction but what the parliament allows them by an act on purpoſe, limiting both the time and the occaſions. In ſhort, it evidently appeared, that the king would not be contradicted, and was reſolved to raiſe money upon the ſubjects as he pleaſed. It is true, he grounded his proceedings upon former precedents. But that ſome of his predeceſſors had, many ages before, practiſed theſe methods, whether out of neceſſity or otherwiſe, was ſufficient for him to conſider ſuch a precedent as the foundation of his right, and a prerogative of the crown. Notwithſtanding all this, the people in general were ſo averſe to the loan, that the money flowed but ſlowly into the king's exchequer. [1627] The court therefore was obliged to uſe a more violent remedy to force the moſt obſtinate: and that was, to order ſuch of the common ſort as refuſed to ſubſcribe to the loan, to be enrolled as ſoldiers to ſerve in his majeſty's troops. As for perſons of birth and rank, they were ſummoned to appear before the council, and upon a ſecond refuſal to lend money, were confined to places at a great diſtance from their habitations, and ſuch as refuſed to be thus confined, were committed to the ſeveral priſons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford, and a zealous adherent of the king, was among the impriſoned[d].

Beſides theſe means, the court practiſed another, from whence they expected great advantages, but which proved more detrimental than beneficial to the king. And that was, to cauſe miniſters, gained for that purpoſe, to preach, as a ſcripture doctrine, that ſubjects were obliged to obey the king's commands without examination. Two of theſe miniſters diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ſermons on this ſubject. Dr. Sibthorp, who was one, ſays, among other things, in a ſermon preached at Northampton, at Lent aſſizes:

" That the prince, who is the head, and makes his court and council, it is his duty to direct and make laws, Eccleſ. viii. 3, 4. He doth whatever pleaſes him. Where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may ſay unto him, What doſt thou?---If princes command any thing which ſubjects may not perform, becauſe it is againſt the laws of God, or of nature, or impoſſible, yet ſubjects are bound to undergo the puniſhment, without either reſiſting, or railing, or reviling, and ſo to yield a paſſive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one---I know no other caſe, but one of thoſe three, wherein a ſubject may excuſe himſelf with paſſive obedience; but in all other he is bound to active obedience."

But Dr. Manwaring ſpoke ſtill more plainly in one of his ſermons. He ſaid, " That the king is not bound to obſerve the laws of the realm concerning the ſubjects rights and liberties, but that his royal will and command in impoſing loans and taxes, without common conſent in parliament, doth oblige the ſubjects conſcience upon pain of eternal damnation. That thoſe who refuſed to pay his loan, offended againſt the law of God, and the king's ſupreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, diſloyalty, and rebellion. And that the authority of parliament is not neceſſary for the raiſing of aids and ſubſidies; and that the ſlow proceedings of ſuch great aſſemblies, were not fitted for the ſupply of the ſtates urgent neceſſities, but would rather produce ſundry impediments to the juſt deſigns of princes."

It can hardly be thought, that ſuch a doctrine was publicly preached in England, or at leaſt, it is apt to be imagined, that theſe preachers were men of no name, who ſought to pleaſe the court, and were not openly approved. But this belief muſt be changed, when it is conſidered, that archbiſhop Abbot was ſuſpended from all his archiepiſcopal functions, and confined to one of his country-houſes [e], for refuſing to licenſe Sibthorp's ſermon: that Manwaring, after having been ſentenced by the lords in the next parliament to pay a thouſand pounds fine, to make a public ſubmiſſion to the bars of the two houſes, and to be impriſoned during the pleaſure of the lords, after having been ſuſpended for three years, and declared incapable of holding any eccleſiaſtical dignity, or ſecular office, obtained, nevertheleſs, the king's pardon, with a good benefice, and afterwards a biſhopric. One cannot therefore help thinking, that the doctrine preached by theſe miniſters, was approved, favoured, and countenanced by the court. Indeed, the king's and his miniſter's conduct plainly ſhewed, it was their intention to eſtabliſh an arbitrary power, and ſet the king above the laws. Of this we ſhall ſee farther proofs in the ſequel.

[c] The papiſts contributed very freely in the loan, but the puritans were very backward in it. Whitelock. p. 8. This did beget in the king at firſt a tenderneſs towards the papiſts, and afterwards a truſt and confidence in them: which was unhappily miſtaken by his other ſubjects, as if he inclined to their religion. Welwood, p. 37.

Notwithſtanding the king's hopes to ſucceed at length in his project, he was not eaſy: the war he had undertaken for the recovery of the Palatinate was ſo ſlowly and unſucceſsfully carried on, that it was evident he would never compaſs his ends by continuing it in ſuch a manner. Hitherto, every thing had miſcarried. The twelve thouſand men intended for the Palatinate, under the command of count Mansfeldt, were loſt for want of proper meaſures for their paſſage, as was ſhewn in the reign of king James. The projected expedition againſt Cadiz and the Spaniſh Weſt-India fleet, had met with no better ſucceſs. The king of Denmark beginning a war with the emperor, at the inſtance of his nephew the king of England, was entirely defeated. The United Provinces, in alliance with England, were rather in want of aſſiſtance, than able to give any. Lewis XIII. had flattered the king of England with hopes of a league againſt the houſe of Auſtria, only to obtain the better terms from the Spaniards in Italy; and ſince he had concluded a peace in that country, did not ſhew the leaſt inclination to join with England for the recovery of the Palatinate. Thus Charles ſaw himſelf farther than ever from the execution of his grand projects. To this may be added, that the diſſolution of his two firſt parliaments, without obtaining the expected ſupplies, rendered him contemptible to his neighbours. There was no ſtate deſirous to enter into a ſtrict alliance with a prince who had imprudently quarelled with his ſubjects, when he moſt wanted their aſſiſtance. In ſhort, though he had intended to free himſelf from the yoke of parliaments, and put himſelf in a condition to raiſe what money he pleaſed upon his ſubjects, by the methods he had deviſed, he daily perceived he had taken wrong meaſures. The loan-money came in but very ſlowly. To raiſe it, he was obliged continually to uſe rigour and violence, the Engliſh for the moſt part refuſing voluntarily to ſubmit to a power, they believed contrary to their liberties and laws. The court therefore was forced to be cautious in the examples of rigour againſt the diſobedient, that it might not cauſe an open rebellion, for fear if a flame broke out in any part, it would ſpread over the whole kingdom.

The king in his preſent ſituation, ſeems to have had but one of theſe two courſes to take, either to agree with his people, or make peace with Spain. By the firſt courſe, he would have been enabled to puſh the war he had undertaken more vigorouſly. By the ſecond, he would have been freed from the trouble of demanding extraordinary ſupplies of his parliament, or of raiſing money by unuſual methods, which gained him the hatred of his people. But both theſe courſes were contrary to his temper, his character, his projects, the intereſts of his favourite and miniſters. As to the firſt, I believe I may affirm, he had formed the project of eſtabliſhing in England a deſpotic power. I ſhall not loſe time in proving it. I had rather the reader would judge for himſelf, by the king's own ſpeeches, by his meſſages to the houſe of commons, by his conduct, and by that of his miniſters and council. What has been hitherto ſeen, may ſerve to give ſome idea of it; but what will appear hereafter, will, as I think, afford undeniable proofs. This being ſuppoſed, Charles could not diveſt himſelf of the principles imbibed from his infancy, and deeply rooted in him by his father's inſtructions and example, without relinquiſhing his projects, and forming a new plan of government, directly contrary to his temper and inclination. In a reconciliation with his people, he muſt have ſubmitted to the maxims of the parliament, who were continually urging the laws of the land, and the liberties of the people, and been obliged to become, if I may ſo ſay, leſs a king than he had hitherto been, and than he thought he had a right to be. The ſuffering the extent of the prerogative royal to be queſtioned on all occaſions, was a thing too oppoſite to his temper. This was a point of which he was no leſs, or rather more, tender than his father. Beſides, the duke of Buckingham, who had a great influence over him, plainly ſaw, that an agreement between the king and the people, would infallibly be followed with his own ruin. The reſt of the miniſters, who were all his creatures, perceived likewiſe, that their welfare depended on the favourite's, and that the favourite's credit could not ſubſiſt with a good underſtanding between the king and his parliament. It was neceſſary therefore, that the king, to extricate himſelf out of this labyrinth, ſhould become, as I may ſay, quite another man, ſhould alter his principles, ſhould have ſtrength of mind ſufficient to diſcern clearly his true intereſts from thoſe of his favourites and miniſters, and reſolution to proceed without their aſſiſtance, and follow councils more agreeable to his ſubjects. But this was a thing impoſſible, conſidering the king's character, who ſeemed then of an inflexible temper. He perceived in the end, he had taken a wrong courſe, but not till it was too late to forſake it.

As to the other courſe, which was to make peace with Spain, beſides that the king thought himſelf bound in honour to ſupport a war of which he was the ſole author, though he always affected to impute it to the parliament, this peace was entirely contrary to his private intereſt. How little ſucceſs ſoever he had reaſon to expect from the continuance of the war, in his preſent circumſtances, it ſerved him for pretence to levy money upon his people, and afforded him means to put in practice his projects to eſtabliſh an abſolute power. On the other hand, it being the intereſt of his favourite and miniſters to keep him at variance with his people, to whom they were all very odious, they could not do it better than by putting him under an indiſpenſible neceſſity of raiſing money upon the ſubject, without conſent of parliament.

The effect of this policy evidently appeared at the very time I am ſpeaking of. Inſtead of perſuading the king to make peace with Spain, they engaged him by degrees to proclaim war with France, at a time when he knew not how to continue the war he had begun with the houſe of Auſtria. To engage France to afford ſome pretence for the rupture, which was meditating in England, the king upon ſome diſguſt concerning the queen's French chaplains and domeſtics [f], diſmiſſed them all, having firſt paid what was due for wages or ſalaries. The king of France highly reſented this manifeſt breach of the marriage-treaty; but however, did nothing that ſhewed deſign to be revenged by way of arms. So the diſguſt received from the queen's domeſtics, who were ſufficiently puniſhed, could not ſerve for pretence of a rupture on the ſide of England, ſince on the contrary, France had reaſon to complain of the breach of the treaty. Nevertheleſs, it was intended to make war upon France, under colour of ſupporting the Hugonots who were oppreſſed, and threatened with utter deſtruction [g]. But when the character of the king, of the favourite, and of the miniſtry is conſidered, it can hardly be thought, that the deſire of maintaining the proteſtant religion, ſuch as it was in France, was the real motive of this war. The king and his whole court mortally hated the preſbyterians. The duke of Buckingham had properly no religion at all. Weſton and Conway were catholics. Laud and Neile thought it impoſſible to be ſaved out of the church of England. How then can it be imagined that all theſe men, who were the king's moſt intimate counſellors, ſhould combine to ſupport in France a religion for which they had the utmoſt contempt? It is much more probable, that the king's miniſters ſeeing little likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by arms, and fearing the king would at length be tired of a fruitleſs war with Spain, induced him to carry his arms into France, in order ſtill to keep him under a neceſſity of raiſing money by extraordinary methods, and thereby perpetuating his miſunderſtanding with his ſubjects, on which the continuance of their credit entirely depended. But I own this is only conjecture. Another cauſe is alleged of this war with France, namely the duke of Buckingham's pride, who being ſent to Paris to conduct the queen into England, became amorous of Anne of Auſtria, wife to Lewis XIII. and had the confidence to diſcloſe his paſſion. It is ſaid, the court of France threatened him with a puniſhment ſuitable to his inſolence, and refuſed to let him ſee the queen any more, but that he ſwore, he would ſee her in ſpite of them all. To this oath is aſcribed the reſolution inſtilled into the king his maſter to make war upon France, in hopes it would give him an opportunity to perform his oath. I own, I ſee very little probability in this pretended project, which however the lord Clarendon has thought fit to mention [h].

The war with France being reſolved, the king declared the grounds of it to his council; namely,

"I. That the houſe of Auſtria had ſuch an influence upon the council of France, as to prevail with them to obſtruct the landing of count Mansfeldt's army, contrary to promiſe, with whom the French ſhould have joined forces for the relief of the Palatinate, and the German princes; which failure of performance in them, proved the ruin of that army."

I have ſpoken of this affair in the reign of king James I. and ſhewed that it was an error in the council of England to depend upon a general promiſe as upon a treaty. Beſides, it was too late for the king to think of revenging this pretended affront, which had not prevented his eſpouſing the French king's ſiſter.

"II. That having by his mediation prevailed for a peace between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects, and engaged his word, that the proteſtants ſhould obſerve the articles of agreement: nevertheleſs the king of France, contrary to the ſaid articles, blocked up their towns, garriſons, and forts, and had committed many ſpoils upon them, when they had done nothing in violation of the edict of peace."

It is very true, it was the intereſt of England to ſupport the Hugonots, who were unjuſtly oppreſſed. But by what law is a prince, who procures a peace between two enemies, but is not guarantee for performance of articles, empowered to go to war with one of the parties that breaks it? Had the king been ſatisfied with ſaying, the intereſt of England would not ſuffer the Hugonots to be oppreſſed, this political reaſon might have been allowed: but in ſuch caſes, there is a wide difference between intereſt and right.

"III. That the king of France had committed an example of great injuſtice in full peace, to ſeize upon one hundred and twenty Engliſh ſhips, with all their merchandiſe and artillery."

The king paſſes over in ſilence, that the French acted only by way of repriſal, and that the Engliſh were the aggreſſors, as the parliament had complained to the king himſelf. It is evident therefore, that the grounds of this war could not be more frivolous.

The king's deſign was to ſend a fleet to Rochel, under colour of relieving that place, which was threatened with a ſiege. This affair had been managed at the court of England by the duke of Soubize and monſieur St. Blancard, a gentleman of Languedoc, without the knowledge of the Rochellers. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect, that their intention was to deliver the town to the Engliſh, on pretence of relieving it. However, the affair was kept very private, and ever ſince April a fleet had been equipping with all expedition, without any poſſibility of gueſſing for what it was intended. When it was ready, the king gave the duke of Buckingham a commiſſion, which plainly ſhewed, the affair was to be a ſecret. By this commiſſion, the duke was made admiral of the fleet, and commander in chief of the land forces, which ſhould be embarked for the recovery of the Palatinate, according to ſuch private inſtructions as he ſhould receive from his majeſty.

This fleet, conſiſting of above an hundred ſhips, having on board ſeven thouſand ſoldiers, ſailed from Portſmouth the 7th of June, and on the 20th of July appeared before Rochel. At the duke's approach, the Rochellers ſhut their gates for fear of a ſurprize, as having no notice that an Engliſh fleet was to come ſo near them. Preſently after were ſeen to arrive the duke of Soubize, with Sir William Beecher, who told them from the duke of Buckingham, that the king of England, out of compaſſion to their ſufferings, had ſent a fleet and army to their aſſiſtance, and if they refuſed his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagement of honour and conſcience for their relief. The mayor replied in the name of the inhabitants, that they moſt humbly thanked his majeſty for the care he had of them; but that being in ſtrict union with all the reſt of the proteſtants in the kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered ſuccours, without conſulting their friends, and without the previous conſent of the whole body of the Hugonots. The duke of Buckingham finding by this anſwer, it would not be eaſy to get his troops into Rochel, directed his courſe to the iſle of Rhee, where Toiras commanded. Toiras endeavoured at firſt to hinder the landing of the Engliſh; but as his forces were few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel at St. Martin's, which was in a good ſtate of defence. Had the duke underſtood the art of war, he would, without loſing a moment, have marched to the fort, and thereby hindered Toiras from getting in proviſions. But he ſpent ſo much time in landing and in preparing to march, that Toiras had leiſure to ſtore the place with ammunition. At laſt he marched to St. Martin's, and beſieged it in form, but with little ſucceſs. He had to deal with one more expert than himſelf, and who found means to keep him employed in the ſiege till November, though he had ſent the king word he ſhould be maſter of the place in eight days. Mean while, the king of France, who had not expected this invaſion, ordered his troops to march with all ſpeed towards the ſea, and came in perſon to haſten the relief of the iſle of Rhee. When all was ready, count Schomberg paſſed into the iſle with ſix or ſeven thouſand men, without any oppoſition from the Engliſh fleet. Then he marched to St. Martin's, the ſiege whereof the duke of Buckingham raiſed with precipitation, being vigorouſly puſhed by the French to the very ſea-ſide, ſo that it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked his remaining troops. It is ſaid, of the ſeven thouſand men he brought from England, near five thouſand periſhed in this unfortunate expedition. It was rumoured however in England, that not above fifteen hundred were loſt; and ſome even ſay, the king was made to believe it.

Whilſt the duke of Buckingham was employed in this expedition, ſir John Elliot, impriſoned for refuſing to lend the king money, preſented to his majeſty a petition for his liberty, which he did not aſk as a favour, but as juſtice. He grounded his requeſt upon ſeveral ſtatutes which he cited, and by which he pretended to ſhew, that the king could not exact money from the ſubject by way of loan, nor were the ſubjects bound to ſubmit to it. As the king then ſtood diſpoſed, this petition could be of no ſervice to the perſon that preſented it. In November following, ſome other gentlemen [i], committed for the ſame reaſon, brought their Habeas Corpus, that is, deſired to be diſcharged upon bail, a privilege enjoyed by all Engliſhmen [k]. This cauſe was pleaded very ſolemnly before all the judges of the realm. There were two points to be decided. The firſt, whether the priſoners were committed by the ſpecial command of the king, ſince the warden ſaid only, "that the priſoners were detained by command of the king, ſignified to him by warrant of ſeveral of the privy-council." Now the priſoners pleaded, that, according to law, the king's order ſhould be produced not barely for detaining them, but for committing them; and that beſides, the ſignifying of the order by the lords of the council, ſhewed, it was not by ſpecial command of his majeſty. The ſecond point was, whether the king could impriſon any ſubject without declaring the cauſe of the commitment, and whether in ſuch caſe the priſoners ought not to have the benefit of a Habeas Corpus, that is, to be diſcharged upon bail. The council for the priſoners repreſented the terrible conſequences of ſuch a power in the king, ſince thereby the liberty of every ſubject would be at the king's mercy, who could detain them in priſon as long as he pleaſed, and there would be no remedy by law. But the judges unanimouſly decided againſt the priſoners, who were all remanded to their ſeveral priſons.

The ill ſucceſs of the iſle of Rhee expedition raiſed numberleſs complaints and murmurs againſt the duke of Buckingham, who had many enemies. Multitudes were loſt in that unfortunate undertaking, and among the reſt, major-general Burroughs, one of the beſt officers in England; and theſe misfortunes were imputed to the duke of Buckingham's incapacity, who had never been in the wars, and knew nothing

[h] The duke of Buckingham is reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been the author of this war; either out of revenge for having been excepted againſt by Lewis XIII. when he was appointed to go embaſſador to France; or on account of ſome affronts put upon him by that court, when he was ſent to bring the queen over. For, from that time, "he took all the ways he could to undervalue and exaſperate that court and nation; and omitted no opportunity to incenſe king Charles againſt France, and even againſt his queen; and behaved himſelf very rudely to her." See Claren. tom. I. p. 38, 39.

[k] For the better underſtanding of what follows, it muſt be obſerved, that when any perſon is committed (unleſs for treaſon or felony) upon his ſending a copy of the mittimus to the chancellor, or any of the judges of the exchequer, they are obliged to grant him a writ called Habeas Corpus, upon the receipt of which, the head gaoler or keeper muſt carry up the priſoner, and return the cauſes of his commitment and detainer to the court, to which the writ is returnable. Then the judge determines whether the caſe be bailable. If not, the priſoner is remanded back to priſon. In the preſent caſe, the warden of the Fleet made this return: "That ſir Walter Earl, knight, named in the writ, is detained in the priſon of the Fleet in his cuſtody, by ſpecial command of the king, to him ſigned by warrant of ſeveral of the privy council." Now it was pleaded in behalf of the priſoners, that the form of the returns was not good, the cauſe of the commitment not being ſpecified as the writ requires. And therefore, if the priſoners were not bailed, but remanded, the ſubjects of the kingdom may be reſtrained of the liberty for ever, and by law there can be no remedy. See Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 459.

There

of the ſea ſervice, though the king had made him both admiral and captain-general. To theſe complaints were added others upon other accounts. The mariners complained, they had received no wages for three years paſt, and deſerted in great numbers, not to be forced to ſerve any longer without pay. The merchants made bitter complaints, that the ſeas were neglected, that within three years they had loſt a great number of ſhips, and that the fiſhermen were taken almoſt in the very harbours. In a word, no one ventured to build any new ſhips, becauſe as ſoon as they were ready the king ſeized them for his ſervice, againſt the will of the owners.

Though the king did not much regard all theſe complaints, which perhaps reached him not; he was however very attentive to the petition which the Rochellers, upon the point of being beſieged, ſent him by their deputies for relief. He had engaged in a war with France, upon his good opinion of his fleet and of his favourite's ability, and though experience ſhewed him this opinion was ill-grounded, he would proceed, let what would be the conſequence. Mean while he ſaw himſelf without money, and the oppoſition he met with in the affair of the loan made him ſenſible how difficult it would be to raiſe it by ſuch methods. For that reaſon he conſulted ſir Robert Cotton upon the preſent ſituation of his affairs. Cotton adviſed him to call a parliament, as the beſt means to free himſelf from all difficulties. But as ſir Robert foreſaw the houſe of commons would attack the duke of Buckingham, he adviſed withal, that the duke might be the firſt, who in full council ſhould move the calling of a parliament. This advice was followed, and the duke having acted his part, the parliament was ſummoned by the unanimous reſolution of the council to meet the 17th of March 1628. Immediately after, warrants were ſent to all parts to releaſe the impriſoned and confined gentlemen for the affair of the loan-money, and the king had the mortification to ſee almoſt all of them, to the number of twenty-ſeven, choſen to ſerve for repreſentatives in the enſuing parliament[1]. He ſent writs of ſummons to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was confined to one of his houſes, to the biſhop of Lincoln, priſoner in the Tower, and to the earl of Briſtol. At the ſame time, the council ordered the lord-mayor of London to uſe moderation in demanding the loan-money. This ſhews that there were ſtill ſome people who ſtood out, and that violence was hitherto uſed to compel them.

[1627-8] The parliament being aſſembled the 17th of March, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THESE times are for action; wherefore, for example ſake, I mean not to ſpend much time in words; expecting accordingly, that your (as I hope) good reſolutions will be ſpeedy, not ſpending time unneceſſarily, or (that I may better ſay) dangerouſly: for tedious conſultations at this conjuncture of time are as hurtful as ill reſolutions.

"I am ſure you now expect from me, both to know the cauſe of your meeting, and what to reſolve on: yet I think that there is none here but knows, that common danger is the cauſe of this parliament, and that ſupply at this time is the chief end of it: So that I need but point to you what to do. I will uſe but few perſuaſions: for if to maintain your own advices, and as now the caſe ſtands for the following thereof, the true religion, laws, and liberties of this ſtate, and the juſt defence of our true friends and allies be not ſufficient, then no eloquence of men nor angels will prevail.

"Only let me remember you, that my duty moſt of all, and every one of yours according to his degree, is to ſeek the maintenance of this church and commonwealth: and certainly, there never was a time in which this duty was more neceſſarily required than now.

"I therefore judging a parliament to be the antient, ſpeedieſt, and beſt way in this time of common danger, to give ſuch ſupply as to ſecure ourſelves, and to ſave our friends from imminent ruin, have called you together. Every man now muſt do according to his conſcience; wherefore if you (as God forbid) ſhould not do your duties, in contributing what the ſtate at this time needs, I muſt, in diſcharge of my conſcience, uſe thoſe other means which God hath put into my hands, to ſave that, which the follies of particular men may otherwiſe hazard to loſe.

"Take not this as a threatening, for I ſcorn to threaten any but my equals, but an admonition from him, that both out of nature and duty, hath moſt care of your preſervations and proſperities: and (though I thus ſpeak) I hope that your demeanours at this time will be ſuch, as ſhall not only make me approve your former counſels, but lay on me ſuch obligations, as ſhall tie me by way of thankfulneſs to meet often with you: for be aſſured that nothing can be more pleaſing unto me, than to keep a good correſpondence with you.

"I will only add one thing more, and then leave my lord-keeper to make a ſhort paraphraſe upon the text I have delivered you, which is, 'To remember a thing, to the end we may forget it.' You may imagine that I came here with a doubt of ſucceſs of what I deſire, remembering the diſtractions of the laſt meeting: but I aſſure you, that I ſhall very eaſily and gladly forget and forgive what is paſt, ſo that you will at this preſent time leave the former ways of diſtractions, and follow the council late given you, To maintain the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace."

The lord-keeper ſeconded his majeſty in this manner:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"YE are here in parliament by his majeſty's writ and royal command, to conſult and conclude of the weighty and urgent buſineſs of this kingdom. Weighty it is and great, as great as the honour, ſafety, and protection of religion, king, and country: and what can be greater? Urgent it is; it is little pleaſure to tell or think how urgent: and to tell it with circumſtances, were a long work; I will but touch the ſum of it in few words.

"The pope and houſe of Auſtria have long affected, the one a ſpiritual, the other a temporal monarchy: and to effect their ends, to ſerve each other's turn, the houſe of Auſtria, beſides the rich and vaſt territories of both the Indies, and in Africa, joined together, are become maſters of Spain and Italy, and the great country of Germany. And although France be not under their ſubjection, yet they have environed all about it; the very bowels of the kingdom ſwayed by the popiſh faction: They have gotten ſuch a part, and ſuch interceſſion in the government, that under pretence of religion, to root out the proteſtants and our religion, they have drawn the king to their adherence, ſo far, that albeit upon his majeſty's interpoſition by his embaſſadors, and his engagement of his royal word, there was between the king and his ſubjects articles of agreement, and the ſubjects were quiet; whereof his majeſty, intereſted in that great treaty, was bound to ſee a true accompliſhment; yet againſt that ſtrict alliance, that treaty hath been broken, and thoſe of the religion have been put to all extremity, and undoubtedly will be ruined without preſent help. So as that king is not only diverted from aſſiſting the common cauſe, but hath been miſled to engage himſelf in hoſtile acts againſt our king and other princes, making way thereby for the houſe of Auſtria, to the ruin of his own and other kingdoms.

"Other potentates, that in former time did balance and interrupt the growing greatneſs of the houſe of Auſtria, are now removed and diverted. The Turk hath made peace with the emperor, and turned himſelf wholly into wars with Aſia. The king of Sweden is embroiled in a war with Poland, which is invented by Spaniſh practices, to keep that king from ſuccouring our part. The king of Denmark is chaced out of his kingdom, on this and on that ſide the Zound; ſo as the houſe of Auſtria is on the point to command all the ſea-coaſts from Dantzick to Embden, and all the rivers falling into the ſea in that great extent: ſo, as beſides the power by land, they begin to threaten our part by ſea, to the ſubverſion of all our ſtate.

"In the Baltick ſea, they are providing and arming all the ſhips they can build or hire; and have at this time their embaſſadors treating at Lubeck, to draw into their ſervice the Hanſe towns, whereby taking from us and our neighbours the eaſt-land trade, by which our ſhipping is ſupplied, they expect, without any blow given, to make themſelves maſters of that ſea. In theſe weſtern parts, by the Dunkirkers, and by the now French and Spaniſh admiral, to the ruin of fiſhing (of infinite conſequence both to us and the Low-Countries), they infeſt all our coaſt, ſo as we paſs not ſafely from port to port. And that fleet which lately aſſiſted the French at the at the iſle of Rhee, is now preparing at St. Andrews, with other ſhips built in the coaſt of Biſcay to re-inforce it, and a great fleet is making ready at Liſbon; where, beſides their own, they do ſerve themſelves upon all ſtrangers bottoms coming to that coaſt for trade: and theſe great preparations are, no doubt, to aſſault us in England or Ireland, as they ſhall find advantage, and a place fit for their turn.

"Our friends in the Netherlands, beſides the fear that juſtly troubles them, leſt the whole force of the emperor may fall down upon them, are diſtracted by their voyages into the eaſt, which hath carried both men and money into another world, and much weakened them at home.

[1] There were releaſed in all ſeventy-eight. See Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 473. where they are all named.

"Thus

"Thus are we even ready on all ſides to be ſwallowed up; the emperor, France, and Spain, being in open war againſt us; Germany over-run; the king of Denmark diſtreſſed; the king of Sweden diverted; and the Low-countrymen diſabled to give us aſſiſtance.

"I ſpeak not this to increaſe fear, unworthy of Engliſh courages, but to preſs to proviſion worthy the wiſdom of a parliament: and for that cauſe his majeſty hath called you hither, that by a timely proviſion againſt thoſe great imminent dangers, ourſelves may be ſtrengthened at home, our friends and allies encouraged abroad, and thoſe great cauſes of fear ſcattered and diſpelled.

"And becauſe, in all warlike preparations, treaſure bears the name, and holds the ſemblance of the nerves and ſinews; and if a ſinew be too ſhort or too weak, if it be either ſhrunk or ſtrained, the part becomes unuſeful: it is needful that you make good and timely ſupply of treaſure, without which all counſels will prove fruitleſs. I might preſs many reaſons to this end, but I will name but few.

"Firſt, for his majeſty's ſake, who requires it. Great is the duty which we owe him by the law of God; great by the law of nature, and our own allegiance; great for his own merit, and the memory of his ever bleſſed father. I do but point at them: but methinks our thoughts cannot but recoil on one conſideration touched by his majeſty, which to me ſeems to ſound, like a parliamentary pact or covenant.

"A war was deviſed here, aſſiſtance profeſſed, yea, and proteſted here: I do but touch it. I know you will deeply think on it; and the more, for the example the king hath ſet you; his lands, his plate, his jewels, he hath not ſpared, to ſupply the war: What the people hath proteſted, the king, for his part hath willingly performed.

"Secondly, for the cauſe ſake. It concerns us in chriſtian charity, to tender the diſtreſſes of our friends abroad; it concerns us in honour not to abandon them, who have ſtood for us. And if this come not cloſe enough, you ſhall find our intereſt ſo woven and involved with theirs, that the cauſe is more ours than theirs. If religion be in peril, we have the moſt flouriſhing and orthodox church: if honour be in queſtion, the ſtories and monuments in former ages will ſhew, that our anceſtors have left as much as any nation: if trade and commerce be in danger, we are iſlanders, it is our life. All theſe at once lie at ſtake, and ſo doth our ſafety and being.

"Laſtly, in reſpect of the manner of his majeſty's demand, which is in parliament, the way that hath ever beſt pleaſed the ſubjects of England. And good cauſe for it: for aids granted in parliament work good effects for the people; they be commonly accompanied with wholeſome laws, gracious pardons, and the like. Beſides, juſt and good kings finding the love of their people, and the readineſs of their ſupplies, may the better forbear the uſe of their prerogatives, and moderate the rigour of the laws towards their ſubjects.

"This way, as his majeſty hath told you, he hath choſen; not as the only way, but as the fitteſt; not as deſtitute of others, but as moſt agreeable to the goodneſs of his own moſt gracious diſpoſition, and to the deſire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, neceſſity and the ſword of the enemy make way to the others. Remember his majeſty's admonition; I ſay, remember it.

"Let me but add, and obſerve God's mercy towards this land above all others. The torrent of war hath overwhelmed other churches and countries; but God hath hitherto reſtrained it from us, and ſtill gives us warning of every approaching danger, to ſave us from ſurpriſe. And our gracious ſovereign, in a true ſenſe of it, calls together his high court of parliament, the lively repreſentation of the wiſdom, wealth, and power of the whole kingdom, to join together to repel thoſe hoſtile attempts, which diſtreſſed our friends and allies, and threatened ourſelves.

"And therefore it behoves all to apply their thoughts unto counſel and conſultations, worthy the greatneſs and wiſdom of this aſſembly; to avoid diſcontents and diviſions, which may either diſtemper or delay; and to attend that Unum neceſſarium, the common cauſe; propounding for the ſcope and work of all the debates, the general good of the king and kingdom, whom God hath joined together with an indiſſoluble knot, which none muſt attempt to cut or untie. And let all, by unity and good accord, endeavour to pattern this parliament by the beſt that have been, that it may be a pattern to future parliaments, and may infuſe into parliaments a kind of multiplying power and faculty, whereby they may be more frequent, and the king our ſovereign may delight to ſit on his throne, and from thence to diſtribute his graces and favours amongſt his people.

"His majeſty hath given you cauſe to be confident of this, you have heard from his royal mouth: which nevertheleſs he hath given me expreſs command to redouble: If this parliament, by their dutiful and wiſe proceedings, ſhall but give this occaſion, his majeſty will be ready, not only to manifeſt his gracious acceptation, but to put out all memory of thoſe diſaſters that have troubled former parliaments.

"I have but one thing more to add, and that is, as your conſultations be ſerious, ſo let them be ſpeedy. The enemy is beforehand with us, and flies on the wings of ſucceſs. We may dally and play with the hour-glaſs that is in our power, but the hour will not ſtay for us; and an opportunity once loſt, cannot be arraigned.

"And therefore reſolve of your ſupplies, that they may be timely and ſufficient, ſerving the occaſion: Your counſel, your aid, all is but loſt, if your aid be either too little, or too late: And his majeſty is reſolved, that his affairs cannot permit him to expect it over long."

Theſe two ſpeeches need no comment, ſince they plainly ſpeak both the king's principles concerning the uſe of parliaments, and his intention, in caſe he received not from the preſent parliament the ſatisfaction he expected. The king does not ſeem to have uſed a proper means to gain the goodwill of the commons. But it muſt be obſerved, that nothing was more oppoſite to his temper, than to ſtoop to his parliament. He thought it great condeſcenſion to declare, that though he had other ways of raiſing money, he was very willing to follow the old method of demanding a ſupply from the parliament. But for fear the commons ſhould think he was forced to it by a kind of neceſſity, he took care to intimate, that in caſe the money he demanded was not granted, he could raiſe it other ways. This was the ſole aim of theſe two ſpeeches.

As to the arguments alleged by the lord-keeper to excite the commons to give a plentiful ſupply to the king, they were too much exaggerated to produce a great effect. The pretended preparations of the Spaniards to invade England were a groundleſs chimera. Indeed, during this whole war, the Spaniards made no attempt upon Great Britain or Ireland. Nay, it was in the king's power to make peace with the Spaniard, who had no demands upon him, and yet, he would make believe that England was in imminent danger. As to the arguments ſo often repeated, that the parliament adviſed the war, it was ſo worn out, that it could not make the leaſt impreſſion. There was not then a man in England, but what was perfectly informed that the king and duke of Buckingham were the real authors of the Spaniſh war, and had fraudulently obtained from the parliament the advice continually inſiſted upon by the king.

Before the commons had entered into any debates, there was a long letter communicated to them, directed, "To my noble friends of the lower houſe of parliament," and diſperſed under the title of "A ſpeech without doors." The author, who was unknown, pretended to have been formerly a member of the lower houſe, though he was not choſen to ſerve in the preſent parliament. His aim was to adviſe the commons how they were to proceed, and to lay before them the ſundry grievances complained of by the people. This writing made a great noiſe at that time, but I do not think it neceſſary to inſert the contents, ſince they were only the ſentiments of a private perſon.

After the two houſes had preſented a petition to the king for a faſt, the commons began to examine the grievances of the nation, and ſeemed determined to grant no ſupply till theſe grievances were redreſſed. The firſt they took into conſideration were, billeting of ſoldiers, loans by benevolence and privy ſeals, impriſonment of gentlemen refuſing to lend, denial of releaſe upon Habeas Corpus; and ſeveral ſpeeches were made upon theſe occaſions. Sir Francis Seymour among other things ſaid---"How can we think of giving ſubſidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or no? For if his majeſty be perſuaded by any to take from his ſubjects what he will, and where it pleaſeth him; I would gladly know what we have to give?---Hath it not been preached in our pulpits, that all we have is the king's JURE DIVINO?"---Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards ſo well known by the name of earl of Strafford, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a ſpeech againſt the government. He ſaid truly, theſe things were not to be imputed to the king, but to the projectors, that is, to the miniſters or others who had formed the deſign of ſtretching the prerogative beyond its due bounds, of whom he ſpoke in this manner: "They have brought the crown into greater want than ever, by anticipating the revenues: And can the ſhepherd be thus ſmitten, and the ſheep not ſcattered? They have introduced a privy council, raviſhing at once the ſpheres of all ancient government, impriſoning us without either bail or bond: they have taken from us, what? What ſhall I ſay indeed, what have they left us? All means of ſupplying the king and ingratiating ourſelves with him, taking up the root of all propriety."---Sir Edward Coke, a great lawyer, ſpoke chiefly to the grievance of the loans, and ſaid, among other things: "Who will give ſubſidies, if the king may impoſe what he will? And if after parliament, the king may inhance what he pleaſeth?---The king cannot tax but by way of loans."---Thereupon he quoted the ſtatute of 25 Edward III. wherein it is ſaid, "That loans againſt the will of the ſubject, are againſt reaſon, and the franchiſes of the land;"---and concluded with this paragraph out of Magna Charta---"Nullus liber homo capiatur vel impriſonetur aut diſſeiſietur de libero tenemento ſuo, &c. niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum, vel per legem terræ." Another, ſpeaking of the impriſonment of thoſe who had refuſed to lend the king money, ſaid,---"O improvident anceſtors! O unwiſe forefathers! to be ſo curious in providing for the quiet poſſeſſion of our lands, and liberties of parliament, and to neglect our perſons and bodies, and to let them die in priſon, and that durante bene placito, remedileſs: If this be law, what do we talk of our liberties! Why do we trouble ourſelves with the diſpute of law, franchiſes, propriety of goods? What may a man call his, if not liberty?"

I intend not to enlarge any farther upon what was ſaid in the houſe of commons upon theſe points. This ſuffices to ſhew how the majority were diſpoſed. All their arguments tended to demonſtrate, that if the king had power to take the goods of his ſubjects by a bare act of his will, whether by way of loan or otherwiſe, and to impriſon ſuch as refuſed to obey his orders without being admitted to bail, they were either to be entirely ſubject to the king's pleaſure, or to begin with firmly eſtabliſhing the rights of the people, to the prevention of tyranny. The court-party durſt not directly oppoſe this general ſentiment, but endeavoured by ſeveral arguments to intimate, that to gain his majeſty's good will, ſupplies were in the firſt place to be granted. Then, they gave hopes, that the king, moved with ſuch a mark of affection for his perſon, would not be againſt redreſſing the grievances [m]. But this made little impreſſion upon the reſt, who were by far the majority, and who verily believed, that to begin with the ſubſidies was the ready way to have the grievances unredreſſed. Mean while to make a diverſion, ſecretary Coke preſented to the houſe certain propoſitions from the king, concerning ſupply; but it was reſolved, that the reading thereof ſhall be deferred till the houſe had taken ſome reſolution with reſpect to the grievances, eſpecially the impriſonment of the ſubjects, and denial of bail. There were very great debates upon theſe points, and the judges themſelves were heard. At laſt, the houſe came to the following reſolutions, directly contrary to the king's pretenſions, and the judges determinations: That is, they eſtabliſhed maxims oppoſite to thoſe of the king; namely,

"I. That no freeman ought to be detained or kept in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the command of the king or privy council, or any other, unleſs ſome cauſe of the commitment, detainer, or reſtraint, be expreſſed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained.

"II. That the writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy council, or any other, he praying the ſame.

"III. That if a freeman be committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained by the command of the king, the privy council, or any other, no cauſe of ſuch commitment, detainer, or reſtraint being expreſſed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained, and the ſame being returned upon a Habeas Corpus, granted for the ſaid party, then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

"IV. That it is the ancient and indubitable right of every freeman, that he hath a full and abſolute property in his goods and eſtate; that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the king, or any of his miniſters, without common conſent by act of parliament [n]."

The propoſitions tendered the day before by ſecretary Coke from his majeſty, were now received and read, but the debate thereof was referred to another day. The propoſitions were theſe:

"1. To furniſh with men and victuals thirty ſhips to guard the narrow ſeas, and along the coaſts.

"2. To ſet out ten other ſhips for relief of the town of Rochel.

"3. To ſet out ten other ſhips for the preſervation of the Elbe, the Sound, and the Baltick ſea.

"4. To levy arms, cloth, victual, pay, and tranſport an army of ten thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand foot, for foreign ſervice.

"5. To pay and ſupply ſix thouſand more for the ſervice of Denmark.

"6. To ſupply the forts of the office of ordnance.

"7. To ſupply the ſtores of the navy.

"8. To build twenty ſhips yearly for the increaſe of the navy.

"9. To repair the forts within the land.

"10. To pay the arrears of the office of ordnance.

"11. To pay the arrears of the victuallers office.

"12. To pay the arrears of the treaſure of the navy.

"13. To pay the arrears due for the freight of divers merchant-ſhips employed in his majeſty's ſervice.

"14. To provide a magazine for victuals for land and ſea ſervice."

The houſe eaſily perceived by the reading of theſe articles, that it would be a work of infinite labour, to examine the neceſſity and juſtice of each, and as there were no eſtimates made, they plainly ſaw, if they ſhould take the particulars into conſideration, the court would mount the expence very high. Wherefore, without entering into any diſcuſſion, they reſolved in general to grant the king a large ſupply [o].

After that, they returned to the examination of this particular grievance, that the king's council, by their bare authority, had confined to their houſes, ſome that refuſed to lend money; had ſent away others to diſtant places from their homes; and conſtrained ſome on the ſame account, to go and ſerve the king in foreign countries [p]. Upon this point, ſir Thomas Wentworth ſaid, "If any man owes a man a diſpleaſure, and ſhall procure him to be put into foreign employment, it will be a matter of high concernment to the ſubject: We know the honour and juſtice of the king, but we know not what his miniſters, or the mediation of embaſſadors may do, to work their own wrath upon any man." Theſe debates produced this reſolultion:

"That no freeman ought to be confined by any command from the king, or privy council, or any other, unleſs it be by act of parliament, or by other due courſe, or warrant of law."

[1628] All theſe determinations promiſed the king no good with reſpect to his prerogative; and as he feared the commons would again attack the duke of Buckingham, he tried to divert them from it by a meſſage delivered to the houſe by ſecretary Coke. It was upon a rumour, that the duke had ſpoken ill of the parliament at the council board. The king aſſured, it was not true; and the ſecretary added, if the duke had ſo ſpoken, he would have contradicted himſelf, for the whole council could bear him witneſs, he was the firſt mover of calling the parliament. But he took care not to tell them, it was merely out of policy, purſuant to Cotton's advice.

The next day the king ſent another meſſage to the commons, deſiring them to take the affair of ſupply into conſideration. He told them likewiſe, that as to the freedom of perſons, and propriety of goods, he was willing to come into any expedients which ſhould be judged convenient, by way of bill, or otherwiſe; and that the more confidence they ſhould ſhew in his grace and goodneſs, the more they ſhould prevail to obtain their deſires.

Upon this meſſage, the houſe unanimouſly voted five ſubſidies to the king [q], but returned immediately to the examination of grievances, and held a conference with the lords upon that ſubject.

Eaſter holidays approaching, the king ſent and deſired the commons not to adjourn, that affairs might be the more ſpeedily diſpatched. This meſſage occaſioned a debate, ſome

[o] March 31, the commons preſented a petition to the king againſt recuſants, which, together with the king's anſwers, is to be ſeen in Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 516, &c.

[p] Sir Peter Hayman, who was ſent into the Palatinate for refuſing to lend money, opened his own caſe. Ibid. p. 522.

[q] The king thankfully received them, acknowledging it the greateſt gift that ever was given in parliament. He added, that he liked parliaments at the firſt, though, ſince, he was grown to a diſtaſte of them; but now he loves them, and ſhall rejoice to meet with his people often. Ibid. p. 525.

He

members fearing ſuch a precedent might be a prejudice to the privileges of the houſe, and the king for the future think he had power to hinder an adjournment when he pleaſed. But at length it was reſolved to do as the king deſired.

The 11th of April, ſecretary Coke moved the diſpatch of the ſubſidies, ſaying, the votes to grant the king money were nothing till turned into a bill. But being oppoſed by ſeveral, it was reſolved, that grievances and ſupply ſhould go hand in hand.

The day following, Coke brought another meſſage from the king to the houſe, to this effect: "That his majeſty had long ſince expected ſome fruit of that which was ſo happily begun; but finding a ſtop beyond all expectation, his command was, that without any further delay they ſhould proceed in the affair of ſupply. For notwithſtanding his conſenting that ſupply and grievances ſhould go together, his meaning was not, that the one ſhould give interruption to the other, nor the time be ſpun out on any pretence. And therefore bid them take heed, that they did not force him to make an unpleaſing end of what was ſo well begun."

This meſſage did the king great injury. 1. Becauſe of the threatening. 2. By reaſon of his inſtances, that the affair of ſupply ſhould be diſpatched before that of grievances; for it was not doubted, that if the firſt were finiſhed, the parliament would be immediately prorogued. 3. Laſtly, The king's unwillingneſs to redreſs the grievances, was a clear evidence, he would never be brought to it of his own accord, and conſequently it was neceſſary to conſtrain him thereto. This was the more probable, as Coke, when he delivered the meſſage, added, "That the king would willingly hear any thing concerning the abuſes of power, but not about power itſelf." Theſe expreſſions were liable to many cavils, and plain intimations, that the king reſerved to himſelf, by this reſtriction, a means to evade the grievances. And indeed, Coke being moved to explain what he meant by the word Power, refuſed it[r].

Two days after, the ſecretary delivered another meſſage from the king, to haſten the affair of ſupply. Theſe meſſages, which came thus one upon another, gave frequent occaſions to the court party to preſs the houſe to content his majeſty. All their ſpeeches upon this head, met in one point, namely, to inſpire the houſe with a dread, that a quarrel between them and the king would be fatal to parliaments, and give the king occaſion to proceed without them for the future. As the king himſelf, and the lord keeper (by his order) had frequently made uſe of the ſame means to frighten the commons, it could not be doubted, that theſe men ſpoke purſuant to the intentions, and perhaps by the order of the court. A privy counſellor's ſpeech in the lower houſe laſt parliament was not yet forgot, and of which the commons had thought fit to take notice, in the remonſtrance they would have preſented to the king. The deſign of that ſpeech was to intimate to the commons, that if they did not content the king, they would run the riſque of being the cauſe of no more parliaments in England. This threat ſo often inſinuated by the king himſelf, by the lord keeper, by the members of the houſe known to be devoted to the court, ſometimes in dark, ſometimes in plain terms, had a quite contrary effect to what the king expected. Inſtead of terrifying the commons, it convinced them, how watchful they ought to be of the king's proceedings, leſt their condeſcenſion, or even their ſilence, ſhould authoriſe ſome things very prejudicial to the liberties of the nation, whom they repreſented. "What! (ſaid moſt of the members among themſelves) we are threatened, that if we do not grant the king whatever he requires, and when he pleaſes, if we oppoſe his pleaſure, even when contrary to the laws, he will govern without a parliament, that is, with an unlimited power: he will impriſon our perſons, ſeize our eſtates, and conſider the whole kingdom as his property! But he does not only threaten us, he has put his threats in execution already. Which then is beſt, either for him to uſurp an abſolute power againſt our will, or for us to ſuffer it, nay, approve it by our ſilence, and ſervile fears? Of the two, certainly the firſt is leaſt dangerous. A time may come, when the king ſhall have occaſion for parliaments, and then we ſhall be able to recover the ground we ſhall have loſt. But if we betray the intereſt of our country, by tamely yielding to the king the power he would aſſume, our liberty will be irrecoverably loſt. We ſhall lay upon ourſelves and poſterity, a yoke which our forefathers could never bear, and be held in abhorrence by the whole nation. And after all, what ſhall we gain by our condeſcenſion? Why, the king will continue the uſe of parliaments, provided he ſhall be abſolute maſter; order them to give him ſuch a ſum, and by ſuch a time; forbid them to examine grievances; in a word, manage them entirely as he pleaſes. Thus we ſhall prevent the king's governing without a parliament, but ſhall eſtabliſh a precedent which ſhall render parliaments for ever ſlaves to the king and his miniſters."

Such were the reaſonings of the greateſt part of the commons, and though they did not openly ſay theſe very words, the houſe ſhewed by their whole conduct, that theſe conſiderations were the real foundation of all their proceedings. For this reaſon it was reſolved to deſire an audience, in order to anſwer all his majeſty's meſſages, and to preſent him withal a petition concerning billeting of ſoldiers upon the ſubject. Their repreſentation to the king by the mouth of their ſpeaker, was as follows:

"Moſt gracious and dread ſovereign,

"YOUR dutiful and loyal commons here aſſembled, were lately humble ſuitors to your majeſty for acceſs to your royal preſence; the occaſion that moved their deſires herein, was a particular of importance, worthy your princely conſideration; which, as it well deſerves, ſhould have been the only ſubject of my ſpeech at this time.

"But ſince your gracious anſwer for this acceſs, obtained by a meſſage from your majeſty, they have had ſome cauſe to doubt, that your majeſty is not ſo well ſatisfied with the manner of their proceedings, as their hearty deſire is you ſhould be, eſpecially in that part which concerns your majeſty's preſent ſupply, as if in the proſecution thereof, they had of late uſed ſome ſlackneſs or delay.

"And becauſe no unhappineſs of theirs can parallel with that which may proceed from a miſunderſtanding in your majeſty, of their clear and loyal intentions, they have commanded me to attend your majeſty, with an humble and ſummary declaration of their proceedings, ſince this ſhort time of their ſitting, which they hope will give your majeſty abundant ſatisfaction, that never people did more truly deſire to be endeared in the favour and gracious opinion of their ſovereign; and withal to let you ſee, that as you can have no where more faithful counſel, ſo your great deſigns and occaſions can no way be ſo ſpeedily or heartily ſupported, as in this old and ancient way of parliament.

"For this purpoſe they humbly beſeech your majeſty to take into your royal conſideration, that although by ancient right of parliament, the matters there debated are to be diſpoſed in their true method and order, and that their conſtant cuſtom hath been to take into their conſiderations the common grievances of the kingdom, before they enter upon the matter of ſupply; yet to make a full expreſſion of that zeal and affection which they bear to your royal majeſty, equalling at leaſt, if not exceeding the beſt affections of their predeceſſors to the beſt of your progenitors; they have in their aſſembly, contrary to the ordinary proceedings of parliament, given your majeſty's ſupply precedence, before the common grievance of the ſubject, how preſſing ſoever, joining with it only thoſe fundamental and vital liberties of the kingdom, which give ſubſiſtence and ability to your ſubjects.

"This was their original order and reſolution, and was grounded upon a true diſcerning, that theſe two conſiderations could not be ſerved, but did both of them entirely concern your majeſty's ſervice, conſiſting no leſs in enabling and encouraging the ſubject, than in proportioning a preſent ſuiting to your majeſty's occaſions, and their abilities; nay, ſo far have they been from uſing any unneceſſary delays, as though, of the two, that of the ſupply were the latter propoſition amongſt them, the grand committee to which both were referred, hath made that of your majeſty's ſupply firſt ready for concluſion.

"And, to be ſure your majeſty's ſupply might receive no interruption by the other, differing from uſage and cuſtom (in caſes of this nature) ſent up of thoſe that concern the ſubjects by parcels, ſome to your majeſty, and ſome to the lords, to the end your majeſty might receive ſuch ſpeedy content as ſuited with the largeſt and beſt extent of their firſt order.

"Sir, you are the breath of our noſtrils, and the light of our eyes, and beſides thoſe many comforts, which under you and your royal progenitors, in this frame of government, this nation hath enjoyed, the religion we profeſs hath taught us whoſe image you are; and we do all moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to believe that nothing is or can be more dear unto us than the ſacred rights and prerogatives of your crown; no perſon or council can be greater lovers of you, nor be more truly careful to maintain them; and the preſerving ſerving of thoſe fundamental liberties which concern the freedom of our perſons, and propriety of goods and eſtates, is an eſſential means to eſtabliſh the true glory of a monarchy.

" For rich and free ſubjects, as they are beſt governed, ſo they are moſt liable to do your majeſty ſervice either in peace or war, which next under God hath been the cauſe of the happy and famous victories of this nation, beyond other kingdoms of larger territories and greater number of people.

" What information ſoever contrary to this ſhall be brought unto your majeſty, can come from no other than ſuch, as for their own ends, under colour of advancing the prerogative, do indeed undermine and weaken royal power by impoveriſhing the ſubjects, render this monarchy leſs glorious, and the people leſs able to ſerve your majeſty.

" Having (by this that hath been ſaid) cleared our hearts and proceedings to your majeſty, our truſt is, that in your royal judgment we ſhall be free from the leaſt opinion of giving any unneceſſary ſtop to our proceedings in the matter of your ſupply, and that your majeſty will be pleaſed to entertain belief of our alacrity and cheerfulneſs in your ſervice, and that hereafter no ſuch misfortune ſhall befal us, to be miſunderſtood by your majeſty in any thing.

" We all moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to receive no information in this or any other buſineſs from private relations, but to weigh and judge of our proceedings by thoſe reſolutions of the houſe that ſhall be repreſented from ourſelves.

" This, rightly and graciouſly underſtood, we are confident from the knowledge of your goodneſs and our own hearts, that the ending of this parliament ſhall be much more happy than the beginning, and be to all ages ſtiled the bleſſed parliament, for making perfect union between the beſt king and the beſt people, that your majeſty may ever delight in calling us together, and we in the comforts of your gracious favour towards us.

" In this hope I return to my firſt errand, which will beſt appear by that which I ſhall humbly deſire you to hear, and being an humble petition from the houſe of commons, for redreſſing of thoſe many inconveniencies and diſtractions that have befallen your ſubjects by the billeting of ſoldiers in private men's houſes againſt their wills.

" Your royal progenitors have ever held our ſubjects hearts the beſt garriſon of this kingdom; and our humble ſuit to your majeſty is, that our faith and loyalty may have ſuch a place in your royal thoughts, as to reſt aſſured, that all your ſubjects will be ready to lay down their lives for the defence of your ſacred perſon, and this kingdom.

" Not going ourſelves into our countries this Eaſter, we ſhould think it a great happineſs to us, as we know it would be a ſingular comfort and encouragement to them that ſent us hither, if we might but ſend them the news of a gracious anſwer from your majeſty in this particular, which the reaſons of the petition we hope will move your moſt excellent majeſty graciouſly to vouchſafe us."

The petition concerning the billeting of ſoldiers, preſented to the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

" IN all humility complaining, ſheweth unto your moſt excellent majeſty your loyal and dutiful commons now in parliament aſſembled, that whereas by the fundamental laws of this realm, every freeman hath, and of right ought to have, a full and abſolute propriety in his goods and eſtate, and that therefore the billeting and placing the ſoldiers in the houſe of any ſuch freeman againſt his will, is directly contrary to the ſaid laws, under which we and our anceſtors have been ſo long and happily governed; yet in apparent violation of the ſaid ancient and undoubted right of all your majeſty's loyal ſubjects of this your kingdom in general, and to the grievous and inſupportable vexation and detriment of many counties and perſons in particular, a new and almoſt unheard-of way hath been invented and put in practice, to lay ſoldiers upon them, ſcattered in companies here and there, even in the heart and bowels of this kingdom; and to compel many of your majeſty's ſubjects to receive and lodge them in their own houſes, and both themſelves and others to contribute towards the maintenance of them, to the exceeding great diſſervice of your majeſty, the general terror of all, and utter undoing of many of your people, inſomuch as we cannot ſufficiently recount, or in any way proportionable to the lively ſenſe that we have of our miſeries herein, are we able to repreſent unto your majeſty, the innumerous miſchiefs and moſt grievous vexations that by this means alone we do now ſuffer, whereof we will not preſume to trouble your ſacred ears with particular inſtances; only, moſt gracious ſovereign, we beg leave to offer to your moſt gracious view, a compaſſionate conſideration of a few of them in particular.

" 1. The ſervice of Almighty God is hereby greatly hindered, the people in many places not daring to repair to the church, leſt in the mean time the ſoldiers ſhould riſle their houſes.

" 2. The ancient and good government of the country is hereby neglected and almoſt contemned.

" 3. Your officers of juſtice in performance of their duties have been reſiſted and endangered.

" 4. The rents and revenues of your gentry greatly and generally diminiſhed; farmers to ſecure themſelves from the ſoldiers inſolence, being by the clamour of ſollicitation of their fearful and injured wives and children, enforced to give up their wonted dwellings, and to retire themſelves into places of more ſecure habitation.

" 5. Huſbandmen, that are as it were the hands of the country, corrupted by ill example of the ſoldiers, and encouraged to idle life, give over work, and rather ſeek to live idly at another man's charges, than by their own labours.

" 6. Tradeſmen and artificers almoſt diſcouraged, and being inforced to leave their trades, and to employ their time in preſerving themſelves and their families from cruelty.

" 7. Markets unfrequented, and our ways grown ſo dangerous, that the people dare not to paſs to and fro upon their uſual occaſions.

" 8. Frequent robberies, aſſaults, batteries, burglaries, rapes, rapines, murders, barbarous cruelties, and other moſt abominable vices, and outrages, are generally complained of from all parts, where theſe companies have been and had their abode, few of which inſolencies have been ſo much as queſtioned, and fewer according to their demerit puniſhed.

" Theſe, and many other lamentable effects (moſt dread and dear ſovereign) have by the billeting of ſoldiers already fallen upon us your loyal ſubjects, tending no leſs to the diſſervice of your majeſty, than to their impoveriſhing and deſtruction, ſo that thereby they are exceedingly diſabled to yield to your majeſty thoſe ſupplies for your urgent occaſions, which they heartily deſire; and yet they are further perplexed with apprehenſion of more approaching dangers, one in regard of your ſubjects at home, the other of enemies from abroad, in both which reſpects it ſeems to threaten no ſmall calamity to the meaner ſort of your people, being exceeding poor, whereof in many places are great multitudes, and therefore in times of more ſettled and moſt conſtant adminiſtration of juſtice, not eaſily ruled, are moſt apt upon this occaſion to caſt off the reigns of government, and by joining themſelves with thoſe diſordered ſoldiers, are very likely to fall into mutiny and rebellion; which in faithful diſcharge of our duties we cannot forbear moſt humbly to preſent to your high and excellent wiſdom, being preſſed with probable fears that ſome ſuch miſchief will ſhortly enſue, if an effectual and ſpeedy courſe be not taken to remove out of the land, or otherwiſe to diſband, thoſe unruly companies.

" For the ſecond, we do moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to take into your princely conſideration, that many of thoſe companies, beſides their diſſolute diſpoſitions and carriages, are ſuch as do openly profeſs themſelves papiſts, and therefore to be ſuſpected, that if occaſion ſerve they will rather adhere to a foreign enemy of that religion, than to your majeſty, their liege lord and ſovereign, eſpecially ſome of their captains and commanders being as popiſhly affected as themſelves, and having ſerved in the wars on the part of the king of Spain and archduchеſs againſt your majeſty's allies; which of what pernicious conſequence it may prove, and how prejudicial to the ſafety of your kingdom, we leave to your majeſty's high and princely wiſdom.

" And now upon theſe, and many more which might be alleged, moſt weighty and important reaſons, grounded on the maintenance of the worſhip and ſervice of Almighty God, the continuance and advancement of your majeſty's high honour and profit, the preſervation of the ancient and undoubted liberties of your people, and therein of juſtice, induſtry, valour, which nearly concern the glory and happineſs of your majeſty and all your ſubjects, and the preventing of calamity and ruin both of church and commonwealth:

" We your majeſty's moſt humble and loyal ſubjects the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of your houſe of commons, in the name of all the commonalty of your kingdom, who are upon this occaſion moſt miſerably diſconſolate and afflicted, proſtrate at the throne of your grace and juſtice, do moſt ardently beg a preſent remove of this inſupportable burden, and that your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to ſecure us from the like preſſure in the time to come."

The

The manner in which the king and the commons tranſacted together is very pleaſant. There was nothing but evaſion and artifice on both ſides: they expreſſed not their thoughts when they ſpoke to each other, and yet underſtood one another perfectly, though they made as if they did not. The commons knew that the reaſons to juſtify the delay of ſupply, alleged in their repreſentation, were not valid, and that the king was perſuaded of the ſame: but they thought he would ſeem to be ſatisfied with them, in order not to oblige them to tell him to his face they could not rely on his promiſes, and conſidered this delay as the only way to have their grievances redreſſed. The king feigned to be ignorant of this motive, and took advantage of the commons uſing obſcure inſinuations inſtead of ſpeaking plainly. On the other hand, though the king had no deſign to redreſs grievances, he would however have it thought he intended it as ſoon as the affair of ſupply was diſpatched. The commons on their part feigning not to know his intention, had a mind to make believe that the delay of ſupply proceeded from quite another cauſe, though they were ſure the king could not miſtake. But as the king did not think himſelf obliged to uſe the ſame ceremony with the commons as they ought to uſe with him, he talked to them in a higher tone, knowing they would not, without neceſſity, be induced to ſpeak more clearly. To their repreſentation therefore he made this reply:

"Mr. ſpeaker, and gentlemen,

"WHEN I ſent you my laſt meſſage, I did not expect a reply, for I intended it to haſten you: I told you at your firſt meeting, this time was not to be ſpent in words, and I am ſure it is leſs fit for diſputes, which if I had a deſire to entertain, Mr. ſpeaker's preamble might have given me ground enough: the queſtion is not now what liberty you have in diſpoſing of matters handled in your houſe, but rather at this time what is fit to be done.

"Wherefore I hope you will follow my example, in eſchewing diſputations, and fall to your important buſineſs. You make a proteſtation of your affection and zeal to my prerogative, grounded upon ſuch good and juſt reaſons, that I muſt believe you: but I look that you uſe me with the like charity, to believe what I have declared more than once, ſince your meeting with us, that I am as forward as you for the neceſſary preſervation of your true liberties. Let us not ſpend ſo much time in this, that may hazard both my prerogative and your liberties to our enemies.

"To be ſhort, go on ſpeedily with your buſineſs, without any more apologies, for time calls faſt on you, which will neither ſtay for you nor me. Wherefore it is my duty to haſten, as knowing the neceſſity of it, and yours to give credit to what I ſay, as to him that ſits at the helm.

"For what concerns your petition, I ſhall make anſwer in a convenient time."

The commons, as I ſaid, meant to reap ſome advantage by the five ſubſidies they were willing to grant the king; and this was a neceſſary condition, which they continually inſinuated, though they avoided uſing that expreſſion[s]. To that end they had prepared a petition to be preſented to the king, in the name of both houſes, to which they deſired the concurrence of the lords. This petition was termed the Petition of Right, becauſe it was pretended not to deſire of the king any grace or favour, but only the maintenance of the liberties of the ſubject. For this reaſon it was to be ſolemnly preſented to the king on his throne by way of bill, and the king was to reply to it in a parliamentary manner. A draught of it had been ſent to the lords for their concurrence[t]. The king was alarmed at it. He was deſirous to avoid receiving ſuch a petition, which too plainly eſtabliſhed the rights of the people, becauſe he ſaw, if he rejected it, he ſhould loſe the five ſubſidies, the bill not being yet paſſed. On the other hand, in granting the contents of the petition, he himſelf tied up his hands for the future, and confeſſed withal, that the acts of authority he had hitherto exerciſed, were contrary to law. Into this ſtreight preciſely it was that the commons meant to draw him by the petition of right. Whereof he omitted nothing in his power to divert the blow. As he had a great influence in the upper houſe, he ſo managed, that the lords, by pretending to agree with the commons upon the ſubſtance of the petition, moved the praying his majeſty to make the following declarations:

"1. That the good old law called Magna Charta, and the ſix ſtatutes, conceived to be declarations and explanations of that law, do ſtill ſtand in force to all intents and purpoſes.

"2. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to declare, that according to Magna Charta, and the ſtatutes aforenamed, as alſo according to the moſt ancient cuſtoms and laws of this land, every free ſubject of this realm hath a fundamental propriety in his goods, and a fundamental liberty of his perſon.

"3. That his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to declare, that it is his royal pleaſure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful ſubjects, all their ancient, ſeveral, juſt liberties, privileges, and rights, in as ample and beneficial manner, to all intents and purpoſes, as their anceſtors did enjoy the ſame under the beſt of his moſt noble progenitors.

"4. That his majeſty would be further pleaſed graciouſly to declare, for the good content of his loyal ſubjects, and for the ſecuring them from future fear, that in all caſes within the cognizances of the common law, concerning the liberties of the ſubject, his majeſty would proceed according to the common law of this land, and according to the laws eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, and in no other manner or wiſe.

"5. As touching his majeſty's royal prerogative, intrinſical to his ſovereignty, and betruſted him withal from God, 'ad communem totius populi ſalutem, & non ad deſtructionem,' That his majeſty would reſolve, not to uſe or divert the ſame, to the prejudice of any his loyal people in the propriety of their goods, or liberty of their perſons: and in caſe for the ſecurity of his majeſty's royal perſon, the common ſafety of his people, or the peaceable government of this kingdom, his majeſty ſhall find juſt cauſe, for reaſon of ſtate, to impriſon or reſtrain any man's perſon, his majeſty would graciouſly declare, that within a convenient time he ſhall and will expreſs the cauſe of the commitment or reſtraint, either general or ſpecial; and upon a cauſe ſo expreſſed, will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common juſtice of the kingdom."

But the commons avoided this ſnare, plainly perceiving it was only an artifice to evade the petition of right, which would become as uſeleſs, after theſe declarations. Indeed, there was a great difference, as we ſhall ſee preſently, between theſe declarations, and what was required in the petition. The declarations were all expreſſed in general terms, which gave the king room to cavil upon the performance of each article, as he had done in the affair of the loans, and the impriſonment of thoſe that refuſed to comply. In thoſe caſes, the king did not pretend to act contrary to theſe laws, but rather thought himſelf authorized by the law; and the judges of the realm had countenanced his pretenſions. But the petition of right was more full and expreſs, and left but little room for cavils. On the other hand, the difference was not leſs between the direct and parliamentary reply demanded by the commons, and the bare and general declarations which were not capable of contenting the people. So, the commons entirely rejected the propoſition of the lords.

The king not ſucceeding in his deſign by means of the upper-houſe, tried to ſatisfy the commons by making them, of his own accord, the ſame offers the lords had ſeemed only to deſire of him. To that purpoſe, having ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, the lord keeper, in his preſence, ſpoke to them in the following manner:

"My lords, and ye the knights, citizens and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

"YE cannot but remember the great and important affairs, concerning the ſafety both of ſtate and religion, declared firſt from his majeſty's own mouth, to be the cauſes of the aſſembling of this parliament; the ſenſe whereof, as it doth daily increaſe with his majeſty, ſo it ought to do, and and his majeſty doubts not but it doth ſo with you, ſince the danger increaſeth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the enemy.

"Yet his majeſty doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occaſioned by the debate which hath ariſen in both houſes, touching the liberty of the ſubject; in which, as his majeſty takes in good part the purpoſe and intent of the houſes, ſo clearly and frequently profeſſed, that they would not diminiſh or blemiſh his juſt prerogative; ſo he preſumes that ye will all confeſs it a point of extraordinary grace and juſtice in him, to ſuffer it to reſt ſo long in diſpute without interruption; but now his majeſty, conſidering the length of time which it hath taken, and fearing nothing ſo much as any future loſs of that, whereof every hour and minute is ſo precious; and foreſeeing that the ordinary way of debate, though never ſo carefully huſbanded, in regard of the form of both houſes, neceſſarily takes more time than the affairs of Chriſtendom can permit; his majeſty out of great princely care, hath thought of this expedient to ſhorten the buſineſs, by declaring the clearneſs of his own heart and intention: and therefore hath commanded me to let you know, "That he holdeth the ſtatute of Magna Charta, and the other ſix ſtatutes inſiſted upon for the ſubjects liberty, to be all in force, and aſſures you, that he will maintain all his ſubjects in the juſt freedom of their perſons, and ſafety of their eſtares; and that he will govern according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm; and that ye ſhall find as much ſecurity in his majeſty's royal word and promiſe, as in the ſtrength of any law ye can make; ſo that hereafter ye ſhall never have cauſe to complain." The concluſion is, that his majeſty prayeth God, who hath hitherto bleſſed this kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you this day, to make the ſucceſs thereof happy both to king and people: and therefore he deſires that no doubt or diſtruſt may poſſeſs any man, but that ye will all proceed unanimouſly to the buſineſs."

[t] The king's ſerjeant Aſhley ſaid in his diſcourſe, that "the propoſitions made by the commons tended rather to anarchy than monarchy, and that they muſt allow the king to govern by acts of ſtate." For which the lords committed him, and he recanted. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 545. Whitelock, p. 10.

The commons avoided this ſnare, as the former, and firmly adhered to the petition of right. A few days after ſecretary Coke brings them a freſh meſſage from the king, to know whether the houſe will reſt on his royal word, declared to them by the lord keeper, which if they do, he aſſures them, it ſhall be royally performed.

This meſſage occaſioned great debates [u], becauſe Coke and the reſt of the court-party uſed their utmoſt endeavours, to perſuade the houſe to what the king propoſed, that is, to lay aſide the petition of right, and reſt upon his majeſty's promiſe. Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, ſaying, "That never houſe of parliament truſted more in the goodneſs of their king, for their own private, than the preſent, but we are ambitious that his majeſty's goodneſs may remain to poſterity, and we are accountable to a public truſt: and therefore ſeeing there hath been a public violation of the laws by his miniſters, nothing will ſatisfy him but a public amends; and our deſires to vindicate the ſubjects right by bill, are no more than are laid down in former laws with ſome modeſt proviſion for inſtruction, performance and execution." This ſo well agreed with the ſenſe of the houſe, that they made it the ſubject of a meſſage to be delivered by the ſpeaker to his majeſty.

Amidſt thoſe deliberations, another meſſage was delivered from his majeſty by ſecretary Coke, to this effect: "That howſoever we proceed in this buſineſs we have in hand, which his majeſty will not doubt, but to be according to our conſtant profeſſion, and ſo as he may have cauſe to give us thanks; yet his reſolution is, that both his royal care, and hearty and tender affection towards all his loving ſubjects, ſhall appear to the whole kingdom, and all the world, that he will govern us according to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm; that he will maintain us in the liberties of our perſons, and properties of our goods, ſo as we may enjoy as much happineſs as our forefathers in their beſt times: and that he will rectify what hath been, or may be found amiſs amongſt us, ſo that hereafter there may be no juſt cauſe to complain. Wherein, as his majeſty will rank himſelf amongſt the beſt of kings, and ſhew he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or right; ſo he will have us to match ourſelves with the beſt ſubjects, not by incroaching upon that ſovereignty or prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing ourſelves within the bounds and laws of our forefathers, without reſtraining them, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, expoſitions, or additions in any ſort, which, he telleth us he will not give way unto.

"That the weight of the affairs of the kingdom and Chriſtendom do preſs him more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; ſo as this ſeſſion of parliament muſt continue no longer than Tueſday come ſevennight at the furtheſt: In which time his majeſty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promiſed; and if the houſe be not as ready to do that is fit for themſelves, it ſhall be their own faults.

"And upon aſſurance of our good diſpatch and correſpondence, his majeſty declareth, that his royal intention is to have another ſeſſion of parliament at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting of ſuch things as cannot now be done."

All this was not able to divert the commons from their purpoſe of turning the petition of right into an act of parliament. The threat of putting an end to the ſeſſion frightened them not, the king having gone too far to recede. The only point was to know, whether he would grant by bill, what he was willing to grant any other way; and he could not break with the parliament on that account, without forfeiting entirely the love of his people, and loſing the five ſubſidies. So the commons would not miſs this opportunity of firmly eſtabliſhing the rights of the ſubjects. Here follows what the ſpeaker ſaid to the king, in the name of the commons, having firſt thanked him for his gracious aſſurance, that he would govern according to the laws, and told him, that the commons greateſt confidence was in his goodneſs.

"—True it is, they cannot but remember the public truſt, for which they are accountable to preſent and future time; and their deſires are, that your majeſty's goodneſs might, in fruit and memory, be the bleſſing and joy of poſterity.

"They ſay alſo, that of late there hath been public violation of the laws, and the ſubjects liberties, by ſome of your majeſty's miniſters, and thence conceive, that no leſs than a public remedy will raiſe the dejected hearts of your loving ſubjects, to a cheerful ſupply of your majeſty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this houſe.

"From thoſe conſiderations, they moſt humbly beg your majeſty's leave, to lay hold of that gracious offer of yours, which gave them aſſurance, that if they thought fit to ſecure themſelves in their rights and liberties, by way of bill, or otherwiſe, ſo it might be provided with due reſpect to God's honour, and the public good, you would be graciouſly pleaſed to give way unto it. Far from their intentions it is, any way to incroach upon your ſovereignty or prerogative; nor have they the leaſt thought of ſtretching or enlarging the former laws in any ſort, by any new interpretations or additions; the bounds of their deſires extend no farther, than to ſome neceſſary explanation of that which is truly comprehended within the juſt ſenſe and meaning of thoſe laws, with ſome moderate proviſion for execution and performance, as in times paſt upon like occaſion hath been uſed.

"The way how to accompliſh theſe their humble deſires, is now in ſerious conſideration with them, wherein they humbly aſſure your majeſty, they will neither loſe time, nor ſeek any thing of your majeſty, but that they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal ſubjects to aſk, and for a gracious and juſt king to grant."

His majeſty's anſwer was delivered by the lord keeper, as follows:

"Mr. ſpeaker, and you gentlemen of the houſe of commons.

"HIS majeſty hath commanded me to tell you, that he expected an anſwer by your actions, and not delay by your diſcourſe: ye acknowledge this truſt and confidence in your proceedings, but his majeſty ſees not how you requite him by your confidence of his word and actions: for what need explanations, if ye doubted not the performance of the true meaning? For explanations will hazard an incroachment upon his prerogative. And it may well be ſaid, what need a new law to confirm an old, if you repoſe confidence in the declaration his majeſty, made by me to both houſes? and yourſelves acknowledge that your greateſt truſt and confidence muſt be in his majeſty's grace and goodneſs, without which nothing ye can frame will be of ſafety, or avail to you: yet, to ſhew clearly the ſincerity of his majeſty's intentions, he is content that a bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other ſix ſtatutes, inſiſted upon for the ſubjects liberties, if ye ſhall chuſe that as the beſt way, but ſo as it may be without additions, paraphraſes, or explanations.

"Thus if you pleaſe you may be ſecured from your needleſs fears, and this parliament may have a happy wiſhed for end: whereas by the contrary, if you ſeek to tie your king by new, and indeed impoſſible, bonds, you muſt be accountable to God and the country for the ill ſucceſs of this meeting. His majeſty hath given his royal word, that ye ſhall have no cauſe to complain hereafter; leſs than which hath been enough to reconcile great princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a king and his ſubjects.

"Laſtly, I am commanded to tell you, that his majeſty's pleaſure is, that without further replies or meſſages, or other unneceſſary delays, ye do what ye mean to do ſpeedily, remembering the laſt meſſage that ſecretary Coke brought you in point of time; his majeſty always intending to perform his promiſe to his power."

To this anſwer the king preſently after adds the following

[u] During the debates ſome ſaid, that the king's word was to be taken in a parliamentary way. Whitelock, p. 10.

meſſage, brought by ſecretary Coke, to preſs the houſe to rely on the king's word, notwithſtanding the intimation of his good pleaſure for a bill. "That he had rather follow others, than begin to enter into this buſineſs; loſs of time hath been the greateſt complaint; the matter fallen now into conſideration, is what way to take, whether to rely on his majeſty's word, or on a bill: If we will conſider the advantage we have in taking his majeſty's word, it will be of the largeſt extent, and we ſhall chuſe that, that hath moſt aſſurance; an act of parliament is by the conſent of the king and parliament; but this aſſurance by word, is, that he will govern us by the laws; the king promiſes that, and alſo, that they ſhall be ſo executed, that we ſhall enjoy as much freedom as ever: this contains many laws, and a grant of all good laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of thoſe very laws, aſſurance, which binds the king further than the law can: firſt it binds his affection, which is the greateſt bond between king and ſubject, and that binds his judgment alſo, nay, his honour, and that not at home, but abroad; the royal word of a king, is the ground of all treaty; nay, it binds his conſcience: this confirmation between both houſes, is in nature of a vow: for my part, I think it is the greateſt advantage to rely on his majeſty's word. He further added, this debate was fitter to be done before the houſe, and not before the committee, and that it was a new courſe to go to a committee of the whole houſe [w]."

This anſwer and meſſage clearly ſhew, how much the king dreaded the petition of right, which was preparing for him. He juſtly ſuppoſed, it would contain not only the ſubſtance of Magna Charta and the ſix ſtatutes, but alſo explanations which would prevent all cavils concerning the true meaning of theſe laws, which was what he would have avoided to approve, for fear of tying up his hands. The great charter and the ſix ſtatutes had long been in force; but that had not prevented his exacting money from his ſubjects by way of loan, and impriſoning ſuch as refuſed to comply. He was ſo far from owning, he had acted contrary to the laws, that he had cauſed his proceedings to be approved by the judges of the realm. In offering therefore to confirm Magna Charta by a bill, he left things in their preſent ſtate, and the people would have reaped no benefit from the new bill. This is what the lord keeper could not forbear intimating, when he ſaid, he did not ſee any occaſion for a new law to confirm an old. But that he would have inſinuated, that the old law was not infringed, and therefore the king was very willing to confirm it, provided there were no additions, explanations, and interpretations. But nothing was more apt to ſhew the commons the neceſſity of theſe explanations, than the king's endeavours to avoid them. His extreme deſire, that his word ſhould be relied on, was a very ſtrong reaſon to ſecure the liberties of the ſubject, by ſomething more binding. It is true indeed, the words of princes are capable of reconciling them to each other, when at variance; but this ſuppoſes a mutual confidence, without which the bare word cannot beget a perfect reconciliation. Now the point was to know, whether the king's word might be ſafely taken, which the commons did not believe, though they durſt not openly declare it. Beſides, their having been told, that the king's promiſe to govern according to law, was a greater ſecurity than the laws themſelves, was a plain indication, that the king did not think it impracticable to evade the law. Hence therefore they drew a freſh argument for binding the king by a more expreſs and poſitive law than thoſe hitherto enacted.

We may further obſerve, that it is very ſurpriſing, the ſecretary, in the concluſion of the meſſage, ſhould teach the commons how this matter ought to be debated in the houſe, inſinuating that to go to a committee of the whole houſe was a new courſe. For the better underſtanding the deſign of this inſinuation, the reader muſt know, that before the houſe a member cannot ſpeak but once upon the ſame point, and having aſſerted his opinion, is not allowed to anſwer or reply. But when the houſe is turned into a committee, there is greater freedom. Every one may argue, anſwer, reply, as he thinks fit. By this means the points in debate are fully cleared, ſo that it is eaſy for each to form his opinion upon the arguments, anſwers, and replies he has heard. It ſeems therefore, by what the ſecretary inſinuated to the commons, the king feared all explanations that might ariſe from this way of debating. But they did not think proper to receive his inſtructions, or alter their uſual method [x]. The houſe therefore was turned into a committee to take into conſideration, all that could be ſaid for or againſt what the king deſired. The general ſenſe of the houſe was expreſſed as follows, by one of the members, with whom the majority agreed:

"Was it ever known (ſaid he) that general words were a ſufficient ſatisfaction to particular grievances? Was ever a verbal declaration of the king, Verbum Regni? When grievances be, the parliament is to redreſs them. Did ever parliament rely on meſſages? They put up petitions of their grievances, and the king never anſwered them: the king's anſwer is very gracious; but what is the law of the realm? that is the queſtion. I put no diffidence in his majeſty; the king muſt ſpeak by a record, and in particulars, and not in general. Did you ever know the king's meſſage come into a bill of ſubſidies? All ſucceeding kings will ſay, ye muſt truſt me as well as ye did my predeceſſors, and truſt my meſſages; but meſſages of love never came into parliament. Let us put up a petition of right: not that I diſtruſt the king, but that I cannot take his truſt, but in a parliamentary way."

As the commons had reſolved, that ſupply and grievances ſhould go hand in hand, the petition of right was no ſooner ready, but they made a farther progreſs in the affair of the ſubſidies, ordering that the two firſt ſhould be paid the 10th of July, one more the 12th of October, another the 20th of December, and the laſt the 1ſt of March. This was done to take from the king all pretence of complaining, that the affair of ſupply was neglected; but this did not ſatisfy him. He wiſhed the ſubſidy bill to be drawn and paſſed, before the petition of right was preſented to him, which the commons were fully reſolved not to do, being perſuaded that as ſoon as the ſubſidy bill ſhould be paſſed, the parliament would be prorogued or diſſolved. So that ſame day, they ſent the petition of right to the lords for their concurrence [y]. But, before it was obtained, the commons ſaw themſelves obliged to ſuſtain two freſh attacks, one from the king, the other from the houſe of lords, where the court party was very ſtrong.

The lords being employed in examining the petition of right, deſired a conference with the commons, where the lord keeper ſaid, he had propoſed to the houſe ſome alterations in the petition, to render it leſs harſh, and more agreeable to his majeſty, to the end, what was deſired might be the more readily obtained: that whilſt the lords were debating upon the commitments, they received a letter from his majeſty, which they deſired to communicate to the commons; and it was read to them accordingly.

To the right truſty and right well-beloved, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, of the higher houſe of parliament.

"Carolus Rex.

"WE being deſirous of nothing more than the advancement of the peace and proſperity of our people, have given leave to free debate upon the higheſt points of our prerogative-royal, which in the time of our predeceſſors, kings and queens of this realm, were ever reſtrained as matters that they would not have diſcuſſed; and in other things we have been willing ſo far to deſcend to the deſires of our good ſubjects, as might fully ſatisfy all moderate minds, and free them from all juſt fears and jealouſies, which thoſe meſſages we have hitherto ſent into the commons houſe, will well demonſtrate unto the world; yet we find it ſtill inſiſted upon, that in no caſe whatſoever, ſhould it never ſo nearly concern matters of ſtate government, we, or our privy-council, have no power to commit any man without the cauſe ſhewed; whereas it often happens, that ſhould the cauſe be ſhewed, the ſervice itſelf would thereby be deſtroyed and defeated, and the cauſe alleged muſt be ſuch as may be determined by our judges of our courts of Weſtminſter, in a legal and ordinary way of juſtice; whereas the cauſes may be ſuch, as thoſe judges have not capacity of judicature, nor rules of law to direct and guide their judgment in caſes of that tranſcendent nature; which happening ſo often, the very incroaching on that conſtant rule of government, for ſo many ages within this kingdom practiſed, would ſoon diſſolve the very foundation and frame of our monarchy. Wherefore as to our commons, we made fair propoſitions, which might equally preſerve the juſt liberty of the ſubject: ſo, my lords, we have thought good to let you know, that without the overthrow of ſovereignty, we cannot ſuffer this power to be impeached; notwithſtanding, to clear our conſcience and juſt intentions, this we publiſh, that it is not in our heart, nor will we ever extend our royal power, lent unto us from God, beyond the juſt rule of moderation, in any thing which ſhall be contrary to our laws and cuſtoms, wherein the ſafety of our people ſhall be our only aim. And we do hereby declare our royal pleaſure and reſolution to be, which God willing, we ſhall ever conſtantly continue and maintain, that neither we nor our privy council ſhall, or will, at any time hereafter, commit, or command to priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrain the perſon of any, for not lending money to us, nor for any juſt cauſe, which in our conſcience doth not concern the public good and ſafety of us and our people, we will not be drawn to pretend any cauſe, wherein our judgment and conſcience is not ſatisfied with; baſe thoughts, we hope, no man can imagine will fall into our royal breaſt; and that in all caſes of this nature, which ſhall hereafter happen, we ſhall, upon the humble petition of the party, or addreſs of our judges unto us, readily and really expreſs the true cauſe of their commitment or reſtraint, ſo ſoon as with conveniency and ſafety the ſame is fit to be diſcloſed and expreſſed; and that in all cauſes criminal, of ordinary juriſdiction, our judges ſhall proceed to the deliverance or ballment of the priſoner, according to the known and ordinary rules of the laws of this land, and according to the ſtatutes of Magna Charta, and thoſe other ſix ſtatutes inſiſted upon, which we do take knowledge, ſtand in full force, and which we intend not to abrogate and weaken againſt the true intention thereof. This we have thought fit to ſignify, the rather to ſhorten any long debate upon this great queſtion, the ſeaſon of the year being ſo far advanced, and our great occaſions of ſtate, not lending any more days for longer continuance of this ſeſſion of parliament."

Given under our ſignet, at our palace at Weſtminſter, 20 Maii, the fourth year of our reign.

The commons took no notice of this letter, or rather, diſſembled their vexation at the king's artifices, who by obſcure and doubtful expreſſions, and by ſundry reſtrictions, was preparing means to evade his promiſes, at the very time he would have them to be received as ſolemn, authentic, and ſatisfactory. This may be plainly ſeen, if the terms of the letter be carefully conſidered, as well as the king's intent in writing it: which was to evade the petition of right, and be left at liberty to uſe his prorogative as he had hitherto done.

The ſecond attack the commons had to ſuſtain, came from the lords. They moved, at a conference, the adding to the petition of right, a clauſe which would have rendered it uſeleſs, at leaſt, according to the court's intention, by whom, very probably, the houſe of lords was directed. The additional clauſe was as follows:

"We preſent this our humble petition to your majeſty, with care not only of preſerving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that ſovereign power wherewith your majeſty is truſted for the protection, ſafety, and happineſs of the people."

This addition was examined and debated with great exactneſs in the houſe of commons[z]; and the general opinion was, that it ought to be rejected, chiefly for three reaſons. The firſt, becauſe of the ambiguity of the words Sovereign Power, which the parliamets had never uſed in ſpeaking of the king's prerogatives. The ſecond, becauſe this addition was in the nature of a ſaving of the king's ſovereignty, which rendered the petition of no force. It was alleged, that in the reign of Edward I. the parliament having preſented the like petition to the king, he would have added theſe words, "ſaving the king's right and ſovereignty;" but the parliament would not conſent to it, becauſe ſuch ſavings render uſeleſs whatever they are annexed to. It was ſaid likewiſe, that for the ſame reaſon the kings would never ſuffer the clergy to inſert in any of their acts, "ſaving the honour of God and the church." The third reaſon was, that if this addition was general, and had no reference to the petition, there was no need of admitting it. But if, on the contrary, it did refer to the petition, it evidently rendered the petition of no effect.

The clauſe being thus rejected by the commons, the lords durſt not throw out the petition[a], on account of that addition, which, in truth, was not abſolutely neceſſary. So, being ſatisfied with giving the king this teſtimony of their affection for his ſervice, they inſiſted no longer upon the additional clauſe. Then the two houſes reſolved to preſent the petition to the king, and to pray his majeſty to give his anſwer in full parliament, that it might be enrolled, and ſerve hereafter for rule to the courts of juſtice as an act of parliament. The 2d of June the king came to the parliament to give the royal aſſent to the petition of right, and ſpoke thus to both houſes:

"Gentlemen,

"I am come hither to perform my duty. I think no man can think it long, ſince I have not taken ſo many days in anſwering the petition, as ye ſpent weeks in framing it: and I am come hither to ſhew you, that as well in formal things as in eſſential, I deſire to give you as much content as in me lies."

The lord keeper added ſomething farther; but, as there is nothing material in his ſpeech, I do not think it neceſſary to inſert it. After he had done ſpeaking, the petition was read aloud, being expreſſed in theſe words[b]:

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

"HUMBLY ſhew unto our ſovereign lord the king, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, that, whereas it is declared and enacted by a ſtatute, made in the time of the raigne of king Edward the firſt, commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aide ſhould be laid or levied, by the king or his heirs, in this realm, without the good-will and aſſent of the archbiſhopps, biſhopps, earles, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other the freemen of the cominalty of this realme: and by authority of parliament houlden in the five and twentieth yere of the raigne of king Edward the third, it is declared and enacted, that from thenceforth noe perſon ſhall be compelled to make any loanes to the king againſt his will, becauſe ſuch loanes were againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land; and by other lawes of this realm it is provided, that none ſhall be charged by any charge or impoſition, called a benevolence, nor by ſuch like charge, by which the ſtatuts before mentioned, and other good laws and ſtatuts of this realme, your ſubjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aide, or other like charge, nor ſett by common conſent in parliament.

"Yet nevertheleſs of late divers commiſſions, directed to ſundrie commiſſioners in ſeveral counties, with inſtructions, have been iſſued, by means whereof your people have bene in divers places aſſembled, and required to lend certain ſummes of money unto your majeſtie, and many of them upon their refuſal ſoe to doe, have had an oath adminiſtered unto them, not warrantable by the lawes and ſtatuts of this realme, and have been conſtrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your privie-councell, and in other places, and others of them have bene therefore impriſoned, confined, and ſundrie other wayes moleſted and diſquieted: and divers other charges have been laide and leavied upon your people in ſeverall counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputie-lieutenants, commiſſioners for muſters, juſtices of peace, and others, by commaunde or direction from your majeſtie, or your privy-councell, againſt the laws and free cuſtomes of the realme.

"And where alſoe by the ſtatute called, The Greate Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeized of his freehold or liberties, or his free cuſtomes, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner deſtroyed, but by the lawfull judgment of his peeres, or by the lawe of the land.

"And in the eight and twentieth yere of the reigne of king Edward the Third, it was declared and enacted by authoritie of parliament, that no man of what eſtate or condition that he be, ſhould be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſherited, nor putt to death without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of law.

"Nevertheleſs againſt the tenor of the ſaid ſtatuts, and other the good lawes and ſtatuts of your realme, to that end provided, divers of your ſubjects have of late beene impriſoned, without any juſt cauſe ſhewed; and when for their deliverance they were brought before your juſtices, by your majeſty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court ſhould order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cauſes of their detayner; noe cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your majeſtie's ſpecial commaund, ſignified by the lords of your privie-council, and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons without being charged with any thinge to which they might anſweare according to law.

" And whereas of late greate companies of ſouldiers and marriners have been diſperſed into divers counties of the realme, and the inhabitants againſt their wills have beene compelled to receive them into their houſes, and there to ſuffer them to ſojorne, againſt the lawes and cuſtomes of this realme, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

" And whereas alſoe by authority of parliament in the 25th yere of the raigne of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that noe man ſhould be fore-judged of life or lymbe, againſt the forme of the great charter, and other the lawes and ſtatuts of this your realme, no man ought to be adjudged to death, but by the lawes eſtabliſhed in this your realme, either by the cuſtomes of the ſame realme, or by acts of parliament: and whereas noe offender of what kind ſoever, is exempted from the proceedings to be uſed, and puniſhments to be inflicted by the lawes and ſtatuts of this your realme; nevertheleſs of late time, divers commiſſions under your majeſtie's great-ſeale have iſſued forth, by which certaine perſons have been aſſigned and appointed commiſſioners, with power and authoritie to proceed within the land, according to the juſtice of martiall lawe againſt ſuch ſouldiers, and marriners, or other diſſolute perſons joyninge with them, as ſhould commit any murder, robbery, felonie, mutiny, or other outrage or miſdemeanor whatſoever; and by ſuch ſummarie courſe and order as is agreeable to martiall lawe, and as is uſed in armies in tyme of war, to proceed to the tryal and condemnation of ſuch offenders, and them to cauſe to be executed and putt to death according to the lawe-martiall.

" By pretext whereof, ſome of your majeſtie's ſubjects have bene by ſome of the ſaid commiſſioners putt to death, when and where, if by the lawes and ſtatuts of the land they had deſerved death, by the ſame lawes and ſtatuts alſoe they might, and by none other ought, to have been judged and executed.

" And alſo ſundrie grievous offendors by colour thereof, clayming an exemption, have eſcaped the puniſhments due to them by the lawes and ſtatuts of this your realme, by reaſon that divers of your officers and miniſters of juſtice have unjuſtly refuſed, or forborne to proceed againſt ſuch offenders according to the ſame lawes and ſtatuts, upon pretence that the ſaid offenders were puniſhable only by martiall lawe, and by authority of ſuch commiſſions as aforeſaid; which commiſſions, and all others of like nature, are wholly and directlie contrary to the ſaid lawes and ſtatuts of this your realm.

" They doe therefore humbly pray your moſt excellent majeſtie, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yeilde any guifte, loane, benevolence, tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent by act of parliament; and that none be called to make anſweare, or take ſuch oath, or to give attendance, or be confyned, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for refuſall thereof; and that no freeman, in any ſuch manner as is before mentioned, be impriſoned or detayned: and that your majeſtie would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid ſouldiers and marriners, and that your people may not be ſo burthened in the tyme to come: and that the aforeſaid commiſſions for proceedinge by martiall lawe, may be revoaked and annulled; and that hereafter, noe commiſſions of like nature may iſſue forth to any perſon or perſons whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leaſt by colour of them, any of your majeſtie's ſubjects be deſtroyed or putt to death, contrary to the lawes and franchiſe of the land.

" All which they moſt humbly pray of your moſt excellent majeſtie, as their rights, and liberties, accordinge to the lawes and ſtatuts of this realme: and that your majeſtie would alſo vouchſafe to declare, that the awardes, doeings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people in any of the premiſſes, ſhall not be drawne hereafter into conſequence or example: and that your majeſty would be alſo graciouſly pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafetie of your people, to declare your royal will and pleaſure, that in the things aforeſaid, all your officers and miniſters ſhall ſerve you, according to the lawes and ſtatuts of this realme, as they tender the honour of your majeſtie and the proſperity of this kingdom."

The king, as hath been ſeen, had uſed all poſſible endeavours to hinder this petition from being preſented, and to ſatisfy the commons with general promiſes, which properly bound him to nothing, and did not deſtroy his ſyſtem of government; ſo, though he feigned to come to the parliament on purpoſe to paſs the petition of right, and give a ſatisfactory anſwer, he purſued however his plan, and ſhewed by his anſwer how much he dreaded to promiſe. Here follows his anſwer, wherein may be eaſily perceived the ſame general promiſes, and the ſame reſtrictions as in what he had offered already:

The king's anſwer to the petition of rights.

" THE king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm; and that the ſtatutes be put in due execution, that his ſubjects may have no cauſe to complain of any wrong or oppreſſions, contrary to their juſt rights and liberties, to the preſervation whereof he holds himſelf in conſcience as well obliged, as of his prerogative."

It would be needleſs to make any remarks on this anſwer, ſince the king's intention appears ſo very plainly: it ſuffices only to obſerve, the king had endeavoured to content the parliament with general promiſes, and the commons not thinking that ſufficient, had inſiſted upon the petition of right, where ſeveral particular caſes were ſpecified. Now the king, inſtead of giving the parliament the ſatisfaction they deſired, kept in his anſwer to his general promiſes, without touching upon any of the particular caſes ſpecified in the petition.

The commons not being ſatisfied with the king's anſwer, made no haſte to finiſh the affair of ſupply: on the contrary, they deſired a conference with the lords, where the point of commitments was thoroughly diſcuſſed [c]. The point in queſtion was, the power aſſumed by the king to impriſon the ſubjects without declaring the cauſe, which the king had not leſſened by his anſwer, though it was one of the chief motives of the petition of right: wherefore the commons, willing to ſhew the king their diſſatisfaction, inſtead of proceeding with the ſubſidy bill, returned to the conſideration of grievances. On this occaſion, and at the inſtance of the commons, the lords paſſed upon Dr. Manwaring the ſentence I have mentioned in another place.

The king ſeeing the commons otherways employed than in the buſineſs of ſubſidies, ſent them the following meſſage by their own ſpeaker:

" That his majeſty having, upon the petition exhibited by both houſes, given an anſwer full of juſtice and grace, for which we and our poſterity have juſt cauſe to bleſs his majeſty, it is now time to grow to a concluſion of the ſeſſion; and therefore his majeſty thinks fit to let you know, that as he doth reſolve to abide by that anſwer, without further change or alteration, ſo he will royally and really perform unto you what he hath thereby promiſed: and further, that he reſolves to end this ſeſſion upon Wedneſday the 11th of this month; and therefore wiſheth that the houſe will ſeriouſly attend thoſe buſineſſes which may beſt bring the ſeſſion to a happy concluſion, without entertaining new matters, and ſo huſband the time, that his majeſty may with the more comfort bring us ſpeedily together again: at which time, if there be any further grievances not contained or expreſſed in the petition, they may be more maturely conſidered, than the time will now permit."

This meſſage made the commons believe [d] the duke of Buckingham had done them ill offices with the king. This was mentioned in the houſe, and ſir John Elliot ſtanding up, and beginning to ſpeak in ſuch a manner that it was thought he was going to attack the favourite and miniſtry, the ſpeaker ſtarted from the chair and ſaid, " There is a command laid upon me, that I muſt command you not to proceed." Whereupon Elliot ſat down. But others more bold, propoſed to go and ſhew their dangers to the lords, and then carry their complaints together to the king. Some of the court-party ſaying that the ſpeech lately ſpoken by ſir John Elliot [e] had given offence to his majeſty, the houſe declared, " That every member is free from any undutiful ſpeech, from the beginning of the parliament to that day; and ordered, that the houſe be turned into a committee, to conſider what is fit to be done for the ſafety of the kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of going to the Tower." But the ſpeaker deſiring leave to go out, obtained it, and im-

[c] The king's anſwer being read in the houſe of commons, and ſeeming too ſcanty, ſir John Elliot roſe up, and in a long ſpeech ſet forth a full and lively repreſentation of all grievances; which done, ſir Edward Coke moved, that an humble remonſtrance be preſented to his majeſty, touching the dangers and means of ſafety of king and kingdom. Whereupon they turned themſelves into a grand committee, and the committee for the bill of ſubſidies was ordered to expedite the ſaid remonſtrance. Mean while comes the meſſage from the king by the ſpeaker, and after reading the meſſage, the houſe proceeded with a declaration againſt Manwaring, which was the ſame day preſented to the lords, at a conference managed by Mr. Pym, betwixt the committees of both houſes. After Manwaring's ſentence, the king ſent another meſſage of the ſame import by the ſpeaker. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 595, 605.

[d] It was not this meſſage, but another, ſent June 5, wherein the king required the commons " not to enter into, or proceed with any new buſineſs, which might ſpend greater time, or lay any ſcandal or aſperſion upon the ſtate, government, or miniſters thereof." Ibid. p. 605.

[e] The ſpeech (after the reading of the king's anſwer to the petition) concerning grievances, mentioned in the note above.

mediately informed the king of what was paſſing in the houſe. In his abſence it was debated, and going to be voted by a majority, to make a remonſtrance to the king, wherein it ſhould be ſaid that the duke of Buckingham was the chief cauſe of all the miſeries of the kingdom. But before the debate was ended, the ſpeaker returned with a meſſage from the king, commanding the houſe to adjourn till the next day, and all committees to ceaſe in the mean time. The lords received the ſame order. On the morrow the ſpeaker brings the following meſſage from the king:

"Whereas his majeſty underſtanding, that ye did conceive his laſt meſſage to reſtrain you in your juſt privileges, to complain of any of his miniſters; theſe are to declare his intentions, that he had no meaning of barring you from what hath been your right, but only to avoid all ſcandals on his council and actions paſt, and that his miniſters might not be, nor himſelf, under their names, taxed for their counſel unto his majeſty, and that no ſuch particulars ſhould be taken in hand, as would aſk a longer time of conſideration than what he hath prefixed, and ſtill reſolves to hold, that ſo for this time all chriſtendom might take notice of a ſweet parting between him and his people; which if it fall out, his majeſty will not be long from another meeting, when ſuch (if there be any) at their leiſure and convenience may be conſidered."

It may have been hitherto obſerved, in king Charles's whole conduct, that he was ſo firm in his principles concerning government, that he could not reſolve to recede from any thing; or if he ſeemed to make any conceſſion, he immediately rendered it uſeleſs by ſome reſtriction. This may be ſeen in his anſwer to the petition of right, but ſtill more particularly in this laſt meſſage to the commons: he would not (as he ſaid) bar them from the privilege to complain of his miniſters, but would not have them caſt any blame on their counſels: that is, properly ſpeaking, he would not have them attacked; or, at moſt, would only ſuffer them to be proſecuted for private offences which they might be guilty of, like all the reſt of the ſubjects, but not for ſtate affairs as miniſters and counſellors. The commons not being more ſatisfied with this meſſage than the former, the houſe was again turned into a committee, and conſidered of ſome more heads to be inſerted in the remonſtrance, particularly the king's deſign to bring into the nation foreign forces. This complaint was grounded upon a diſcovery the houſe had made of a privy ſeal, expreſſed in theſe words [f]:

"Charles, by the grace of God, &c.
"To the treaſurer and under treaſurer for our exchequer for the time being, greeting:
"WE do hereby will and command you, out of our treaſury, remaining in the receipt of our ſaid exchequer, forthwith to pay, or cauſe to be paid, unto Philip Burlemack of London, merchant, the ſum of thirty thouſand pounds, to be paid by him over by bill of exchange into the Low-Countries and Germany, unto our truſty and well-beloved ſir William Balfour, knight, and John Dolbier, eſq; or either of them, for levying and providing certain numbers of horſes, with arms for horſe and foot, to be brought over into this kingdom for our ſervice, viz." &c.

At the ſame time the commons ſent a meſſage to the lords, to deſire their concurrence in an humble petition to the king, that a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer be given by his majeſty in full parliament to the petition of right; to which the lords conſented. The king knew then it was not poſſible for him to avoid giving ſuch an anſwer as the parliament deſired, and therefore reſolved at laſt to do it with a good grace, otherwiſe he ſaw plainly the affair of ſupply would be for ever delayed; ſo coming to the parliament the 7th of June, both houſes preſented the following petition to him:

"MAY it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament aſſembled, taking in conſideration, that the good intelligence between your majeſty and your people doth much depend upon your majeſty's anſwer upon their petition of right formerly preſented; with unanimous conſent do now become moſt humble ſuitors unto your majeſty, that you would be pleaſed to give a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer thereunto in full parliament."

To which the king replied: "The anſwer I have already given you, was made with ſo good deliberation, and approved by the judgments of ſo many wiſe men, that I could not have imagined but it ſhould have given you full ſatisfaction: but to avoid all ambiguous interprepations, and to ſhew you there is no doubleneſs in my meaning, I am willing to pleaſure you as well in words as in ſubſtance: read your petition, and you ſhall have anſwer that I am ſure will pleaſe you."

Here the petition was read, and this anſwer was returned, "Soit droit fait comme il eſt deſiré. C.R." [g].

Then ſaid his majeſty, "This I am ſure is full, yet no more than I granted you in my firſt anſwer; for the meaning of that was to confirm your liberties, knowing, according to your own proteſtations, that you neither mean nor can hurt my prerogative. And I aſſure you my maxim is, that the people's liberties ſtrengthen the king's prerogative, and the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties.

"You ſee how ready I have ſhewed myſelf to ſatisfy your demands, ſo that I have done my part; wherefore if this parliament have not a happy concluſion, the ſin is yours, I am free from it."

The commons being ſatisfied upon this point, began ſeriouſly to proceed with the bill of ſubſidies, but in ſuch a manner however, that they made the conſideration of grievances go hand in hand with it [h], knowing, as ſoon as the money bill was paſſed, the king would put an end to the ſeſſion: they began therefore with examining a commiſſion, whereby the king had authorized and required a certain number of lords and gentlemen to conſider of the beſt and ſpeedieſt means for raiſing money upon the people by way of impoſition or otherwiſe [i]. This commiſſion had been granted after the ſummons to the parliament, but before the meeting. Probably the king fearing he ſhould be obliged to diſſolve this parliament for the ſame reaſons he had diſſolved the former, was willing to be ſecured beforehand of means to raiſe money in caſe the parliament refuſed to grant a ſupply. Be this as it will, the commons, after a conference with the lords, voted that the commiſſion ſhould be inſerted in the remonſtrance they were to preſent to the king.

Then they entered upon the examination of Buckingham's conduct, an examination by no means favourable to the duke. He was charged with being the cauſe of all the evils to the kingdom, of the loſſes at ſea, of the decay of trade, of the diſaſters of the armies, and of countenancing Arminianiſm and popery. Upon this article it was obſerved, that the duke's mother was a papiſt, and had a great influence over her ſon, who had himſelf an abſolute ſway over the king: and that Dr. Montague, who was reckoned a zealous Arminian, made his court to him with great diligence. In ſhort, the houſe came to this reſolution, "that the exceſſive power of the duke of Buckingham is the cauſe of the evils and dangers to the king and kingdom, and that this be added to the remonſtrance:" and a few days after voted, "that Dr. Neile biſhop of Wincheſter, and Dr. Laud biſhop of Bath and Wells, be named to be thoſe about the king, who are ſuſpected to be Arminians." As this remonſtrance clearly and diſtinctly diſcovers the occaſions of the commons complaints againſt the government, I think it neceſſary to inſert it.

"Moſt dread ſovereign,
"AS with humble thankfulneſs, we your dutiful commons now aſſembled in parliament, do acknowledge the great comfort which we have in your majeſty's pious and gracious diſpoſition, ſo we think it a meet and moſt neceſſary duty, being called by your majeſty, to conſult and adviſe of the great and urgent affairs of this church and commonwealth, finding them at this time in apparent danger of ruin and deſtruction, faithfully and dutifully to inform your majeſty thereof, and with bleeding hearts and bended knees, to crave your ſpeedy redreſs therein, as to your own wiſdom (unto which we moſt humbly ſubmit ourſelves and our deſires) ſhall ſeem moſt meet and convenient. What the mul-

[f] Burlemack was called into the houſe, and confeſſed he received thirty thouſand pounds by privy ſeal for the buying of horſes; that one thouſand of them were levied; that thoſe horſes and their riders were to come over, and arms provided for them in Holland; but that he heard a countermand was gone to ſtay them. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 612.

[g] This (ſays Whitelock) ſatisfied the commons and all good men, and is the ſame in the printed act, and ſo that excellent law paſſed, p. 10.

[h] The houſe ordered that the committees for religion, trade, grievances, and courts of juſtice, ſhould ſit no longer; and that only the grievances of moſt moment ſhould be taken into conſideration. Ruſh. tom. I. p. 613.

[i] The commons ſending for this commiſſion to the lord keeper, he returned anſwer, he received a warrant at the council table for the ſealing thereof; and when it was ſealed he carried it back to the council table: however, it was ſent and read. It was dated the laſt day of February, and directed to all the court lords and biſhops, and ſuch gentlemen as were thought well affected to the miniſtry. The reader may ſee it in Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 614.---It was ſuppoſed that the ſending for foreign troops from Germany, as mentioned above, was in order to ſupport this commiſſion, in caſe of reſiſtance. Ibid. tom. I. p. 474.

titude and potency of your majeſty's enemies are abroad; what be their malicious and ambitious ends; and how vigilant and conſtantly induſtrious they are in purſuing the ſame, is well known to your majeſty; together with the dangers thereby threatened to your ſacred perſon and your kingdoms, and the calamities which have already fallen and do daily increaſe upon your friends and allies, of which we are well aſſured your majeſty is moſt ſenſible, and will accordingly, in your great wiſdom, and with the graveſt and moſt mature council, according to the exigency of the times and occaſions, provide to prevent and help the ſame.

"To which end we moſt humbly intreat your majeſty, firſt, and eſpecially, to caſt your eyes upon the miſerable condition of this your own kingdom, of late ſo ſtrangely weakened and dejected, that unleſs, through your majeſty's moſt gracious wiſdom, goodneſs, and juſtice, it be ſpeedily raiſed to a better condition, it is in no little danger to become a ſudden prey to the enemies thereof; and of the moſt happy and flouriſhing, to be the moſt miſerable and contemptible nation in the world. In the diſcoveries of which dangers, miſchiefs, and inconveniencies lying upon us, we do freely proteſt that it is far from our thoughts to lay the leaſt aſperſion upon your ſacred perſon, or the leaſt ſcandal upon your government; for we do in all ſincerity of our hearts, not only for ourſelves, but in the name of all the commons of the realm (whom we repreſent) aſcribe as much duty, as a moſt loyal and affectionate people can do unto the beſt king (for ſo ye are, and ſo have been pleaſed abundantly to expreſs yourſelf this preſent parliament, by your majeſty's clear and ſatisfactory anſwer to our petition of right: for which both ourſelves and our poſterity ſhall bleſs God for you, and ever preſerve a thankful memory for your great goodneſs and juſtice therein); and we do verily believe, that all, or moſt of theſe things, which we ſhall now preſent unto your majeſty, are either unknown unto you, or elſe by ſome of your majeſty's miniſters offered under ſuch ſpecious pretences, as may hide their own ill intentions, and ill conſequences of them, from your majeſty: but we aſſure ourſelves, according to the good example of your majeſty's predeceſſors, nothing can make your majeſty (being a wiſe and judicious prince, and above all things deſirous of the welfare of your people) more in love with parliaments than this, which is one of the principal ends of calling them, that therein your majeſty may be truly informed of the ſtate of all the ſeveral parts of your kingdom, and how your officers and miniſters do behave themſelves in the truſt repoſed in them by your majeſty, which is ſcarce able to be made known unto you but in parliament, as was declared by your bleſſed father, when he was pleaſed to put the commons in parliament aſſembled, in mind, That it would be the greateſt unfaithfulneſs and breach of duty to his majeſty, and of the truſt committed to them by the country, that could be, if in ſetting forth the grievances of the people, and the condition of all the parts of this kingdom from whence they come, they did not deal clearly with him, without ſparing any, how near and dear ſoever they were unto him, if they were hurtful or dangerous to the commonwealth.

"In confidence therefore of your majeſty's gracious acceptation in a matter of ſo high importance, and in faithful diſcharge of our duties, we do firſt of all moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to take notice, that howſoever we know your majeſty doth with your ſoul abhor that any ſuch thing ſhould be imagined or attempted; yet there is a general fear conceived in your people, of ſecret working and combination, to introduce into their kingdom innovation and change of our holy religion, more precious unto us than our lives, and whatever this world can afford. And our fears and jealouſies herein are not merely conjectural, but ariſing out of ſuch certain and viſible effects as may demonſtrate a true and real cauſe; for notwithſtanding the many good and wholeſome laws, and the proviſions made to prevent the increaſe of popery within this kingdom; and notwithſtanding your majeſty's moſt gracious and ſatisfactory anſwer to the petition of both houſes in that behalf, preſented to your majeſty at Oxford, we find there hath followed no good execution or effect, but on the contrary, (at which your majeſty, out of the quick ſenſe of your own religious heart, cannot but be in the higheſt meaſure diſpleaſed) thoſe of that religion do find extraordinary favours and reſpect in court from perſons of great quality and power, whom they continually reſort unto, and in particular to the counteſs of Buckingham, who herſelf openly profeſſing that religion, is a known favourer and ſupporter of them that do the ſame; which we well hoped, upon your majeſty's anſwer to the aforeſaid petition at Oxford, ſhould not have been permitted, nor that any of your majeſty's ſubjects of that religion juſtly to be ſuſpected, ſhould be entertained in the ſervice of your majeſty, or your royal conſort the queen. Some likewiſe of that religion have had honours, offices, and places of command and authority lately conferred upon them. But that which ſtriketh the greateſt terror into the hearts of your loyal ſubjects concerning this, is, that letters of ſtay of legal proceedings againſt them have been procured from your majeſty (by what indirect means we know not): and commiſſions under the great ſeal, granted and executed for compoſition to be made with popiſh recuſants, with inhibitions, and reſtraint, both to the eccleſiaſtical and temporal courts, and officers to intermeddle with them; which is conceived to amount to no leſs than a toleration, odious to God, full of diſhonour, and extreme diſprofit to your majeſty, of extreme ſcandal and grief to your good people, and of apparent danger to the preſent ſtate of your majeſty, and of this kingdom; their numbers, power, and inſolency, daily increaſing in all parts of your kingdom, and eſpecially about London, and the ſuburbs thereof, where exceeding many families do make their abode publicly, frequent maſs at Denmark-houſe, and other places; and by their often meetings and conferences, have opportunities of combining their counſels and ſtrength together, and to the hazard of your majeſty's ſafety and the ſtate, and moſt eſpecially in theſe doubtful and calamitous times. And as our fear concerning change or ſubverſion of religion, is grounded upon the daily increaſe of papiſts, the open and profeſſed enemies thereof, for the reaſons formerly mentioned; ſo are the hearts of your good ſubjects no leſs perplexed, when with ſorrow they behold a daily growth and ſpreading of the faction of the Arminians, that being, as your majeſty well knows, but a cunning way to bring in popery, and the profeſſors of thoſe opinions, the common diſturbers of the proteſtant churches, and incendiaries in thoſe ſtates, wherein they have gotten any head, being proteſtants in ſhew, but jeſuits in opinion; which cauſed your royal father, with ſo much pious wiſdom, and ardent zeal, to endeavour the ſuppreſſing of them, as well at home, as in the neighbour countries. And your gracious majeſty imitating his moſt worthy example, hath openly, and by your proclamation, declared your miſlike of thoſe perſons, and of their opinions; who, notwithſtanding are much favoured and advanced, not wanting friends even of the clergy, near to your majeſty; namely, Dr. Neile biſhop of Wincheſter, and Dr. Laud biſhop of Bath and Wells, who are juſtly ſuſpected to be unſound in their opinions that way. And it being now generally held the way to preferment and promotion in the church, many ſcholars do bend the courſe of their ſtudies to maintain thoſe errors; their books and opinions are ſuffered to be printed and publiſhed; and on the other ſide, the imprinting of ſuch as are written againſt them, and in defence of the orthodox church, are hindered and prohibited: and (which is a boldneſs almoſt incredible) this reſtraint of orthodox books, is made under colour of your majeſty's formerly mentioned proclamation, the intent and meaning whereof, we know, was quite contrary. And farther, to increaſe our fears concerning innovation of religion, we find, that there hath been no ſmall labouring to remove that which is the moſt powerful means to ſtrengthen and encreaſe our own religion, and to oppoſe both thoſe, which is the diligent teaching and inſtruction of the people in the true knowledge and worſhip of Almighty God. And therefore means hath been ſought out to depreſs and diſcountenance pious, and painful, and orthodox preachers; and how conformable ſoever, and peaceable in their diſpoſition and carriage they be, yet the preferment of ſuch is oppoſed, and inſtead of being encouraged, they are moleſted with vexatious courſes and purſuits, and hardly permitted to lecture. And in thoſe places where are no conſtant preaching miniſters, whereby many of our good people (whoſe ſouls, in this caſe, we beſeech your majeſty to commiſerate) are kept in ignorance, and are apt to be eaſily ſeduced to error and ſuperſtition. It doth not a little alſo increaſe our dangers and fears this way, to underſtand the miſerable condition of your kingdom of Ireland, where, without controul, the popiſh religion is openly profeſſed, and practiſed in every part thereof, popiſh juriſdiction being there generally exerciſed and avowed, monaſteries, nunneries, and other ſuperſtitious houſes newly erected, re-edified, and repleniſhed with men and women of ſeveral orders, and in a plentiful manner maintained at Dublin, and moſt of the great towns, and divers other places of the kingdom; which, of what ill conſequence it may prove, if not ſeaſonably repreſſed, we leave to your majeſty's wiſdom to judge: but moſt humbly beſeech you (as we aſſure ourſelves you will) to lay the ſerious conſideration thereof to your royal and pious heart, and that ſome ſpeedy courſe may be taken for redreſs therein.

And

" And if now to all theſe your majeſty will be pleaſed to add the conſideration of the circumſtances of time, wherein theſe courſes, tending to the deſtruction of true religion, within theſe your kingdoms, have been taken here, even then when the ſame is with open force and violence proſecuted in other countries, and all the reformed churches in Chriſtendom, either depreſſed, or miſerably diſtreſſed: we do humbly appeal unto your majeſty's princely judgment, whether there be not juſt ground of fear, that there is ſome ſecret and ſtrong co-operating here with the enemies of our religion abroad, for the utter extirpation thereof? and whether, if thoſe courſes be not ſpeedily redreſſed, and the profeſſion of true religion more encouraged, we can expect any other but miſery and ruin ſpeedily to fall upon us? eſpecially, if beſides the viſible and apparent dangers wherewith we are compaſſed about, you would be pleaſe to remember the diſpleaſure of Almighty God, always bent againſt the neglect of his holy religion, the ſtrokes of whoſe divine juſtice we have already felt, and do ſtill feel with ſmart and ſorrow in great meaſure.

" And beſides this fear of innovation in religion, we do in like faithful diſcharge of our duties, moſt humbly declare to your majeſty, that the hearts of your people are full of fear of innovation and change of government, and accordingly poſſeſſed with extreme grief and ſorrow; yet in this point, by your majeſty's late anſwer to our petition of right touching our liberties, much comforted, and raiſed again out of that ſadneſs and diſcontent, which they generally had conceived throughout the whole kingdom, for the undue courſes which were the laſt year taken for raiſing of monies by loans, than which (whatever your majeſty hath been informed to the contrary) there were never any monies demanded nor paid with greater grief, and general diſlike of all your faithful ſubjects; though many, partly out of fear, partly out of other reſpects (yet moſt unwillingly), were drawn to yield to what was required.

" The billeting of ſoldiers did much augment both their fears and grief; wherein likewiſe they find much comfort upon your gracious anſwer to our petition of right, and to that we preſented to your majeſty concerning this particular. Yet we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, that we may inform you, that the ſtill continuance and late reinforcing of thoſe ſoldiers, the conditions of their perſons (many of them not being natives of this kingdom, nor of the ſame, but of an oppoſite religion), the placing them upon the ſea-coaſt, where making head amongſt themſelves, they may unite with the popiſh party at home, if occaſion ſerve, and join with an invading enemy to do extreme miſchief; and that they are not yet diſmiſſed, both ſtill miniſter cauſe of jealouſy in your loving ſubjects: for that the ſoldiers cannot be continued without exceeding great danger of the peace and ſafety of your kingdom.

" The report of the ſtrange and dangerous purpoſe of bringing in German horſe, and riders, would have turned our doubts into deſpair, and our fears into a certainty of confuſion, had not your majeſty's gracious meſſage (for which we humbly give you thanks) comforted us by the aſſurance of your royal word, that they neither are, nor were intended by your majeſty for any ſervice in England, but that they were deſigned for ſome other foreign employment. Yet the ſight of the privy ſeal, by which, it ſeemeth, they were to be levied; the great ſum of money, which, upon examinations, we found to be paid for that purpoſe, gave us juſt cauſe of fear, that much about the ſame time there was a commiſſion under the great ſeal granted unto the lords, and others of the privy-council, to conſider of other ways for raiſing of monies, ſo particularly by impoſitions, gave us juſt cauſe to ſuſpect, that whatſoever was your majeſty's gracious intention, yet there wanted not thoſe, that under ſome colourable pretence, might ſecretly by this, or by other ways, contrive to change the frame of both religion and government, and thereby undermine the ſafety of your majeſty and your kingdoms.

" Theſe men could not be ignorant, that the bringing in of ſtrangers for aid, hath been pernicious to moſt ſtates, where they have been admitted, but to England fatal. We do bleſs God that hath given your majeſty a wiſe underſtanding heart to diſcern of thoſe courſes, and that ſuch power produceth nothing but weakneſs and calamity. And we beſeech your majeſty to pardon the vehemency of our expreſſion, if in the loyal and zealous affections we bear to your majeſty and your ſervice, we are bold to declare to your majeſty and the whole world, that we hold it far beneath the heart of any free Engliſhman to think, that this victorious nation ſhould now ſtand in need of German ſoldiers to defend their now king and kingdom.

" But when we conſider the courſe formerly mentioned, and theſe things to an apparent change of government, the often breaches of parliament, whereby your majeſty hath been deprived of the faithful counſel, and free aids of your people, by taking of tunnage and poundage, without grant thereof by act of parliament, ever ſince the beginning of your majeſty's reign to this preſent, the ſtanding commiſſion granted to the duke of Buckingham to be general of an army in the land in the time of peace, the diſcharging of faithful and ſufficient officers and miniſters, ſome from judicial places, and others from the offices and authorities which they formerly held in the commonwealth: we cannot but at the ſight of ſuch an apparent deſolation as muſt neceſſarily follow theſe courſes, out of the depth of ſorrow, lift up our cries to heaven for help, and next, under God, apply ourſelves unto your ſacred majeſty, who, if you could hear ſo many thouſands ſpeaking together, do jointly implore ſpeedy help and reformation.

" And if your majeſty would be pleaſed to take a further view of the preſent ſtate of your realm, we do humbly pray you to conſider, whether the miſerable diſaſters and ill-ſucceſs that hath accompanied all your late deſigns and actions, particularly thoſe of Cales, and the Iſle of Rhee, and the laſt expedition to Rochel, have not extremely waſted that ſtock of honour that was left unto this kingdom, ſometimes terrible to all other nations, and now declining to contempt beneath the meaneſt.

" Together with our honours, we there loſt thoſe (and that not a few) who, had they lived, we might have ſome better hope of recovering it again; our valiant and expert colonels, captains, and commanders, and many thouſand common ſoldiers and mariners: though we have ſome cauſe to think, that your majeſty is not as yet rightly informed thereof; and that of ſix or ſeven thouſand of your ſubjects loſt at the iſle of Rhee, your majeſty received information but of a few hundreds. And this diſhonour and loſs hath been purchaſed with the conſumption of above a million of treaſure.

" Many of the forts are exceeding weak and decayed, and want both men and munition. And here we cannot but with grief conſider and complain of a ſtrange improvidence (we think your majeſty will rather call it treachery), that your ſtore of powder, which by order of your privy-council, dated the 10th of December 1626, ſhould be conſtantly three hundred laſt, beſides a continual ſupply of twenty laſt a month for ordinary expences, and were now fit (as we conceive) to be double the proportion, is at this time in the Tower (the preſent warrants being ſerved) but nine laſts and forty-eight pounds in all; which we tremble to think of. And that, notwithſtanding the extreme ſcarcity of powder, great quantities have been permitted to be ſold out of your majeſty's ſtore to particular perſons for private gain; whereof we have ſeen a certificate, ſix laſt ſold ſince the 14th of January laſt, and your majeſty's ſtore being unfurniſhed of powder, which by a contract made with Mr. Evelyn, by advice of your lords in parliament, ought to be ſupplied monthly with twenty laſt, at the rate of three pounds ten ſhillings and ten-pence a barrel; your majeſty hath been forced to pay above ſeven pounds a barrel for powder, to be brought in from beyond ſeas; for which purpoſe, twelve thouſand four hundred pounds was impreſſed to Mr. Burlemack the laſt year, and that powder not ſo good as that by contract your majeſty ſhould have by one third part; all which are moſt fearful and dangerous abuſes. But what the poverty, weakneſs, and miſery of our kingdom is now grown unto by decay of trade, and deſtruction, and loſs of ſhips and mariners, within theſe three years, we are almoſt afraid to declare: And could we by any other means have been ſure, that your majeſty ſhould any other way have had a true information thereof, we ſhould have been doubtful to have made our weakneſs and extremity of misfortune in this kind to appear: But the importunate and moſt pityful complaints from all parts of the kingdom near adjoining to the ſea in this kind, would rend, as we think, the ſtoneſt heart in the world with ſorrow; and the ſenſe we have of the miſerable condition your kingdom is in by reaſon thereof, eſpecially, for that we ſee no poſſible means (being now ſhortly to end this ſeſſion) how to help the ſame, adds ſuch a weight of grief unto our ſad thoughts, as we have not words to expreſs it: But for your majeſty's more exact information therein, we beſeech you be pleaſed to peruſe the kalendar of particulars, which, with the remonſtrance, we moſt humbly preſent unto your majeſty.

" One reaſon, amongſt many, of this decay of trade, and loſs of ſhips and mariners is, the not guarding of the narrow ſeas, the regality whereof your majeſty hath now in a manner wholly loſt, being that wherein a principal part of the honour and ſafety of this kingdom heretofore conſiſted; and now having abſolutely neglected it, the town of Dunkirk doth ſo continually rob and ſpoil your ſubjects, that we can aſſure your majeſty (if ſome preſent and effectual remedy be not forthwith provided) the whole trade of this kingdom, the ſhipping, mariners, and all belonging thereunto, will be utterly loſt and conſumed. The principal cauſe of which evils and dangers we conceive to be the exceſſive power of the duke of Buckingham, and the abuſe of that power: And we humbly ſubmit unto your majeſty's excellent wiſdom, whether it be ſafe for yourſelf, or your kingdoms, that ſo great power as reſts in him by ſea and land, ſhould be in the hands of any one ſubject whatſoever.

"And as it is not ſafe, ſo, ſure we are, it cannot be for your ſervice, it being impoſſible for one man to manage ſo many and weighty affairs of the kingdom as he hath undertaken, beſides the ordinary duties of thoſe offices which he holds, ſome of which well performed, would require the time and induſtry of the ableſt men both of counſel and action, that your whole kingdom will afford, eſpecially in theſe times of common danger.

"And our humble deſire is farther, that your moſt excellent majeſty will be pleaſed to take into your moſt princely conſideration, whether, in reſpect the ſaid duke hath ſo abuſed his power, it be ſafe for your majeſty and your kingdoms to continue him, either in his great offices, or in his place of nearneſs and counſel about your ſacred perſon.

"And this in all humility, aiming at nothing but the honour of Almighty God, and the maintenance of his true religion, the ſafety and happineſs of your moſt excellent majeſty, and the preſervation and proſperity of this church and commonwealth; we have endeavoured with faithful hearts and intentions, and in diſcharge of the duty we owe to your majeſty and our country, to give your majeſty a true repreſentation of our preſent danger, and preſſing calamities, which we humbly beſeech your majeſty graciouſly to accept, and to take the ſame to heart, accounting the ſafety and proſperity of your people, your greateſt happineſs, and their love, your richeſt treaſure. A rueful and lamentable ſpectacle we confeſs it muſt needs be, to behold thoſe ruins in ſo fair an houſe, ſo many diſeaſes, and almoſt every one of them deadly, in ſo ſtrong and well-tempered a body as this kingdom lately was. But yet we will not doubt, but that God hath reſerved this honour for your majeſty, to reſtore the ſafety and happineſs thereof, as a work worthy ſo excellent a prince, for whoſe long life and true felicity we daily pray, and that your fame and never-dying glory may be continued to all ſucceeding generations."

This remonſtrance, delivered by the ſpeaker (who much deſired to be excuſed), made no great impreſſion upon the king, though it did upon the people. All the facts alleged were known, and indiſputable truths. As to the right, the people readily believed, the king and his miniſters meant to eſtabliſh a deſpotic power, becauſe all their proceedings plainly ſhewed it. But they could not believe that the parliament had purpoſely formed a project to rob the king of his prerogatives. They were the more confirmed in that belief, as after the diſſolution of this very parliament, the king, in the reaſons he gave for the diſſolution, complained not of the remonſtrance.

The ſame day the remonſtrance was preſented to the king, the commons ſent the ſubſidy-bill to the lords for their concurrence. Soon after, the king acquaints them by meſſage, that he meant to end the ſeſſion the 26th of June; whereupon the commons began to prepare a particular remonſtrance of the undue taking of tunnage and poundage [k]. This was an ancient impoſt upon merchants goods exported and imported, which the parliament uſually granted to the kings, to enable them to guard the ſeas and protect the trade. This impoſt had long been granted to every king, and it happened ſometimes, that after the death of a king, his ſucceſſor had continued to levy it, till the parliament had given it by an act. As in the reign of Charles I. the court was much guided by precedents, favourable to the prerogative-royal, and as they took advantage of ſuch precedents, as if they had been ſo many laws, it happened that ſince king James's death, Charles had levied tunnage and poundage, without deſiring an act of parliament for that purpoſe, under colour that ſome of his predeceſſors had practiſed it ſome time till an act was paſſed. This is what the commons found fault with, maintaining, the right was a pure grant of the people, and conſequently the king had not power to levy it without the conſent of parliament; and the more, as the ſeas had never been well guarded, or the trade leſs protected than in the firſt years of this reign. To maintain therefore the people's rights, and hinder the crown from uſurping by degrees the impoſt of tunnage and poundage, as a right independent of the parliament, the commons prepared a remonſtrance to the king upon that ſubject.

Whilſt the remonſtrance was drawing, the king acquainted the lords, that the commiſſion for finding means to raiſe money, was but a warrant of advice, agreeable to the time and occaſions; but that now having received a token of his people's love, by the ſubſidy-bill ready to be paſſed, the commiſſion was become uſeleſs, and therefore he had commanded it to be cancelled. As if he had ſaid, in caſe the parliament had not granted a ſupply, he ſhould have found ways to raiſe money. As to his ſaying the commiſſion was but a warrant of advice, it is ſtrange that in ſpeaking to men of ſenſe, ſuch wretched excuſes ſhould be uſed. The day following, the commons were informed alſo, that the commiſſion was cancelled. As the affair of tunnage and poundage made a great noiſe, it is neceſſary to inſert the commons remonſtrance on that ſubject.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"YOUR majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, being in nothing more careful, than of the honour and proſperity of your majeſty, and the kingdom, which they know do much depend upon that happy union and relation betwixt your majeſty and your people, do with much ſorrow apprehend, that by reaſon of the uncertainty of their continuance together, the unexpected interruptions which have been caſt upon them, and the ſhortneſs of time in which your majeſty hath determined to end this ſeſſion, they cannot bring to maturity and perfection, divers buſineſſes of weight, which they have taken into their conſideration and reſolution, as moſt important for the common good: Amongſt other things, they have taken into eſpecial care the preparing of a bill, for the granting of your majeſty ſuch a ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage, as might uphold your profit and revenue in as ample a manner as their juſt care and reſpect of trade (wherein not only the proſperity, but even the life of the kingdom doth conſiſt) would permit; but being a work which will require much time and preparation by conference with your majeſty's officers, and with the merchants, not only of London, but of other remote parts, they find it not poſſible to be accompliſhed at this time: Wherefore conſidering it will be much more prejudicial to the right of the ſubject, if your majeſty ſhould continue to receive the ſame without authority of law, after the determination of a ſeſſion, than if there had been a receſs by adjournment only, in which caſe, that intended grant would have related to the firſt day of the parliament; and aſſuring themſelves, that your majeſty is reſolved to obſerve that your royal anſwer, which you have lately made to the petition of right of both houſes of parliament: Yet doubting leſt your majeſty may be miſinformed concerning this particular caſe, as if you might continue to take thoſe ſubſidies of tunnage and poundage, and other impoſitions upon merchants, without breaking that anſwer, they are forced by that duty which they owe to your majeſty, and thoſe whom they repreſent, to declare, 'That there ought not any impoſition to be laid upon the goods of merchants, exported or imported, without common conſent by act of parliament; which is the right and inheritance of your ſubjects, founded not only upon the moſt ancient and original conſtitution of this kingdom, but often confirmed and declared in divers ſtatute laws.'

"And for the better manifeſtation thereof, may it pleaſe your majeſty to underſtand, That although your royal predeceſſors, the kings of this realm, have often had ſuch ſubſidies and impoſitions granted unto them upon divers occaſions, eſpecially for the guarding of the ſeas, and the ſafeguard of merchants: Yet the ſubjects have been ever careful to uſe ſuch cautions and limitations in thoſe grants, as might prevent any claim to be made, that ſuch ſubſidies do proceed from duty, and not from the free-gift of the ſubjects. And that they have heretofore uſed to limit a time in ſuch grants, and for the moſt part but ſhort, as for a year or two, and if it continued longer, they have ſometimes directed a certain ſpace of ceſſation or intermiſſion, that ſo the right of the ſubject might be more evident. At other times it hath been granted upon occaſion of war, for a certain number of years, with proviſo, That if the war was ended in the mean time, then the grant ſhould ceaſe: And of courſe it hath been ſequeſtred into the hands of ſome ſubjects, to be employed for the guarding of the ſeas, and it is acknowledged by the ordinary anſwers of your majeſty's predeceſſors, in their aſſent to the bills of ſubſidies, tunnage and poundage, that it is of the nature of other ſubſidies, proceeding from the good-will of the ſubject: Very few of your predeceſſors had it for life, until the reign of Henry VII. who was ſo far from conceiving he had any right thereto, that although he granted commiſſions for collecting certain duties and cuſtoms due by law, yet he made no commiſſions for receiving the ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage, until the ſame was granted to him in parliament. Since his time all the kings and queens of this realm have had the like grants for life, by the free love and good-will of the ſubjects. And whenſoever the people have been grieved, by laying any impoſitions, or other charges upon their goods and merchandizes without authority of law (which hath been very ſeldom), yet upon complaint in parliament, they have been forthwith relieved; ſaving in the time of your royal father, who, having through ill counſel raiſed the rates and charges upon merchandizes to that height at which they now are, yet he was pleaſed ſo far forth to yield to the complaint of his people, as to offer, That if the value of thoſe impoſitions which he had ſet might be made good unto him, he would bind himſelf and his heirs by act of parliament, never to lay any other: Which offer, the commons at that time, in regard of the great burden, did not think fit to yield unto. Nevertheleſs your loyal commons in this parliament, out of their eſpecial zeal to your ſervice, and eſpecial regard of your preſſing occaſions, have taken into their conſideration, ſo to frame a grant of ſubſidy of tunnage or poundage to your majeſty, that both you might have been the better enabled for the defence of your realm, and your ſubjects, by being ſecure from all undue charges, be the more encouraged cheerfully to proceed in their courſe of trade; by the increaſe whereof, your majeſty's profit, and likewiſe the ſtrength of the kingdom, would be very much augmented.

[k] The commons fell immediately upon the bill of tunnage and poundage; but finding they ſhould not have time to accompliſh the ſame, it was ordered that a committee ſhould be appointed to draw up a remonſtrance, of the undue taking of tunnage and poundage without act of parliament. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 628.

"But not being now able to accompliſh this their deſire, there is no courſe left unto them, without manifeſt breach of their duty, both to your majeſty and their country, ſave only to make this humble declaration, that the receiving of tunnage and poundage, and other impoſitions not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to your majeſty's royal anſwer to the ſaid petition of right. And therefore they do moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to forbear any further receiving of the ſame; and not to take it in ill part from thoſe of your majeſty's loving ſubjects, who ſhall refuſe to make payment of any ſuch charges, without warrant of law demanded.

"And as by this forbearance, your moſt excellent majeſty ſhall manifeſt unto the world your royal juſtice in the obſervation of your laws; ſo they doubt not but hereafter at the time appointed for their coming again, they ſhall have occaſion to expreſs their great deſire to advance your majeſty's honour and profit."

The king being informed of the contents of this remonſtrance, on the 26th of June ſent for the ſpeaker, who returned ſome time after to the houſe, whilſt the remonſtrance was reading. He was no ſooner come, but the king, who was now at the houſe of lords, ſent for the commons, and thus ſpoke to both houſes:

"IT may ſeem ſtrange that I came ſo ſuddenly to end this ſeſſion; before I give my aſſent to the bills, I will tell you the cauſe, though I muſt avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the houſe of commons gave me a remonſtrance, how acceptable every man may judge; and for the merit of it, I will not call that in queſtion, for I am ſure no wiſe man can juſtify it.

"Now ſince I am truly informed, that a ſecond remonſtrance is preparing for me, to take away the profit of my tunnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alleging, I have given away my right thereto by my anſwer to your petition:

"This is ſo prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this ſeſſion ſome few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more remonſtrances, to which I muſt give a harſh anſwer. And ſince I ſee, that even the houſe of commons begins already to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted in your petition, leſt it be worſe interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The profeſſion of both houſes in the time of hammering this petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, ſaying, they had neither intention or power to hurt it. Therefore it muſt needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my ſubjects. Yet to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promiſed you, I do here declare myſelf, That thoſe things which have been done, whereby many have had ſome cauſe to expect the liberties of the ſubjects to be trenched upon, which indeed was the firſt and true ground of the petition, ſhall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice, and from time to time, in the word of a king, ye ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain. But as for tunnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to aſk, nor meant by me, I am ſure, to grant.

"To conclude, I command you all that are here, to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws; for none of the houſes of parliament, either joint or ſeparate (what new doctrines ſoever may be raiſed), have any power either to make or declare a law without my conſent."

After this ſpeech, the ſubſidy-bill was paſſed, the lords having already given their conſent, and the parliament was prorogued to the 20th of October.

The king's ſpeech to the parliament before the prorogation, was ſo dark, that it was hard to conceive upon what grounds he complained of the remonſtrance the commons had prepared. He ſeems to have conſidered tunnage and poundage as a right annexed to his prerogative royal. Otherwiſe, there was no need to obſerve, that both houſes, whilſt they were preparing the petition of right, had declared, they meant not to encroach upon his prerogative. This argument, on ſuppoſition of that principle, would have been unanſwerable, and the reſt very ſuperfluous. But as the king knew he could never prove this right to belong to him independently of the parliament, he proceeded to other arguments, the weakneſs whereof is evident. He ſaid, the two houſes by their petition of right, did not intend to take from him tunnage and poundage, from whence he inferred, that ſince they had no ſuch particular view, he could not with juſtice be deſired to deſiſt from it. But firſt, though the petition of right contained ſome particular articles, theſe articles did not exclude whatever was implied in the general article, founded upon the ancient ſtatutes: "That no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other charge, ought to be levied by the king, without the conſent of parliament." Now tunnage and poundage being of this nature, it neceſſarily followed, that it was included in the general article, or elſe, it was to be proved to belong to the crown, independently of the common conſent of the people. In the ſecond place, the two houſes had no intention to deprive him of tunnage and poundage in particular, becauſe they deſigned to grant it by an act. He could not therefore conclude from thence, that he had a right to levy it without their conſent. He alleged as another argument, that he never meant to grant them this article, making his anſwer to depend upon his intention. But his anſwer, "Soit fait comme il eſt deſiré," manifeſtly referred to the contents of the petition, and not to the king's intention in granting it. His third argument was taken from tunnage and poundage being one of the beſt revenues of the crown, and his chief ſupport. This was an excellent argument to demonſtrate to the parliament the neceſſity of granting him this right, and to induce him to continue the ſeſſion till the act was paſſed; but he could not thence infer, that he had power to levy it againſt the parliament's will, eſpecially as it was in his breaſt to have it in a legal way. Moreover, he continually inculcated, that his anſwer depended upon his intention, directly contrary to the clear and expreſs terms of the anſwer itſelf, which could refer only to the petition. Finally, in taking from the houſes the power of declaring what was, or what was not, law, he aſcribed it ſolely to the judges who were under him; that is to ſay, as he could make or unmake the judges as he pleaſed, he put himſelf properly in poſſeſſion of this power, independently of the two houſes. This intention appeared but too plainly afterwards.

This ſeſſion was worth to the king five ſubſidies [1], a very conſiderable aid, with which the parliament purchaſed the

An act forbidding carriers, waggoners, and drovers, travelling on Sundays; or butchers killing or ſelling meat on that day. 2. To reſtrain the paſſing or ſending any to be popiſhly bred beyond the ſeas. 3. For the better ſuppreſſing of unlicenſed ale-houſe keepers. 4. For eſtabliſhing Sutton's hoſpital. 5. king's anſwer to the petition of right, that is, the confirmation of the laws, which till then had paſſed for inconteſtible. On the other ſide, the king thought he had no leſs dearly bought the five ſubſidies by his condeſcenſion to tie up his hands, in giving his conſent to the petition of right, contrary to his own principles, and the projects he had formed with reſpect to government. But he afterwards ſhewed, that in granting the petition of right, he had only amuſed the parliament, ſince he never regulated his conduct by what was contained in the petition. Preſently after the prorogation of the parliament, the king publiſhed ſeveral proclamations. The firſt was to ſuppreſs Dr. Manwaring's ſermons, entitled, Religion and Allegiance. But this ſuppreſſion conſiſted only in an order to ſuch as had any copies of theſe ſermons, to deliver them to the ſecretary of ſtate, or ſome other magiſtrate[m]. The ſequel will ſhew whether the court was deſirous the order ſhould be punctually executed. But the king's appearing publicly not to approve of theſe ſermons, was ſufficient to ſatisfy the people.

By another proclamation, Richard Smith, titular biſhop of Chalcedon, was ordered to be apprehended, with all other prieſts and jeſuits that had taken orders by authority from the ſee of Rome, and, after conviction, to be committed to the caſtle of Wiſbich[n]. Some jeſuits having been taken and ſent to Newgate[o], the king ordered, that if they were found guilty, they ſhould be carried to the ſame caſtle of Wiſbich in the iſle of Ely. Theſe were all the proceedings of the court againſt the papiſts.

But on the other hand, the king took a courſe which gave a much worſe opinion of his own, or his miniſter's zeal for religion. Firſt, he appointed commiſſioners to compound with recuſants. Secondly, Sir Richard Weſton, a known papiſt, was made lord treaſurer, and afterwards earl of Portland. Thirdly, Dr. Laud, who was conſidered as head of the Arminians, in the judgment of the houſe of commons, was tranſlated from Bath and Wells to the biſhopric of London. Fourthly, Dr. Montague, who had given ſo great offence by his book, entitled, Appeal to Cæſar, was promoted to the ſee of Chicheſter[p].

The town of Rochel being at this time cloſely beſieged by the king of France, the king had prepared a fleet to relieve it, and the duke of Buckingham, who was to have the command, was now at Portſmouth. But when he was going to embark, he was ſtabbed to the heart with a knife, and immediately died[q]. The aſſaſſin was one John Felton, a lieutenant, who owned, that after the declaration of the commons againſt the duke, he had looked upon him as an enemy to his country, and been thereby induced to commit the deed. It appeared by his trial, that he had no accomplice, and was led to this wicked action by an exceſs of zeal. The king being then at ſir Daniel Norton's near Portſmouth, ſeemed extremely concerned for the duke's death, and to give him even after his death, continual marks of his affection, his creatures remained in the ſame favour and poſts they had enjoyed in the life-time of their protector.

Mean while, as the relief of Rochel could not be delayed any longer, the king ſent away the fleet deſigned for that purpoſe[r]. But cardinal Richelieu had uſed ſo great diligence, that the barricado he was making to hinder the approach of the Engliſh ſhips, was finiſhed, ſo that the fleet was forced to return without effecting any thing, after having ſeen Rochel taken[s].

The meeting of the parliament appointed to the 20th of October, was by proclamation prorogued to the 10th of January. In this interval, certain caſes happened which ſupplied the parliament with a freſh occaſion of complaint, and in the end cauſed their diſſolution. Though the remonſtrance concerning tunnage and poundage was not preſented to the king, it was however public, and ſufficient to ſhew the people what was the ſenſe of the houſe of commons. Upon this foundation three merchants among others, refuſed to pay this duty to the king. Rolls, one of the three, merchant of London, and member of the houſe of commons, having refuſed it, as contrary to law, the cuſtomers ſeized his goods; and upon his alleging the authority of parliament, one of the officers inſolently told him, "If all the parliament were in you, we would take your goods." Chambers and Vaſſal, the other two merchants of London, the firſt of whom was alderman, were condemned to pay tunnage and poundage, by the barons of the exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained.

[1628-9] The parliament meeting the 10th of January 1628-9, Rolls's affair was immediately laid before the houſe, and referred to a committee. Whilſt the committee were in debate, the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, willing them to deſiſt till next day in the afternoon, at which time he would ſpeak with them at Whitehall. The lords having alſo received orders to be preſent, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"THE care I have to remove all obſtacles that may hinder the good correſpondency between me and this parliament, is the cauſe I have called you together at this time, the particular occaſion being a complaint made in the lower houſe. As for you, my lords, I am glad to take this, and all other occaſions, whereby you may clearly underſtand both my words and actions; for as you are neareſt in degree, ſo you are the fitteſt witneſſes unto kings.

"The complaint I ſpeak of is, for ſtaying men's goods that deny tunnage and poundage; this may have an eaſy and ſhort concluſion, if my words and actions be rightly underſtood: for by paſſing the bill, as my anceſtors have had it, my by paſt actions will be included, and my future proceedings authoriſed, which certainly would not have been ſtuck on, if men had not imagined that I had taken theſe duties as appertaining to my hereditary prerogative, in which they are much deceived; for it ever was and ſtill is my meaning, by the gift of my people to enjoy it; and my intention in my ſpeech at the ending of the laſt ſeſſion concerning this point, was to challenge tunnage and poundage as of right, but de bene eſſe, ſhewing you the neceſſity, not the right by which I was to take it, until you had granted it to me, aſſuring myſelf, according to your general profeſſions, you wanted time, not will, to give it me.

"Wherefore now having opportunity, I expect that without loſs of time you make good your profeſſions, and ſo by paſſing of a bill, put an end to all the queſtions ariſing from this ſubject; eſpecially ſince I have cleared the only ſcruple that can trouble you in this buſineſs. To conclude, let us not be jealous one of the other's actions; for if I had been eaſily moved at every occaſion, the order you made on Wedneſday laſt might have made me ſtartle, there being ſome ſhew to ſuſpect that you had given yourſelves the liberty to be the inquiſitors after complaints (the words of your order being ſomewhat too largely penned), but looking into your actions, I find you only hear complainers, not ſeeking complaints: for I am certain you neither pretend, nor deſire the liberty to be inquiſitors of men's actions before particular complaint be made.

"This I have ſpoken to ſhew you how ſlow I am to believe harſhly of your proceedings; likewiſe to aſſure you, that the houſes reſolutions, not particular men's ſpeeches, ſhall make me judge well or ill, not doubting, but according to my example, you will be deaf to ill reports concerning me, till my words and actions ſpeak for themſelves, that ſo this ſeſſion beginning with confidence one towards another, it may end with a perfect good underſtanding between us: which God grant."

Some days after, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, that the bill for tunnage and poundage might be ſpeedily taken into conſideration, and no time loſt. But the commons not thinking the king had power to preſcribe the time to them, fell upon matters of religion, particulary with regard to Arminianiſm: and finding that Laud, Montague, and Manwaring, had been preferred ſince the laſt ſeſſion, ſeveral members made great complaints. Though the king preſſed them again by meſſage to proceed with the bill for tunnage and poundage, they pretended that religion ought to have the precedency of all other affairs. Wherefore they began to inquire how the execution of the laws againſt papiſts came to ceaſe; and whence it was that papiſts were employed and countenanced, and new ceremonies continually introduced, eſpecially at Durham, by Dr. Coſins, as angels, ſaints, crucifixes, altars, candles and Candlemaſs-day; and laſtly, from whence proceeded the increaſe of Arminianiſm.

This inquiry was interrupted by a freſh meſſage from the king, requiring them to give the preference to the bill for tunnage and poundage. Nevertheleſs he declared, that he meant not to interrupt their debates upon matters of religion, provided the houſe would not meddle with what did not belong to them. By that, he took away with one hand what he gave with the other, ſince he believed, the commons had no right to meddle with religion. This meſſage hindered them not from continuing their debates. The proclamation forbidding all diſputes for and againſt Arminianiſm was complained of particularly, wherein it was ſaid, "If there be any difference of opinion concerning the ſeaſonable interpretation of the thirty-nine articles, the biſhops have power to order which way they pleaſe." But as ſome of the biſhops were ſuſpected, it was concluded, that by the terms of the proclamation, the kingdom would be obliged to receive popery or Arminianiſm, by following the determinations of the biſhops [t]. Theſe ſuſpicions fell chiefly upon Laud and Neile, who being the king's counſellors for matters of religion, governed almoſt all the other biſhops. Upon this account, the houſe, to prevent the dangers they feared, thought fit to enter into this vow:

"We the commons in parliament aſſembled, do claim, proteſt, and avow for truth, the ſenſe of the articles of religion, which were eſtabliſhed by parliament in the thirteenth year of our late queen Elizabeth, which by the public act of the church of England, and by the general and current expoſitions of the writers of our church, have been delivered unto us. And we reject the ſenſe of the jeſuits and Arminians, and all others, wherein they differ from us."

As the intention of the commons was to perſuade the people that religion was in danger, they defired the concurrence of the lords to petition the king for a faſt, which they obtained with ſome difficulty. The king plainly perceived the deſign of the petition, and, though he did not think fit to reject it, anſwered, that the cuſtom of faſting every ſeſſion was but lately begun; that he granted it however for this time, though he did not ſee the neceſſity of it; but for the future would not grant a faſt, except on extraordinary occaſions. Adding, that as for the defence of the reformed churches abroad, fighting would do them more good than faſting.

As the king had frequently preſſed the commons to proceed with the bill for tunnage and poundage, and give it the precedency of matters of religion, they thought themſelves obliged to preſent a declaration to the king to juſtify their conduct.

This declaration, which was a ſort of apology, containing nothing material, I do not think it neceſſary to inſert it at length. It ſuffices to ſay, the commons excuſed themſelves two ways for not giving precedency to the bill for tunnage and poundage. The firſt was, becauſe matters of religion having been firſt propoſed, the conſtant order of the houſe required, they ſhould have the preference. The ſecond was, the weight and importance of the concerns of religion. They concluded with thanking the king for his promiſes, to maintain religion, thereby tacitly reproaching him for not performing them.

The king anſwered this declaration, not particularly, but with ſome ſhort notes. He told them, "he thought it ſtrange they ſhould have an ill opinion of him with reſpect to religion. He aſſured them, that he would never ſtop his ears to the complaints that ſhould be brought to him upon that ſubject, provided that in form and matter the commons did not tranſgreſs their limits." Concluding with theſe words: "I muſt ſtill be inſtant with you, that you proceed with tunnage and poundage with diligence (not looking to be denied in ſo juſt a deſire); that you muſt not think it ſtrange, if I, finding you ſlack, give you ſuch farther quickning as I ſhall find cauſe."

After this, the commons continued their debates upon matters of religion, and particularly on the proclamation to prohibit diſputing for or againſt Arminianiſm. This was pretended to be a ſnare to ſuppreſs the puritan party, and give the Arminians more liberty, and that Laud and Montague had given the king this advice. It was alſo complained, that the enemies of religion had procured a royal pardon under the great ſeal for four eccleſiaſtics, the moſt ſuſpected in England, namely, Montague, Coſins, Sibthorp, and Manwaring; and that, in contempt of the parliament, they were even promoted to biſhoprics, or other good benefices [u]. I confeſs I cannot conceive how it is poſſible to juſtify the king's condeſcenſion for thoſe who adviſed him to protect ſo openly, nay, to prefer men ſo odious to the parliament, ſince he could not be ignorant how much he rendered himſelf ſuſpected by ſuch a conduct: at leaſt it cannot be denied that he gave his enemies an advantage. But beſides that it was the genius of the king and court to look upon the parliament, and eſpecially the commons, with extreme contempt, the king could refuſe nothing to Dr. Laud, who was his prime counſellor in eccleſiaſtical affairs. To confirm the commons in their ſuſpicions of Laud, the printers and bookſellers of London preſented ſeveral petitions, complaining of the reſtraint of books written againſt popery and Arminianiſm, whilſt a licenſe was never refuſed to ſuch as were compoſed in favour of popiſh and Arminian doctrines. They even inſtanced in certain books againſt popery, which were denied to be licenſed. They affirmed, this was done by the biſhop of London, or his chaplains, to whom the examination of the books was committed.

As Dr. Laud, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, made a very great figure in England during the firſt fifteen years of this reign, I do not think it improper to relate here part of what is ſaid for and againſt him. Not that I pretend fully to make known his genius, his character, his religion: this to me ſeems impracticable, conſidering what oppoſite opinions there are concerning him, it being almoſt impoſſible to affirm any thing of him, good or bad, upon the teſtimony of ſome, but what is contradicted and rejected as falſe by others. This is the common effect of parties. Hardly can any thing be added to the encomiums which thoſe who profeſs what they call High-Church, that is, the rigid epiſcopalians, beſtow on this famous biſhop. The lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory, expreſſes, on all occaſions, a great eſteem for Laud, and finds no other fault in him, but a little too much eagerneſs to accompliſh his undertakings. All the reſt of the ſame party extol him to the ſkies. They ſee no imperfection in him; and every where praiſe his wiſdom, his good ſenſe, his learning, his piety, and above all, his zeal for the church of England, for which he at laſt died a martyr. The preſbyterians, on the contrary, without denying his ſenſe and learning, affirm, he was a rank Arminian, and almoſt a papiſt. They ſay, that under the colour of a great zeal for the ceremonies of the church, he carried them to the borders of popery, and juſtly rendered himſelf ſuſpected of deſigning by degrees to reſtore the Romiſh religion in England. That to this end he made even the leaſt trifles, ſuch as the reformers had not meddled with, becauſe they thought them indifferent, to be conſidered as eſſential to religion. They inferred from thence, that it was impoſſible for a man of his ſenſe, to be attached to things of ſo little moment, had he not entertained ſome ill deſign againſt the reformed religion. That he was a mortal enemy of the preſbyterians and puritans, becauſe from them he met with moſt oppoſition to the execution of his projects. For my part, I own, that in all that has been ſaid againſt him, I have found no convincing proof of his intention to re-eſtabliſh the Roman catholic religion in England, unleſs we confound, as many did in thoſe days, popery with high-church, through a ſpirit of party. But it is very certain, he mortally hated the preſbyterians, and would have utterly extirpated puritaniſm, had it been in his power. As for Arminianiſm, it is very probable, he was greatly inclined to it. See his character given by his predeceſſor archbiſhop Abbot, in the narrative which he drew in his own vindication in the year 1627.

"This man is the only inward counſellor with Buckingham, ſitting with him ſometimes privately whole hours, and feeding his humours with malice and ſpight.

"His life in Oxford was to pick quarrels in the lectures of the public readers, and to advertiſe them to the then biſhop of Durham, that he might fill the ears of king James with diſcontents, againſt the honeſt men that took pains in their places, and ſettled the truth (which he called Puritaniſm) in their auditors.

"He made it his work to ſee what books were in the preſs,

[t] It may here be obſerved once for all, that from the conſtant complaints of the growth of Arminianiſm, it may be inferred, the thirty-nine articles of the church of England were in thoſe days generally taken in a calviniſtical ſenſe, though they are now, and have long been, ſubſcribed by the clergy for moſt part in the Arminian. The preſbyterians (whoſe tenets are eſpouſed by Rapin) adhere to the calviniſtical interpretation.

[u] Oliver Cromwel, who was of this committee, complained, that Dr. Neile, biſhop of Wincheſter, countenanced perſons who had preached popery: and, that Dr. Manwaring had been made biſhop. Adding, if theſe be the ſteps to church preferment, what may we expect. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 655.

and to look over epiſtles dedicatory, and prefaces to the reader, to ſee what faults might be found.

" It was an obſervation, what a ſweet man this was like to be, that the firſt obſervable act that he did, was the marrying the earl of D. to the lady R.[w], when it was notorious to the world that ſhe had another huſband, and the ſame a nobleman, who had divers children then living by her. King James did for many years take this ſo ill, that he would never hear of any great preferment of him; inſomuch that the biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, who taketh upon him to be the firſt promoter of him, hath many times ſaid, that when he made mention of Laud to the king, his majeſty was ſo averſe from it, that he was conſtrained oftentimes to ſay, That he would never deſire to ſerve that maſter, which could not remit one fault unto his ſervant. Well, in the end he did conquer it, to get him to the biſhopric of St. David's; which he had not long enjoyed, but he began to undermine his benefactor, as at this day it appeareth. The counteſs of Buckingham told Lincoln, that St. David's was the man that undermined him with her ſon: and verily, ſuch is his aſpiring nature, that he will underwork any man in the world, ſo that he may gain by it."

This character is not to Laud's advantage; but it muſt be obſerved, that the archbiſhop aſcribed his own diſgrace to the ſecret counſels given by that prelate to the duke of Buckingham.

Whilſt the commons were in debate concerning religion, the ware-houſe of Mr. Rolls, merchant and member of parliament, was locked up by a purſuivant, and himſelf called forth and ſerved with a ſubpœna[x]. This put the houſe in a flame, and occaſioned the ſending for the officers of the cuſtoms, to know upon what account they had ſeized the merchant's effects, and carried them to the king's ſtore-houſe[y]. They replied, it was for refuſing to pay tunnage and poundage, and other duties. But becauſe there was an information already preferred againſt the merchants in the exchequer and ſtarchamber, the commons reſolved not to proceed with the bill of tunnage and poundage, till the goods were reſtored to the owners; and ordered that the barons of the exchequer ſhould be told, to make void their injunction concerning the detaining of the merchants effects[z]. The barons returned anſwer, that they did not, by their injunctions, determine, or any way touch upon the right of tunnage and poundage; neither did they by their orders, bar the owners from ſuing for their goods in a lawful courſe: but whereas the merchants endeavoured to take their goods out of the king's poſſeſſion by writs of replevin, which was no lawful courſe in the king's caſe, nor agreeable to his prerogative royal, therefore the court of exchequer did ſtay thoſe ſuits, and declare, that the owners, if they conceived themſelves wronged, might take ſuch remedy as the law allows. This anſwer, which ſignified nothing, not being ſatisfactory to the commons, a motion was made to conſider whether ever the court of exchequer held this courſe before, for ſtaying of replevins; and whether this had been done by the prerogative of the king in his court of exchequer.

This affair having been long debated in the houſe, the officers of the cuſtoms were ſent for again, and anſwered, that they acted by virtue of a commiſſion under the great ſeal. One of them ſaid, " He had ſeized the goods for duties that were due in the time of king James, and that his majeſty had ſent for him, and commanded him to make no other anſwer." Whereupon the houſe being turned into a grand committee, a motion was made and ſeconded, whether the officers of the cuſtom ſhould be proceeded againſt, by ſeparating their intereſt from that of the king. After ſeveral ſpeeches pro and con, a report was made from the grand committee, that they had at laſt reſolved, that Mr. Rolls ought to have privilege of perſon and goods; which being voted, the ſpeaker was moved to put the queſtion, but he refuſed to do it, ſaying, the king had commanded the contrary. Such a command could not but ſurpriſe the houſe: they adjourned to the 25th of February, and then were farther adjourned by his majeſty's order till the 2d of March. On that day the commons being met, and requiring the ſpeaker to put the queſtion, he ſaid, " I have a command from the king to adjourn the houſe till the 10th of March." And endeavouring to get out of the chair, he was held down by force, and the doors were locked, till ſir John Elliot had drawn the following proteſtation, which was approved by the majority, though not without great tumult and confuſion, and even ſome blows.

The commons proteſtation.

" 1. Whoſoever ſhall bring in innovation of religion, or by favour or countenance ſeem to extend or introduce popery or Arminianiſm, or other opinion diſagreeing from the truth and orthodox church, ſhall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth.

" 2. Whoſoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking and levying of the ſubſidies of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or ſhall be an actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall be likewiſe reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

" 3. If any merchant or perſon whatſoever, ſhall voluntarily yield or pay the ſaid ſuſidies of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he ſhall likewiſe be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the ſame."

As the king expected no money from this ſecond ſeſſion, he was very glad to have, as he thought, a plauſible pretence to diſſolve the parliment: ſo, that very day a proclamation was drawn up[a], to give notice of his deſign to diſſolve the parliament on the 10th of March, and that the members might depart about their own affairs.

The next day, warrants were directed from the council to Denzil Hollis, ſir Miles Hobart, ſir John Elliot, ſir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, Benjamin Valentine, eſquires, commanding their perſonal appearance on the morrow. Four of them, Hollis, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine, appeared; and refuſing to anſwer out of parliament for what was ſaid and done in the houſe, were committed cloſe priſoners to the Tower. The council ordered at the ſame time the ſtudies of Hollis, Elliot, and Selden, to be ſealed up; and a proclamation was publiſhed to apprehend them. It muſt be obſerved, that the parliament not being yet diſſolved, theſe men were ſtill actually members of parliament.

On the 10th of March, the king coming to the parliament houſe, made the following ſpeech, addreſſing himſelf only to the lords, there being but few commons preſent, the ſpeaker and houſe of commons not having been called.

" My lords,

" I NEVER came here upon ſo unpleaſant an occaſion, it being the diſſolution of a parliament; therefore men may have ſome cauſe to wonder why I ſhould not rather chuſe to do this by commiſſion, it being rather a general maxim of kings to leave harſh commands to their miniſters, themſelves only executing pleaſing things: yet conſidering that juſtice as well conſiſts in reward and praiſe of virtue, as puniſhing of vice, I thought it neceſſary to come here to day, and declare to you and all the world, that it was merely the undutiful and ſeditious carriage in the lower houſe that hath made the diſſolution of this parliament; and you, my lords, are ſo far from being any cauſers of it, that I take as much comfort in your dutiful demeanour, as I am juſtly diſtaſted with their proceedings; yet to avoid their miſtakings, let me tell you, that it is ſo far from me to adjudge all the houſe alike guilty, that I know that there are many there as dutiful ſubjects as any in the world, it being but ſome few vipers among them that did caſt this miſt of undutifulneſs over moſt of their eyes: yet, to ſay truth, there was a good number there that could not be infected with this contagion; inſomuch that ſome did expreſs their duties in ſpeaking, which was the general fault of the houſe the laſt day. To conclude, as thoſe vipers muſt look for their reward of puniſhment, ſo you, my lords, muſt juſtly expect from me that favour and protection, that a good king oweth to his loving and faithful nobility. And now, my lord keeper, do what I have commanded you."

Then the lord keeper ſaid, " My lords, and gentlemen of the houſe of commons (though the commons were not called), the king's majeſty doth diſſolve this parliament."

[w] Laud it ſeems had married Charles Blount earl of Devonſhire, to the lady Rich, wife of the earl of Warwick, who was then alive.

[x] The author ſays, the purſuivant ſent for Mr. Rolls out, to order him not to touch what was locked up. But this, and ſome other little miſtakes in this and the following paragraphs, are corrected in the tranſlation, it not being ſo eaſy to do it by way of note.

[y] It was moved, that the perſon that ſerved the ſubpœna might be ſent for and examined by what procurement it was taken forth. Sir Humphry May, privy counſellor, aſſured the houſe, that this neither proceeded from king nor council, and therefore deſired it might be ſearched to the bottom. And afterwards the attorney general wrote a letter to Mr. Rolls, telling him, the ſerving a ſubpœna upon him was a miſtake. And yet report was made to the houſe by the committee for tunnage and poundage, that the attorney general, notwithſtanding his letter, did give order for the proceſs againſt Mr. Rolls. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 654.

[z] Chambers, it ſeems, having ſued out a writ of replevin, the proper remedy in law to regain the poſſeſſion of his goods, the barons of the exchequer did order an injunction under the ſeals of the ſaid court, directed to the ſheriffs of London, commanding them not to execute the ſaid writ, or any the like, and declaring the goods were not replevable. Ibid. p. 612.

[a] The author ſays, publiſhed; but it was not publiſhed till after the 10th of March. Ibid. p. 661.

The diſſolution of the parliament was cauſed by the inſolence of the houſe of commons, as the king had juſt told the lords: and this inſolence, this ſeditious carriage, conſiſted only in keeping the ſpeaker in his chair by force, after he had notified that the houſe was adjourned by his majeſty's order, till a proteſtation of three very ſhort articles was ſet down in writing. This was the commons offence. And here it muſt be remarked, that there was a great difference between the adjourning and the proroguing or diſſolving of the parliament. The king's power to prorogue and diſſolve was never called in queſtion; before the time of James I. I believe no king had ever thought of adjourning the parliament. King James was the firſt that did it. The commons complained of it as a breach of their privileges; but not finding the lords inclined to diſpute this power with the king, they were forced to give way, though they foreſaw the ill conſequences. Theſe conſequences ſhewed themſelves in the preſent reign. Charles I. taking the advantage of this ſingle precedent eſtabliſhed by the king his father, was not ſatisfied with hindering the parliament from adjourning themſelves at Eaſter, as hath been ſeen, but even adjourned the houſes twice, at a time when the commons were debating upon matters which were not agreeable to him; and alſo prevented the ſpeaker by his ſole authority to put the queſtion when required. It is eaſy to ſee the conſequences of this power to adjourn the houſes. The king could put a ſtop to all the debates of either houſe, by adjourning them whenever they took into conſideration any matters diſpleaſing to him. On the other hand, upon ſuppoſition that the king's right was unqueſtionable, the houſe of commons had diſobeyed his orders and violated his prerogative, which might be attended with no leſs ill conſequences. But the king, ſuppoſing his right as fully eſtabliſhed, without giving himſelf any farther trouble to prove it, reſolved to puniſh the houſe of commons, not only by the diſſolution of the parliament, a puniſhment which concerned the whole nation rather than their repreſentatives, but alſo in cauſing ſome of their moſt active and ſtirring members to be condemned as rebellious and ſeditious.

[1629[To that end he commanded the judges of the realm to meet and give their opinions upon the queſtions he had to propoſe to them, in order to be guided by their determinations, leſt he ſhould be accuſed of proceeding too arbitrarily. The queſtions, with the judges anſwers, were as follow:

"1. Whether if any ſubject hath received probable information of any treaſon, or treacherous attempt, or intention againſt the king or ſtate, that ſubject ought not to make known to the king, or his majeſty's commiſſioners, when thereunto he ſhall be required, what information he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to the end the king, being truly informed, may prevent the danger? And if the ſaid ſubject in ſuch caſe ſhall refuſe to be examined, or to anſwer the queſtions which ſhall be demanded of him for farther inquiry and diſcovery of the truth, whether it be not a high contempt in him, puniſhable in the ſtar chamber, as an offence againſt the general juſtice and government of the kingdom?

Sol. The reſolution and anſwer of all the juſtices was, "That it is an offence puniſhable as aforeſaid, ſo that this do not concern himſelf, but another, nor draw him to danger of treaſon or contempt by his anſwer.

"2. Whether it be a good anſwer or excuſe, being thus interrogated, and refuſing to anſwer, to ſay, that he was a parliament-man when he received this information, and that he ſpake thereof in the parliament-houſe, and therefore the parliament being now ended, he refuſed to anſwer to any queſtions but in the parliament-houſe, and not in any other place?

Sol. The judges did not venture to decide publicly this queſtion: but they gave this anſwer by advice privately to the attorney general, "That this excuſe being in nature of a plea and an error in judgment, was not puniſhable until he were over ruled in an orderly manner to make another anſwer; and whether the party were brought in Ore tenus, or by information, for this plea he was not to be puniſhed."

"3. Whether a parliament-man, committing an offence againſt the king or council, not in a parliament way, might, after the parliament ended, be puniſhed or not?

Sol. All the judges unanimouſly anſwered, "He might, if he be not puniſhed for it in parliament; for the parliament ſhall not give privilege to any contra morem parliamentarium, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty. And all agreed, that regularly he cannot be compelled out of parliament to anſwer things done in parliament, in a parliamentary courſe; but it is otherwiſe where things are done exorbitantly, for thoſe are not the acts of a court."

"4. Whether, if one parliament-man alone ſhall reſolve, or two or three ſhall covertly conſpire, to raiſe falſe ſlanders and rumours againſt the lords of the council and judges, not with intent to queſtion them in a legal courſe, or in a parliamentary way, but to blaſt them, and to bring them to hatred of the people, and the government in contempt, be puniſhable in the ſtar chamber after the parliament is ended?

Sol. The judges reſolve, "That the ſame was puniſhable out of parliament, as an offence exorbitant committed in parliament, beyond the office, and beſides the duty of a parliament-man."

The artifice of theſe queſtions conſiſted, 1. In the king's propoſing them in a general manner, as if they related not to any particular perſon. 2. In his aſcribing to one, two, or three members of the houſe, what was done by a great majority. 3. In ſuppoſing offences, outrages, treaſons againſt himſelf or council, and in deciding queſtions of law before the facts were ſtated [b].

By virtue of theſe determinations, the attorney general exhibited in the ſtar chamber an information againſt the impriſoned members, wherein he greatly aggravated what had paſſed in the lower houſe, when the ſpeaker was kept by force in the chair, but without the leaſt mention of the occaſion.

At the ſame time alderman Chambers, one of thoſe that refuſed to pay tunnage and poundage was alſo proſecuted in the ſtar chamber, for ſaying, "That the merchants were more ſcrewed up and wrung in England than in Turky." He was condemned in an exhorbitant fine of 2000l. by which, and ſome other oppreſſions, he was reduced to a very low condition.

I have already mentioned the artifice uſed by the court to remove from the parliament ſuch gentlemen as they ſuſpected, by making them ſheriffs of their reſpective counties, which obliged them to ſwear to the due execution of their office. Walter Long, eſq; of Wiltſhire, being made ſheriff of the county a little before the calling of the laſt parliament, was however elected for Bath, and he preferred this ſervice to that which his office obliged him to. During the ſitting of the parliament, Long was left undiſturbed, but after the diſſolution, the court entered an information againſt him in the ſtar chamber for breaking his oath by abſenting himſelf from his county, and he was fined 2000 marks.

The other members that were in ſeveral priſons, having petitioned the judges to be releaſed upon bail by virtue of the Habeas Corpus, when the judges were met and ready to deliver their opinions, the priſoners were not brought to the bar according to the rule of court: whereupon, proclamation being made for the bringing them in, the court was informed that they were removed to the Tower by the king's own warrant. Then there came a letter to the judges from the king, ſignifying to the court that the priſoners were not ſuffered to appear before them, by reaſon of their inſolent carriage towards him; that is, inſtead of applying themſelves to the king for pardon, they had addreſſed themſelves to the judges to be releaſed upon bail, according to law. Not to inſiſt too long upon this affair, I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying, that they were kept in priſon from March till October, without being tried, or obtaining the benefit of the Habeas Corpus. In fine, the court of King's Bench having agreed with one voice, "That the court, as this caſe is, ſhall have juriſdiction, though the offences were committed in parliament, and that the impriſoned members ought to plead," judgment was given againſt them upon a Nihil dicit [c]. They were to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure, and moreover, Elliot was fined 2000l. Hollis, 1000 marks, and Valentine 500l.

The king's conduct, as well in diſſolving the parliament, as in what was done afterwards, could not but breed diſcontent among the people. Murmurs were every where heard: libels were diſperſed about London againſt the king's counſellors, and particularly againſt biſhop Laud [d] and the lord treaſurer Weſton, who were accuſed of putting the king upon theſe violent proceedings. For this reaſon, the king, to prevent greater complaints, publiſhed a declaration to notify to the people the cauſes of the diſſolution of the laſt parliament. Though this declaration be very long, I think it

[b] Judge Whitelock often highly complained of this way of ſending to the judges for their opinions before hand, and ſaid, "That if biſhop Laud went on in this way, he would kindle a flame in the nation." Whitelock, p. 13.

[c] They refuſed to put in other plea, than denying the juriſdiction of the court in this caſe.

[d] The libel againſt biſhop Laud was to this effect: "Laud, look to thyſelf, be aſſured thy life is ſought: as thou art the fountain of wickedneſs, repent of thy monſtrous ſins, before thou be taken out of the world; and aſſure thyſelf, neither God nor the world can endure ſuch a vile counſellor or whiſperer to live." The other was as bad againſt the lord treaſurer Weſton. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 662.—They were ſuppoſed to have perſuaded the king to diſſolve the parliament. Echard, tom. II. p. 79.

neceſſary to inſert the whole in this place, leſt I ſhould be accuſed of having either paſſed over in ſilence, or too much abridged what may ſerve to juſtify the king. It muſt be obſerved that it was dated the 10th of March, the very day the parliament was diſſolved, though it was not publiſhed that day, but ſome time after.

The king's declaration to all his ſubjects, notifying the cauſes which moved him to diſſolve the laſt parliament.

" HOWSOEVER princes are not bound to give account of their actions but to God alone, yet for the ſatisfaction of the minds and affections of our loving ſubjects, we have thought good to ſet down thus much by way of declaration, that we may appear to the world in the truth and ſincerity of our actions, and not in thoſe colours in which we know ſome turbulent and ill-affected ſpirits (to maſque and diſguiſe their wicked intentions, dangerous to the ſtate) would repreſent us to the public view.

" We aſſembled our parliament the 17th day of March, in the third year of our reign, for the ſafety of religion, for ſecuring our kingdoms and ſubjects at home, and our friends and allies abroad. And therefore, at the firſt ſitting down of it, we declared the miſerable afflicted eſtate of thoſe of the reformed religion in Germany, France, and other parts of Chriſtendom; the diſtreſſed extremities of our deareſt uncle the king of Denmark, chaced out of a great part of his dominions; the ſtrength of that party which was united againſt us: that (beſides the pope and the houſe of Auſtria, and their ancient confederates) the French king profeſſed the rooting out of the proteſtant religion: that of the princes and ſtates on our party, ſome were over-run, others diverted, and ſome diſabled to give aſſiſtance. For which, and other important motives, we propounded a ſpeedy ſupply of treaſure, anſwerable to the neceſſity of the cauſe.

" Theſe things in the beginning were well reſented by the houſe of commons, and with ſo much alacrity and readineſs, that they agreed to grant a liberal aid: but before it was brought to any perfection, they were diverted by a multitude of queſtions raiſed among them, touching their liberties and privileges, and by other long diſputes, that the bill did not paſs in a long time; and by that delay, our affairs were put into a far worſe caſe than at the firſt; our foreign actions then in hand, being thereby diſgraced and ruined for want of timely help.

" In this, as we are not willing to derogate from the merit and good intentions of thoſe wiſe and moderate men of that houſe (to whoſe forwardneſs we attribute it, that it was propounded and reſolved ſo ſoon), ſo we muſt needs ſay, that the delay of paſſing it when it was reſolved, occaſioned by cauſeleſs jealouſies, ſtirred up by men of another temper, did much leſſen both the reputation and reality of that ſupply. And their ſpirit, infuſed into many of the commiſſioners and aſſeſſors in the country, hath returned up the ſubſidies in ſuch a ſcanty proportion, as is infinitely ſhort, not only of our great occaſions, but of the precedents of former ſubſidies, and of the intentions of all well-affected men in that houſe.

" In thoſe large diſputes, as we permitted many of our high prerogatives to be debated, which in the beſt times of our predeceſſors had never been queſtioned, without puniſhment or ſharp reproof; ſo we did endeavour to have ſhortened thoſe debates for winning of time, which would have much advantaged our great affairs both at home and abroad. And therefore, both by ſpeeches and meſſages, we did often declare our gracious and clear reſolution to maintain, not only the parliament, but all our people, in their ancient and juſt liberties, without either violation or diminution; and in the end, for their full ſatisfaction and ſecurity, did, by an anſwer framed in the form by themſelves deſired to their parliamentary petition, confirm their ancient and juſt liberties and rights, which we reſolve with all conſtancy and juſtice to maintain.

" This parliament howſoever, beſides the ſettling our neceſſary ſupply, and their own liberties, they waſted much time in ſuch proceedings (blaſting our government, as we are unwilling to remember), yet we ſuffered them to ſit, until themſelves deſired us to appoint a time for their receſs, not naming either adjournment or prorogation.

" Whereupon, by advice of our council, we reſolved to prorogue and make a ſeſſion; and to that end prefixed a day, by which they might (as was meet in ſo long a ſitting) finiſh ſome profitable and good laws; and withal gave order for a gracious pardon to all our ſubjects; which, according to the uſe of former parliaments, paſſed the higher houſe, and was ſent down to the commons. All which being graciouſly intended by us, was ill-entertained by ſome diſaffected perſons of that houſe, who by their artifices, in a ſhort time raiſed ſo much heat and diſtemper in the houſe; for no other viſible cauſe, but becauſe we had declared our reſolution to prorogue, as our council adviſed, and not to adjourn, as ſome of that houſe (after our reſolution declared, and not before) did manifeſt themſelves to effect; that ſeldom hath greater paſſion been ſeen in that houſe upon the greateſt occaſions. And ſome glances in the houſe, but upon open rumours abroad were ſpread, That by the anſwer to the petition, we had given away, not only our impoſitions upon goods exported and imported, but the tunnage and poundage (whereas in the debate and hammering of that petition, there was no ſpeech or mention in either houſe concerning thoſe impoſitions, but concerning taxes and other charges within the land: much leſs was there any thought thereby to debar us of tunnage and poundage, which, both before and after the anſwer to that petition, the houſe of commons, in all their ſpeeches and treaties, did profeſs they were willing to grant). And at the ſame time many other miſinterpretations were raiſed of that petition and anſwer, by men not well-diſtinguiſhing between well-ordered liberty and licentiouſneſs; as if by our anſwer to that petition, we had let looſe the reins of our government. And in this diſtemper, the houſe of commons, laying aſide the pardon (a thing never done in any former parliament), and other buſineſs fit to have been concluded in that ſeſſion, ſome of them went about to frame and contrive a remonſtrance againſt our receiving of tunnage and poundage, which was ſo far proceeded in, the night before the prefixed time for concluding the ſeſſion, and ſo haſtened by the contrivers thereof, that they meant to have put it to the vote of the houſe the next morning, before we ſhould prorogue that ſeſſion. And therefore, finding our gracious favours in the ſeſſion, afforded to our people, ſo ill requited, and ſuch ſiniſter ſtrains made upon our anſwer to that petition, to the diminution of our profit, and (which was more) to the danger of our government: we reſolved to prevent the finiſhing of that remonſtrance, and other dangerous intentions of ſome ill-affected perſons, by ending the ſeſſion the next morning, ſome few hours ſooner than was expected; and by our own mouth to declare to both houſes the cauſe thereof: and for hindering the ſpreading of thoſe ſiniſter interpretations of that petition and anſwer, to give ſome neceſſary directions, for ſettling and quieting our government, until another meeting; which we performed accordingly the ſix and twentieth of June laſt,

" The ſeſſion thus ended, and the parliament riſen, that intended remonſtrance gave us occaſion to look into the buſineſs of tunnage and poundage. And therefore, though our neceſſities pleaded ſtrongly for us, yet we were not apt to ſtrain that point too far, but reſolved to guide our ſelf by the practice of former ages, and examples of our moſt noble predeceſſors, thinking thoſe counſels beſt warranted, which the wiſdom of former ages, concurring with the preſent occaſions, did approve; and therefore gave order for a diligent ſearch of records: upon which it was found, that although in the parliament holden in the firſt year of the reign of king Edward the fourth, the ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage was not granted unto that king, but was firſt granted unto him by parliament in the third year of his reign; yet the ſame was accounted and anſwered to that king, from the firſt day of his reign, all the firſt and ſecond years of his reign, and until it was granted by parliament. And that in the ſucceeding times of king Richard the third, king Henry the ſeventh, king Henry the eighth, king Edward the ſixth, queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, the ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage was not only enjoyed by every of thoſe kings and queens, from the death of each of them deceaſing, until it was granted by parliament under the ſucceſſor; but in all theſe times (being for the moſt part peaceable, and not burthened with like charges and neceſſities, as theſe modern times) the parliament did moſt readily and cheerfully, in the beginning of every of thoſe reigns, grant the ſame, as a thing moſt neceſſary for the guarding of the ſeas, ſafety and defence of the realm, and ſupportation of the royal dignity. And in the time of our royal father of bleſſed memory, he enjoyed the ſame a full year, wanting a very few days, before his parliament began; and above a year before the act of parliament for the grant of it was paſſed. And yet when the parliament was aſſembled, it was granted without difficulty. And in our own time, we quietly received the ſame three years or more, expecting with patience in ſeveral parliaments the like grant thereof, as had been made to ſo many of our predeceſſors; the houſe of commons ſtill profeſſing, that multitude of other buſineſſes, and not want of willingneſs on their part, had cauſed the ſettling thereof to be ſo long deferred. And therefore finding

ſo much reaſon and neceſſity for the receiving of the ordinary duties in the cuſtom houſe, to concur with the practice of ſuch a ſucceſſion of kings and queens, famous for wiſdom, juſtice, and government, and nothing to the contrary, but that intended remonſtrance, hatched out of the paſſionate brains of a few particular perſons; we thought it was ſo far from the wiſdom and duty of a houſe of parliament, as we could not think that any moderate and diſcreet man (upon compoſed thoughts, ſetting aſide paſſion and diſtemper) could be againſt receiving of tunnage and poundage; eſpecially ſince we do, and ſtill muſt purſue thoſe ends, and undergo that charge for which it was firſt granted to the crown; it having been ſo long and conſtantly continued to our predeceſſors, as that in four ſeveral acts of parliament, for the granting thereof to king Edward the ſixth, queen Mary, queen Elizabeth, and our bleſſed father, it is in expreſs terms mentioned, to have been had and enjoyed by the ſeveral kings, named in thoſe acts, time out of mind, by authority of parliament. And therefore upon theſe reaſons we held it agreeable to our kingly honour, and neceſſary for the ſafety and good of our kingdom, to continue the receipt thereof, as ſo many of our predeceſſors had done. Wherefore when a few merchants (being at firſt but one or two) fomented, as it is well known, by thoſe evil ſpirits that would have hatched that undutiful remonſtrance, began to oppoſe the payment of our accuſtomed duties in the cuſtom houſe, we gave order to the officers of our cuſtoms to go on, notwithſtanding that oppoſition, in the receiving of the uſual duties, and cauſed thoſe that refuſed to be warned to attend at the council board, that by the wiſdom and authority of our council, they might be reduced to obedience and duty; where ſome of them, without reverence or reſpect to the honour and dignity of that preſence, behaved themſelves with ſuch boldneſs and inſolency of ſpeech, as was not to be endured by a far meaner aſſembly, much leſs to be countenanced by a houſe of parliament, againſt the body of our privy council.

"And as in this we did, what in reaſon and honour was fit for the preſent, ſo our thoughts were daily intentive upon the re-aſſembling of our parliament, with full intention on our part, to take away all ill-underſtanding between us and our people; whoſe loves, as we deſire to continue and preſerve, ſo we uſed our beſt endeavours to prepare and facilitate the way to it. And to this end, having taken a ſtrict and exact ſurvey of our government, both in the church and commonwealth, and what things were moſt fit and neceſſary to be reformed: we found in the firſt place, that much exception had been taken at a book, entitled, Apello Cæſarem, or, an Appeal to Cæſar; and publiſhed in the year 1625, by Richard Montague, then bachelor of divinity, and now biſhop of Chicheſter; and becauſe it did open the way to thoſe ſchiſms and diviſions, which have ſince enſued in the church, we did for remedy and redreſs thereof, and for the ſatisfaction of the conſciences of our good people, not only by our public proclamation, call in that book, which miniſtred matter of offence; but to prevent the like danger for hereafter, re-printed the articles of religion, eſtabliſhed in the time of queen Elizabeth of famous memory; and by a declaration before thoſe articles, we did tie and reſtrain all opinions to the ſenſe of thoſe articles, that nothing might be left for private fancies and innovations. For we call God to record, before whom we ſtand, that it is, and always hath been our heart's deſire, to be found worthy of that title, which we account the moſt glorious in all our crown, Defender of the Faith. Neither ſhall we ever give way to the authoriſing of any thing, whereby any innovation may ſteal or creep into the church; but to preſerve that unity of doctrine and diſcipline eſtabliſhed in the time of queen Elizabeth, whereby the church of England hath ſtood and flouriſhed ever ſince.

"And as we were careful to make up all breaches and rents in religion at home, ſo did we by our proclamation and commandment, for the execution of laws againſt prieſts and popiſh recuſants, fortify all ways and approaches againſt that foreign enemy; which if it hath not ſucceeded according to our intention, we muſt lay the fault where it is, in the ſubordinate officers and miniſters in the country, by whoſe remiſſneſs, jeſuits and prieſts eſcape without apprehenſion; and recuſants from thoſe convictions and penalties which the law and our commandment would have inflicted on them. For we do profeſs, that as it is our duty, ſo it ſhall be our care to command and direct well; but it is the part of others to perform the miniſterial office. And when we have done our office, we ſhall account ourſelf, and all charitable men will account us, innocent, both to God and men. And thoſe that are negligent, we will eſteem as culpable both to God and us; and therefore will expect that hereafter they give us a better account.

"And as we have been careful for the ſettling of religion, and quieting the church; ſo were we not unmindful of the preſervation of the juſt and ancient liberties of our ſubjects, which we ſecured to them by our gracious anſwer to the petition in parliament, having not ſince that time done any act whereby to infringe them. But our care is, and hereafter ſhall be, to keep them entire and inviolable, as we would do our own right and ſovereignty, having for that purpoſe enrolled the petition and anſwer in our courts of juſtice.

"Next to the care of religion, and of our ſubjects rights, we did our beſt for the provident and well-ordering of that aid and ſupply, which was granted to us the laſt ſeſſion, whereof no part hath been waſtefully ſpent, nor put to any other uſe than thoſe for which it was deſired and granted; as upon payment of our fleet and army; wherein our care hath been ſuch, as we choſe rather to diſcontent our deareſt friends and allies, and our neareſt ſervants, than to leave our ſoldiers and mariners unſatisfied, whereby any vexation or diſquiet might ariſe to our people. We have alſo, with part of thoſe moneys, begun to ſupply our magazines, and ſtores of munition, and to put our navy into a conſtant form and order. Our fleet is likewiſe fitting, and almoſt in a readineſs, whereby the narrow ſeas may be guarded, commerce maintained, and our kingdom ſecured againſt all foreign attempts. Theſe acts of ours might have made this impreſſion in all good minds, that we were careful to direct our counſels, and diſpoſe our actions, as might moſt conduce to the maintenance of religion, honour of our government, and ſafety of our people. But with miſchievous men once ill-affected, 'ſeu bene, ſeu male facta premunt;' and whatſoever once ſeemed amiſs, is ever remembered; but good endeavours are never regarded.

"Now all theſe things that were the chief complaints the laſt ſeſſion, being by our princely care ſo ſeriouſly reformed, the parliament re-aſſembled the 20th of January laſt. We expected, according to the candour and ſincerity of our own thoughts, that men would have framed themſelves for the effecting of a right underſtanding between us and our people. But ſome few malevolent perſons, like empirics and leud artiſts, did ſtrive to make new work, and to have ſome diſeaſe on foot, to keep themſelves in requeſt, and to be employed and entertained in the cure. And yet to manifeſt how much offences have been diminiſhed, the committees for grievances, committees for courts of juſtice, and committees for trade, have, ſince the ſitting down of the parliament, received few complaints, and thoſe ſuch as they themſelves have not thought to be of that moment or importance, with which our ears ſhould be acquainted.

"No ſooner therefore was the parliament ſet down, but theſe ill-affected men began to ſow and diſperſe their jealouſies, by caſting out ſome glances and doubtful ſpeeches, as if the ſubject had not been ſo clearly and well dealt with, touching their liberties, and touching the petition anſwered the laſt parliament. This being a plauſible theme, thought on for an ill purpoſe, eaſily took hold on the minds of many, that knew not the practice. And thereupon the ſecond day of the parliament, a committee was appointed to ſearch, whether the petition and our anſwer thereunto were enrolled in the parliament roll, and in the courts at Weſtminſter, and in what manner the ſame was done. And a day was alſo then appointed, on which the houſe being reſolved into a committee, ſhould take into conſideration thoſe things, wherein the liberty of the ſubject had been invaded, againſt the petition of right. This, though it produced no other effect of moment or importance, yet was ſufficient to raiſe a jealouſy againſt our proceedings, in ſuch as were not well acquainted with the ſincerity and clearneſs of them. There followed another of no leſs ſkill; for although our proceedings before the parliament, about matters of religion, might have ſatisfied any moderate men, of our zealous care thereof (as we are ſure it did the moſt), yet, as bad ſtomachs turn the beſt things into their own nature, for want of good digeſtion; ſo theſe diſtempered perſons have done the like of our good intents, by a bad and ſiniſter interpretation: for, when they did obſerve, that many honeſt and religious minds in that houſe did complain of thoſe dangers that did threaten the church; they likewiſe took the ſame word in their mouth, and their cry likewiſe was, 'templum domini, templum domini,' when the true care of the church never came into their hearts: and what the one did out of zeal unto religion, the other took up as a plauſible theme, to deprave our government, as if we, our clergy, and council, were either ſenſeleſs or careleſs of religion, and this wicked practice practice hath been, to make us ſeem to walk before our people, as if we halted before God.

"Having, by theſe artifices, made a jealous impreſſion in the hearts of many; and a day being appointed to treat of the grant of tunnage and poundage, at the time prefixed, all expreſſed great willingneſs to grant it. But a new ſtrain is found out, that it could not be done without great peril to the right of the ſubject, unleſs we ſhould diſclaim any right therein, but by grant in parliament; and ſhould cauſe all thoſe goods to be reſtored, which, upon commandment from us, or our council, were ſtayed by our officers until thoſe duties were paid, and conſequently ſhould put ourſelves out of the poſſeſſion of the tunnage and poundage, before they were granted; for elſe, it was pretended, the ſubject ſtood not in fit caſe to grant it. A fancy and cavil raiſed of purpoſe to trouble the buſineſs; it being evident, that all the kings before named did receive that duty, and were in actual poſſeſſion of it, before, and at the very time when it was granted to them by parliament. And although we, to remove all difficulties, did from our own mouth, in thoſe clear and open terms, that might have ſatisfied any moderate and well-diſpoſed minds, declare, that it was our meaning, by the gift of our people to enjoy it; and that we did not challenge it of right, but took it 'de bene eſſe,' ſhewing thereby, not the right, but the neceſſity by which we were to take it (wherein we deſcended, for their ſatisfaction, ſo far beneath ourſelf, as we are confident never any of our predeceſſors did the like, or was the like ever required or expected from them). Yet for all this, the bill of tunnage and poundage was laid aſide, upon pretence, they muſt firſt clear the right of the ſubject therein; under colour whereof, they entertain the complaints, not only of John Rolls, a member of their houſe, but alſo of Richard Chambers, John Foukes, and Bartholomew Gilman, againſt the officers of our cuſtoms, for detaining their goods, upon refuſal to pay the ordinary duty, accuſtomed to be paid for the ſame. And upon theſe complaints, they ſend for the officers of the cuſtoms, enforcing them to attend day after day, by the ſpace of a month together; they cauſe them to produce their letters patents under our great ſeal, and the warrants made by our privy-council, for levying of thoſe duties. They examine the officers upon what queſtions they pleaſe, thereby to entrap them for doing our ſervice and commandment. In theſe and other their proceedings, becauſe we would not give the leaſt ſhew of interruption, we endured long with much patience, both theſe and ſundry other ſtrange and exorbitant encroachments and uſurpations, ſuch as were never before attempted in that houſe.

"We are not ignorant how much that houſe hath of late years endeavoured to extend their privileges, by ſetting up general committees for religion, for courts of juſtice, for trade, and the like; a courſe never had until of late: ſo as, where in former times the knights and burgeſſes were wont to communicate to the houſe ſuch buſineſſes as they brought from their countries; now there are ſo many chairs erected, to make enquiry upon all ſorts of men, where complaints of all ſorts are entertained, to the unſufferable diſturbance and ſcandal of juſtice and government, which having been tolerated a while by our father and ourſelf, hath daily grown to more and more height; inſomuch that young lawyers ſitting there, take upon them to decry the opinions of the judges; and ſome have not doubted to maintain, that the reſolution of that houſe muſt bind the judges; a thing never heard of in ages paſt. But, in this laſt aſſembly of parliament, they have taken on them much more than ever before.

"They ſent meſſengers to examine our attorney general (who is an officer of truſt and ſecrecy) touching the execution of ſome commandments of ours, of which, without our leave firſt obtained, he was not to give account to any but ourſelf. They ſent a captious and directory meſſage to the lord-treaſurer, chancellor, and barons of the exchequer, touching ſome judicial proceedings of theirs in our court of exchequer.

They ſent meſſengers to examine upon ſundry queſtions, our two chief juſtices, and three other of our judges, touching their judicial proceedings at the gaol delivery at Newgate, of which they are not accountable to the houſe of commons.

"And whereas ſuits were commenced in our court of ſtar chamber, againſt Richard Chambers, John Foukes, Bartholomew Gilman, and Richard Philips, by our attorney general, for great miſdemeanors; they reſolved that they were to have privilege of parliament againſt us for their perſons, for no other cauſe, but becauſe they had petitions depending in that houſe; and (which is more ſtrange) they reſolved that a ſignification ſhould be made from that houſe by a letter, to iſſue under the hand of their ſpeaker, unto the lord keeper of our great ſeal, that no attachment ſhould be granted out againſt the ſaid Chambers, Foukes, Gilman, or Philips, during their ſaid privilege of parliament. Whereas it is far above the power of that houſe, to give directions to any of our courts at Weſtminſter, to ſtop attachments againſt any man, though never ſo ſtrongly privileged; the breach of privilege being not in the court that grants, but in the party or miniſter that puts in execution ſuch attachments. And therefore, if any ſuch letter had come to the lord keeper, as it did not, he ſhould have highly offended us, if he had obeyed it. Nay, they went ſo far, as they ſpared not the honour of our council board, but examined their proceedings in the caſe of our cuſtomers, interrogating what this or that man of our council ſaid, in direction of them in the buſineſs committed to their charge. And when one of the members of that houſe, ſpeaking of our counſellors, ſaid, we had wicked counſel; and another ſaid, that the council and judges ſought to trample under feet the liberty of the ſubject; and a third traduced our court of ſtar chamber, for the ſentence given againſt Savage, they paſſed without check or cenſure by the houſe. By which may appear how far the members of that houſe have of late ſwollen beyond the rules of moderation, and the modeſty of former times; and this under pretence of privilege and freedom of ſpeech, whereby they take liberty to declare againſt all authority of council and courts at their pleaſure.

"They ſent for our ſheriff of London, to examine him in a cauſe whereof they had no juriſdiction; their true and ancient juriſdiction extending only to their own members, and to the converſation of their privileges, and not to the cenſure of foreign perſons and cauſes, which have no relation to their privileges, the ſame being but a late innovation. And yet upon an enforced ſtrain of a contempt for not anſwering to their ſatisfaction, they commit him to the Tower of London, uſing that outward pretext for a cauſe of committing him, the true and inward cauſe being, for that he had ſhewed himſelf dutiful to us and our commandments, in the matter concerning our cuſtoms.

"In theſe innovations (which we will never permit again) they pretended indeed our ſervice; but their drift was, to break, by this means, through all reſpects and ligaments of government, and to erect an univerſal overſwaying power to themſelves, which belongs only to us, and not to them.

"Laſtly, in their proceedings againſt our cuſtomers; they went about to cenſure them as delinquents, and to puniſh them, for ſtaying ſome goods of ſome factious merchants, in our ſtore-houſe, for not paying thoſe duties which themſelves had formerly paid, and which the cuſtomers, without interruption, had received of all other merchants, many years before, and to which they were authorized, both by our great ſeal, and by ſeveral directions and commandments from us and our privy council.

"To give ſome colour to their proceedings herein, they went about to create a new privilege (which we will never admit), That a parliament-man hath privilege for his goods againſt the king; the conſequence whereof would be, That he may not be conſtrained to pay any duties to the king, during the time of privilege of parliament. It is true, they would have this caſe to have been between the merchants, and our farmers of our cuſtoms, and have ſerved them from our intereſt and commandment, thereby the rather to make them liable to the cenſure and puniſhment of that houſe. But on the other ſide, we holding it both unjuſt and diſhonourable, to withdraw ourſelf from our officers, in any thing they did by our commandment, or to diſavow any thing that we had enjoyned to be done; upon Monday the 23d of February, ſent a meſſage unto them by ſecretary Coke, thanking him for the reſpect they had ſhewed, in ſevering the intereſt of our farmers from our own intereſt and commandment. Nevertheleſs, we were bound in honour to acknowledge a truth, that, what was done by them, was done by our expreſs commandment and direction; and if for doing thereof our farmers ſhould ſuffer, it would highly concern us in honour. Which meſſage was no ſooner delivered unto them, but in a tumultuous and diſcontented manner they called, Adjourn, adjourn; and thereupon, without any cauſe given on our part, in a very unuſual manner, adjourned until the Wedneſday following.

"On which day, by the uniform wiſdom of our privy council, we cauſed both houſes to be adjourned until the ſecond day of March; hoping that in the mean time, a better and more right underſtanding might be begotten between us and the members of that houſe, whereby the parliament might come to an happy iſſue.

"But underſtanding by good advertiſement, that their diſcontent did not in that time digeſt and paſs away; we reſolved to make a ſecond adjournment until the 10th of March; which was done, as well to take time to ourſelf, to think of ſome means to accommodate thoſe difficulties, as to give them time to adviſe better: and accordingly, we gave commandment for a ſecond adjournment in both houſes, and for ceſſation of all buſineſs till the day appointed; which was very dutifully obeyed in the higher houſe, no man contradicting or queſtioning it: But when the ſame commandment was delivered in the houſe of commons by their ſpeaker, it was ſtraightways contradicted; and although the ſpeaker declared unto them, it was an abſolute right and power in us to adjourn, as well as to prorogue or diſſolve; and declared and read unto them divers precedents of that houſe, to warrant the ſame; yet our commandment was moſt contemptuouſly diſobeyed; and ſome riſing up to ſpeak, ſaid, They had buſineſs to do before the houſe ſhould be adjourned."

Here the king inſerted a long account of what paſſed in the houſe, when the ſpeaker was kept by force in the chair, whilſt the remonſtrance was drawing. This account is much aggravated, being taken word for word from the attorney general's information againſt Elliot. But it contains in ſubſtance no more than what hath been ſaid before.

"Whilſt the duke of Buckingham lived, he was intitled to all the diſtempers and ill-events of former parliaments; and therefore much endeavour was uſed to demoliſh him, as the only wall of ſeparation between us and our people. But now he is dead, no alteration was found among thoſe envenomed ſpirits, which troubled then the bleſſed harmony between us and our ſubjects, and continue ſtill to trouble it. For now, under the pretence of public care of the commonwealth, they ſuggeſt new and cauſeleſs fears, which in their own hearts they know to be falſe; and deviſe new engines of miſchief, ſo to caſt a blindneſs upon the good affections of our people, that they may not ſee the truth and largeneſs of our heart towards them. So that now it is manifeſt, the duke was not alone the mark theſe men ſhot at, but was only as a near miniſter of ours, taken up, on the bye, and in their paſſage to their more ſecret deſigns; which were only to caſt our affairs into a deſperate condition, to abate the powers of our crown, and to bring our government into obloquy; that in the end all things may be overwhelmed with anarchy and confuſion.

"We do not impute theſe diſaſters to the whole houſe of commons, knowing that there were amongſt them many religious, grave, and well-minded men; but the ſincerer and better part of the houſe was overborne, by the practices and clamours of the other, who, careleſs of their duties, and taking advantage of the times, and our neceſſities, have enforced us to break off this meeting; which had it been anſwered with like duty on their parts, as it was invited and begun with love on ours, might have proved happy and glorious, both to us and this whole nation.

"We have thus declared the manifold cauſes we had to diſſolve this parliament, whereby all the world may ſee how much they have forgotten their former engagements at the entry into the war, themſelves being perſuaders to it; promiſing to make us feared by our enemies, and eſteemed by our friends. And how they turned the neceſſities grown by that war, to enforce us to yield to conditions incompatible with monarchy.

"And now that our people may diſcern that theſe provocations of evil men (whoſe puniſhments we reſerve to a due time) have not changed our good intentions to our ſubjects, we do here profeſs to maintain the true religion and doctrine eſtabliſhed in the church of England, without admitting or conniving at any back-ſliding, either to popery or ſchiſm. We do alſo declare, That we will maintain the ancient and juſt rights and liberties of our ſubjects, with ſo much conſtancy and juſtice, that they ſhall have cauſe to acknowledge, That under our government and gracious protection, they live in a more happy and free eſtate than any ſubjects in the chriſtian world. Yet let no man hereby take the boldneſs to abuſe that liberty, turning it to licentiouſneſs, nor miſinterpret the petition, by perverting it to a lawleſs liberty, wantonly or frowardly, under that or any other colour, to reſiſt lawful and neceſſary authority. For as we will maintain our ſubjects in their juſt liberties, ſo we do and will expect, that they yield as much ſubmiſſion and duty to our royal prerogatives, and as ready obedience to our authority and commandments, as hath been performed to the greateſt of our predeceſſors.

"And for our miniſters, we will not that they be terrified by thoſe harſh proceedings, that have been ſtrained againſt ſome of them. For as we will not command any thing unjuſt or diſhonourable, but ſhall uſe our authority and prerogatives for the good of our people; ſo we will expect, that our miniſters obey us, and they ſhall aſſure themſelves we will protect them.

"As for our merchants, we let them know we ſhall always endeavour to cheriſh and enlarge the trade of ſuch as be dutiful, without burthening them beyond what is fitting: But the duty of five in the hundred, for guarding the ſeas, and defence of the realm, to which we hold ourſelves ſtill obliged (and which duty hath continued without interruption ſo many ſucceſſions of ages), we hold no good or dutiful ſubject will deny it, being ſo neceſſary for the good of the whole kingdom. And if any factious merchant will affront us, in a thing ſo reaſonable, and wherein we require no more, nor in no other manner, than ſo many of our predeceſſors have done, and have been dutifully obeyed: let them not deceive themſelves, but be aſſured, that we ſhall find honourable and juſt means to ſupport our eſtate, vindicate our ſovereignty, and preſerve the authority which God hath put into our hands.

"And now having laid down the truth and clearneſs of our proceedings, all wiſe and diſcreet men may eaſily judge of thoſe rumours, and jealous fears, that are maliciouſly and wickedly bruited abroad, and may diſcern by examination of their own hearts, whether (in reſpect of the free paſſage of the goſpel, indifferent and equal adminiſtration of juſtice, freedom from oppreſſion, and the great peace and quietneſs which every man enjoyeth under his own vine and fig-tree) the happineſs of this nation can be paralleled by any of our neighbour-countries; and if not, then to acknowledge their own bleſſedneſs, and for the ſame be thankful to God, the author of all goodneſs."

This declaration, or rather apology, produced not the effect the king expected. It was very difficult for the king to perſuade the people, that a dozen members of parliament had formed a project to ſubvert the government, to introduce anarchy, to uſurp the royal authority, without any appearance of the leaſt advantage to themſelves or others. It would have been ſtill more ſtrange, that ſuppoſing the king ſo juſt a prince, and ſo tender of his people, as he deſired to be thought, theſe men ſhould have had ſufficient credit, to bring over the majority of the commons to their ſentiments. On the other hand, the king defended himſelf very weakly, in his declaration, on the articles concerning recuſants, tunnage and poundage, and in general, on the cauſes of the diſſolution of the parliament. For in aggravating the commons fault, in not inſtantly obeying the adjournment, he not only ſuppoſed his power inconteſtible, though it was not ſo, but alſo omitted the immediate cauſe of their non-compliance, namely, the ſpeaker's refuſal, by his expreſs command, to put the queſtion, which was a manifeſt breach of the freedom of parliament. Complaints therefore and murmurs continued more than ever, notwithſtanding this apology. It was publicly ſaid, the king intended utterly to deſtroy the privileges of the parliament and the liberties of the people; and what was done afterwards againſt the impriſoned members, helped not to undeceive the nation. It was added, that trade was ruined, and religion in danger, and that the kingdom was going to be enſlaved, if theſe miſchiefs were not redreſſed by a new parliament. The king being informed of theſe rumours, publiſhed a proclamation to this effect:

"THAT, notwithſtanding his majeſty's late declaration, for ſatisfying the minds and affections of his loving ſubjects, ſome ill-diſpoſed perſons do ſpread falſe and pernicious rumours abroad, as if the ſcandalous and ſeditious propoſition in the houſe of commons, made by an outlawed man, deſperate in mind and fortune, and tumultuouſly taken up by ſome few, after that, by his majeſty's royal authority, he had commanded their adjournment, had been the vote of the whole houſe, whereas the contrary is the truth; for it was then decried by the wiſeſt and beſt-affected, and ſince diſavowed, upon examination, by ſuch as were ſuſpected to have conſented thereunto, and affirmed, as well by them, as others who ſerved in the houſe that day, to be a thing of a moſt wicked and dangerous conſequence, to the good eſtate of this kingdom; and it appeareth to be ſo, by thoſe impreſſions which this falſe rumour hath made in men's minds, whereby, out of cauſeleſs fears, the trade of the kingdom is diſturbed, and merchants diſcouraged to continue their wonted traffic. His majeſty hath thought it expedient, not only to manifeſt the truth thereof, but to make known his royal pleaſure; that thoſe who raiſe or nouriſh falſe reports, ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed; and ſuch as cheerfully go on with their trade, have all good encouragement; not purpoſing to over-charge his ſubjects by any new burthens, but to ſatisfy himſelf with thoſe duties that were received received by the king his father of bleſſed memory, which his now majeſty, neither can nor will diſpenſe withal; but but ſhall eſteem them unworthy of his protection who ſhall deny the ſame, his majeſty intending to employ it for the defence of his kingdom, dominion of the ſeas, and ſafeguard of the merchants, eſpecially by ſuch ſhipping as are now making ready, and ſuch farther preparations for aid of his friends and allies, as need ſhall require. And whereas for ſeveral ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged, howſoever his majeſty hath ſhewed by his frequent meeting with his people, his love to the uſe of parliaments; yet the late abuſe having for the preſent driven his majeſty unwillingly out of that courſe, he ſhall account it preſumption for any to preſcribe any time to his majeſty for parliaments; the calling, continuing, and diſſolving of which, is always in the king's own power. And his majeſty ſhall be more inclinable to meet in parliament again, when his people ſhall ſee more clearly into his intents and actions; when ſuch as have bred this interruption ſhall receive their condign puniſhment, and thoſe who are miſled by them, and by ſuch ill reports as are raiſed upon this occaſion, ſhall come to a better underſtanding of his majeſty and themſelves."

About this time appeared a writing, entitled, "A propoſition for his majeſty's ſervice, to bridle the impertinency of parliaments." Very probably, if this writing had been preſented to the king, it would never have been publiſhed. Accordingly, it was afterwards declared in the ſtar chamber to be a ſeditious libel[e]. It ſerves however to ſhew, that many people thought the king was taking meaſures to throw off the yoke of parliaments, ſince he evidently followed ſome of the maxims propoſed in this writing. There was even no likelihood of his intending to call another parliament, till he had found means of having the commons more at command, as he had plainly intimated in his laſt proclamation.

Rochel being taken, the king did not think proper to continue a war with France, which could bring him no advantage, nor ſerve him for pretence to aſk money of the parliament, ſince he was determined not to call one. As France had no quarrel with him, but concerning the queen's domeſtics, which was not a ſufficient motive to continue the war, a peace was quickly concluded between the two crowns, by the mediation of the republic of Venice. It was ſigned the 14th of April, about a month after the diſſolution of the parliament. France ſo little cared for what had paſſed concerning the queen's domeſtics, that ſhe was ſatisfied with inſerting this article in the treaty of peace: "The articles and contract of the marriage of the queen of Great Britain are to be confirmed faithfully. And as for the ſaid queen's houſhold, if there be any thing to be added or diminiſhed, it ſhall be done by a mutual conſent freely and willingly, as it may be judged fit and convenient for the ſervice of the ſaid queen." The peace was ſworn in September following.

The king had now freed himſelf from the yoke of the parliament, and intended not to reſume it. But withal, he he had deprived himſelf of the ſupplies of money, which the parliaments were wont to grant to the kings, not only on urgent and extraordinary occaſions, but alſo as marks of affection and zeal, when the people were pleaſed with the government. One may venture to ſay, no prince in Europe equals in riches a king of England, who is beloved by his ſubjects. Not only his ordinary revenues, if well managed, are more than ſufficient to enable him to keep a ſplendid and magnificent court; but it is properly the ſovereign alone who has never any need to heap up money againſt any future emergencies. He finds, at all times, in the purſes of his ſubjects, and by a free gift, whatever is neceſſary to ſupport the honour of his ſtate. There is no potentate in Europe that can, like him, be ſure of never wanting money. But what muſt he do to gain the love of his people? Why, a thing the moſt practicable and eaſy, the moſt juſt, the moſt adapted to the welfare of his kingdom, and to his own intereſt. In a word, he muſt obſerve the laws to which himſelf and predeceſſors have conſented, and which were deemed neceſſary for king and people. The pride therefore and inſatiable avarice of favourites and miniſters, are the only things that make him ſometimes loſe the advantages naturally flowing from the conſtitution of the government. Theſe men, impatient of any bounds to their lawleſs ambition of governing with an abſolute ſway, ſeek all poſſible means to inſtil into their maſter a deſire to ſet himſelf above the laws, and to become like other monarchs. That is, they do all that lies in their power to change the king's true and ſolid happineſs into real miſery. For though a king of England ſhould render himſelf abſolute, he could never, by oppreſſion and violence, obtain from his people what he may freely receive, by ſubmitting to the laws and conſtitution of the government. We have ſeen in the two late reigns of William III. and queen Anne, and we daily ſee in that of the prince on the throne, ſuch undeniable proofs of what I advance, that I think it needleſs to ſay any more. I ſhall only obſerve, that the kings of England, who were the moſt famous and moſt eſteemed, as Edward I. Edward III. Henry V. Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, conſtantly followed the ſame maxims, and thereby rendered their reigns proſperous and happy. Whereas James I. Charles I. Charles II. James II. who took a contrary courſe, became miſerable, and performed nothing either for their own or the nation's glory.

Charles I. like the king his father, was very fond of arbitrary power, and had no favourites or miniſters, but what were of the ſame principles. His privy council became by degrees an abſolute court, which thought itſelf above the laws. The ſtar chamber was another court, the moſt rigorous that ever was, the ſeverity whereof fell chiefly upon thoſe who pretended to diſpute the prerogative royal. The high commiſſion perfectly ſeconded the council and ſtar chamber, and under colour of putting a ſtop to ſchiſm, oppreſſed, as puritans, thoſe that refuſed to ſubmit to a deſpotic power. In ſhort, the judges of the realm being all choſen by the court, and devoted to the king, omitted no opportunity to ſupport the prerogative royal, and raiſe it as high as the king deſired. The parliament only could cure theſe diſorders, but the king was determined to call no more, the maxims of the parliament being diametrically oppoſite to his. He thought the parliament had much incroached upon the prerogative royal in the foregoing reigns, and the parliament could not help dreading the conſequences of the general maxims, which the king was endeavouring to introduce into the government; and the rather, as they ſaw plainly, theſe conſequences were not bare ſpeculations, but were put in practice. This dread induced them to deny the king ſome things readily granted by former parliaments to his predeceſſors, becauſe they were free from any ſuch fears. But as the nation in general was more inclined to be ruled by the parliament than by the court, theſe contraſts bred in the minds of the people a diſtaſte to the court, the fatal effects whereof the king afterwards experienced.

By the diſſolution of the late parliament, and by his reſolution never to call another, which was univerſally known, the king had not only deprived himſelf of the extraordinary ſupplies he might have expected from the commons, but had alſo done himſelf great prejudice with reſpect to his treaſury. The five ſubſidies granted by the parliament, fell very ſhort of what was expected. As every man's quota towards a ſubſidy is ſettled by commiſſioners in each county, and by aſſiſtants belonging to the towns and villages, in proportion to his poſſeſſions, either poverty, or decay of trade, or ſome ſuch excuſe, was pleaded to leſſen the tax. On the other hand, the commiſſioners and aſſiſtants not being inclined to the court, allowed very readily theſe excuſes, and appeared much more apt to favour their countrymen than the king. This occaſioned a great diminution of the uſual value of the ſubſidies: moreover, tunnage and poundage were not paid without force. There was continual occaſion to uſe violence, to ſeize the effects, and impriſon the merchants, to oblige them to pay what the houſe of commons had declared illegal. Beſides, they practiſed a thouſand artifices to defraud the King of a duty, which they thought was unjuſtly laid upon them. To cure theſe inconveniencies, the council was forced to give very ſtrict orders, even to the empowering the officers of the cuſtoms to enter into any ſhip, veſſel, or houſe, and to ſearch in any trunk or cheſt, and break any bulk whatſoever, in default of the payment of cuſtoms. But beſides, that this had never been practiſed before, another inconvenience aroſe. Theſe officers, under colour of ſearching, uſed many oppreſſions and rogueries, which cauſed the people ſtill the more to exclaim. In a word, the king had not half the profit from tunnage and poundage that he received before his quarrel with the parliament, and the people were much more diſſatisfied than ever. But to hinder their diſcontent from turning into rebellion, the council gave ſtrict orders to have the militia, both horſe and foot, completed, armed, and inſtructed in the exerciſe of arms[f]. It was thereby [e] The project contained in this writing, was framed in 1613, by ſir Robert Dudley, ſon of the earl of Leiceſter. However, the earls of Bedford, Somerſet, and Clare, ſir Robert Cotton, Mr. Selden, and Mr. St. John, were committed for diſperſing it, and queſtioned in the ſtar chamber; but ſir David Fowles upon oath diſcovered the author, and ſo ended this buſineſs. intended to intimidate the people, and keep them in awe, whilſt on the other hand, they were amuſed with orders for the rigorous execution of the laws againſt recuſants. But theſe orders muſt have been neglected, ſince the people's complaints upon that ſubject never ceaſed during the whole courſe of this reign.

Mean while, as the king wanted money, and it was eaſy to foreſee, that his ordinary revenues would not be ſufficient to ſupply his expences, the miniſters found no better way to increaſe the king's revenue, than by granting monopolies. That is, the king, by his letters patents, formed companies, to whom alone he gave the privilege of ſelling certain goods or wares, and who were to pay him for it ſuch a yearly revenue. This was directly contrary to the rights of the people, and very deſtructive to trade: but in thoſe days, the good of the nation was what the court had leaſt in view. This abuſe went ſo far, that in a manner all ſort of commodities were monopolized, and the ſale engroſſed by ſome company, even to old rags. I ſhall not here ſpecify theſe monopolies, becauſe, not having been all eſtabliſhed at once, they will perhaps be mentioned hereafter[z].

[1630] Since the king had undertaken to break with France, the Spaniſh war was no more talked upon than if there had been no ſuch thing, though in all the ſpeeches to the foregoing parliaments, and in all the meſſages to the commons, he had endeavoured to ſhew how neceſſary this war was for the welfare of all Europe, and eſpecially of England. He had frequently inſinuated, that England and Ireland were in ſo great danger of being invaded by the Spaniards, that it was not poſſible to be too ſpeedy in applying a remedy to ſo urgent an evil. And yet, the Spaniards never made any attempt that might confirm the fears the king would have inſpired the parliament with. The king of Spain, contented with not being attacked, undertook nothing againſt England, knowing he was in no danger from that quarter. However, after the concluſion of the peace between France and England, he thought proper to end the war with the Engliſh, to which he met with no obſtacle, Charles not being in condition to continue it. So a peace between the two crowns, after ſome negotiations, was concluded in November 1630.

Preſbyterianiſm had lately gained ground in England, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of the biſhops, and particularly of Laud biſhop of London, ſworn enemy to the puritans. This prelate ſeldom miſſed any opportunity to ſhew his hatred to them, and ſuch opportunities very frequently offered. Beſides that he was the king's moſt intimate counſellor, eſpecially for eccleſiaſtical matters, he had almoſt the ſole direction of the high commiſſion, after the archbiſhop of Canterbury was excluded on account of Sibthorp's ſermon. He ſo managed therefore, to prevent the growth of preſbyterianiſm, that the king ſent certain inſtructions to the archbiſhops, with a command to impart them to the biſhops of their provinces, in order to their being obſerved. The chief end of theſe inſtructions was to hinder any preſbyterian miniſter from creeping into the church of England, and to diſcover the careleſs obſervers of the rights preſcribed by the canons. Laud himſelf was the author of theſe inſtructions, which were agreeable to ſome conſiderations, for the better ſettling of the church government, preſented by him to the king ſome time before. As the preſbyterians were not ignorant from whence the evil ſprung, they entertained an implacable enmity to that prelate, the effects whereof they made him feel afterwards, when they found an opportunity.

This year the king had the ſatisfaction of having a ſon called Charles, of whom the queen was delivered the 29th of May.

Guſtavus Adolphus king of Sweden, had expreſſed a great deſire to relieve Germany, oppreſſed by the emperor, but his wars with Poland had prevented the execution of his deſign. Upon that account the kings of France and England joined together to procure a peace between theſe two crowns, in which they ſucceeded at laſt. The French king's aim was to humble the houſe of Auſtria by this diverſion; and Charles hoped, that by the king of Sweden's means, he ſhould recover the Palatinate for his brother-in-law. The peace I have juſt mentioned, was no ſooner concluded, than the king of Sweden prepared to enter Germany at the head of a powerful army. At the ſame time he made a private agreement with the king of England, whereby Charles engaged to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men, in the marquis of Hamilton's name, as if that lord had raiſed theſe troops at his own charge. Theſe articles ſeldom deceive: but however they give the princes who uſe them, the aſſurance to ſay, it is done againſt their conſent. That I may not return to this affair, I ſhall ſay here in two words, Charles was the dupe of Guſtavus. When the Swede, after ſeveral victories over the Imperialiſts, was able in his turn to aſſiſt the king of Bohemia, he would have laid ſuch hard terms upon him, that he could not think of accepting them. So Charles withdrew his troops, which had done good ſervice in the war, and recalled ſir Henry Van, who was with the king of Sweden in quality of ambaſſador. Thus ended this ſort of league, the particulars whereof I think it needleſs to relate, ſince it cauſed no alteration in the affairs of this reign.

I return now to domeſtic affairs. The king's ordinary revenues not ſufficing for his expences, it was neceſſary to find means to raiſe a further ſupply. One of theſe means was, to attack ſuch as had neglected to receive the order of knighthood at the king's coronation, though they had been ſummoned. It was an ancient cuſtom, from the conqueſt, that ſuch as had 15l. a year in land, where obliged to ſerve the king in his wars; and thoſe who were not capable of ſerving, compounded with the king, and for a certain ſum were releaſed from that ſervice. To this end, thoſe who were worth 15l. a year, were to be made knights, that is, fit to ſerve the king. In proceſs of time, the number of thoſe who were to take the order of knighthood, was limited to ſuch as had 20l. a year. What was at firſt but a bare cuſtom, was turned into a law in the reign of Edward II. and after that ſome of the following kings took advantage of it, as may be ſeen in Rymer's Collection of Public Acts. But in general, though this ſtatute was not aboliſhed, it had however been long diſuſed. Charles I. going upon the ſtatute's being ſtill in force, ſince it was never expreſly repealed, put it in practice at his coronation, and pretended to uſe great condeſcenſion, in ſummoning to take knighthood ſuch only as had 40l. a year, though at that time 40l. were much leſs than 20l. in the days of Edward II. He found but very few willing to obey theſe ſummons, the uſe whereof was entirely forgotten. The king himſelf overlooked this non-compliance, perhaps for fear it might be ſome prejudice to him with regard to the ſupplies he was to aſk of the parliament. But after the diſſolution of the third parliament, he did not think himſelf obliged to the ſame caution. He appointed therefore commiſſioners to compound with thoſe who had neglected to appear, as well for their contempt, as for being excuſed from receiving the order of knighthood. The commiſſioners had this inſtruction, "To take no leſs than after the rate of thrice and half as much, as the perſons compounding were found rated in the ſubſidy." Multitudes being ſummoned upon this occaſion, the compoſitions brought the king above a 100,000l. This was looked upon afterwards as a grievous oppreſſion, and the parliament repealed the ſtatute on which it was grounded.

I have already ſpoken of biſhop Laud's extraordinary zeal for the church of England. This church at the reformation, thought fit to retain ſome ceremonies, not as abſolutely neceſſary, but rather as indifferent, and which conſequently ſhe believed it not proper to remove from the divine ſervice. Laud was not only ſcrupulouſly attached to theſe ceremonies, but alſo to every thing that ſerved to adorn the externals of religion, and ſeemed more inclined to increaſe the number, than ſuppreſs any of thoſe that moſt offended the puritans. He gave a proof of this inclination, when he conſecrated St. Catharine Creed church, which had been lately repaired. On this occaſion he uſed ſome formalities which he might have forborne, as being too like what is practiſed in the church of Rome on ſuch ſolemnities. The manner of conſecration was thus:

[1631] "At the biſhop's approach to the weſt door of the church, ſome that were prepared for it, cried with a loud voice, 'Open, open, ye everlaſting doors, that the king of glory may enter in!' And preſently the doors were opened: and the biſhop, with ſome doctors, and many other principal men went in, and immediately falling down upon his knees, with eyes lifted up, and his arms ſpread abroad, uttered theſe words: 'This place is holy, the ground is holy. In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, I pronounce it holy.'

"Then he took up ſome of the duſt, and threw it up into the air ſeveral times, in his going up towards the chancel. When they approached near to the rail and communion-table, the biſhop bowed towards it ſeveral times; and returning, they went round the church in proceſſion, ſaying

z Thus, as the lord Clarendon obſerves, "unjuſt projects of all kinds, many ridiculous, many ſcandalous, all very grievous, were ſet on foot; the envy and reproach of which came to the king, the profit to other men; inſomuch that of 200,000l. drawn by theſe ways in one year, ſcarce 1500 l. came to the king." tom. the 100th Pſalm; after that the 19th Pſalm, and then ſaid a form of prayer, 'Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.' and concluding, 'We conſecrate this church, and ſeparate it unto thee, as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common uſe.'

"After this the biſhop, being near the communion-table, and taking a written book in his hand, pronounced curſes upon thoſe that ſhould afterwards prophane that holy place, by muſters of ſoldiers, or keeping prophane law courts, or carrying burdens through it; and at the end of every curſe, he bowed towards the eaſt, and ſaid, 'Let all the people ſay, Amen.'

"When the curſes were ended, he pronounced a number of bleſſings upon all thoſe that had any hand in framing and building of that ſacred and beautiful church, and thoſe that had given, and ſhould hereafter give any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utenſils; and at the end of every bleſſing, he bowed towards the eaſt, ſaying, 'Let all the people ſay, Amen.'

"After this followed the ſermon; which being ended, the biſhop conſecrated and adminiſtered the ſacrament in manner following:

"As he approached the communion-table, he made many ſeveral lowly bowings, and coming up to the ſide of the table where the bread and wine were covered, he bowed ſeven times, and then, after the reading of many prayers, he came near the bread, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin wherein the bread was laid, and when he beheld the bread, he laid it down again, flew back a ſtep or two, bowed three ſeveral times towards it, then he drew near again, and opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

"Then he laid his hand on the cup, which was full of wine, with a cover upon it, which he let go again, went back, and bowed thrice towards it; then he came near again, and lifting up the cover of the cup, looked into it, and ſeeing the wine, he let fall the cover again, retired back, and bowed as before; then he received the ſacrament, and gave it to ſome principal men; after which many prayers being ſaid, the ſolemnity of the conſecration ended."

If Laud had taken all theſe ceremonies, both in the conſecration of the church, and in the adminiſtration of the ſacrament, from a ritual of the church of England, made ſince the reformation, there would have been nothing to object. But ſome years after, the houſe of commons accuſed him in form, of having exactly copied the Roman Pontifical, which was found in his ſtudy. He denied it, alleging two ſeemingly very frivolous reaſons. Firſt, that the pontifical preſcribes aſhes to be thrown up by the biſhop who conſecrates the church, whereas he threw up duſt in the air, which he found on the ground [h]. Secondly, that he obſerved a form communicated to him by biſhop Andrews. But as there is ſo little difference between duſt and aſhes, and as biſhop Andrews's form agreed with that of the pontifical, this anſwer was not much approved. However this be, it cannot be denied, that it was affectation to uſe on this occaſion, both for conſecrating the church, and adminiſtering the ſacrament, a different form from that of the church of England, and to chuſe one ſo very like the Roman pontifical. This gave his enemies a great advantage, who took occaſion from it, to charge him with an intention to introduce popery. But he little regarded what could be ſaid againſt him. The king's favour had raiſed him ſo high, that it was not in the power of his enemies to hurt him, but on the contrary, he had frequent opportunities to be revenged of them. Whilſt he was moſt exclaimed againſt, three doctors in divinity of the univerſity of Oxford, having preached againſt Arminianiſm, were expelled the univerſity, and ſome others who had undertaken their defence, were turned out of their offices. This was under colour of obſerving the king's proclamation, and it was not doubted but Laud was the author of theſe violent proceedings [i].

In the mean time, the king's miniſters were diligently ſeeking means to raiſe money, and new projects were every day offered, of which they choſe ſuch as they thought proper. Among theſe means, monopolies, as I ſaid, were at firſt moſt in vogue. In the beginning of the year 1632, the king by his patent under the great ſeal, incorporated the ſoap-makers. It is ſaid this patent alone was worth to him 10,000l. [k]. There was another company ſettled for making of cards, of whom the king bought them at 18s. a groſs, and ſealing them, ſold them again. But I ſhould be too tedious was I to mention all the monopolies made in this reign by the king's authority [l].

[1632] Monopolies were not however the only way practiſed to raiſe money. Several other methods were found. Shortly after, the kings by proclamation commanded all lords, gentlemen, clergymen, and others whoſe ſtay in London was not abſolutely neceſſary, to depart within forty days, and reſide in their reſpective counties, and at their manſion houſes. This injuction ſeemed to be grounded upon the king's deſire to hinder the nobility and gentry from waſting their eſtates by a needleſs reſidence in London, where they were obliged to be at great expence. But it was perceived afterwards, that the king had another end in it, when ſuch were ſummoned before the ſtar chamber as had neglected to obey the proclamation, and were condemned in grievous fines to the king's uſe. At the ſame time, the king appointed commiſſioners to puniſh thoſe that, contrary to former prohibitions, had enlarged the city of London by new buildings. From all this the king drew very conſiderable ſums, the fines in which the offenders were condemned being all to his uſe. The ſtar chamber exerciſed great rigour on theſe occaſions.

About the ſame time, the city of London was fined fifteen hundred marks, becauſe the mayor and aldermen had neglected to take inquiſition of the death of one Dr. Lamb, who paſſed for a conjurer, and of whom the duke of Buckingham had made uſe, but for what purpoſe I know not. This man being eighty years of age, was purſued by the mob from ſtreet to ſtreet, and died within a few days, either of the fatigue he had endured, or of the bruiſes he had received.

I have already obſerved, that preſbyterianiſm, or, as it was then called, puritaniſm, daily gained ground, notwithſtanding the endeavours uſed by the king, biſhops, high-commiſſion, ſtar chamber, and courts of juſtice, to ſtop its progreſs. As theſe endeavours conſiſted not in better informing the preſbyterians, but only in the great ſeverity exerciſed upon them, when their zeal cauſed them to offend, they were the more exaſperated againſt the church of England, as they ſaw at the ſame time, that the Arminians and papiſts were left unmoleſted, or if orders were ſometimes given againſt them, ſuch orders were never executed. This made them exclaim againſt the biſhops, and charge them with deſign to introduce popery and Arminianiſm into the church. Unhappily, they imputed to the whole church of England, the violences which ought to have been aſcribed to the circumſtances of the times, and the particular character of ſome biſhops, who having credit at court, intimated to the king, that nothing was more oppoſite to regal authority, than preſbyterian church-government. All who were not very ſubmiſſive to the king, were conſidered as puritans, and as ſuch frequently oppreſſed. So, by a fatal policy, men well-affected to the church of England, but enemies to arbitrary power, were forced againſt their wills to join with the puritans, in order to ſtrengthen their party, and enable them to oppoſe the deſigns of the court. I am perſuaded, this conduct gave puritaniſm many adherents, which otherwiſe it would never have had. What makes me of this opinion is, that preſbyterianiſm never made ſo great a progreſs as during the firſt fifteen years of this reign, though it had never been more perſecuted. After all, this conduct is not to be aſcribed to the church of England. We do not find in her principles and doctrines, any thing repugnant to charity, or tending to violence; but it was wholly owing to the character and deſigns of the court prelates, of the king's miniſters and counſellors, who meant to carry the royal authority to the higheſt degree. They thought nothing would more conduce to that end, than the humbling, or rather the utter ruin of the puritans, and unfortunately conſidered as ſuch, all that oppoſed their [h] Laud's words in Ruſhworth are: "Whereas it was ſaid, I threw up duſt in the air, this I deny; and where it was alleged that it was in imitation of the Roman pontifical, that (ſaid he) is a miſtake, for the pontifical preſcribes aſhes, not duſt, to be caſt abroad." However, it was expreſly depoſed by two witneſſes, that he threw up duſt. Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 78. 79.

[i] Laud was choſen chancellor of Oxford, April 12, in the room of William earl of Pembroke, who died of an apoplexy, April 10. Mr. Thomas Ford of Maudlin-college, Mr. Giles Hodges of Exeter-college, and Mr. Giles Thorn of Baliol, being ſummoned before the vice chancellor, appealed from him to the proctors: Mr. Atherton Bruch of Brazen-noze, and Mr. John Doughty of Merton, who received their appeals, were turned out of their offices, and Ford, Hodges, and Thorn, expelled. The cauſe was tried before the king at Woodſtock, Auguſt 23. Ibid. p. 210.

design, according to king James's maxim. Hence it happened, that by confounding thus the ſtate puritans with the church puritans, they compelled, as I may ſay, the firſt to join with the laſt.

The deſign of ruining preſbyterianiſm deſtroyed all regard to the ſcruples of tender conſciences, even in things of little moment, left by the reformers in the public worſhip rather as indifferent, than as abſolutely neceſſary. On the contrary, every thing that gave moſt offence to the preſbyterians, was not only induſtriouſly practiſed, but alſo repreſented as neceſſary, and ſeveral novelties added which were apt to widen the breach, and make an union impracticable. Of this the reader will hereafter be convinced. But before I leave this ſubject, I cannot forbear to relate a fact which clearly proves what I have advanced.

There was in the city of Saliſbury a collegiate church, called St. Edmond's, which with its revenues, like the reſt of that kind, came by act of parliament into the hands of Henry VIII. and remained in the crown till the reign of James I. who ſold it to a private perſon, and he to another, ſo that it paſſed ſucceſſively through ſeveral hands, till at length the laſt proprietor ſold the church to the pariſhioners of St. Edmond's, who repaired and made it the pariſh church. The windows, which had till then been preſerved, were painted after the old faſhion, and contained among other things the hiſtory of the creation, where the painter, had repreſented God the father in the form of an old man, creating the world during the firſt ſix days, but on the ſeventh had painted him ſitting, to denote the day of reſt. The ignorant painter had committed ſeveral blunders, having given to one day the work performed on another, and in expreſſing the creation of the ſun and moon, had put in God's hand a pair of compaſſes, as if he was going to meaſure them. Henry Sherfield recorder of Sarum, and pariſhioner of St. Edmond's, having called a veſtry, repreſented to the pariſhioners, that theſe pictures gave offence, and were apt to lead the people to ſuperſtition. That the painter had committed ſeveral errors, and beſides the repreſentation of God the father in the form of an old man, offended the eyes of good Chriſtians. Whereupon the veſtry thought proper to take down the windows [m], and put up others not painted in their place. Armed with this order, the recorder ſends for a glazier, and ſhewing him with his ſtick the glaſs which was to be changed, broke ſome of the panes, as little caring to preſerve them.

Upon this outrage, an information is exhibited againſt Sherfield in the ſtar chamber by the attorney general, ſhewing that contrary to the canons, which forbid any private perſon to alter or innovate any thing in the fabric or ornament of a church without ſpecial licence from his majeſty or the biſhop of the dioceſe, Sherfield being ill-affected to the diſcipline of the church of England, and the government thereof by biſhops, did combine with ſome others of the ſame opinion, and undertake, by a bare order of the veſtry, and in contempt of the king and the dioceſan, to break down the windows of St. Edmond's church, which contained excellent pictures of the creation, made hundreds of years ſince, and were a great ornament to the church. That he committed this profane act contrary to the order of the biſhop, who by letter had enjoined him to deſiſt from that deſign. That by this ill example, other wicked and ſchiſmatical perſons ill-affected to the government of the church of England under his majeſty, might be encouraged to uſe the like violent courſes.

Sherfield anſwered, that the church of St. Edmond's was a lay-fee, and had ſo continued ever ſince it fell to the crown, and therefore it was legally exempted from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of the dioceſe. That conſequently thoſe who had purchaſed the church, had lawful power to alter the windows, as they had before made other alterations, in the ſteeple, walls, pulpit, and other parts, without any complaints from the biſhop. That after all, he had only taken down ſome ſmall quarries of glaſs to ſhew the glazier what was to be altered, and that the hiſtory of the creation might ſtill be plainly diſcovered. That the painting was ſo far from being fine, that when it was done, it did not coſt above forty ſhillings. Then he ſet forth the groſs blunders of the painter; and proved, by acts of parliament made in the reign of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, that all pictures ſhall be removed out of the churches. Finally, he denied that he was ill-affected to the government of the church under biſhops, or had acted in contempt of the king, or ever received a letter from the biſhop of Saliſbury upon the ſubject. Whereupon the biſhop of London ſaid, that he did not pretend to juſtify the errors of the painter, but only to obſerve to the court, that God being called in ſcripture, "the Ancient of Days," might be the occaſion of the painter's repreſenting God the father like an old man [n]. But that Sherfield was much more to blame than the painter, for daring to make alterations without licenſe. In ſhort, Sherfield was fined five hundred pounds, contrary to the opinion of ſome of his judges, who would have mounted his fine to a thouſand, and condemned to make a public acknowledgment of his fault before ſuch perſons as the biſhop ſhould chuſe to name [o]. I thought myſelf obliged to relate this inſtance, in order to ſhew what methods were taken to ruin preſbyterianiſm. It is eaſy to perceive, that ſuch ſeverities could not but produce very ill effects amongſt the people, and alienate them from, inſtead of reconciling them to, the church of England.

In the account I have given of the third parliament held in this reign, I had ſometimes occaſion to ſpeak of Sir Thomas Wentworth, knight of the ſhire for the county of York. This gentleman, ſeveral times in the houſe of commons, gave proofs of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privileges of the parliament. By that he became formidable to the court, though he took care not to run into any exceſs with regard to the king and his miniſter. On the contrary, he always ſoftened his opinions with ſome honourable and reſpectful expreſſions, but however ſeldom failed to oppoſe the pretenſions of the court. As he was one of the greateſt geniuſes then in England, the king ſoon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very ſerviceable to him, if he could gain him to his intereſt. He endeavoured it therefore after, or perhaps before the diſſolution of the parliament, and ſucceeded ſo well, that Wentworth became one of the moſt zealous promoters of the royal authority, or rather the deſpotic power the king had a mind to eſtabliſh [p]. Upon this account, the king thought him the fitteſt perſon to be intruſted with the preſidentſhip of the council in the north. As this is one of the grievances complained of by the Engliſh againſt Charles I. and one of the moſt noted occaſions wherein that prince diſcovered his deſign to ſet up an unlimited power, it will be neceſſary briefly to ſhew what this council in the north was, and the uſe the king would have made of it to ſubject his people to a deſpotic power.

Upon the ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries in the 27th year of the reign of Henry VIII. there were, for two or three years together, ſeveral inſurrections in the north. Mean while, as Henry VIII. did not intend to ſtop there, but meant alſo to ſuppreſs all the reſt of the monaſteries, he thought proper to take ſome care to prevent the like inſurrections in thoſe parts. To that end, he eſtabliſhed at York a court of juſtice, under the ſpecious pretence of eaſing his poor ſubjects, who had not wherewithal to proſecute their ſuits in the courts of Weſtminſter. But his real intent was, that this court ſhould have an eye upon the proceedings of the northern lords and gentlemen who were ſuſpected, in order to puniſh them immediately, in caſe it was perceived they were endeavouring to raiſe any freſh inſurrections. A commiſſion therefore was granted to the biſhop of Landaff, the firſt preſident, and others, by virtue whereof was eſtabliſhed this new council in the north, otherwiſe called the court of York. The juriſdiction of this court extended over Yorkſhire, Northumberland, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, the biſhopric of Durham, the county of the cities of York, Kingſton upon Hull, and Newcaſtle upon Tine. The king's commiſſion was no other than a commiſſion of oyer and terminer, with an additional clauſe, whereby the council was impowered to hear all cauſes, real and perſonal, when one or both of the parties, by reaſon of their poverty, could not proſecute their rights, according to the laws of the land. This clauſe, though illegal, produced no ill effect nor any complaint, whether the new court exerciſed that part of the commiſſion at all, or only ſo ſparingly, that the poor found eaſe and benefit by it.

In the firſt year of the reign of king James I. a commiſſion was granted to the lord Sheffield preſident of the court of

Among

York, which varied not from the former, only it had reference to inſtructions which the king was to ſend him. It is not known whether theſe inſtructions were ſent; but it is evident, that in making the power of the court to depend on the king's inſtructions, the intent was, that its deciſions ſhould not be made ſo much according to the laws, as according to his majeſty's private orders. And indeed king James in the ſeventh year of his reign granted a new commiſſion to the ſame lord Sheffield, omitting theſe two clauſes, which were in the firſt, that they ſhould inquire "per ſacramentum bonorum et legalium hominum," and hear and determine, "ſecundum leges Angliæ." Thus the power of the court was limited only by the particular inſtructions, which were the firſt that appear to have been ſent thither.

From that time, whenever the commiſſion was renewed, which was upon every change of preſident or counſellor, the king ſent new inſtructions, tending to render the court of York independent, not only of the courts of Weſtminſter, which are the courts of the whole kingdom, but even of all ſorts of laws. Charles I. renewed this commiſſion in favour of the lord Wentworth, with a more ample power than any of his predeceſſors had been inveſted with. In 1632, a clauſe was added, whereby, among other things, authority was committed to him to hear and determine all offences and miſdemeanors, ſuits, debates, controverſies and demands, cauſes, things and matters whatſoever contained in the inſtructions annexed to the commiſſion. But what were theſe inſtructions [q]? In the parliament of 1640, Mr. Edward Hyde, then member of the houſe of commons, and afterwards earl of Clarendon, being ſent by the houſe to the lords, concerning the court of York, ſaid in his ſpeech to them, that in the inſtructions of 1632 and 1637, containing fifty-eight articles, "there was ſcarce one that was not againſt or beſide the law." From whence he took occaſion to aſk, "What have the good northern people done, that they only muſt be disfranchiſed of all their privileges, and be governed according to the diſcretion of the court of York?" Nay, though this court might proceed according to diſcretion, ſpecial proviſion was made in the king's inſtructions, that no fine, no puniſhment, ſhould be leſs than by law appointed [r].

This court was aboliſhed afterwards by the ſame parliament of 1640.

The king having governed three or four years without a parliament, was very much at eaſe. His will, by degrees, began to paſs for law; there was no houſe of commons to complain publicly, and he ſaw none about him but ſuch as were always ready to flatter him, and cheriſh his principles concerning government. On the other hand, he was freed from the incumbrance and expence of a war, which had created him great trouble, and rendered him too dependent on the parliament. In ſhort, though he was not ignorant that in general the people were diſcontented, he did not ſee any appearance of rebellion, the great men of the kingdom and the neighbouring princes being ſo diſpoſed, as to give no encouragement to thoſe who ſhould attempt to diſturb the ſtate. His affairs being in this ſituation, he believed he could not take a properer time to go into Scotland, were three important affairs required his preſence. Firſt, he had a mind to be crowned. 2. He intended to hold a parliament for procuring of money. 3. He deſigned to take ſome meaſures there for the execution of a project long ſince formed, to reduce the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England, and entirely ruin preſbyterianiſm. To this end it was, that he took with him Laud, biſhop of London, and at his arrival in Scotland, made him privy-counſellor of that kingdom. He departed therefore from London the 13th of May 1633, and being come to Edinburgh, was crowned with the uſual ſolemnities. After that he held a parliament, which gave him the largeſt ſubſidy that had ever been granted to any king of Scotland before him [s]. The third point concerning religion requires ſome explanation. But as I intend to ſpeak more fully of it hereafter, I ſhall only ſay here what is abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the king's deſign.

[1633] The reformation was eſtabliſhed in Scotland in the reign of queen Mary, mother of James I. upon the plan of the churches of Geneva and Switzerland. The hierarchy was entirely ſuppreſſed, and the government of the church committed to preſbyters and national ſynods, called in Scotland General Aſſemblies. But however, the biſhops were ſtill continued, though diveſted of all eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction: they retained only their revenues, lands, houſes, ſeat in parliament, and all the temporal advantages in general that were annexed to the epiſcopal dignity. From the beginning of the reformation, that is from the year 1561, to the end of the ſixteenth century, the ſtate of the biſhops underwent ſeveral revolutions, of which I ſhall ſay nothing here, becauſe I deſign to ſpeak of them elſewhere. It ſuffices to ſay at preſent that James I. becoming king of England, found means to cauſe the parliament of Scotland to reſtore epiſcopacy to its former luſtre, and give the biſhops their ancient juriſdiction over the church. This was the firſt ſtep to lead the kirk of Scotland to the deſired point, that is, to a perfect conformity with the church of England. But the tedious treaty of his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh infanta, and the affairs of Bohemia and the Palatinate, hindered him from fully executing his project. Charles I. had this work no leſs at heart than the king his father: but as in the beginning of his reign he was engaged in a war with Spain, and afterwards with France, and moreover his diſputes with his parliaments affording him little leiſure to think of other matters, he could not ſeriouſly ſet about this affair till after the others were ended. In the parliament at Edinburgh, in the year 1633, among other acts that were preſented to be paſſed, there were two, namely, An act anent (or concerning) his majeſty's royal prerogative and apparel of kirkmen; an act of ratification of the acts touching of religion. Theſe were the only acts that met with any oppoſition, on account of the conſequences which ſome feared the king would hereafter draw from them. The firſt of theſe acts was properly but a confirmation of a like act paſſed in the reign of king James VI. impowering his majeſty to order the veſtments of the clergy as he pleaſed. Now as from that time the deſign of altering the diſcipline of the kirk of Scotland had ſhewed itſelf more and more, ſome of the members of this parliament ſuſpected the king would make uſe of that act to introduce the ſurplice. And indeed, being aſked whether he intended it, he made no anſwer, but taking a liſt of the whole members out of his pocket, ſaid, "Gentlemen, I have all your names here, and I will know who will do me ſervice, and who will not, this day." However, about thirteen noblemen and as many barons and burgeſſes declared that they agreed to the act for his majeſty's prerogative, but diſſented from that part of it as to the apparel of kirkmen.

The other act which I mentioned, was expreſſed in the following manner: "Our ſovereign lord, with the advice and conſent of the eſtates, ratifies and approves all and whatſoever acts and ſtatutes made before, anent the liberty and freedom of the true kirk of God, and religion preſently profeſſed within this realm, and ordains the ſame to ſtand in their full force and effect, as if they were ſpecially mentioned and ſet down therein."

I have already ſaid, that in the reign of James VI. and eſpecially after his acceſſion to England, he made ſeveral innovations in the kirk of Scotland, particularly with reſpect to the epiſcopal juriſdiction which had been reſtored. The whole artifice of this act conſiſted therefore in theſe words, "the religion at preſent profeſſed;" for thereby were confirmed all the innovations in the diſcipline of the kirk of Scotland, to which the oppoſers of the act would not agree. They were very willing to ratify the acts made in favour of religion, as eſtabliſhed by an act paſſed in the ſixth year of James VI. when the biſhops had no power or juriſdiction, but would not admit theſe words, "at preſent profeſſed." During theſe conteſts, the king ſaid, with ſome emotion, "I will have no diſtinction, but command you to ſay, I or No." Whereupon the diſſenting lords and gentlemen ſaid, No. However the two acts paſſed by a majority of votes. Some affirmed afterwards, that fraud was uſed in gathering the votes: however, the king's eagerneſs to have theſe two acts paſſed, convinced the people of Scotland that the project of making greater innovations in the kirk ſtill ſubſiſted, and that the two acts were a ſort of preparitive to accompliſh it.

[q] Among other matters in the inſtructions, the ſaid preſident was to hear and determine, according to the courſe of proceedings in the ſtar chamber, divers offences, deceits, and falſities, whether the ſame were provided by act of parliament, or not. Likewiſe to hear and determine, according to the courſe of proceedings in the court of chancery, all manner of complaints, as well concerning lands, tenements and hereditaments, &c. and to ſtay proceedings in the courts of common law by injunction, or otherwiſe, as is uſed in the courts of chancery. And that no prohibition ſhall be granted at all, but in caſes where the preſident exceeded the limits of the ſaid inſtructions. And that if a Habeas Corpus be granted, the party was not to be diſcharged till he performed the decree of the council. Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 158.

[r] "But, added Mr. Hide, as much greater as your diſcretion ſhall think fit. And indeed, ſays he, in this improvement we find arbitrary courts are very pregnant. If the law require my good behaviour, this diſcretion makes me cloſe priſoner: if the law ſets me in the pillory, this diſcretion appoints me to leave my ears there. And ſuch confuſion hath this diſcretion in theſe inſtructions produced, as if diſcretion were only to act with rage and fury." See the whole ſpeech in Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 162. where the reader will find a narrative of the foundation, progreſs, and growth of this court.

[s] This ſubſidy was 30s. of every pound worth of land, for ſix years: and alſo the ſixteenth penny of all annual rents, of intereſt of money, and for ſix years as the former. Ibid. tom. II. p. 182.

The

On the other hand, the oppoſition the king met with, ſhewed him it was not yet time to act openly, and that it was neceſſary to take other meaſures to facilitate the ſucceſs of his deſigns [t].

If it was endeavoured in Scotland to ruin preſbyterianiſm by indirect ways, it was thought proper to proceed in England with leſs caution: accordingly, all poſſible efforts were uſed to deſtroy it utterly, by perſecuting the puritans, for whom there was not the leaſt condeſcenſion. The court and biſhops laid it down for a rule, not to depart on their account from one tittle of what was practiſed in the church of England, for fear they ſhould grow too powerful, and the indulgence ſhewn them prove detrimental to the church. But there was a ſtronger reaſon, namely, the implacable hatred conceived of them by the king, his miniſters, and, above all, by the biſhops of London and Wincheſter, which made them earneſtly ſeek all occaſions to oppreſs them: and theſe occaſions were eaſy to be found. They had only to preſs the obſervation of the canons, without diſpenſing with one article, in order to cauſe the preſbyterians to commit offences which expoſed them to the rigour of the eccleſiaſtical and civil laws. But as the biſhops could not be every where, and wanted people to inform them of what paſſed, Walter Curle biſhop of Wincheſter, bethought himſelf, in his primary viſitation, to oblige by oath the church-wardens and other officers to turn informers, that none might eſcape their enquiry. The oath was as follows:

"You ſhall ſwear, that you and every of you, without all affection, favour, hatred, hope of reward and gain, or fear of diſpleaſure or malice of any perſon, ſhall preſent all and every ſuch perſon or perſons, of or within your pariſh, who hath committed any offence, fault, or crime, or omitted any part of duty, which be enjoined to perform: wherein you ſhall deal uprightly and according to truth; neither of malice preſenting any contrary to truth, nor of corrupt affection ſparing to preſent any, and to conceal the truth; having in this action God before your eyes, with an earneſt zeal to maintain truth, and ſuppreſs vice. So help you God, and the contents of this book."

With this oath were delivered certain inſtructions, according to which they were to proceed.

"1. As to the articles concerning the church, they are to enquire, whether they have the Book of Conſtitutions, or Canons eccleſiaſtical, and a parchment Regiſter-book, Book of Common Prayer, and Book of Homilies, &c.? And whether the communion-table be placed in ſuch convenient ſort within the ſaid chancel or church, as that the miniſter may be beſt heard in his prayer and adminiſtration?

"2. As to the articles concerning the clergy, whether doth the miniſter read the Conſtitutions ſet forth by his majeſty once every year?

"3. Whether the miniſter or preacher uſed to pray for the king's majeſty with his whole title, as king of Great Britain? And doth he in like manner pray for the archbiſhops and biſhops? And doth he obſerve all the orders, rites, and ceremonies preſcribed in the Common Prayer, and adminiſtring the ſacrament? And whether doth the miniſter receive the ſacrament, kneeling at the ſame, and adminiſtreth to none but ſuch as do kneel, as by the XIIth Canon is directed?

"4. Whether hath the miniſter admitted to the communion any notorious offenders or ſchiſmatics, contrary to the XXVIth and XXVIIth conſtitution? And whether ſtrangers of any other pariſh do come often and commonly to your church, from their own pariſh-church, contrary to the XXVIIIth Canon? And whether doth the miniſter uſe to ſign the children with the ſign of the croſs when they are baptized? And whether is your miniſter a licenſed miniſter? If yea, then by whom? And whether doth the miniſter wear the ſurplice whilſt he is ſaying the public prayers, and adminiſtring the ſacraments? Whether doth the miniſter catechize and inſtruct the youth of ignorant perſons of your pariſh in the Ten Commandments, &c.? And whether he doth ſolemnize marriage, the banes not being three ſeveral Sundays and holidays firſt publiſhed in time of divine ſervice? And whether doth your miniſter in the Rogation-days uſe the perambulation of the circuit of the pariſh? Whether doth the miniſter every ſix months denounce in the pariſh all ſuch as do perſevere in the ſentence of excommunication, not ſeeking to be abſolved? Or hath he admitted any excommunicated perſon into the church, without certificate and abſolution? Whether is your miniſter a favourer of recuſants, whereby he may be ſuſpected not to be ſincere in religion? Whether is your miniſter noted to be an incontinent perſon, a frequenter of taverns, ale-houſes, a common gameſter, a player of dice, &c.?" With divers other articles of enquiry.

Hence may be ſeen how very careful the biſhop of Wincheſter was to hinder any preſbyterian miniſters from getting into the church of England. But though the oath enjoined by this prelate was a real outrage upon the laws, the parliament alone having power to preſcribe ſuch oaths, none dared to attack him directly. The preſbyterians were ſure to meet with no encouragement from the court; on the contrary, their diſlike of a thing was a ſufficient reaſon with the court ſtrenuouſly to ſupport it. Of this I ſhall give two very remarkable proofs. The preſbyterians were offended at the feaſts of the dedications of churches, commonly called Wakes or Ales, becauſe they were only occaſions of riot and debauchery, and becauſe theſe days ſeldom paſſed without ſome diſorders. In Somerſetſhire, where theſe revels abounded, the lord chief juſtice Richardſon and baron Denham, in their circuits, made an order, with the general conſent of the whole bench, that theſe revels ſhould be ſuppreſſed [u]: but the chief juſtice being commanded to attend the council-board, was ſeverely reprimanded, and enjoined to revoke the order made at the aſſizes. A ſecond proof of what I advanced was this:

The preſbyterians, notwithſtanding the late king's proclamation, affecting ſtill to forbid their ſervants to be preſent at theſe revels, or to uſe any recreations publicly on Sundays after divine ſervice, the king renewed and confirmed the proclamation publiſhed by his father, commanding that the people ſhould not be troubled or moleſted in their recreations. The court was afraid, that by degrees a maxim, deemed by them prejudicial to their intereſt, would be eſtabliſhed, namely, that when a cuſtom, not ill in itſelf, occaſioned abuſes, it ought to be aboliſhed. This maxim ſeeming to them too general, becauſe it might be applied to things of great conſequence, they oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power.

George Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying this year, 1633, William Laud, biſhop of London, ſucceeded him in that dignity [w].

This year the queen was delivered of a ſecond ſon, in October, who was called James, and created duke of York.

The preſbyterians were poſſeſſed, that a project was formed to re-eſtabliſh the Romiſh religion in England. This notion in general ought not to ſeem ſtrange, ſince it is certain that from the reformation this project had never been interrupted; but the authors of it muſt be carefully diſtinguiſhed. Had the preſbyterians been ſatisfied with believing that ſome private Roman catholics had formed ſuch a deſign, it may be affirmed they would not have been miſtaken; but they went much farther: they imagined that the king's miniſters, the council, biſhops, and particularly the new archbiſhop of Canterbury, were the authors of the project. If they did not directly charge the king with it, at leaſt they were perſuaded, either that he encouraged it, or ſuffered himſelf to be carried farther than he intended by perſons who concealed their deſign from him. The catholics themſelves gave occaſion for theſe ſuſpicions, in ſhewing openly their hopes of quickly ſeeing a change in favour of their religion. We find in a diary kept by Laud of what happened to him every day, that this very year 1633, he had the offer of a cardinal's cap, if he would help to reſtore the Roman religion. For my part, I verily believe, neither the king nor the archbiſhop [x], nor the miniſters, for the moſt part, ever formed ſuch a deſign; at leaſt, in all that has been ſaid upon the ſubject, I have not met with any proof which appeared, I will not ſay ſufficient to convince me, but even to have the leaſt probability. Nevertheleſs, it is certain this opinion was ſpread among the people, and the preſbyterians uſed all their endeavours to gain it belief. I do not know whether they believed it themſelves, or only thought it for their advantage to caſt this reproach upon the church of England, in order to ſtrengthen their party, in which they ſucceeded at laſt beyond their expectations. But ſince this opinion produced in time ſurpriſing effects, I cannot forbear ſhewing upon what it was grounded.

1. Whilſt James I. was only king of Scotland, before the death of queen Elizabeth, he was ſuſpected to favour the papiſts [y]. Elizabeth herſelf was not free from ſuch a ſuſpicion, as appeared in the hiſtory of her reign. After James's acceſſion to the throne of England, he always expreſſed great tenderneſs for the catholics. This he ſhewed on ſeveral occaſions, as in the gunpowder-plot; by his expreſſions in favour of the catholics in all his ſpeeches to the parliament; by the places of truſt, which he gave indifferently to papiſts and proteſtants, as he owned himſelf in his famous apology; by his continual refuſal to execute the laws againſt recuſants; and laſtly, by the little zeal and affection he expreſſed for the proteſtant religion in the two negotiations with Spain and France concerning his ſon's marriage. I ſay nothing here of his conferences with the archbiſhop of Ambrun, becauſe they were not known in his life-time, nor can be affirmed to be faithfully related. All this gave ſome cauſe to ſuſpect that king James had ſome ill deſign with regard to religion, and had left the execution to the care of his ſucceſſor.

2. Charles I. when prince, and at Madrid, ſent a letter to the pope, which might have rendered him ſuſpected. This ſuſpicion might be confirmed by the ſecret articles he is ſaid to have ſigned on occaſion of his marriage with the infanta.

3. After Charles was on the throne, he always ſhewed a very great condeſcenſion to the catholics, ſeveral whereof were raiſed to the higheſt poſts: Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, was a papiſt; Weſton, who was made earl of Portland and lord treaſurer, was ſo likewiſe; indeed the duke of Buckingham profeſſed the reformed religion, but it was generally believed he would have made no difficulty to change it for the Roman; beſides, his mother and his ducheſs were papiſts. The parliament, as I have ſaid, preſented to the king a liſt of many recuſants, to whom were committed the places of truſt in their reſpective counties. In ſhort, though the king had poſitively promiſed to proceed with vigour againſt the recuſants, he ſeems not to have performed his promiſe, ſince the following parliaments were frequently obliged to renew their inſtances, and always in vain. If the king gave any orders upon that ſubject, they were never executed, and every one believed the court connived at the neglect of thoſe who were charged with the execution, ſo that this was a perpetual cauſe of complaint during his whole reign.

4. The king had an exceſſive complaiſance for his queen, and the queen was not only a papiſt, but alſo very zealous for her religion. This gave occaſion to fear ſhe had formed the project of reſtoring it in England, and would at laſt draw the king into her ſentiments.

5. The preſbyterians, who were looked upon as the greateſt enemies to popery, were furiouſly oppreſſed and perſecuted, whilſt the Arminians and papiſts were ſuffered to live unmoleſted. Hence it was inferred, that the court acted with ſuch warmth againſt that ſect, only to make way, by their deſtruction, to the reſtoration of popery.

6. Arminianiſm was ſo openly countenanced by the court, and ſome of the principal biſhops, that many believed there was a deſign to make uſe of it as a means to effect the more eaſily a change of religion.

7. As this notion of a deſign to reſtore popery ſpread itſelf over the kingdom, the heads of the church of England were more attached to all the rites and ceremonies which gave moſt offence to tender conſciences: kneeling at the ſacrament, wearing the ſurplice, confirmation, keeping of ſaints days, proceſſions, bowing to the altar, and the like, which offended the preſbyterians, as being reliques of popery, theſe things, I ſay were preſſed by the biſhops with the ſame eagerneſs as if religion muſt have fallen with them, and as if they were abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation. This cauſed many to ſuſpect that the obſervance of all theſe points was preſſed with deſign to pave the way for the more eaſy reception of the popiſh tenets hereafter.

8. The heads of the church of England were not ſatisfied with zealouſly maintaining the ceremonies and rites uſed in their church ſince the reformation, but made certain additions to them from time to time, which could not be juſtified by the canons. This occaſioned theſe things to be conſidered as innovations tending to popery. What Laud had done in conſecrating St. Catharine-Creed church, and in adminiſtring the ſacrament, was of this kind. When ſome complained of theſe things, the biſhops that countenanced them alleged a ſtatute, which impowered queen Elizabeth and her ſucceſſors, in caſe of any abuſes and indecencies in the divine ſervice, to preſcribe ſuch ceremonies as they ſhould judge proper for the glory of God and the decency of his worſhip. Now as the king never failed to approve of what was injoined by the biſhops, many ſuſpected that the king's authority was uſed to ſupport theſe ſeemingly inconſiderable innovations, with deſign to take the advantage of the ſame authority to juſtify alterations of much greater conſequence.

9. Laſtly, the church's little regard to tender conſciences, and her obſtinacy in refuſing to relax in any the moſt inſignificant point; as for inſtance, the ſurplice, gave occaſion to believe, theſe things would not be ſo zealouſly adhered to, were there not ſome more hidden deſigns.

Theſe were the grounds, as far as I have been able to obſerve, on which was founded the people's belief of a ſettled deſign to introduce popery. However, theſe are only preſumptions, from whence, as I ſaid, it cannot be juſtly inferred, that this opinion was well grounded. But on the other hand, it muſt be confeſſed, that the principal biſhops, who were not ignorant of the conſequences drawn from their conduct, were extremely careleſs in clearing themſelves, or in taking meaſures to remove, or at leaſt to weaken theſe ſuſpicions. They regarded the preſbyterians with the utmoſt contempt, as a ſet of ſtubborn obſtinate people, who ought to be humbled, inſtead of being indulged. But it was not with reſpect to religion only that the ruin of the puritans was thought neceſſary. They were alſo conſidered as perſons, who by the principles of their religion, were inclined to oppoſe all authority in the ſtate as well as in the church, and conſequently they could not be kept too low. This bred between the two parties an implacable enmity, which is not yet extinguiſhed. The preſbyterians, who were under oppreſſion at the time I am ſpeaking of, had their turn afterwards, and oppreſſed, nay, utterly deſtroyed, the church of England. In the violent motions cauſed by this enmity, the biſhops ſuffered firſt. Laud loſt his head on the ſcaffold. The monarchy was overthrown, and in the fall the king himſelf came to a tragical end. The church of England diſappeared for ſome time, and was, as it were, buried in the ruins of the ſtate. And it was not without a wonderful providence that the monarchy and the church were at laſt reſtored to their former ſplendor.

The king, as I ſaid, intended to introduce the rites of the church of England into the kirk of Scotland. This project was formed by the king his father, who had even ordered that divine ſervice ſhould be celebrated in his royal chapel at Edinburgh, in the ſame manner as in his chapel at Whitehall. But whether this order was neglected, or the Scots would not frequent the chapel, Charles thought proper not only to renew it, but to add ſeveral things to hinder the chapel from being deſerted for the future. On the 8th of October, he ſent the following articles to the biſhop of Dunblane, dean of his chapel at Edinburgh:

"OUR expreſs will and pleaſure is, that the dean of our chapel, that now is, and his ſucceſſors, ſhall be aſſiſtant to the right reverend father in God the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, at the coronation, ſo often as it ſhall happen.

"2. That the book of the form of our coronation lately uſed, be put in a little box, and laid into a ſtandard, and committed to the care of the dean of the chapel ſucceſſively."

The coronation of Charles I. it muſt be obſerved, had been performed according to the rites of the church of England.

"3. That there be prayers twice a day, with the choir, as well in our abſence as otherwiſe, according to the Engliſh liturgy, till ſome courſe be taken for making one, that may fit the cuſtom and conſtitution of that church.

"4. That the dean of the chapel look carefully, that all that receive the bleſſed ſacrament there, receive it kneeling; and that there be a communion held in that our chapel, the firſt Sunday of every month.

"5. That the dean of our chapel, that now is, and ſo ſucceſſively, come duely thither to prayers upon Sundays, and ſuch holy-days as that church obſerves, in his whites, and preach ſo, whenever he preacheth there. And that he be not abſent from thence, but upon neceſſary occaſion of his dioceſe, or otherwiſe, according to the courſe of his preferment.

"6. That theſe orders ſhall be our warrant to the dean of our chapel. That the lords of our privy-council, the lords of the ſeſſions, the advocate, clerks, writers to the ſignet, and members of our college of juſtice, be commanded to receive the holy communion once every year at leaſt, in that our chapel royal, and kneeling for example-ſake to the kingdom. And we likewiſe command the dean aforeſaid, to make report yearly to us how we are obeyed therein, and by whom; and alſo if any man ſhall refuſe, in what manner he doth ſo, and why.

"7. That the copies which are conſecrated to our uſe, be delivered to the dean, to be kept upon inventory by him,

James would turn catholic, and enter into a confederacy with his holineſs and his catholic majeſty, againſt the queen of England; and produced a letter of credence of the ſaid king James, preſenting a memorial of the reaſons that induced the king of Scotland to be reconciled to the ſee apoſtolic.

This tranſaction is mentioned by none of our hiſtorians. The papers relating to this affair were found among ſir Ralph Winwood's, which the reader may ſee in the Collection of State Papers publiſhed by Edmund Sawyer, eſq; tom. I. p. 1.

and in a ſtandard provided for that purpoſe; and to be uſed at the celebration of the ſacrament in our chapel royal [z]."

Beſides theſe articles, the king writ a letter to the dean, ordering him to certify to the lords of the privy-council, if any of thoſe appointed to communicate in his chapel royal, did not perform theſe articles, to the end, ſuch order might be taken, as his majeſty had appointed by his former letters.

Hence it is viſible, that not only the whole council of Scotland, but alſo thoſe who were in public employments and court-places, were prepared to conform to the church of England, otherwiſe they would not have been employed, or continued in their poſts. It was with them the king intended to begin, that, as he ſaid himſelf, they might ſerve for example to the reſt. We ſhall ſee preſently what happened, when the king would have obliged the whole Scotch nation to the ſame condeſcenſion.

Whilſt the king was ſeeking means to engage the Scots to conform to the church of England, pains were taking on the contrary to alienate from the preſbyterians in England, by affecting ſuch uſages and cuſtoms as were moſt apt to offend them. At that time the heads of the church of England, inſtead of undeceiving thoſe who prepoſterouſly imagined ſhe was leaning to popery, ſeem to have taken all poſſible care to confirm their ſuſpicions, by induſtriouſly conforming to the church of Rome in matters of little moment, and without any neceſſity, as if it was done on purpoſe to brave them. In October 1633, the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, as ordinaries of St. Gregory's church, which ſtood near the cathedral, removed the communion table from the middle of the chancel to the upper end, placing it there altar-wiſe. For which they alleged two reaſons: The firſt, that in the king's chapel, and all cathedrals, the communion tables were placed in that manner, and therefore it was fit other churches ſhould conform to the ſame cuſtom. The ſecond, that when the tables ſtood in the middle of the chancel, ſeveral ſcandalous indecencies were committed, people leaning thereon in ſermon time, or putting their hats on it. This laſt reaſon, added to the great care that was taken about kneeling at the ſacrament, cauſed many to believe, that the endeavouring to inſpire ſuch an extraordinary reſpect for the communion table, and the giving it always the name of altar, was not without deſign. And therefore ſome of the pariſhioners of St. Gregory's complained of this removal, by appeal to the court of the arches [a]. But the council having notice of it, prevented the ſentence, by ordering the dean of the arches, to confirm by his authority, what had been done in St. Gregory's church. A few days after, the king being preſent in council, cauſed this affair to be debated, and approving the act of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, gave commandment, that if thoſe pariſhioners did proceed in their appeal, the dean of the arches (who was then attending at the hearing of the cauſe) ſhould caſt them, and confirm the removal. This ſentence, given by the king's ſovereign authority, without ſtaying for the judgment of the court, to whoſe cognizance this matter properly belonged, was a fountain of oppreſſions to many miniſters and congregations, who were not willing to comply with it. There was ſcarce a church in England, except the cathedrals and the king's chapel, where the communion table was placed altar-wiſe at the upper end of the chancel. But after the king had confirmed the removal in St. Gregory's church, the like diſputes aroſe in numberleſs places, and the high commiſſion had frequent occaſion to puniſh the miniſters, who were ſuſpected of too little zeal for the church of England. As ſince the reformation, the altars were changed into communion tables, and placed in the middle of the chancel, to avoid ſuperſtition, many imagined, the tables were again turned into altars, with intent to revive a ſuperſtitious worſhip.

England being then in profound peace, and almoſt wholly unconcerned in what paſſed abroad, I can ſpeak only of domeſtic affairs. It is true, that each taken ſingly may ſeem of little conſequence, but altogether may ſerve to ſhew the character of the king, the genius of the court, the conduct of the magiſtrates, and in general, the cauſes of that terrible revolution, of which the lord Clarendon has given the hiſtory.

In February 1634, came to a ſolemn hearing in the ſtar chamber, a cauſe which made a great noiſe, and which ſhewed the extreme ſeverity of that court againſt ſuch as were ſuſpected not to be ſubmiſſive enough to the government. The caſe was this: Mr. William Prynn, barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn, had compiled and printed a large volume in quarto, of above a thouſand pages, entitled Hiſtrio-Maſtix. The author's chief deſign was to ſhew, that ſtage-plays, balls, maſques, were unlawful and antichriſtian. But in treating his ſubject, he had interſperſed ſundry reflections, applicable to the king, the queen, and the church, who approved or tolerated theſe abuſes. It was pretended, his aim in general was to ſhew there was a deſign to reduce religion to a kind of paganiſm, in order to make way for popery. This outrage was repreſented by the king's council in the blackeſt colours they could poſſibly give it. At laſt, after a ſolemn hearing of three days, the book was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman, a thing till then unuſual in England. As for the author, ſentence paſſed upon him, that he ſhould be expelled Lincoln's-Inn, diſabled to practice, degraded of his degree in the univerſity of Oxford, ſet on the pillory, have his ears cut off, impriſoned during life, and fined 5000l. The publiſher, Michael Sparkes, who was alſo the printer of the book, was fined 500l. and Mr. Buckner, the chaplain who licenſed it, 50l.

This ſentence ſeemed too ſevere to diſintereſted perſons. It mortified the preſbyterians eſpecially, moſt of whom were of the ſame principles with Prynn. They could not help perceiving, in the ſeverity exerciſed upon this author, a malicious deſign to diſgrace their ſect, and oppreſs them on all occaſions. The truth is, the preſbyterian party, though very numerous, as plainly appeared afterwards, laboured then under oppreſſion. They had againſt them, the king, the miniſters, the council, the ſtar chamber, the high commiſſion, the principal heads of the church of England, the Arminians, the papiſts, the lords lieutenants of the counties, the judges of the realm, and all the magiſtrates in general. Notwithſtanding all this, they daily gained ground. This would ſeem incredible, if it was not conſidered, that the court themſelves were the chief cauſe of their increaſe. The court conſidered as puritans, all who did not ſhew ſubmiſſion enough to the king, or would not allow ſufficient extent to the prerogative-royal, and by oppreſſing them as ſuch, or by refuſing them all kinds of employments, engaged them unavoidably to turn to the preſbyterians. As the king's pretenſions, with regard to government, were not approved by the majority of the nation, it happened by degrees, that almoſt all England became preſbyterians, according to the ſenſe given by the court to that term. For beſides, it is certain, there were in the preſbyterian party, multitudes who were very well affected to the church of England, but could not allow the king's principles concerning government: ſo, this party, though continually oppreſſed, grew daily more numerous, waiting with impatience for a parliament, where they were almoſt ſure of finding protectors. But at the time I am ſpeaking of, there was no appearance of the king's intention to call a parliament. As nothing forced him to it, he took care not to expoſe himſelf to the ill-humours of a houſe of commons, and run the riſk of ſeeing revived the complaints which had obliged him to diſſolve the three foregoing parliaments.

It is very true, that in governing without a parliament, the king debarred himſelf of the extraordinary ſupplies which the ſovereigns uſually received from thence: but he did not believe, that the only way to have extraordinary ſupplies, was to apply to the houſe of commons. He had expreſly told the parliament, by the lord keeper, and frequently intimated himſelf, that he could find money without the aſſiſtance of parliaments. And yet, the petition of right having intervened ſince that time, and the king having bound himſelf, by his anſwer, not to raiſe any tax without the conſent of both houſes, he ſeemed to be deprived, by that anſwer, of all methods which he thought he might lawfully uſe before the petition was preſented. But expedients to evade the moſt ſolemn promiſes, are ſeldom wanting to men in power. On theſe occaſions, there are miniſters and counſellors who inſinuate to their maſters, that promiſes made by ſovereigns, bind them no farther than they think proper. William Noy, attorney general, who was one of theſe bold counſellors, had, the laſt year, furniſhed the king with a way to raiſe an extraordinary ſupply without the concurrence of the parliament: namely, by the impoſition of a tax upon the people, under colour of maintaining a certain number of ſhips to guard the ſeas [b]. But this bold counſellor died before he had ſeen the effects of his advice [c], after having however engaged his master in an affair which made him for ever lose his people's confidence, and was one of the principal causes of his ruin.

The death of the attorney general hindered not the king from putting his advice in practice. To that purpose he directed to the mayors and head officers of the maritime towns, writs, to much the same effect with the following directed to the mayor of London [d]:

"Carolus Rex, &c.

"TO the mayor, commonalty and citizens of our city of London, and to the sheriffs of the same city, and good men in the said city, and in the liberties and members of the same, greeting. Because we are given to understand, that certain thieves, pirates and robbers of the sea, as well Turks, enemies of the christian name, as others, being gathered together, wickedly taking by force, and spoiling the ships, and goods, and merchandizes, not only of our subjects, but also of the subjects of our friends in the sea, which hath been accustomed anciently to be defended by the English nation; and the same, at their pleasure, have carried away, delivering the men in the same into miserable captivity: and forasmuch as we see them daily preparing all manner of shipping, farther to molest our merchants, and to grieve the kingdom, unless remedy be not sooner applied, and their endeavours be not more manly met withal; also the dangers considered, which on every side, in these times of war, do hang over our heads, that it behoveth us, and our subjects, to hasten the defence of the sea and kingdom with all expedition or speed that we can: we willing, by the help of God, chiefly to provide for the defence of the kingdom, safeguard of the sea, security of our subjects, safe-conduct of ships and merchandizes to our kingdom of England coming, and from the same kingdom to foreign parts passing: forasmuch as we and our progenitors, kings of England, have been always heretofore masters of the aforesaid sea, and it would be very irksome unto us, if that princely honour in our times should be lost, or in any thing diminished. And although that charge of defence, which concerneth all men, ought to be supported by all, as by the laws and customs of the kingdom of England hath been accustomed to be done: notwithstanding, we considering that you, constituted in the sea-coasts, to whom by sea as well great dangers are imminent, and who by the same do get more plentiful gains for the defence of the sea, and conservation of our princely honour in that behalf, according to the duty of your allegiance against such attempts, are chiefly bound to set to your helping hand; we command firmly, enjoining you the aforesaid mayor, commonalty, and citizens, the sheriffs of the said city, and the good men in the same city, and in the liberties and members of the same, in the faith and allegiance wherein ye are bound unto us, and as ye do love us, and our honour, and under the forfeiture of all which ye can forfeit unto us, that ye cause to be prepared and brought to the port of Portsmouth, before the 1st day of March now next ensuing, one ship of war of the burthen of nine hundred tuns, with three hundred and fifty men at the least, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: one other ship of war of the burthen of eight hundred tuns, with two hundred and sixty men at the least, as well skilful masters, as very able and expert mariners: four other ships of war, every of them of the burthen of five hundred tuns, and every of them with two hundred men at the least, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: and one other ship of war, of the burthen of three hundred tuns, with a hundred and fifty men, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: and also every of the said ships with ordnance, as well greater as lesser, gun-powder, and spears, and weapons, and other necessary arms sufficient for war, and with double tackling, and with victuals, until the said 1st of March, competent for so many men; and from that time for twenty-six weeks, at your charges, as well in victuals as men's wages, and other things necessary for war during that time, upon defence of the sea in our service, in command of the admiral of the sea, to whom we shall commit the custody of the sea, before the aforesaid 1st day of March, and as he, on our behalf, shall command them to continue; so that they may be there the same day, at the farthest, to go from thence with our ships, and the ships of other faithful subjects, for the safeguard of the sea, and defence of you and yours, and repulse and vanquishing of whomsoever busying themselves to molest or trouble upon the sea our merchants, and other subjects and faithful people coming into our dominions for cause of merchandize, or from thence returning to their own countries. Also we have assigned you the aforesaid mayor and aldermen of the city aforesaid, or any thirteen, or more of you, within thirty days after the receipt of this writ, to assess all men in the said city, and in the liberties, and members of the same, and the land-holders in the same, not having a ship, or any part of the aforesaid ships, not serving in the same, to contribute to the expences, about the necessary provision of the premisses; and to assess and lay upon the aforesaid city, with the liberties and members thereof, viz. upon every of them according to their estates and substances, and the portion assessed upon them; and to nominate and appoint collectors in this behalf. Also we have assigned you, the aforesaid mayor, and also the sheriffs of the city aforesaid, to levy the portions so as aforesaid assessed upon the aforesaid men and land-holders, and every of them in the aforesaid city, with the liberties and members of the same, by distress and other due means; and to commit to prison all those whom you shall find rebellious, and contrary in the premisses, there to remain until we shall give further order for their delivery. And moreover we command you, that about the premisses ye diligently attend, and execute those things with effect, upon peril that shall fall thereon: But we will not, that under the colour of our aforesaid command, more shall be levied of the said men, than shall suffice for the necessary expences of the premisses; or that any, who have levied money for contribution, to raise the aforesaid charges, shall by him detain the same, or any part thereof; or should presume, by any manner of colour, to appropriate the same to other uses; willing, that if more than may be sufficient shall be collected, the same may be paid out among the contributors, for the rate of the part to them belonging.

"Witness myself, at Westminster, the 20th day of October, in the tenth year of our reign."

The lord mayor of London having received this writ, assembled the common council, who agreed to present the following petition to the king:

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble petition of your faithful subjects, the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of your city of London, most humbly shewing,

"THAT whereas, your majesty by writ, bearing teste 20 Octobris last, commanded your petitioners at their charge, to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victual, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth by the 1st of March next, and to continue from thence by the space of twenty-six weeks in your majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas and other causes in the said writ contained:

"Your petitioners do, in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgement of your sacred majesty's many favours unto your said city, inform your majesty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament (which they are ready humbly to shew forth), they are exempt, and are to be freed from that charge, &c."

But the pretensions of the city of London, were not capable of causing the king to desist from his resolution. We shall see, on the contrary, that in time this tax, which was at first peculiar to the maritime towns, was imposed upon the whole kingdom [e].

[1634-5] After Laud's promotion to the archbishopric of Canterbury, his zeal for the church of England and against the presbyterians, seemed to be much increased. He kept by the king's order a private correspondence with the bishops of Scotland, concerning the liturgy and canons designed to be introduced into the kirk, and of which I shall speak more fully presently. It suffices to say here, that it was he that was charged with the conduct and execution of this project. But he did not confine his labours to the conversion of the Scots, nor even of the English presbyterians. The Dutch, the Walloons, the French, who had taken refuge in England, since the reign of Edward VI. had obtained sundry privileges from the former kings, and particularly the liberty of celebrating divine service after their manner, that is, the presbyterian, and formed ſeveral congregations, both in London and other parts of the kingdom. But Laud could not bear they ſhould enjoy this privilege any longer; and therefore ſent them theſe two injunctions, having firſt ſecured the king's approbation:

"1. That all the natives of the Dutch and Walloon congregations, in his grace's dioceſe, ſhould repair to their ſeveral pariſh-churches of thoſe ſeveral pariſhes where they inhabited, to hear divine ſervice and ſermons, and perform all duties and payments required in that behalf.

"2. That the miniſters, and all other of the Dutch and Walloon congregations, which were not natives and born ſubjects to the king's majeſty, or any other ſtrangers that ſhould come over to them, while they remained ſtrangers, might have and uſe their own diſcipline, as formerly they have done; yet it was thought fit, that the Engliſh liturgy ſhould be tranſlated into French and Dutch, for the better ſettling of their children to the Engliſh government."

Beſides that, by theſe injunctions, he impoſed upon theſe foreign churches a liturgy which they did not approve, he reduced theſe congregations almoſt to nothing, ſince he excluded all that were born in the kingdom, that is, all the deſcendants of ſuch as had fled hither in the reign of Edward VI. and conſequently there could be but very few left of thoſe born out of the kingdom.

Upon this, the Dutch and Walloon churches at Norwich preſented a petition to the biſhop of that dioceſe, remonſtrating, that the archbiſhop's injunctions were contrary, not only to ſeveral orders of the council heretofore given in favour of their congregations, but alſo to the privileges granted them when they firſt ſettled in England, and continued to them during the reigns of Edward VI. queen Elizabeth, and James I. and confirmed alſo by his preſent majeſty's royal word. The biſhop of Norwich not returning a favourable anſwer to their petition, they applied to the archbiſhop himſelf, who anſwered them by letter: That his majeſty was reſolved, his inſtructions ſhould hold, and that obedience ſhould be yielded to them by all the natives, after the firſt deſcent; concluding his letter with theſe words: "And thus I have given you anſwer fairly in all your particulars, and do expect all obedience and conformity to my inſtructions, which if you ſhall perform, the ſtate will have occaſion to ſee how ready you are to practiſe the obedience which you teach: And for my part, I doubt not but yourſelves, or your poſterity at leaſt, ſhall have cauſe to thank both the ſtate and the church for this care taken of you; but if you refuſe (as you have no cauſe to do, and I hope you will not), I ſhall then proceed againſt the natives, according to the laws and canons eccleſiaſtical [f]."

[1635] Thus the archbiſhop alleged, in vindication of the breach of the privileges granted to theſe congregations, and confirmed by four kings, of whom his preſent majeſty was one, the king's ſole will, or rather his own. It was evident, that the king's good pleaſure on which he laid ſo much ſtreſs, was rather an approbation of what the archbiſhop had undertaken, than a warrant to undertake it. The preſbyterians having no other way to be revenged of the archbiſhop, publiſhed ſeveral libels againſt him, taking notice of all the innovations he had brought into the church, pretending they were ſo many ſteps towards popery. They forgot not to upbraid him with the pictures he had placed in the windows of his chapel at Lambeth, particularly that of God the Father in the form of a little old man. They obſerved ſeveral other things, of which the archbiſhop was afterwards accuſed by the houſe of commons. But this is not the proper place to ſpeak of this impeachment, or of the archbiſhop's defence.

The king being always in want, his miniſters were continually employed in deviſing means to raiſe money. In the beginning of the year 1635, the attorney general preſented an information in the ſtar chamber againſt ſeveral hundreds of perſons, lords, knights, gentlemen, ladies, and others, for diſobeying his majeſty's proclamation, by which they were commanded not to reſide in London. I do not find the ſentence given upon this information, but very probably, conſidering the ſtar chamber's zeal to ſupport the king's authority, the parties accuſed were puniſhed by fine.

The tax to provide and maintain a certain number of ſhips to guard the ſeas, was impoſed in 1634, for the year 1635, only upon the maritime towns. But in 1635, the king ſent his writs for ſhip-money all over the kingdom for the year 1636 [g]. The reaſon, or rather pretence, of this general tax was, that the kingdom was in great danger, on account of the league lately concluded between France and the Low-Countries. Though it did not appear how this league, which was not againſt England, could put the kingdom in danger, the king however inferred, that the two moſt powerful ſtates in naval forces being united, it was abſolutely neceſſary that England ſhould have a ſtrong fleet to preſerve the dominion of the ſea, otherwiſe ſhe might be inſulted, and her trade diſturbed. This tax being impoſed by virtue of the prerogative-royal, ſeveral private perſons refuſed to pay the ſums they were rated at. Nay, ſome there were who ſued the magiſtrates and other officers appointed to levy the money, aſſerting, that the ſubject could be taxed only by act of parliament. This oppoſition was the reaſon, that in the year 1636 ſhip-money amounted to not above 200,000l. though the king had expected a much larger ſum. Mean while, the king conſidering that by means of this tax he ſhould have a ſettled revenue, beſides that it would be a precedent to make uſe of his prerogative on other occaſions, reſolved to ſupport his project at any rate. But to guard it againſt all objections of being illegal, and contrary to his anſwer to the Petition of Right, he had a mind to ſhew he was authorized on this occaſion to exert his prerogative. To that end he ſent to the judges of the realm, and required their opinion concerning his right to levy this tax. As the judges wholly depended upon the court, they very readily decided in favour of the king, and gave him their opinion in writing [h]. But the king thought not proper to publiſh their determination, being ſatisfied with keeping it private till there would be occaſion to uſe it. This will hereafter appear. But I muſt firſt ſpeak of ſome other things which paſſed in this interval.

This year, 1635, the king renewed a former commiſſion to confirm their defective titles, to ſuch as held lands of the crown. He pretended it was an act of grace, and that his only aim was to ſecure the poſſeſſion of lands to thoſe who held them by diſputable titles. But notwithſtanding this, the commiſſion was looked upon as a manifeſt oppreſſion. For, under colour of examining defective titles, all the proprietors were obliged to produce their titles, to which, how valid ſoever they might be, the commiſſioners made objections. So, to avoid a law-ſuit with the king, wherein they were ſure to be caſt, conſidering the diſpoſition of the judges, the proprietors were forced to compound, and give money to ſecure their lands, which were otherwiſe in danger of being re-united to the crown.

Shortly after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all perſons, except ſoldiers, mariners, merchants, and their factors, not to depart the kingdom without his licence. Several kings of England had ordered the ſame thing on ſome particular occaſions, but it was doubted whether ſuch a prohibition was neceſſary when the proclamation was publiſhed.

The abuſes of the informers, that is, perſons who watched people's actions, in order to accuſe them, in caſe they infringed the laws, were grown ſo exceſſive, that the king was forced, if not to aboliſh them entirely, at leaſt, to qualify them by certain directions which he ordered to be obſerved.

The office of lord treaſurer, which had been executed by commiſſioners ſince the death of the earl of Portland, was conferred on Dr. William Juxton, biſhop of London, who diſcharged it worthily. No churchman had enjoyed this poſt ſince Henry VII's time [i].

The ſame year was preſented to the king, by the earl of Arundel, an old man called Parr, who was a hundred and fifty-two years of age, and in perfect health. He was born the laſt year of the reign of Edward IV.

The elector palatine and prince Rupert (or Robert) his brother arrived in England about this time, and were lodged in the king their uncle's palace [k].

occaſion, or whenever they gave their enemies an advantage, through an exceſs of zeal, which was not always well regulated. Samuel Ward, a miniſter in Ipſwich, boldly preached againſt the king's Book of Sports; and alſo ſaid, "That the church of England was ready to ring changes in religion." For which he was ſuſpended by the high-commiſſion, and afterwards committed to priſon for refuſing to make a public recantation. The church-wardens of Beckington in Somerſetſhire refuſing to place the communion-table otherwiſe than it had been for ſixty years, were excommunicated by the biſhop of Bath and Wells. They appealed to the arches, but their appeal was rejected. Then they petitioned the king, but with no better ſucceſs. So the church-wardens ſtood excommunicated a whole year, and were afterwards thrown into the common gaol, from whence at length they were releaſed by the biſhop, upon their public ſubmiſſion and penance. It would be too tedious to relate all the actions which were entered in the high commiſſion upon the two articles I have been ſpeaking of. It ſuffices to obſerve, that the number was very great, and the high commiſſion always puniſhed very ſeverely ſuch as dared to ſwerve from what was preſcribed by the church.

On the other hand, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ever zealous for the church of England, conſidered as puritans all who neglected the leaſt rite or ceremony of the church. This prelate being informed of ſome remiſſneſs in that reſpect in the two univerſities, could not ſuffer ſuch an abuſe. There were at Cambridge three chapels where divine ſervice was daily celebrated, though they had never been conſecrated. This neglect, which to him ſeemed ſo blameable, exciting his zeal, he reſolved to viſit the univerſities as metropolitan. He met with ſome oppoſition, the univerſities maintaining, that he had not the right of viſiting as archbiſhop, though they did not deny he might viſit by the king's commiſſion, if his majeſty was pleaſed to appoint him. But not being ſatisfied with a borrowed power, he brought the caſe before he king, who decided it in his favour, after having himſelf ſupported the archbiſhop's reaſons with arguments, and anſwered the objections of the univerſities. The archbiſhop being ſo well ſupported, could not fail of obtaining the victory [l].

The king being determined, as I ſaid, to continue the tax for the maintenance of the ſhips deſigned to guard the ſeas, and having the laſt year given orders for levying it this year 1636, was obliged to ſeek a pretence for a fleet. This tax, called by the Engliſh ſhip-money, and which for ſhortneſs I ſhall term ſo for the future, was grounded upon the neceſſity of guarding the ſeas. But none could perceive the danger, which, according to the king, England was expoſed to by the alliance between France and Holland. To this pretence therefore was to be added that of preſerving the dominion of the narrow ſeas. To that end he publiſhes a proclamation, declaring, "Whereas king James did, in the ſeventh year of his reign, ſet forth a proclamation touching fiſhing; whereby all perſons of what nation or quality ſoever (being not his natural-born ſubjects) were reſtrained from fiſhing upon any of the coaſts and ſeas of Great Britain, Ireland, and the reſt of the iſles adjacent, until they had orderly obtained licences in that behalf. Since which time, neither the king his father nor himſelf have made any conſiderable execution of the ſaid proclamation, but have expected a voluntary conformity thereto. But now finding by experience, that all the inconveniencies which occaſioned that proclamation, are rather increaſed than abated; and his majeſty well knowing how far he is obliged in honour to maintain the rights of his crown, has thought it neceſſary to renew the aforeſaid reſtraint of fiſhing, and to declare, that his reſolution is to keep ſuch a competent ſtrength of ſhipping upon his ſeas, as may be ſufficient both to hinder farther encroachments upon his regalities, and aſſiſt and protect thoſe his good friends and allies, who ſhall henceforth with licence endeavour to take benefit of fiſhing upon his coaſts."

Theſe friends were Hollanders, who came every year and fiſhed for herrings on the coaſt of Scotland. It was therefore manifeſt, that after thirty years forbearance he ſought a quarrel with the Dutch, only to have occaſion to fit out a fleet, which ſerved for pretence to impoſe the tax of ſhip-money. This quarrel produced the two famous treatiſes, entitled, Mare Liberum, and Mare Clauſum; the former penned by Grotius, the latter by Selden. But the king regarded not arguments drawn from hiſtory, or ancient treaties between the two nations; he made uſe of a more effectual method, namely, a fleet under the command of Algernoon earl of Northumberland. This fleet attacking the diſperſed fiſhermen, who little expected it, and ſinking ſome, compelled the reſt to retire into the Engliſh harbours, as the ſafeſt retreat, and in ſhort, to give the king 30,000 florins, for permiſſion to continue their fiſhing that ſummer [m].

Soon after, the king raiſed 30,000l. by a commiſſion to enquire concerning depopulations and converſions of arable lands to paſture, ſince the 10th year of queen Elizabeth [n]. There were many offenders of this kind, and ſo heavy a fine was impoſed in the ſtar chamber on ſir Anthony Roper, that the reſt, to avoid the ſame treatment, ſpeedily compounded with the king.

But ſhip-money was the moſt important thing, and as ſuch regarded by the court. The king neither would nor could depart from it, for three principal reaſons. Firſt, becauſe he ſhould be deprived of a very conſiderable aid, which he meant to render fixed and cuſtomary. Secondly, in deſiſting from this tax, after levying it two years ſucceſſively, he would have given cauſe to believe he had no power to impoſe it, and conſequently had acted contrary to law. Thirdly, having reſolved never more to call a parliament, it highly concerned him to eſtabliſh his prerogative in ſuch a manner, that none ſhould dare to conteſt it. So the city of London having petitioned the board, that the twenty ſhips they were rated at might be reduced to ten, received a very ſharp anſwer to this effect:

"That the tax of ſhip-money was neceſſary for the preſervation of the ſtate; and the charge was not immoderate: that his majeſty would admit of no excuſe, but expected a ready compliance: that the precedents alleged in favour of the city, ought to induce them to obey, rather than to contradict, and direct the king."

Notwithſtanding all this, there were ſome that obſtinately refuſed to pay their ſhare of this tax, imagining, no court of juſtice would be ſo bold to compel them. As theſe examples were of dangerous conſequence, the king thought proper to publiſh the opinions of the judges. To that end the lord-keeper having aſſembled all the judges in the ſtar chamber, told them, the king was very well pleaſed with their endeavours in their ſeveral circuits, to perſuade his ſubjects to pay ſhip-money; but however, his majeſty hearing that ſome refuſed to pay this tax, had thought fit to have recourſe to their advice for his direction in the caſe, and had commanded him to publiſh their opinions for the ſatisfaction of his ſubjects. Then he cauſed the king's letter to the judges on this ſubject to be read, as follows:

"TRUSTY and well-beloved, we greet you well. Taking into our princely conſideration, that the honour and ſafety of this our realm of England (the preſervation whereof is only entruſted in our care) was, and is now more nearly concerned than in former times, as well by divers counſels and attempts, to take from us the dominion of the ſea, of which we are the ſole lords, and rightful owners, the loſs whereof would be of great danger and peril to this kingdom, and other our dominions; we, for the avoiding of theſe and the like dangers, well weighing with ourſelves, that where the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, there the charge and defence ought to be borne by all the realm in general; did, for prevention of ſo public a miſchief, reſolve with ourſelves to have a royal navy provided, that might be of force and power, with Almighty God's bleſſing and aſſiſtance, to protect and defend this our realm, and our ſubjects therein, from all ſuch perils and dangers; and for that purpoſe we iſſued forth writs under our great ſeal of England, directed to all our ſheriffs of all our ſeveral counties of England, and Wales, commanding thereby all our ſaid ſubjects of every city, town, and village, to provide ſuch a number of ſhips well furniſhed, as might ſerve for this our royal purpoſe, and which might be done with the greateſt equality that could be, in performance whereof, though generally throughout all the counties of this our realm, we have found in our ſubjects great cheerfulneſs and alacrity, which we graciouſly interpret, as a teſtimony as well of their dutiful affections to us in our ſervice, as of the reſpect they have to the public, which well becometh every good ſubject. Nevertheleſs, finding that ſome few, haply out of ignorance what the laws and cuſtoms of this our realm are, or out of a deſire to be eaſed, and freed in their particulars (how general ſoever the

"Given under our ſignet, at our court at Whitehall, the ſecond day of February, in the twelfth year of our reign, 1636."

The king's letter being read, the lord-keeper commanded the caſe incloſed to be read, being as follows:

"Carolus Rex,

"WHEN the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great ſeal of England, command all the ſubjects of our kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furniſh ſuch a number of ſhips, with men, victuals, and munition, and for ſuch time as we ſhall think fit for the defence and ſafeguard of the kingdom from ſuch danger and peril, and by law compel the doing thereof, in caſe of refuſal and refractorineſs? And whether, in ſuch a caſe, is not the king ſole judge both of the danger, and when, and how the ſame is to be prevented and avoided?"

The judges anſwer.

"May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty,

"WE have, according to your majeſty's command, every man by himſelf, and all of us together, taken into ſerious conſideration, the caſe and queſtion ſigned by your majeſty, and incloſed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the kingdom in danger, your majeſty may, by writ under the great ſeal of England, command all your ſubjects of this your kingdom, at their charge to provide and furniſh ſuch a number of ſhips, with men, victuals, and munition, and for ſuch time as your majeſty ſhall think fit, for the defence and ſafeguard of this kingdom from ſuch danger and peril: and that by law your majeſty may compel the doing thereof, in caſe of refuſal or refractorineſs: and we are alſo of opinion, that in ſuch caſe your majeſty is the ſole judge, both of the danger, and when, and how the ſame is to be prevented and avoided [o]."

After the reading of the caſe and anſwer, the lord keeper ſaid, "the king had commanded him to publiſh the judges determination, and to give order that it ſhould be entered in all the courts of Weſtminſter. That moreover, his majeſty enjoined the judges to declare the ſame in their circuits throughout the kingdom, that no man might plead ignorance. That however, it was not his majeſty's purpoſe to ſtop the actions or ſuits which have been, or ſhould be brought concerning this matter, but only to prevent ſuch as ſhould bring their action, from being ſurpriſed." He concluded with ſaying, "If any contrary opinion ſhould yet remain among men, it muſt proceed from thoſe that are ſons of the law, or from ſome not towards the law. Of the latter I will ſay, 'Felices demum eſſent artes ſi de illis ſolum judicarent artifices.' And as to the former, you, the judges of the realm, are and ever have been accounted the fathers of the law, then will it ill-become the ſon to diſpute againſt, or take upon him to be wiſer than the father."

It is eaſy to perceive, that the artifice of the queſtion propoſed to the judges lay in ſuppoſition of ſome imminent danger to the kingdom, for inſtance, a ſudden and unexpected invaſion, which moſt certainly was not the caſe then. And yet upon the bare poſſibility of ſuch an extraordinary caſe, the king eſtabliſhed a principle, which gave him power to impoſe not only ſhip-money, but any other tax he ſhould pleaſe for the future. The prevarication of the judges conſiſted in that feigning not to ſee the artifice of the queſtion, they admitted, without examination, the king's ſuppoſition, and decided the preſent caſe, upon the foundation of an extraordinary and unforeſeen emergency, which was not impoſſible. Two of the judges however, namely, Hutton and Crooke, were not of the ſame opinion: but they were perſuaded to ſign, like the reſt, by the conſideration that it was the opinion of the whole body. Let it be farther obſerved, that the order to enter the judges determination in the courts of juſtice, and to publiſh it through all parts of the kingdom, was very extraordinary, ſince thereby the king pretended to make it a ſort of law, by which the courts were to proceed in judging the ſuits, which might afterwards be brought upon this affair. This had never been practiſed, but with regard to acts of parliament.

After theſe precautions, the king thought himſelf ſufficiently authoriſed to order ſuch to be proſecuted, as refuſed to pay ſhip-money. He imagined, none would be ſo hardy and obſtinate as to maintain a refuſal before judges, that had already declared their opinion, and could not give a contrary judgment without making themſelves ridiculous. Nevertheleſs, there was a gentleman, who being perſuaded, notwithſtanding the judges determination, that ſhip-money was illegal and contrary to the petition of right, reſolved to ſtand the ſhock, and refuſe to pay the tax. Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamſhire was the man, who being rated at twenty [p] ſhillings, choſe rather to be condemned than pay voluntarily. This caſe was argued in the exchequer chamber, before all the judges of England, who were ſent for to render the judgment the more ſolemn and authentic. Though the point was only to decide, whether Mr. Hampden ſhould pay twenty ſhillings or not, it was however, the moſt important caſe that had ever been argued in any court of juſtice. The point in queſtion was to determine, whether the king had power to tax the ſubject without the concurrence of the parliament, and whether the people were obliged to pay taxes impoſed in that manner. Accordingly Mr. Hampden's and the king's counſel diſplayed on this occaſion all that wit, learning, knowledge of the laws, ſolidity of reaſoning, ſubtlety, chicanery, are able to produce. There were ſome who pleaded four days together. I do not ſuppoſe it is expected, I ſhould inſert here all the arguments alleged on both ſides in this famous caſe. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with briefly giving a general idea of the thing.

The king's counſel maintained, that the king was the head of the ſtate, and obliged to protect it when in danger: that this danger might be ſuch as required an immediate remedy. From thence they inferred, that what was alleged in favour of the laws was not to the purpoſe, ſince caſes might happen where it was impracticable to obſerve them: conſequently their execution was reſtrained by neceſſity, and in theſe caſes of neceſſity, the king had an abſolute power to impoſe taxes for the defence of the realm, for which they urged ſundry precedents in former reigns. They added, as the people were not called to the king's council to give their opinion, whether there was a neceſſity or not, to impoſe taxes for the defence of the kingdom, it followed, that the king, by the advice of his council, was the ſole judge: that his majeſty having deemed it neceſſary in the preſent caſe, he might lawfully impoſe ſhip-money, and his ſubjects could not refuſe to pay it, without incurring the guilt of diſobedience.

The counſel for Mr. Hampden owned the king was head of the ſtate, and that it was incumbent on him to defend it; but withal maintained, that they had provided the means to put the kingdom in a ſtate of ſafety, by inveſting the perſon of his majeſty with ſeveral privileges which were intended for that purpoſe. For inſtance, the right of being aſſiſted by the poſſeſſors of the fees of the crown, of arming the cinque-ports, fines, confiſcations, tunnage and poundage, and other cuſtoms, of which he was actually in poſſeſſion, and which he had himſelf declared to be deſigned for the defence of the ſeas. Laſtly, ſuppoſing and allowing all theſe means to be exhauſted, the king had another infallible way, which was to call a parliament, and demand a ſupply, for all extraordinary occaſions.

But the king's council chiefly inſiſted upon the poſſibility of ſuch ſudden and unforeſeen caſes as would not afford time to call a parliament. This was their main argument, and the ſole foundation of the advantages they pretended to draw from the precedents of former reigns. Though the principles they would have eſtabliſhed tended to put it in the king's power to impoſe taxes whenever he pleaſed, they durſt not however aſſert it in plain terms, but limited his power to caſes of neceſſity, of which however they would have the king to be the ſole judge, which came to the ſame thing.

To this, Mr. Hampden's counſel replied: 1. Theſe caſes were very rare, and granting the king had a power in ſuch caſes to impoſe extraordinary taxes, this neceſſity ought to be very evident. 2. The king, upon ſuch a ſuppoſition, having exacted loans from his ſubjects, the parliament had declared them void, and the king in his anſwer to the petition of right, acknowledged he had no power to demand them. 3. At this preſent time there was no reaſon to fear any ſudden invaſion, ſince his majeſty was in peace with all his neighbours. 4. The king himſelf did not think the danger to be imminent, ſince the writs ſent to the counties to fit out ſhips being dated the 7th of Auguſt, theſe ſhips were not to be at Portſmouth till the 1ſt of March following, and conſequently the king himſelf was of opinion, that there was ſeven months time to prevent the danger, in which ſpace a parliament might eaſily be called.

I ſhall inſiſt no longer upon this ſubject, which would lead me too far, if I ſhould relate the objections, anſwers, and replies of both ſides. It ſuffices to make this general remark, that the counſel for Mr. Hampden pleaded expreſs laws, Magna Charta, the ſubſequent ſtatutes, and the petition of right. The king's council inſiſted chiefly upon precedents and inſtances taken from ſome of the former reigns, upon the impoſſibility in certain caſes, of ſtrictly obſerving the laws, from whence they inferred, that the laws were not ſo general, but that they were limited by extraordinary caſes, and the king being bound to defend the ſtate, ought to be the ſole judge of ſuch caſes. I do not find they endeavoured to prove that the kingdom was actually in one of theſe extraordinary caſes, or in imminent danger.

After the cauſe had been argued many days, from the beginning of November till Chriſtmas, and in the following terms, till May and June, judgment was given againſt Mr. Hampden, and he was condemned to pay the ſum he was taxed at. From thenceforth no one would have recourſe to the law, ſince it would have been in vain after ſo ſolemn a judgment [q].

Whilſt endeavours were uſing in England to carry the prerogative-royal higher than ever, the king reſolved to execute at laſt the project he had formed with regard to Scotland, namely, to reduce the kirk to a perfect conformity with the church of England. This project was formed by king James at his acceſſion to the crown of England: nay, he had found means before he left Scotland to reſtore epiſcopacy, as will preſently appear. From that time the biſhops were always protected and countenanced by James I. and Charles I. who gained the parliaments to their intereſts, and moreover exerted their prerogative in favour of the prelates, for with them the execution of their deſign was to begin. As the troubles this affair occaſioned in Scotland were the principal cauſe of the misfortunes and ruin of Charles I. I think it indiſpenſably neceſſary to trace them to their origin, and the rather as they had great influence upon the affairs of England. Beſides, though many foreign authors have ſpoken of the difference between Charles I. and his ſubjects of Scotland, I do not know any one that has undertaken to explain this matter clearly, or ſpoken of it impartially.

The reformation was received in Scotland by public authority in the reign of queen Mary, 1560, juſt before the death of Francis II. and whilſt the queen his widow was yet in France. The firſt that embraced the reformed religion in Scotland, under the former reigns, were much perſecuted, even to the time I have been ſpeaking of, and yet their number did not fail daily to increaſe. The biſhops thought themſelves bound in conſcience to perſecute the reformed: they were at once their adverſaries and judges, and conſequently it was almoſt impoſſible but this conduct ſhould draw on them the enmity of the ſufferers; accordingly, the decree of the ſtates to admit the reformation was no ſooner made, than the biſhops loſt all their credit and authority. It is certain the plan on which the government of the new church was at firſt ſettled, was not favourable to epiſcopacy, but it was reſolved to conform to the diſcipline of the churches of Switzerland. The reformed had too great an averſion for the biſhops to remain under their yoke, eſpecially as there were but very few prelates that agreed to the late change in religion. All that was done in their favour was, that the council ordered ſuch as would embrace the reformation ſhould enjoy their revenues, on condition they would maintain miniſters. This plainly ſhews, that though their revenues were left them, there was no intention to continue the government of the church in their hands. It was not the ſame in England, when the reformation was received in the reign of Edward VI. Far from being prejudiced againſt the biſhops, the Engliſh on the contrary could not but own it was by means of the principal prelates that the reformation was eſtabliſhed. There was therefore no motive either of hatred or policy to incline the Engliſh to throw off epiſcopal government, though they ſhould be ſuppoſed to conſider it as a thing indifferent. But in Scotland, paſſions, policy, and reaſon itſelf, required a deliverance from the yoke of the biſhops, who, for the moſt part, oppoſed the reformation to the utmoſt of their power: ſo preſbyteries, national ſynods, or general aſſemblies, were eſtabliſhed, to whoſe care the ſettling of the diſcipline was committed.

Theſe general aſſemblies at firſt had, or perhaps uſurped, a very great authority: it was even neceſſary their power ſhould be great, to enable them to defend the reformation againſt the perpetual attacks of its enemies. Queen Mary, who arrived ſoon after in Scotland, was a zealous catholic, and many of the principal lords were in the ſame ſentiments: ſo the popiſh party was ſtill very ſtrong, and in condition to obſtruct the progreſs of the reformation. On the other hand, the general aſſembly, which then conſiſted wholly of miniſters, vigorouſly ſupported the new religion, notwithſtanding the efforts of the catholic party. Mean while, though they ardently laboured to aboliſh epiſcopacy by public authority, they could not obtain of the parliament an expreſs act for that purpoſe. At laſt, in 1566, the general aſſembly ſolemnly approved of the diſcipline of the church of Switzerland, and of a parity among the miniſters. This was ſufficient to overthrow at once the ſpiritual power of the biſhops, but not to deprive them of their temporal privileges: ſo, from the year 1561, to the depoſing of queen Mary in 1567, the ſtate of the biſhops was very uncertain. They enjoyed their revenues, ſat in parliaments, but their ſpiritual juriſdiction was acknowledged by few, though they ſtrove to preſerve it. The general aſſembly had declared for the preſbyterian government, but the parliament had not yet made any deciſion. Mean while the biſhops were in a very melancholy ſituation, ſince the people, who had a great veneration for the general aſſembly, could not, after they had been condemned there, acknowledge them for paſtors. So, though their ſpiritual authority was not expreſly abrogated by the parliament, it was, as I may ſay, reduced to nothing, ſince they could not exerciſe it, the general aſſembly directing all the affairs of the church. This has occaſioned warm diſputes concerning epiſcopacy; ſome affirming it was entirely aboliſhed in Scotland, and others, that it was always continued. One cannot but wonder at a diſpute about a fact of this nature, and it is no leſs ſurpriſing that the parliament of Scotland ſhould delay above thirty years to ſettle the government of the church by their authority: wherefore it is abſolutely neceſſary to explain the reaſons, otherwiſe it would be difficult to underſtand the cauſes of the troubles of Scotland, of which we muſt neceſſarily ſpeak. But before I deſcend to particulars, it will be requiſite to obſerve, that we muſt carefully diſtinguiſh the benefice from the office of a biſhop: by the benefice I mean the revenues, lands, honours, privileges, in a word, all the temporalities annexed to the quality of biſhop; by the office I underſtand the ſpiritual juriſdiction and functions of the biſhops. If this diſtinction is not continually remembred, it will be impoſſible to underſtand the diſputes concerning this matter.

It is certain, that from the year 1560, when the reformation was eſtabliſhed in Scotland, to the year 1609, the church of that kingdom was governed by preſbyteries, dioceſan and provincial ſynods, general aſſemblies, and that even ſuperintendants were appointed, who continued till the year 1575. It is no leſs certain that the general aſſemblies condemned and rejected epiſcopal government above thirty years, and, during that time, conſtantly demanded and earneſtly ſollicited the abolition of epiſcopacy, with reſpect both to temporals and ſpirituals. Nevertheleſs from the beginning of the reforma-

[q] This cauſe was not only argued by the king's, and Mr. Hampden's counſel, but afterwards by the judges at the bench, and all of them (except Hutton and Crooke) argued, and gave their judgment for the king. Judge Crooke (ſays Whitelock, of his own knowledge) was reſolved to deliver his opinion for the king, and to that end had prepared his argument: but a few days before, upon diſcourſe with ſome of his relations, and moſt ſerious thoughts of the buſineſs, and being heartened by his lady, who told her huſband upon this occaſion, "That ſhe hoped he would do nothing againſt his conſcience, for fear of any danger or prejudice to him or his family; and that ſhe would be contented to ſuffer want or any miſery with him, rather than be an occaſion for him to do or ſay any thing againſt his judgment. Upon theſe, I ſay, and the like encouragements, but chiefly upon his better thoughts, he ſuddenly altered his purpoſe, and argued and declared his opinion againſt the king. Whitelock's Mem. p. 24.

tion till 1592, no expreſs act of parliament could be obtained, whether for or againſt epiſcopacy, or to approve or reject the preſbyterian government, if we except the interval between the years 1571, and 1575, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter[r].

Had the general aſſemblies confined their demands to the aboliſhing of epiſcopacy as to the ſpiritual functions, very likely they would have eaſily obtained it. But after the abolition of the epiſcopal office as far as in them lay, they were not contented with deſiring that their acts might be confirmed by the parliament, but demanded alſo that the name of biſhop might be aboliſhed, and the biſhops deprived of all ſorts of temporal honours and privileges, as the right of ſitting in parliament and the like. But the court always oppoſed it ſtrenuouſly, becauſe the biſhoprics and abbies being filled by the king, he could almoſt depend upon as many votes in parliament as there were biſhops and abbots. For the ſame reaſon the court, by ſecret practices, hindered the parliament from paſſing any act to eſtabliſh preſbytery and abrogate the ſpiritual juriſdiction of biſhops, becauſe it was perceived that this would tend to deprive them of their temporal honours. Not but that, in the actual practice of the church, epiſcopacy was really aboliſhed and preſbytery eſtabliſhed; but however, as long as there was no expreſs act to aboliſh epiſcopacy, the biſhops and abbots could not be prevented from voting in parliament, which was a great advantage to the court: ſo the name and title of biſhops and abots ſtill ſubſiſted. They held the lands annexed to their benefices, and enjoyed the ſame temporal privileges with their predeceſſors, though the office was ceaſed. This is ſo true with reſpect to the abbots, as to admit of no diſpute: the abbies were in the poſſeſſion of laymen, who ſat in parliament by the name and title of abbots. As to the biſhops, the thing is not ſo clear, becauſe the title of biſhop was conferred on churchmen: had the court beſtowed the biſhoprics upon laymen, it would have given the aſſembly too great an advantage, who deſired nothing more than a plauſible pretence to preſs the abolition of the temporalities of the prelates. This ſhews that a man may juſtly ſay, there were, and there were not, at the ſame time, biſhops in Scotland: there were biſhops, if it is conſidered that there were perſons ſo called, who held the lands and revenues of the ſees, and who, as ſuch, had a ſeat in parliament; there were none, with reſpect to the ſpiritual functions, which were really aboliſhed by the decrees of the general aſſembly, and by actual practice, though the parliament had not expreſly repealed them. Upon the confuſion of the ſpiritual and temporal ſtates of the biſhops, all the objections and anſwers in this diſpute wholly turn. Some prove very plainly that epiſcopacy ſubſiſted in Scotland, provided they confine the meaning of that word to temporals; but their proofs are very defective with regard to ſpirituals. Others evidently ſhew that epiſcopacy was aboliſhed as to the ſpiritual functions by virtue of the acts of the general aſſembly; but they cannot prove it was aboliſhed with reſpect to the temporal privileges, ſince the parliament had not yet made any deciſion. As neither can produce any act of parliament, at leaſt till ſuch a time, they allege ſome from whence they endeavour to draw inferences to their advantage. But this requires a further explanation. For the better underſtanding this matter we muſt neceſſarily diſtinguiſh the various circumſtances of Scotland, from the beginning of the reformation, namely, in the reign of Mary; in that of James VI. during his minority; under the ſame prince after aſſuming the goverment, according to the ſeveral miniſters or favourites by whoſe advice he was directed; and laſtly, under the ſame prince after his acceſſion to England. The ſtate of biſhops depended all this time on the intereſts of thoſe who were in the adminiſtration.

The reign of Mary laſted till this year 1567. The queen was a zealous catholic, and yet, ſo long as the earl of Murray her natural brother had any credit with her, the reformation was not attacked. But towards the end of her reign, under Bothwel's adminiſtration, the general aſſembly loſt ground. However, in 1566, they made the fore-mentioned decree, to approve of the diſcipline of the churches of Switzerland, and of a parity among the miniſters, which entirely deſtroyed epiſcopacy. But the queen, regardleſs of the decree, openly reſtored the archbiſhopric of St. Andrews, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the aſſembly.

The interval from the depoſing of queen Mary in 1567, to 1573, was a time of troubles and diſcord, under the adminiſtration of ſeveral regents, whoſe authority was not firmly eſtabliſhed: ſo that it was very difficult for the parliament effectually to ſettle the diſcipline of the church. All that can be ſaid is, that they rejected not what was eſtabliſhed by the general aſſembly, though they gave not their actual conſent to it. On the other hand, in 1572, and 1573, the regent, for ſome private views, cauſed ſome acts to be paſſed in favour of epiſcopacy, but which were afterwards repealed. Theſe acts were as follow:

By the firſt, which is the 46th of the parliament holden in 1572, it is declared, "The archbiſhops and biſhops have the authority, and are ordained, to convene and deprive all inferior perſons being miniſters, who ſhall not ſubſcribe the articles of religion, and give their oath for acknowledging and recognoſcing of our ſovereign lord and his authority, and bring a teſtimonial in writing thereupon, within a month after their admiſſion."

By the 48th act of the ſame parliament, it is declared, "That archbiſhops and biſhops have authority at their viſitations to deſign miniſters glebes."

By the 54th of the ſaid parliament, "Archbiſhops and biſhops were authoriſed to nominate and appoint at the viſitations, perſons in every parochin for making and ſetting of the taxation, for upholding and repairing of kirks and kirkyards, and to convene, try, and cenſure all perſons that ſhall be found to have applied to their own uſe the ſtones, timber, or any thing elſe pertaining to kirks demoliſhed."

By the 55th of the parliament in 1574, "Archbiſhops and biſhops were authoriſed to admoniſh perſons married, in caſe of deſertion, to adhere, and in caſe of diſobedience, to direct charges to the miniſter of the parochin to proceed to the ſentence of excommunication."

There appears in theſe four acts ſome ſigns of the epiſcopal juriſdiction, or at leaſt that the parliament did not look upon epiſcopacy as entirely aboliſhed. But on the other hand, if the biſhops actually exerciſed their functions at that time, where was the neceſſity of the parliament's authoriſing them to act in moſt of the things ſpecified in theſe ſtatutes? But there is here a ſtronger objection ſtill againſt the biſhops; and that is, they who have thus cited theſe acts, have curtailed them, and paſſed over in ſilence the ſuperintendants who were joined with the biſhops, from whence it is inferred that the biſhops were impowered only as commiſſioners of the parliament.

I proceed now to the time of king James's majority, or at leaſt of his aſſuming the government, though he was not really of age. The earl of Morton having loſt his head in 1581, the duke of Lenox and the earl of Arran, ruled the young king as they pleaſed. They were expelled afterwards by the Ruthens, but the king recalled the earl of Arran, who became more powerful than ever. It is certain this favourite's deſign was to diſengage the king his maſter from the intereſt of England, and to countenance the duke of Guiſe's project to invade Elizabeth by Scotland: it was the favourite's buſineſs therefore to curb the too great power of the general aſſembly, who ſtrongly oppoſed the execution of that project. The beſt way to ſucceed, was not only to protect the biſhops, but alſo to give them authority over the miniſters, that theſe might be more humble. To that end he procured the four following acts in the parliament of 1584.

The 140th ran: "That none of his majeſty's lieges and ſubjects preſume or take upon hand to impugn the dignity and authority of the three eſtates of this kingdom, whereby the honour and authority of the king's majeſty's ſupreme court of parliament, paſt all memory of man, hath been [r] For the better underſtanding of the ſequel of the Scotch affairs, it will not be amiſs to give a brief account of the preſent government of the kirk of Scotland. In Scotland are eight hundred and ninety pariſhes, each of which is divided in proportion to its extent, into particular diſtricts, and every diſtrict has its own ruling elders (that is, men of the principal quality and intereſts in the pariſh), and deacon (that is, one who has a competency, and is of a good character for manners and underſtanding). A conſiſtory of miniſters, elders, and deacons, is called a kirk-ſeſſion, the loweſt eccleſiaſtical judicatory, which meets once a week, to conſider the affairs of the pariſh: the miniſter is always moderator, but without a negative. Appeals lie from hence to their own preſbyteries, which are the next higher judicators. Scotland is divided into ſixty-nine preſbyteries, each conſiſting of from twelve to twenty-four contiguous pariſhes, with one ruling leader choſen half-yearly out of every kirk-ſeſſion, compoſe a preſbytery; they meet in the head town, and chuſe their moderator, who muſt be a miniſter; half-yearly he is only prolocutor. From hence appeals lie to provincial ſynods, which are compoſed of ſeveral adjacent preſbyteries, two, three, four, to eight: there are fifteen in all. The members are the miniſters and a ruling elder out of every pariſh. Theſe ſynods meet twice a year, at the principal town of it bounds: they chuſe a moderator, who is their prolocutor. The acts of the ſynod are ſubject to the review of the general aſſembly, the dernier reſort of the kirk of Scotland. It conſiſts of commiſſioners from preſbyteries, royal burghs, and univerſities: a preſbytery of twelve miniſters ſends two miniſters and one ruling elder; of between twelve and eighteen, it ſends three and one ruling elder; of between eighteen and twenty-four, ſends four and two ruling elders; of twenty-four, ſends five and two elders. Every royal burgh ſends one elder, and Edinburgh two; every univerſity ſends one commiſſioner, uſually a miniſter: the aſſembly meets once a year.

continued, or to ſeek or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the ſame three eſtates, or any of them, in time coming, under the pain of treaſon."

By the 131ſt, "All judgments and juriſdictions, as well in ſpiritual as temporal cauſes, in practice and cuſtom, during the twenty-four years by-paſt, not approved by the king and three eſtates in parliament, are diſcharged; and it is defended, that none of his highneſs's ſubjects, of whatſoever quality, eſtate, or function they be of, ſpiritual or temporal, preſume or take upon hand to convocate, convene, or aſſemble themſelves together for holding of councils, conventions, or aſſemblies, to treat, conſult, or determinate in any matter of eſtate, civil or eccleſiaſtical (except in the ordinary judgments), without his majeſty's ſpecial commandment, or expreſs licence had and obtained to that effect.

By the 132d, "Biſhops are authorized to try and judge miniſters guilty of crimes meriting deprivation."

The 133d ordains, "That miniſters exerciſing any office, beſide their calling, be tried and adjudged culpable by their ordinaries."

It is manifeſt, that the intent of theſe four acts was to aboliſh the general aſſemblies with the preſbytery, and reſtore the epiſcopal government. But it muſt be obſerved,

1. Theſe acts were made during the tyranny of the earl of Arran, who had formed the project of admitting into Scotland a popiſh army; and it is no credit to the biſhops, that he ſhould think them proper to countenance that deſign. 2. The general aſſembly ſolemnly proteſted againſt theſe acts, maintaining it was not in the power of the king and parliament to ſettle or alter the government of the church, without the church's conſent; that it could not be juſtly pretended that four biſhops, who were preſent in this parliament, and whoſe ſpiritual power was long ſince aboliſhed, and four laymen, under the name of abbots, were lawful repreſentatives of the whole church, or that their conſent to theſe acts ſhould be conſidered as the conſent of the national church. 3. Theſe four acts were repealed by the parliament of 1592.

I muſt proceed now to another juncture, when king James, freed from the earl of Arran's tyranny, having relinquiſhed the chimerical projects ſuggeſted by that favourite, was better acquainted with his true intereſts: I mean the year 1587. Though, in the beginning of this year, Elizabeth had beheaded Mary, king James's mother, he was ſoon comforted by the hopes of poſſeſſing one day the crown of England, which he was afraid of loſing in caſe he continued to form projects againſt religion, as he had done during the earl of Arran's miniſtry. This ſame year therefore he gave the royal aſſent to the act of annexation, whereby were annexed to the crown "All lordſhips and baronies pertaining to whatſoever archbiſhops, or biſhops, abbots, priors, nuns, and monks; reſerving always to archbiſhops, etc. and others poſſeſſors of great benefices of the eſtate of prelates, and which before had or hath vote in parliament, the principal caſtles and fortalices."

It may be inferred from this act, that the depriving the biſhops of their lands, was depriving them withal of the right of ſitting in parliament, ſince that right was founded entirely upon the poſſeſſion of the baronies: nay, it ſeems that the title of biſhop began now to be conferred on laymen, which gave them only the poſſeſſion of the chief caſtle belonging to the ſee: at leaſt we find that, ſhortly after, the biſhopric of Cathneſs becoming vacant by the death of Robert earl of March, the king's uncle, the general aſſembly prayed his majeſty to give that ſee to a clergyman.

At laſt, in 1592, the parliament appealed and annulled not only the fore-mentioned acts of 1583, but alſo ſuch as were contrary to the diſcipline eſtabliſhed, "approving, ratifying and confirming the aſſemblies, preſbyteries, and ſynods, with the diſcipline and juriſdiction of the kirk, as moſt juſt and godly, notwithſtanding whatſoever ſtatutes, acts, canons, civil or municipal laws, made in the contrary. Further, they abrogated all acts, granting commiſſion to biſhops and other judges conſtitute in eccleſiaſtical cauſes; and ordained preſentation to benefices, to be directed to preſbyteries, with power to give collation thereupon."

This act was confirmed in 1593, and the power of preſbyteries ſolemnly acknowledged by the parliament in 1594, Act 129.

Was not this ſufficient to aboliſh epiſcopacy entirely? By the act of 1587, the biſhops were diſpoſſeſſed of their lands; and by that of 1592, they loſt all manner of juriſdiction: for how could the power of the preſbyteries and general aſſemblies be conſiſtent with the epiſcopal juriſdiction? And yet there were perſons who ſtill bore the name of biſhop, by reaſon of their holding caſtles formerly belonging to the ſees; for it does not appear upon what other account they could be called biſhops: nay, very likely, ſeveral of theſe ſorts of fees were in lay-hands; at leaſt, the abbies and priories were certainly ſo.

But things remained not long upon the ſame foot. Whether the general aſſemblies uſurped too much authority, after they were freed from the biſhops, or for ſome other reaſons, the king formed new projects, and reſolved to reſtore the biſhops. At that time, as at many other junctures, the court had ſo great an influence over the parliament, that almoſt whatever was deſired, was enacted.

The king therefore ſo ordered it in 1597, that "the privilege of a voice in parliament was granted to the whole kirk; and under that name to biſhops and abbots, even as in times of papiſtry. As to the office and ſpiritual government of biſhops, the parliament remitted them to the king and the aſſembly, intending not to derogate from the provincial and general aſſemblies, and other whatſoever preſbyteries and ſeſſions, nor from the diſcipline eſtabliſhed in the kirk."

The act ſhews, the biſhops had loſt their right of ſeat in parliament, ſince there was occaſion to give it them again. By virtue of this act, they reſumed their places in parliament, and even Sir Robert Spotiſwood a layman, took his ſeat there, as abbot of New-Abbey. The king deſired nothing more at that time than to introduce the biſhops and abbots again into the parliament. But he did not ſtop there, as will be ſeen preſently.

Mean while, as the general aſſembly ſtill continued ſtrenuouſly to oppoſe the promotion of churchmen to poſts of authority in the ſtate, and as the people ſeemed more inclined to follow the determinations of the general aſſembly, than thoſe of the parliament, it was to be feared, this diſſenſion would at laſt raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. To prevent this inconvenience, the king cauſed the general aſſembly, held at Montroſs in the year 1600, to be preſſed ſo earneſtly to conſent to what the parliament of 1597 had granted to the biſhops, that they were obliged either to comply, or entirely break with him. They approved this act therefore, but upon certain conditions, the ſubſtance whereof was, that the biſhops ſhould act in parliament only as commiſſioners or deputies of the kirk, and ſhould be ſubject to the general aſſembly. The conditions laid upon them were theſe:

They ſhall obtain a commiſſion from the general aſſembly to act in their name in parliament, and ſhall ſwear to obſerve the following articles.

They ſhall move nothing, without having an expreſs order from the kirk, on pain of being deprived of their office.

They ſhall not conſent, no not by their ſilence, to any thing againſt the liberties of the kirk, under the ſame penalty.

They ſhall be accountable to each general aſſembly, for their behaviour in the diſcharge of their commiſſion, ſince the laſt aſſembly; be obliged to demand the approbation, and ſubmit to the determination and cenſure of the aſſembly without any appeal, on pain of being pronounced infamous and excommunicated.

They ſhall be ſatisfied with that portion of their benefices, the king ſhall pleaſe to allot them for their ſubſiſtence, that they may not be a burden to the miniſters that are already, or ſhall be hereafter ſettled in their benefices.

They ſhall not ſuffer their benefices to go to decay, or diſpoſe of any thing belonging thereto, without the conſent of the king and the general aſſembly, and ſhall allow that inhibitions be directed to them for that purpoſe.

They ſhall exerciſe the functions of paſtors in their own congregations, and be ſubject to the cenſure of their own preſbyteries and the general aſſembly, like the reſt of the miniſters that are not commiſſioned.

In the adminiſtration of diſcipline, and in every thing relating to the government of the kirk, they ſhall uſurp no power or juriſdiction beyond what is adjudged to other miniſters, on pain of forfeiting their office.

In preſbyteries and general and provincial aſſemblies, they ſhall demean themſelves in the ſame manner as other miniſters, and ſhall be liable to their cenſure.

None of thoſe that ſit in parliament ſhall be members of the general aſſemblies, unleſs they be expreſly deputed by their preſbyteries.

It is plain from theſe conditions, inſerted in the act of parliament made to confirm that of 1597, what was the intention of the Montroſs aſſembly, in agreeing, out of complaiſance to the king, that the biſhops ſhould ſit in parliament. The biſhops embraced what was for their advantage, namely, the aſſembly's conſent to the privilege that was granted them: but never performed any of the conditions. The court was then favourable to them, but it was ſtill more ſo, after the king's acceſſion to the crown of England.

As ſoon as James I. became king of England, he formed, as I ſaid, the project of eſtabliſhing in the kirk of Scotland, the diſcipline and hierarchy of the church of England. To accompliſh this deſign, it was neceſſary to reſtore the biſhops to all the rights they had enjoyed before the reformation, and accordingly he reſolved to begin with that reſtoration. His power in the parliament was very great during the laſt years of his being in Scotland; but it was nothing in compariſon of what it was after his acceſſion to the throne of England. It ſuffices to ſay, that this influence was in proportion to the means he had of diſpenſing to his Scotch ſubjects favours, which he had not been able to grant them in their own country. We have ſeen, in the hiſtory of his reign, how he ſhowered his bounties upon them, which the Engliſh could not forbear to complain of. It is not therefore very ſtrange, that the members of the parliament of Scotland ſhould be at his devotion. He made uſe of his credit in the year 1606, and obtained the following act of parliament:

"The ancient and fundamental policy, conſiſting in the maintenance of the three eſtates of parliament, being of late greatly impaired, and almoſt ſubverted, eſpecially by the indirect aboliſhing of the eſtate of biſhops by the act of annexation: albeit it was never meaned by his majeſty, nor by his eſtates, that the ſaid eſtate of biſhops, being a neceſſary eſtate of the parliament, ſhould any way be ſuppreſſed; yet by diſmembering and abſtracting from them of their livings, being brought in contempt and poverty, the ſaid eſtate of biſhops is hereby reſtored, and redintegrate to their ancient and accuſtomed honours, dignities, prerogatives, privileges, lands, teindes, rents, as the ſame was in the reformed kirk, moſt amply and free, at any time before the act of annexation; reſcinding and annulling all acts of parliament made in prejudice of the ſaid biſhops in the premiſſes, or any of them, with all that hath followed, or may follow thereupon, to the effect they may peaceably enjoy the honours, dignities, privileges, and prerogatives competent to them or their eſtate ſince the reformation of religion."

Thus far however it concerned only the temporalities, there not being in the act a ſingle word from whence it might be inferred that the parliament reſtored the biſhops to their ſpiritual functions or ancient juriſdiction. The general aſſembly pretended indeed, that the king and parliament could make no alterations in the ſpirituals, without the kirk's conſent: but they had no power to hinder the king and parliament from giving the lands of the crown to whom they pleaſed, and from admitting into the parliament ſuch as they thought proper. But the king did not intend to ſtop there.

In 1609, the king, under colour of confirming the act of 1606, obtained of the parliament another act, which in confirming the other, added a clauſe, whereby the biſhops were reſtored to all their former authority, privileges and juriſdictions. By virtue of this laſt act it was that the biſhops took poſſeſſion of the government of the kirk, notwithſtanding the conditions of the Montroſs aſſembly, which they little regarded, and ſuppoſed to be annulled by this act. But the general aſſembly proteſted in form againſt this act, affirming the parliament had not power, without the kirk's conſent, to reſtore a ſpiritual office that had been aboliſhed. They proteſted alſo againſt the promotion of churchmen to civil poſts, as pernicious to religion. Their proteſtation was rejected: but however it was printed and diſperſed throughout the kingdom.

The general aſſembly's oppoſition had a great effect upon the people, who loved not the biſhops, and for fifty years had been uſed to the preſbyterian government. They complained the parliament had been gained to impoſe upon them epiſcopal government, which was odious to the whole nation, not only without conſulting the kirk, but even againſt her will. This oppoſition convinced the king, that notwithſtanding the authority of the parliament, he ſhould find it very difficult to reduce the people of Scotland to obedience, ſo long as the general aſſembly oppoſed the reſtoration of the biſhops. He reſolved therefore to cauſe a general aſſembly to be held at Glaſgow in 1610, where he took care to gain a majority of votes, and of which the biſhops were the chief directors. The aſſembly thus diſpoſed, agreed that the biſhops ſhould reſume all their ſpiritual functions, with the government of the church. After that, in 1612, the king called a parliament, who, upon the conſent of the Glaſgow aſſembly, paſſed an act, whereby the biſhops were reſtored to all their ſpiritual rights.

The adverſaries of the biſhops, aſtoniſhed at this proceeding, were forced to be ſilent, the torrent being too ſtrong to be oppoſed. Beſides, the general aſſemblies being now leſs neceſſary, ſince the biſhops had the government of the church, the king very ſeldom gave them leave to meet, and when he did, it was after he had taken all neceſſary precautions to be aſſured that the biſhops would be the directors and managers. In 1617, he morever obtained of the parliament an act, whereby it was ordained, that the biſhops ſhould be elected by the chapters, and conſecrated with the accuſtomed rites, that is, with thoſe introduced of late years. As during the troubles in Scotland on account of religion, the people, as will preſently appear, loudly complained of the reſtoration of the biſhops, the conſent of the Glaſgow aſſembly in 1610 was continually objected to them. For this reaſon the firſt general aſſembly that king Charles was obliged to grant in 1638, found no better method to evade this objection, than to declare the Glaſgow aſſembly void from the beginning.

Such was the ſtate of epiſcopacy in Scotland, from the beginning of the reformation to the reign of Charles I. who, at his acceſſion to the throne, found it fully eſtabliſhed, though contrary to the bent of the nation in general, as it plainly appeared afterwards. James I. as I obſerved, had formed the deſign of putting the kirk of Scotland upon the ſame foot with the church of England. He had made great progreſs therein, and Charles I. purſued the ſame deſign with ſtill more ardor than his father. But as hitherto I have related only what concerns the biſhops, it is neceſſary, before we ſpeak of the troubles of that kingdom, which firſt commenced in 1637, to mention the meaſures ſucceſſively taken by the two kings to accompliſh their deſign.

After James I. had entirely reſtored epiſcopacy in Scotland, he reſolved to finiſh his work by degrees. To that purpoſe, he began with five articles mentioned in the hiſtory of his reign, which he cauſed to be approved by the general aſſembly of Perth, by means as illegal perhaps as violent [b]. The biſhops governed the preſbyteries, by making themſelves moderators, ſo that it was not poſſible to chuſe any for commiſſioners to the aſſembly general, but ſuch as they thought proper. However, the five articles being approved, the king, who by long experience was well acquainted with the genius and character of the Scots, thought it neceſſary, before all things, to curb the petulancy and boldneſs of the miniſters, for fear they ſhould raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. The people had for them a great veneration, which was even increaſed after the reſtoration of the biſhops, becauſe theſe were more careful to maintain their grandeur and power, than to gain the love of their flocks. To compaſs his ends, the king ſet up in Scotland a high commiſſion, like that in England, but which, till then, was unheard of in Scotland. As the Scots had never given their king the title of ſupreme head of the church, as was done in England, there had been no occaſion to eſtabliſh a high-commiſſion in Scotland, to exerciſe the ſupremacy in the king's name. But James I. who was very apt to ſtretch his prerogative, readily believed, he had no leſs right to exerciſe the ſupremacy in Scotland than in England, though till now he had never thought of any ſuch thing. Be this as it will, by means of this new court, which was at firſt very ſevere, and excommunicated and deprived the miniſters for the leaſt offence, he kept them ſo in awe, that not a man dared to ſtir. This, with the favours beſtowed upon ſuch as ſhewed a readineſs to countenance his deſigns, made him almoſt ſecure of ſucceſs in his undertaking, which daily advanced. Nothing was wanting to complete it, but the cauſing the Engliſh liturgy and canons to be received in Scotland, after which, there would be no difference between the churches of the two kingdoms. This was as eaſy to be accompliſhed as what had been done already. So the king having convened a general aſſembly at Aberdeen, it was repreſented to them, that divine ſervice was performed in the kirk of Scotland after an indecent manner, every miniſter having liberty to compoſe public prayers and uſe what expreſſions they pleaſed, which was liable to great inconveniencies: that it would therefore be proper to compile a liturgy to be uſed in every church in Scotland, to the end the people might every where pray with one heart and one mouth. It muſt be obſerved, that it was not moved to receive the Engliſh liturgy, but only to compoſe one proper for the kirk of Scotland. Whereupon ſeveral members of the aſſembly believed, they might without danger agree, that a common-

Many Scotiſh preſbyterians, it ſeems, were ſo weak as to believe, that theſe were the five articles condemned at the ſynod of Dort. See the five articles of Dort. vol. VIII. p. 331.

prayer-book ſhould be uſed, and the rather, as the reformed churches of Geneva, Switzerland, France, and Germany, had their ſeveral liturgies, though very different from that of the Engliſh. This motion being approved, the aſſembly appointed commiſſioners to compoſe the new liturgy, and it may well be imagined, this nomination was agreeable to the king's deſire. Theſe commiſſioners, moſt of whom were biſhops, after ſpending a conſiderable time in framing the liturgy, only copied that which was ſet forth in England in the reign of Edward VI. and ſent it to the king for his approbation.

The affairs of the Palatinate and the Spaniſh marriage ſo ingroſſed king James during the laſt years of his life, that he could not effectually think of finiſhing the work he had undertaken in Scotland. As he knew the Scots perfectly, and their ſtrong prejudice for preſbyterianiſm, he doubtleſs thought proper to defer the execution of his deſign till he had ended his two principal affairs. He was apprehenſive, that if any troubles ſhould unfortunately happen in Scotland on account of the liturgy, they might divert him from what was then the principal object of his care. I have related in the hiſtory of his reign, how he was amuſed for many years, and therefore he could not, before his death, finiſh what he had begun, but left it to the care of his ſucceſſor.

Charles I. was no leſs eager than his father, to eſtabliſh in Scotland the diſcipline of the church of England. But his circumſtances in the beginning of his reign, did not allow him to apply himſelf to the finiſhing of this affair with all the ſpeed he deſired. His wars with Spain, and afterwards with France, his projects with regard to his prerogative, his continual quarrels with the parliaments, required his whole application. Beſides, it was not proper in theſe junctures to rouze the Scots, who indeed ſeemed quiet and ſubmiſſive, but however were very diſcontented, as the king well knew. He ſtayed therefore till he had concluded a peace with France and Spain, and rendered himſelf as it were abſolute by the diſſolution of three parliaments, by his reſolution never to call any more, and by his eſtabliſhing his prerogative concerning taxes without the concurrence of the parliament. Then it was that he ſeriouſly thought of completing the reduction of the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England. He had not however been idle with reſpect to Scotland during theſe five years of his reign. Though he had delayed the execution of his deſign, it was ever in his thoughts, and he had taken ſome meaſures which ſeemed to warrant ſucceſs. 1. He had either continued or renewed the high commiſſion, introduced by the king his father. 2. He had almoſt aboliſhed the general aſſemblies, by not allowing any ſince his acceſſion to the throne. 3. He had ſo ſupported and countenanced the biſhops, that they had the clergy entirely in their power, whom they ruled with a very heavy hand. 4. He had gained a great number of the miniſters by means of benefices and eccleſiaſtical offices or dignities, which were granted only to thoſe whoſe compliance he could depend upon. 5. He had ſo filled the council of Scotland, in whoſe hands the adminiſtration of affairs is lodged in the king's abſence, that there was ſcarce a privy counſellor but what was engaged to promote his deſigns. 6. There was in this council ſeveral biſhops, and the archbiſhop of St. Andrews was veſted with the chancellorſhip, the prime office of the kingdom [c]. 7. He had ſecured the lords of ſeſſion, that is, of the college of juſtice [d], and in a word, all who had places depending upon the court. 8. He had charged Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to hold continual correſpondence with the biſhops and council of Scotland, and take with them the neceſſary meaſures to accompliſh the deſign. It ſeemed therefore impoſſible, that the king ſhould meet with any oppoſition from a diſperſed people, without leaders, without ſupport, and deſtitute of the aſſiſtance of their magiſtrates.

[1637] With all theſe advantages, Charles undertook to finiſh what ſtill remained to be done in Scotland. To that end, after a reviſal of the liturgy tranſmitted to the late king, he ſent it back into Scotland, with orders to have it received in the kirk. But upon the objection, that this liturgy being word for word the ſame with that of the church of England, the Scots might take offence at the impoſing upon them the liturgy of another kingdom, he thought proper to make ſome alterations, and ordered, that inſtead of the Engliſh verſion of the pſalms, and of the epiſtles and Goſpels, the Scotch tranſlation ſhould be inſerted in the liturgy of Scotland. After that, he believed it could not be complained of with the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon, that he had a mind to impoſe the Engliſh liturgy upon the kirk of Scotland, though there was no other difference between them, than what I have mentioned [e].

During the reviſal of the liturgy, the king ſent into Scotland a book of canons, for the government of the kirk, and theſe canons enjoined a conformity to the liturgy, though it was not yet publiſhed, nor ſo much as known to the people. This was ſo groſs an error, that it muſt be ſupriſing, the king and his miniſters could be guilty of it. The pretence to introduce theſe new canons was, that the acts of the general aſſemblies not being printed, but contained in many large manuſcript volumes, remained unknown to the people. For this reaſon the king imagined, they would be obliged to him for his care in extracting the moſt material and principal things, in a little book which might be in every one's hands. It ſeems ſometimes, that certain princes imagine they have a ſovereign power, not only over the bodies, but alſo the underſtandings of their ſubjects, to make them believe the greateſt abſurdities. We have here two remarkable inſtances. Charles undertakes to perſuade the people of Scotland, that he does not pretend to impoſe the Engliſh liturgy upon them, though it is the very ſame, not only in ſubſtance, but word for word, becauſe the verſion of the epiſtles and goſpels is different. On the other hand, he would have them believe, that the book of canons is only an abſtract of the acts of their general aſſemblies, though the contrary be evident. From the beginning of the reformation, to the Glaſgow aſſembly in 1610, that is, during the ſpace of fifty years, the general aſſemblies had always condemned and rejected epiſcopacy, and all their acts without exception, ſuppoſe the preſbyterian government. The book of canons, on the contrary, ſuppoſed, in every article, the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy and epiſcopal government. How then was it poſſible to perſuade the Scots, that this book of canons was an abſtract of the acts of their general aſſemblies? This was impoſing upon them in a very ſtrange manner [f].

The liturgy being ready, the king ſent it into Scotland, and appointed it to be read in all the churches of Edinburgh on Eaſter-day this year 1637. But upon further conſideration, the order was revoked. The king was told, it might be dangerous to ſurpriſe the people with the reading of the liturgy before they were prepared. That it was more proper to defer it ſome months, in order to ſee whether, in that interval, the male-contents would attempt to oppoſe it. In that caſe, they might be oppreſſed before they had time to take juſt meaſures, and the ill ſucceſs of their attempt, would only ſerve to promote the king's deſign. This reaſon appeared ſo plauſible, that the king ordered the reading of the liturgy to be deferred till Sunday the 23d of July the ſame year. During this whole interval, there was no unuſual motion in Edinburgh, nor the leaſt appearance that the king's orders would meet with oppoſition [g]. To be ſtill more ſecure, the council cauſed it to be publiſhed eight days before in all the churches of the city, that the liturgy would be read the Sunday following. No perſon ſtirred the whole week, and all was ſo quiet in the city, that the council doubted not of ſucceſs.

Nevertheleſs, the next Sunday the lord chancellor, moſt of the lords of the council, ſome biſhops, the lords of ſeſſion or judges of the realm, and the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, repairing to St. Giles's church, the cathedral of the city, when the dean opened the book to read the liturgy, the meaner ſort of [c] This office had never been in the hands of a church-man ſince the reformation. He had likewiſe nine biſhops lords of ſeſſion, or privy-counſellors. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 67. Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 386.

[d] This court was inſtituted by James V. (after the form of the ſupreme ſovereign court or parliament of Paris) who gave it great privileges and immunities. The lord chancellor claimed a right to preſide in this as in all the king's courts. But this was much diſputed by the court of ſeſſion, and therefore he ſeldom came there. This court ſits from the 1ſt of November, to the laſt of February, and from the 1ſt of June, to the laſt of July. From hence lies no appeal. It conſiſts of fifteen members.

[e] See a particular account of the differences between the two liturgies in Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. tom. II. p. 768, 769.——King Charles, in his declaration about the Scotiſh liturgy, ſays, "That it was compoſed in ſubſtance not different from that of England, that the Roman party might not upbraid the two nations with any differences in their liturgies, and yet in ſome few alterations differing from it, that it might truly be reputed a book of the Scotiſh church's own compoſing." Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 387.

[f] The lord Clarendon juſtly obſerves, as ſomething ſtrange, that neither theſe canons, nor the liturgy, were communicated to the Scotiſh clergy, nor paſſed their approbation. They were compiled by ſome Scotiſh biſhops, and tranſmitted from Scotland to archbiſhop Laud, Juxon biſhop of London, and Wren of Norwich, who reviſed, and put the finiſhing hand to them. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 83, 85, 86.

[g] Nor (ſays the lord Clarendon) was any thing done for the better adjuſting things in the time of this ſuſpenſion, but every thing left in the ſame ſtate of unconcernedneſs as it was before; not ſo much as the council's being better informed of it; as if they had been ſure all men would have ſubmitted to it for conſcience-ſake. He ſays, the earl of Traquaire adviſed this delay. Vol. I. p. 87.

The

people, with clapping of hands, execrations and outcries, raiſed ſo hideous a noiſe, that it was not poſſible to hear a word. Whereupon the biſhop of Edinburgh, who was to preach, ſtepping into the pulpit with thoughts to appeaſe the people, was received with the ſame clamours and imprecations; and if a ſtool, thrown at his head, had not been diverted by the hand of one preſent, would have been in danger of being killed. The lord chancellor and judges found no more reverence. At laſt, the provoſt and bailiffs of the city came from their places, and with much difficulty thruſt out of the church the inraged populace, and ſhutting the doors, the dean read the liturgy, though continually interrupted by the noiſe without, and the ſtones thrown in at the windows. There were the ſame tumults in all the reſt of the churches of Edinburgh, and yet no one was killed or wounded: only the biſhop of Edinburgh ran ſome riſk both in the church and in retiring to his lodging. This firſt tumult was raiſed only by the rabble, no perſon of condition or name appearing in it. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh openly diſavowed theſe diſorders, and promiſed the council to uſe their endeavours to diſcover and puniſh the authors and abettors. They offered likewiſe to take order for the ſecurity of the miniſters who ſhould be appointed to read the liturgy another time, and writ to the archbiſhop of Canterbury to clear themſelves, deſiring him to repreſent their innocence to the king.

Harveſt approaching, many people left Edinburgh and went into the country. Mean while, the magiſtrates of the city prayed the council that the liturgy might not be read, becauſe they had obſerved the people were not yet diſpoſed to receive it. But in October, after harveſt, ſo great a concourſe of people flocked to Edinburgh, that it was eaſy to ſee a freſh tumult was preparing. Wherefore the council publiſhed three proclamations. The firſt, to order all ſtrangers to depart the city within twenty-four hours. A ſecond, for removing the ſeſſion [h] from Edinburgh to Dundee [i]. A third, for calling in and burning a ſeditious book, intitled, "A Diſpute againſt the Engliſh Popiſh Ceremonies, obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland." The firſt and laſt were not much regarded.

On the morrow, the 18th of October, the people came together in a tumultuous manner in the ſtreets of Edinburgh, and ſeeing the biſhop of Galloway as he was going to the council, a great multitude followed him all the way with continual curſings, but however did him no hurt. They even beſet the counſel-houſe, demanding the biſhop's perſon, though it was in their power to have ſeized, nay, to have killed him whilſt he was in the ſtreet. The council finding themſelves thus beſet, ſent to the magiſtrates to come to their relief; who anſwered, they were themſelves ſurrounded in their town-houſe by their own citizens, who threatened to tear them in pieces, if they did not immediately ſign a paper, which for fear of their lives they were forced to do. The paper contained theſe three things: Firſt, that the magiſtrates ſhould join with the people in petitioning againſt the liturgy: Secondly, that by their authority they ſhould preſently reſtore to their pulpits Ramſey and Rollock, two ſilenced miniſters, very much beloved by the people: Thirdly, that they ſhould reſtore to his place one Henderſon, a ſilenced reader. Upon this the earls of Traquaire and Wigton, the firſt of whom was lord treaſurer, came to the town-houſe to adviſe with the magiſtrates, what was beſt to be done for the ſafety of the biſhop of Galloway, who was ſtill beſet. After the conſultation, the two earls returning to the council, were inſulted by the populace. The earl of Traquaire, was thrown down, his hat, cloak, and white ſtaff taken from him, the people crying out, "God defend all thoſe who will defend God's cauſe; and God confound the ſervice-book and all the maintainers of it." Preſently after, the provoſt came to the council, and declared, that though he had uſed his utmoſt endeavours, it was not poſſible to appeaſe the people. At laſt the lords of the council applied themſelves to ſome of the nobility and gentry, and others, who were now aſſembled to ſign the petition againſt the ſervice-book. Theſe men had more credit with the populace than the magiſtrates, and prevailed with them at length to retire. The ſecond tumult, wherein no perſon was killed or wounded no more than in the firſt, ſeemed however to be more important and dangerous; becauſe in the firſt, none but the rabble were concerned, whereas it plainly appeared, the mutineers were countenanced by ſeveral lords and gentlemen, as well as by the better ſort of citizens.

The tumult being appeaſed, a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding any meetings in the ſtreets or elſewhere; a proclamation of no uſe, at a time when the council could not be ignorant how much their authority was contemned by thoſe whom they would have inſpired with fear. Accordingly, ſo far were the male-contents from being terrified, that they ſent their commiſſioners to the board, to require that the ſilenced miniſters might be reſtored to them, and that they might have aſſurance for the punctual performance of what had been lately promiſed them by the magiſtrates. The council could eaſily ſee by this conduct, that the male-contents had no deſign to ſtop there. And indeed, ſhortly after, the lord chancellor received two petitions; one in the name of all the men, women, children, and ſervants of Edinburgh, againſt the liturgy: the other from the noblemen, gentry, miniſters and burgeſſes of the ſame city, againſt the liturgy and book of canons.

The firſt alleged, "That they had a long time winked at ſome alterations, being put in hope that no farther innovations ſhould follow. But now ſeeing that they were like to be conſtrained to embrace another ſervice, not approved by the church and kingdom, and which had neither been agitated nor received either by general aſſembly or parliament: they therefore deſired that they might have the happineſs of enjoying their religion, as it had been reformed in that land, and authorized by his majeſty."

In the ſecond, the petitioners complained, "That whereas they were attending a gracious anſwer to their former ſupplications againſt the ſervice-book, they were ſurpriſed and charged by public proclamation, to depart out of the town within twenty-four hours thereafter under pain of rebellion; by which their fears of a more ſevere and ſtrict courſe of proceeding were augmented. Wherefore they were conſtrained to remonſtrate, that in the book of common-prayer, drawn up and ſet forth by the archbiſhops and biſhops, were ſown the ſeeds of divers ſuperſtitions, idolatry, and falſe-doctrine, contrary to the religion eſtabliſhed in the realm by divers acts of parliament. That in the book of canons, &c. it was ordained, That whoſoever ſhall affirm, that the form of worſhip inſerted in the book of common-prayer, and adminiſtration of the ſacraments, doth contain any thing repugnant to the ſcriptures, or are corrupt, ſuperſtitious, or unlawful in the ſervice and worſhip of God, ſhall be excommunicated, and not be reſtored, but by the biſhop of the place or archbiſhop of the province." That beſides it is ordained, that "where in any of the canons there is no penalty expreſly ſet down, the puniſhment ſhall be arbitrary as the biſhop ſhall think fitteſt. All which canons were never ſeen or allowed in any general aſſembly, but were impoſed contrary to order of law appointed in the realm for eſtabliſhing conſtitutions eccleſiaſtical. Laſtly, That the biſhops had not only begun to urge the acceptance of thoſe things, by injunctions given in provincial aſſemblies, but alſo by open proclamation and charge of Horning [k]. Wherefore the petitioners craved, that this matter might be put to the trial, and the prelates be taken order with according to the laws of the realm, and not ſuffered to ſit any more as judges, until the cauſe be tried and decided according to juſtice."

The king thought not fit to anſwer theſe petitions, being on the contrary determined to puniſh ſeverely the authors of the late tumults. However, he commanded the privy council to publiſh a proclamation on this occaſion, ſuppoſing, though without any foundation, it would be capable of ſatisfying the people. After mention in the proclamation of the lords petition, &c. it was ſaid, "His majeſty, in a juſt reſentment of that foul indignity, the late inſurrections at Edinburgh, hath been moved to delay the ſignification of his majeſty's gracious intentions, in giving to his ſubjects ſuch ſatisfactory anſwers to their petitions, as in equity might be expected from ſo juſt and religious a prince: but yet his majeſty being unwilling that his loyal and faithful ſubjects ſhould be poſſeſſed with groundleſs and unneceſſary doubts and fears, his majeſty is pleaſed out of his goodneſs to declare, that as he abhorreth all ſuperſtition of popery, ſo he will be moſt careful, that nothing be allowed within his majeſty's dominions, but that which ſhall tend to the advancement of true religion, as it is at preſent profeſſed within his moſt ancient kingdom of Scotland; and that nothing is or was intended to be done therein, againſt the laudable laws of this his majeſty's native kingdom.".

It muſt be obſerved, that according to the king, the true religion was that of the church of England. That by the religion at preſent profeſſed, he meant only that which contained the hierarchy and epiſcopacy; and by the laws of the kingdom, he underſtood thoſe that were enacted after the king his father's acceſſion to the crown of England and of which I have ſpoken above. It is at leaſt certain the male-contents gave this ſenſe to his general expreſſions, from whence they inferred, he was very far from deſiſting from what he had undertaken, and ſtill farther from pardoning the late diſorders at Edinburgh. Wherefore, they reſolved to take meaſures, not only to ſecure themſelves from the king's reſentment, but alſo to cauſe all innovations complained of to be aboliſhed [1].

Some time after, the council having removed the ſeſſion to Stirling, the king ſent them another proclamation, with orders to have it publicly read in the principal towns of the kingdom. The proclamation was to this effect:

[1638] "WE find our royal authority much injured by ſome late petitions and declarations given in to our council againſt the book of Common Prayer, and canons of the church, both in the matter and in the carriage thereof; whereby we conceive thoſe of our nobility, gentry, and others, who kept and aſſiſted theſe meetings, for contriving and forming the ſaid petitions, to deſerve and be liable to our high cenſure, both in their perſons and fortunes; yet becauſe we believe, that what they have done herein is out of a prepoſterous zeal, we are graciouſly pleaſed to diſpenſe therewith, and with what may be their fault and error therein, to all ſuch as, upon ſignification or declaration of our pleaſure, ſhall retire themſelves as becometh good and dutiful ſubjects: to which purpoſe our will and pleaſure is, that you diſcharge all ſuch convocations and meetings in time coming, under the pain of treaſon. And alſo that you command, charge, and inhibit all our lieges and ſubjects, that none of them preſume, nor take in hand, to reſort nor repair to our burgh of Stirling, nor to no other burgh where our council and ſeſſion ſit, till firſt they declare their cauſe of coming to our council, and procure their warrant to that effect. And as concerning any petitions that ſhall hereafter be given us, upon this or any other ſubject, we are likewiſe pleaſed to declare, we will not ſhut our ears therefrom, ſo that neither the form nor matter be prejudicial to our regal authority."

This proclamation was not capable of ſatisfying the male-contents. Firſt, there was not a word concerning the ſubject of their petition, and by that they could perceive, the king had no deſign to ſuppreſs the liturgy and canons. Secondly, the king repreſented as a great condeſcenſion the pardon he was pleaſed to grant for their fault in preſenting a petition without his leave. This ſhewed them, that according to the king's intention, obedience was their only courſe for the future. Thirdly, the king clearly intimated to them, he would receive no more petitions, ſince he declared, he would reject ſuch as ſhould by the matter or form be prejudicial to his authority. Was not this ſaying, he would reject all? In ſhort, they ſaw plainly, the king, in forbidding all meetings, ſought only to diſunite and hinder them from concerting meaſures to obtain their deſires. I own, I do not ſee how the king could flatter himſelf that ſuch a proclamation would produce the effect he expected, and the rather, as there were not in Scotland forces ſufficient to ſupport his authority. The male-contents were not ſo ſtupid as to be ignorant of the king's deſign. So, on the morrow, the earls of Hume and Lindſey, accompanied with a great croud of nobles and people, came and publicly read in Stirling a proteſtation againſt the proclamation, the preſence and authority of the council not being capable of hindering it. The ſame proteſtation was publicly read at Linlithgow and Edinburgh, immediately after the proclamation had been publiſhed there.

In this proteſtation the male-contents ſaid, "They had preſented a ſupplication on the 23d of September, and another upon the 18th of October; as alſo a remonſtrance December the 19th, againſt the ſervice-book, and the canons, as well as againſt the archbiſhops and the biſhops, as their parties, having the ſame day preſented a declinator againſt them, to prevent their being judges in their own cauſe. But the council having refuſed to admit of this declinator, they found themſelves obliged to make the following proteſtation:

"1. That they might have immediate recourſe to the king, to preſent their grievances, and in a legal way to proſecute the ſame before the ordinary competent judges.

"2. That the archbiſhops and biſhops could not be reputed or eſteemed lawful judges, till they had purged themſelves of ſuch crimes as were laid to their charge.

"3. That no proclamation, nor any act of council, paſt in preſence of the archbiſhops and biſhops, could any ways be prejudicial to the ſupplicants.

"4. That neither they, nor any that had joined, or ſhould join with them againſt innovations, ſhould incur any danger in life, lands, or any political or eccleſiaſtical pains, for not obſerving ſuch acts, books, canons, rites, judicatures, proclamation, introduced without or againſt the acts of general aſſemblies, or acts of parliament, and the ſtatutes of the kingdom.

"5. That if any inconveniences ſhall fall out thereupon, they could not be imputed to them, ſince the council refuſed to hear their juſt remonſtrances.

"6. That their requeſts tended to no other end, but to the preſervation of the true reformed religion, and the laws and liberties of his majeſty's kingdom."

Hitherto the king and the council of Scotland had flattered themſelves that the male-contents might be curbed by acts of authority. But this proteſtation plainly ſhewed, they were too powerful to be compelled to obedience, by orders of the council, or by proclamations. They were perſuaded, the king ſought only to ſurpriſe them, and intended not to deſiſt from his undertaking. On the other hand, they had conceived an extreme averſion to the biſhops, looking upon them as the authors of the evils the church laboured under. The more they ſaw the king was againſt their aſſembling themſelves to conſult in common about their affairs, the more they perceived the neceſſity of their union, without which they would be infallibly oppreſſed one after another. So, before they could know the effect of their proteſtation upon the king, as they expected no good from the court, they erected at Edinburgh, which was at their devotion, ſeveral tables (as they called them) to manage their affairs. There were four principal ones: The firſt of the lords; the ſecond of the gentry; the third of the burroughs; and the fourth of the miniſters. And the gentry had many ſubordinate tables, according to their ſeveral ſhires. Theſe tables conſulted of what they thought fit to be propoſed at the general table, conſiſting of commiſſioners choſen from the other four tables. Never was ſovereign more punctually obeyed than this general table, by all who diſapproved the innovations introduced into the church for thirty or forty years paſt, that is, by almoſt the whole kingdom.

The firſt thing that proceeded from theſe tables was the famous covenant, or general band taken by the Scots, for maintenance of their religion from all innovations. For the better underſtanding what this covenant was, it muſt be obſerved, that in 1580, whilſt the duke of Lenox and the earl of Arran, the king's favourites, were ſuſpected of ill deſigns againſt the proteſtant religion, the general aſſembly thought it neceſſary to draw up a confeſſion of faith, and cauſed it to be ſubſcribed by all the ſubjects, and by the king himſelf, to whom they preſented a very humble petition on that occaſion. As James could not reject this petition, without confirming the people's ſuſpicions, which might have been of dangerous conſequence, he ſubſcribed the confeſſion of faith himſelf, and ordered it to be ſubſcribed by perſons of all ranks. This was done in the years 1580 and 1581, and the ſubſcriptions were renewed 1590, with an additional clauſe, whereby the ſubſcribers engaged to maintain the true religion and the king's perſon.

[1] There were, on June 14, this year, extremely ſevere proceedings in the ſtar chamber againſt ſome perſons, which ſerved very much to incenſe the whole nation againſt that mercileſs court. 1. William Prynn, for writing, in his confinement in the Tower, books called the Quench-Coal, News from Ipſwich, The Unbiſhopping of Timothy and Titus. 2. John Baſtwick, M. D. (born at Writtlee in Eſſex, brought up at Emanuel college, and Padua, and who profeſſed phyſic at Colcheſter) for a book called, Flagellum Pontificis & Epiſcoporum Latialium, and another againſt the high commiſſion, entitled, his Litany. Henry Burton, B. D. rector of St. Matthew's in Friday-ſtreet, and formerly cloſet keeper to the king, for a ſermon preached on November 5, in all which books were contained ſevere invectives againſt the biſhops. For this they were all three fined 5000l. a piece. Prynn condemned to loſe the reſt of his ears, and be ſtigmatized on both cheeks with the letters S. L. for a ſeditious libeller; and the other two to loſe only their ears; and all to be impriſoned for life; Prynn in Caernarvon, Baſtwick in Launceſton, and Burton in Lancaſter caſtle. From whence they were afterwards removed, Prynn to Montorgueil caſtle in Jerſey, Baſtwick to the Scilly iſlands, and Burton to Guernſey. The lord Clarendon obſerves, that as theſe three men were of the three profeſſions which had the moſt influence upon the people, though they had formerly been looked upon under characters of reproach, yet when they were expoſed on ſcaffolds, as common and ſignal rogues, to have their ears cut off, and faces branded with hot irons, men began no more to conſider their manners, but the men; and each profeſſion, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, and degrees, and quality, would have ſecured them from ſuch infamous judgments, and treaſured up wrath for the time to come. Vol. I. p. 73.—But this was not all: for John Lilburn, for writing in Prynn's behalf, to whom he had been clerk, was condemned to be whipped from the Fleet-priſon to Weſtminſter-hall, and to ſtand in the pillory. He is ſaid to receive five hundred ſtripes with a treble cord.—Alſo Williams biſhop of Lincoln, upon a charge of diſloyal words againſt the king, and for ſuborning witneſſes, was fined 10,000l. committed to the Tower, and ſuſpended ab officio & beneficio. And Lambert Oſbaldeſton, maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, for ſome letters of his to that biſhop, which were ſuppoſed to reflect on archbiſhop Laud, was fined 5000l. to the king, and 5000l. for damages to the archbiſhop, and to ſtand in the pillory in Dean's-yard; but he made his eſcape. Biſhop Williams was alſo fined 8000l. upon this account. State Trials, vol. I. Fuller. Collier. Ruſhworth.

It was this confeſſion of faith of 1580 that was revived this preſent year 1638, by order of the general table, and offered to all ſorts of perſons to ſign. Hitherto there was nothing that could give the king juſt cauſe of complaint, at leaſt, as to the matter, ſince it was the ſame confeſſion that the king his father and the whole kingdom had ſigned in 1580 and 1581. It is true, as to the form, he could juſtly complain, that his approbation had not been demanded. But the tables were not ſatisfied with the bare confeſſion of faith, they added alſo an obligation, whereby the ſubſcribers bound themſelves by oath, to maintain religion as it was in 1580, and to reject all the innovations introduced ſince into the church. This was directly contrary to the king's deſigns. Part of the oath, which, being annexed to the confeſſion of faith, was called the covenant, that is contract, agreement, or league among the ſubſcribers, was as follows:

" FINALLY being convinced in our minds, and confeſſing with our mouths, that the preſent and ſucceeding generations in this land are bound to keep the foreſaid national oath and ſubſcription inviolable: We noblemen, barons, gentlemen, burgeſſes, miniſters, and commons under ſubſcribing, conſidering divers times before, and eſpecially at this time, the danger of the true reformed religion, of the king's honour, and of the public peace of the kingdom, by the manifold innovations and evils generally contained, and particularly mentioned in our late ſupplications, complaints, and proteſtations, do hereby profeſs, and before God, his angels, and the world, ſolemnly declare, that with our whole hearts we agree and reſolve all the days of our life conſtantly to adhere unto, and to defend the foreſaid true religion, and forbearing the practice of all innovations, already introduced in the matters of the worſhip of God, or approbation of the corruptions of the public government of the kirk, or civil places and power of kirkmen, till they be tried and allowed in free aſſemblies, and in parliaments, to labour by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the goſpel, as it was eſtabliſhed and profeſſed before the foreſaid novations: And becauſe after due examination we plainly perceive, and undoubtedly believe, that the innovations and evils contained in our ſupplications, complaints, and proteſtations, have no warrant of the word of God, are contrary to the articles of the aforeſaid confeſſions, to the intention and meaning of the bleſſed reformers of religion in this land, to the above-written acts of parliament, and do ſenſibly tend to the re-eſtabliſhing of the popiſh religion and tyranny, and to the ſubverſion and ruin of the true reformed religion, and of our liberties, laws and eſtates; we alſo declare, that the aforeſaid confeſſions are to be interpreted, and ought to be underſtood of the foreſaid novations and evils, no leſs than if every one of them had been expreſſed in the foreſaid confeſſions; and that we are obliged to deteſt and abhor them, amongſt other particular heads of papiſtry abjured therein: and therefore from the knowledge and conſcience of our duty to God, to our king and country, without any wordly reſpect or inducement, ſo far as human infirmity will ſuffer, wiſhing a further meaſure of the grace of God for this effect, we promiſe and ſwear by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profeſſion and obedience of the foreſaid religion; that we ſhall defend the ſame, and reſiſt all theſe contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmoſt of that power that God hath put into our hands all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the ſame heart we declare before God and men, that we have no intention or deſire to attempt any thing that may turn to the diſhonour of God, or the diminution of the king's greatneſs and authority; but on the contrary, we promiſe and ſwear, that we ſhall to the utmoſt of our power, with our means and lives, ſtand to the defence of our dread ſovereign the king's majeſty, his perſon and authority in the defence and preſervation of the foreſaid true religion, liberties and laws of the kingdom; as alſo to the mutual defence and aſſiſtance, every one of us of another, in the ſame cauſe of maintaining the true religion, and his majeſty's authority, with our beſt counſels, our bodies, means, and whole power, againſt all ſorts of perſons whatſoever, &c."

This covenant, like an alarm-bell, brought all the Scots together that were diſſatisfied with the government, that is, almoſt the whole nation. It was ſubſcribed by the great men and the people, except the privy-counſellors, the judges, the biſhops, and ſuch miniſters as were dignitaries in the church. Theſe were, a little before, veſted with all the authority both in church and ſtate, the king verily believing, that to have thoſe for him, who were in the public places and offices, was ſufficient to awe the people. But when the breach was once made, by the publication of the covenant, the number, not the quality of adherents, was to be conſidered, and then the royaliſts were not above one in a thouſand; ſo that the king, council, judges, and biſhops, were on a ſudden without authority and power. To urge the laws was in vain; the covenant was the ſole law the people would follow with reſpect to religion, as being bound by a ſolemn oath. Thus the king's authority being no longer regarded, and his promiſes miſtruſted by the people, as tending, in their opinion, only to deceive them, it is not ſtrange, that the king's after-endeavours to extinguiſh the flame ſhould prove fruitleſs. I have dwelt the longer upon the riſe of the Scotch troubles, becauſe it ſeemed to me abſolutely neceſſary to the underſtanding of what afterwards paſſed in England. For the ſame reaſon, I am alſo obliged to ſpeak of the effects produced by the covenant in Scotland; but I ſhall endeavour to be as brief as poſſible.

Though the ſtandard of rebellion was, as it were, erected in Scotland, and the king did not well ſee how he ſhould free himſelf from theſe difficulties, he could not yet deſiſt from his project. He ſtill hoped the gathering ſtorm might, by ſome artifice, be diſpelled. So prepoſſeſſed was he in favour of the royal authority, that, though he ſaw it little regarded, he imagined, his declarations and proclamations, worded for the moſt part in ambiguous terms, would be ſufficient to reduce the Scots to their duty. But he did not conſider, that before the breach, the people were in a manner obliged to ſhut their eyes, and ſeem not to ſee what they ſaw; but that, when the breach was once made, the male-contents were too wiſe to be taken in his ſnares, and too bold or inſolent to refrain from publiſhing the artifices that were intended to amuſe them. The king deceived himſelf alſo in another thing. As the Scots perpetually pleaded their laws, he thought to ſilence them, by alleging on his ſide, the laws enacted within forty years, not conſidering that theſe laws were the principal cauſe of their complaints, and what they deſired to be annulled. So, in producing theſe acts of parliament, whereby the innovations had been approved, he only confirmed their belief, that he deſigned to ſupport them, and conſequently it was neceſſary to uſe ſome violent means to make him deſiſt. The king had for him the laws in force, ſince they were never repealed; and the people believed, they might rightfully cauſe to be aboliſhed thoſe laws, impoſed on them by corruption, artifice, and violence, complaining that theſe new laws were enacted in violation of the old. Thus both ſides complained of the breach of the laws.

The male-contents ſaid, " James and Charles had eſtabliſhed epiſcopal government in the kirk, contrary to her conſent, who ought to have been conſulted in ſuch an affair, which concerned religion alone, and could be decided only by the general aſſembly. But inſtead of following the ſettled rules of the kirk, the biſhops were firſt introduced into the parliament, and then, by means of the biſhops, whatever was deſired, was enacted, though the king and parliament had no right to appoint new offices, and new juriſdictions in the kirk, without the conſent of the kirk herſelf, repreſented by the general aſſembly, and not by five or ſix biſhops, with as many lay-abbots, who were allowed a ſeat in parliament. To accompliſh this deſign, ſeveral other artifices were uſed, as bribing the Glaſgow aſſembly, aboliſhing general aſſemblies, erecting a high-commiſſion, inconſiſtent with the liberties of the kingdom. In a word, the king had exerciſed, and ſtill did exerciſe a power repugnant to the privileges of the ſubjects, in impoſing upon them a liturgy and canons, deteſted by almoſt the whole nation, without aſking the conſent of kirk or parliament. By this management, no leſs violent than artful, the government of the kirk was entirely altered, not only without the people's advice, but againſt their will, as plainly appeared by the great number of ſubſcribers to the covenant, and the few that refuſed to ſign it. They thought themſelves therefore authorized, by virtue of their privileges, to demand the reſtoration of religion in its purity, ſuch as it was in 1580, and the abolition of all innovations. If the king complained that this covenant was made without his participation and conſent, he ought to blame none but himſelf, ſince he had reduced them to this neceſſity, by refuſing to hearken to their moſt humble petitions. This covenant ſeemed contrary to law, only becauſe it was ſuppoſed, that people's privileges were not invaded, though the contrary was evident. Scotland was a monarchy, conſiſting of a happy mixture of the king's prerogatives and the people's privileges. This union was ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that it was not poſſible to ſeparate theſe two things, without deſtroying the conſtitution of the government. It was very true, if the people would enjoy their privileges, they were to pay all due obedience to the king: but it was no leſs true, that the king could require this this obedience, only as he protected the people in their liberties. If they ſhould be ſo ſenſeleſs, as to pay a punctual obedience to laws advantageous to the crown, whilſt the king made no ſcruple to ſubvert the conſtitution, by aſſuming an abſolute power, they ſhould only ſupply him continually with arms, to reduce them to perfect ſlavery. In ſhort, the deſign of their covenant was not as it was induſtriouſly intimated, to rob the king of his juſt rights, but to hinder him from ſtretching his prerogative beyond the limits of the law."

The king alleged on his ſide, "That the Scots, under the falſe pretence that their privileges were violated, were running into open rebellion, by refuſing to pay the king due obedience. In ſigning a league directly contrary to the rights of the crown, they uſurped a power which was ſo far from being legal, that it was even repugnant to the laws. Their complaints in general about the breach of their privileges were groundleſs, ſince there was but one article in queſtion concerning religion, that is, not the doctrine, but only the diſcipline of the church. Epiſcopacy had been immemorially eſtabliſhed in the church of Scotland. It had indeed been under a ſort of eclipſe ſince the reformation, at a time when the regulation of the diſcipline was more conſidered than the reformation of the doctrine. Preſbyterian government had been eſtabliſhed in the church of Scotland, by the authority of general aſſemblies only, who were not ſovereigns, and whoſe decrees were of no force, till approved and confirmed by parliament. From 1561 to 1592, the parliament never approved of it, and if the parliament, held that year, had their reaſons to confirm it, the following parliaments had a ſtronger to aboliſh it, and reſtore epiſcopal government. Herein nothing was done contrary to law or cuſtom, ſince no man could be ignorant that the parliament, which repreſents the whole nation, has power to annul and repeal all former acts. The male-contents could not queſtion this maxim, without groſsly contradicting themſelves, ſince their preſbyterian government could be founded only on the act of parliament made in 1592, whereby were repealed all the ancient laws in favour of epiſcopacy. How then was it poſſible to ſhew, that the parliament of 1592, had power to aboliſh epiſcopacy, and that of 1612 no right to aboliſh preſbyterian government? As to the general aſſemblies, to which was aſcribed an abſolute power in matters of religion, this power was either natural or acquired. If natural, whence was it, that before the reformation, ſuch aſſemblies, conſiſting of preſbyteries only, without biſhops, were never heard of? If it was an acquired power, they muſt have received it from the nation, that is from the king and parliament. Conſequently they were ſubject to the parliament, and their acts could not be valid but as confirmed by the parliament. If they had received the unlimited power aſcribed to them, where was the act that granted it, and why was it not produced? Nay, though ſuch an act ſhould be produced that would not be ſufficient, unleſs it was ſhewn withal to be irrepealable; otherwiſe it would ſtill be evident, they depended upon the parliament, and conſequently their acts had not the force they pretended to give them, unleſs approved by the parliament, and the approbation unrepealed. Theſe general aſſemblies were firſt inſtituted at the reformation, for the direction of affairs, and the eaſe of the king and parliament, in the examination of what was to be changed or altered with reſpect to religion. But it was too true, they had uſurped by degrees an authority very prejudicial to the crown, and improper for ſubjects. As to the liturgy mentioned by the male-contents in ſo contemptuous a manner, as if it was intended to be introduced on purpoſe to lead the people gradually to popery, he had but one thing to plead in its favour, namely, that it was compoſed by biſhops, who ſuffered martyrdom for the proteſtant religion, and therefore it was very impertinent to ſay, ſuch perſons had a mind to reſtore popery, when they were manifeſtly uſing their utmoſt endeavours to purge the public worſhip of every thing tending that way. If the king his father and himſelf had deſired to introduce the liturgy into the church of Scotland, it was becauſe they believed it conducive to the edification of the faithful, and to the baniſhing of the indecency with which divine ſervice was performed in that church, where every miniſter made what prayers he pleaſed, and often, without any premeditation, which was liable to great inconveniences. Herein he had nothing in view but the good and benefit of his ſubjects of Scotland, and it was injuring him in the higheſt degree, to impute to him a deſign of introducing popery, which on the contrary he abhorred." As to the book of canons, he defended himſelf, in the manner before mentioned, and therefore it is needleſs to repeat it.

After ſeeing the reaſons of both parties, it will not be difficult to conceive the motives of their conduct, without my being obliged hereafter to diſplay them. I ſhall only add, that the male-contents having reſolved to improve the weakneſs of the king's party, and the advantage given them by their covenant, to aboliſh the innovations complained of, did not uſe ſo much the moſt juſt and legal means, as thoſe they believed moſt proper for their ends. On the other hand, the king conſtantly adhered to the acts of parliament, by which theſe pretended innovations were eſtabliſhed, feigning not to ſee, in that reſpect, the leaſt cauſe of complaint againſt himſelf or the king his father.

Things being come to the point above mentioned, by the almoſt univerſal ſubſcription of the covenant, the king reſolved to ſend the marquis of Hamilton into Scotland, to repreſent his perſon under the title of his high commiſſioner. He imagined this Scotch lord being inveſted with ſo eminent a character, would by his credit and induſtry reduce the people to obedience, without giving them any real ſatisfaction, being ſtill very unwilling to deſiſt from this project. The tables having notice of this, doubted not but the king's aim was to amuſe and ſurpriſe them, and therefore they uſed all poſſible means to divert the impending danger. I ſhall not deſcend to particulars, but content myſelf with ſaying, that the high commiſſioner was received by the male-contents with great coldneſs and little reſpect, and that they prepared, on the contrary, to withſtand him vigorouſly, in caſe he offered to aſſert his authority.

Mean while, the king having ſent to Scotland a ſhip laden with arms [a] for Edinburgh caſtle, the tables reſolved to ſeize them, fearing the king intended to ſurpriſe them, whilſt he ſhould amuſe them with negociations. This reſolution could not be executed, becauſe the king's party having notice of it, inſtantly unladed the veſſel, and carried the arms to Dalkeith, where the council then was. For this reaſon the tables ſet a guard near the gate of the caſtle, to prevent the arms from being carried in. At the ſame time, the male-contents received two ſhips freighted with arms for their ſervice. The king could hardly digeſt this affront. But the male-contents did not think it prudent to be expoſed to a ſurpriſe, on pretence that the rupture between the king and them was not yet entire.

The high commiſſioner being come to Edinburgh, offered theſe three propoſitions to the conſideration of the male-contents:

1. What they ſhould expect to hear in the king's name for accommodating their grievances?

2. What might be expected from them for returning to their former obedience?

3. That they ſhould renounce and deliver up their late covenant.

To which they anſwered,

1. That they inſiſted upon a general aſſembly, and a parliament.

2. That they could not return to his majeſty's obedience, ſince they had never departed from it.

3. That they would ſooner renounce their baptiſm than the covenant [b].

The marquis had brought with him a declaration, which however he was not to uſe but in caſe of neceſſity, becauſe the king was unwilling to promiſe the leaſt condeſcenſion to the Scots, unleſs forced to it. But the marquis ſoon perceived it was not poſſible to bring the male-contents to obedience, without amuſing them at leaſt with the hopes that the king would have ſome regard to their grievances. He therefore thought proper to publiſh the declaration, though it evidently appeared by the very expreſſions, that the king would not properly be obliged to any thing. What follows is the moſt material part of the declaration, and ſhews wherein conſiſted the king's condeſcenſion:

"And for the further clearing of ſcruples, we do hereby aſſure all men, that we will neither now, nor hereafter, preſs the practice of the ſervice-book, or the foreſaid canons, nor any thing of that nature, but in ſuch 'a fair and legal way, as ſhall ſatisfy all our loving ſubjects,' that we neither intend innovations in religion or laws; and to this effect have given order to diſcharge all acts of council thereanent. And for the high commiſſion, we ſhall ſo rectify it, with the help and advice of our privy council, that it ſhall never impugn the laws, nor be a juſt grievance to our loyal ſubjects; and what is further fitting to be agitated in general aſſemblies and parliament, for the good and peace of the kirk, and peaceable government of the ſame, in eſtabliſhing of the religion at preſent poſſeſſed, ſhall likewiſe be taken into our royal conſideration, in a free aſſembly and parliament, which ſhall be indicted and called with our beſt convenience."

[b] After this they ſet new guards upon the caſtle of Edinburgh, doubled the watch; and hearing that the lord commiſſioner was to have the next Sunday divine ſervice in the king's palace at Holy-rood-houſe, they ſent him word that whoſoever ſhould read the Engliſh ſervice in that chapel, ſhould never read more, and that there was a thouſand men ready to diſturb it. Ten,

The king muſt have been ill-informed of the diſpoſition of the Scots, to imagine that a declaration with ſo many reſtrictions and ambiguous expreſſions ſhould be capable of contenting them. The declaration was no ſooner proclaimed at the market-croſs at Edinburgh, but the tables cauſed an anſwer, in form of a proteſtation, to be publicly read in the ſame place, the ſubſtance whereof was:

1. That no proclamation or declaration could ſettle their fears, nor ſecure them from the re-entry of any evil or innovation.

2. That they poſitively inſiſted upon a general aſſembly and a parliament, which the king did not promiſe to call.

3. That the proclamation did not mention their complaints and grievances, but under the name of diſorders, faults, and miſdemeanors, &c.

4. That the king took it for granted he had abundantly and ſufficiently ſatisfied their fears, by his two former proclamations, and by his preſent declaration.

5. That this proclamation ſuppoſed them guilty of an unlawful combination or rebellion.

6. That it did not diſallow nor diſcharge any of the innovations complained of, but left liberty to any prelate or perſon to practiſe the ſame.

7. That it plainly evidenced his majeſty's intentions of preſſing the practiſe of thoſe innovations in a legal way, that is, according to thoſe laws which were the ſubject of their complaints.

8. That his majeſty did not promiſe to aboliſh, but only to rectify the high commiſſion, with the advice of his privy council, implying the king's power, with conſent of his council, to eſtabliſh any judicatory within his kingdom, without conſent of the three eſtates convened in parliament.

The high commiſſioner being better informed of the affairs of Scotland, by what he had ſeen with his own eyes, thought it neceſſary to go himſelf and acquaint the king. He made therefore a journey to court, and returned ſhortly after, with a power to call a general aſſembly, and a parliament. But as for the aſſembly, he would know beforehand what perſons it ſhould be compoſed of, and what was to be debated. The tables rejected the limitation, as tending to render the aſſembly uſeleſs. They likewiſe told him, if the king refuſed to convene a general aſſembly, they believed they were ſufficiently authorized to call one themſelves.

Probably, the king's high commiſſioner had orders to grant a general aſſembly, if it could not be avoided; but however to uſe his utmoſt endeavours, either that the tables ſhould deſiſt from their demand, or at leaſt, if he granted an aſſembly, to clog the favour with conditions that ſhould prevent the king's deſigns receiving any prejudice, It was doubtleſs in obedience to this order, that he preſented to the tables eleven [c] articles, as ſo many conditions on which he was willing to call an aſſembly. As he had very likely good ſpies, he knew pretty well what the tables intended to do in order to reap great advantages by a general aſſembly, and theſe eleven conditions ſolely tended to render their meaſures ineffectual. The tables being compoſed of the moſt able perſons in Scotland, eaſily diſcovered the high commiſſioner's aim. They replied therefore to theſe eleven articles, ſo as to ſhew him it would be very difficult to ſurpriſe them. Nevertheleſs he was not diſcouraged, and under colour of complying with the male-contents, reduced the eleven conditions to theſe two, which however contained the ſubſtance of the eleven, and tended to the ſame end.

"1. That no laymen ſhould have voices in chuſing the miniſters to be ſent from the ſeveral preſbyteries to the general aſſembly, nor any but the miniſters of the ſame preſbytery.

"2. That the aſſembly ſhould not go about to determine things eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, otherwiſe than by remonſtrance or petition to the parliament."

To underſtand the end and motive of the firſt of theſe conditions, it muſt be obſerved, that it was very plainly perceived in Scotland, ſince the Glaſgow aſſembly in 1610, how eaſily the king could ſecure a majority of votes among the miniſters, either by fears or hopes, or by preſent and real favours. For this reaſon the male-contents had reſolved not to let the miniſters have the ſole direction of the affairs of religion, and therefore had erected four tables, whereof that of the miniſters, which was but the third, could not determine of any thing without the concurrence of the other three, and the approbation of the general-table. Moreover, when the tables had demanded a general aſſembly, they had at the ſame time reſolved, that this aſſembly ſhould be compoſed not only of the miniſters, but alſo of lay-elders, who ſhould be perſons of authority, and whoſe number ſhould exceed that of the miniſters. In ſhort, they deſigned the miniſters who were to be ſent to the aſſembly, ſhould be elected not only by the miniſters themſelves of each preſbytery, but alſo by the lay-elders. The marquis of Hamilton, who had intelligence of their intention, laid therefore a double ſnare for them in the former of his two conditions. The firſt ſnare conſiſted in that, feigning to be ignorant of their deſign to ſend lay-elders to the general aſſembly, he ſuppoſed it was to be compoſed of miniſters only. The ſecond conſiſted in that he pretended, the nomination of theſe miniſters for the aſſembly ſhould be made by the miniſters alone without the participation of the lay-elders. He thereby endeavoured to break the meaſures the tables had judged neceſſary to ſecure themſelves from the articles of the court.

As to the ſecond condition, it was evident that by things already eſtabliſhed by acts of parliament, he underſtood all the innovations complained of, which had been introduced ſince the year 1606, and which for the moſt part were, as I ſaid, founded upon acts of parliament. So, by this ſecond condition, he broke ſtill more directly than by the firſt, the meaſures the tables might take, to cauſe theſe innovations to be examined and declared ſuch by the general aſſembly. Wherefore the tables rejected theſe two conditions, regarding them as ſo many ſnares to ſurpriſe them, ſince they could not accept them without being at the king's mercy. The affair was come to that point, that the tables were ſatisfied the innovations complained of were really innovations, and of their right to require their abolition. The ſole queſtion was to adviſe the propereſt means to procure the ſatisfaction they demanded. On the other hand, the king did not in the leaſt doubt the validity of the acts of parliament, whereby theſe pretended innovations were eſtabliſhed. And perhaps he ſtill leſs queſtioned his power to introduce the liturgy and canons. But his concern was to find the propereſt means to maintain his own and the parliament's authority, and to diſpel the ſtorm that was gathering in Scotland.

The high commiſſioner clearly perceiving, he had to deal with men who were upon their guard, and that it would be difficult to ſurpriſe them, reſolved to take a ſecond journey to England, to inform the king of the ſtate of affairs. By putting the male-contents in hopes the king would grant ſuch a general aſſembly as they deſired, he obtained with great difficulty, that the election of commiſſioners ſhould be delayed till his return, which was fixed to the 21ſt of September. During his abſence, the tables expecting only new ſnares or freſh delays from the court [d], reſolved that a general aſſembly ſhould be held, either with the king's permiſſion, if he would grant it, or without his conſent, and that the election of commiſſioners ſhould be the 22d of September. In this interval, they ſent to all the preſbyteries directions in eight articles, not to chuſe any ſuſpected miniſter, and to elect everywhere lay-elders, who ſhould be perſons of authority, and more numerous than the miniſters. In a word, they took all poſſible meaſures to have an aſſembly at their devotion, wherein they perfectly ſucceeded, the king's party being everywhere ſo weak, that they were not in condition to oppoſe it ſucceſsfully.

The high commiſſioner being returned to Scotland with new inſtructions, immediately ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed, containing in ſubſtance theſe three principal articles:

"1. That his majeſty revoked the ſervice-book, the book of canons, the high commiſſion, and the five articles of Perth.

"2. That for the future none of his ſubjects, whether eccleſiaſtical or civil, ſhould be liable to the trial and cenſure of the parliament or general aſſembly.

"3. That perſons of all ranks ſhould be required to ſign the confeſſion of faith of 1580, with the oath he had annexed, but very different from that of the covenant."

After publiſhing this proclamation, the high commiſſioner ſummoned a general aſſembly, to meet at Glaſgow the 21ſt

[c] Ten, ſays Whitelock, and Ruſhworth, p. 18. 762.

[d] This, it ſeems, was the grand deſign of the court, as appears by one of the king's letters to the high commiſſioner, "In a word, ſays his majeſty to him, gain time by all the honeſt means you can, without forſaking your grounds." Burnet's Mem. of Hamil. p. 56.

I:

of November this year 1638, and a parliament at Edinburgh, the 15th of May the next year 1639.

It was not without reaſon that the male-contents expected ſome new ſnare from the king. Though the confeſſion of faith which the king ordered to be ſigned, was exactly the ſame with that prefixed to the covenant, the oath, or general-band, annexed by the king, imported, that they ſwore to maintain the religion at preſent profeſſed, which was utterly deſtroying the oath of the covenant, whereby the ſubſcribers were bound to reject all the innovations introduced ſince 1580. This ſnare was ſo palpable, and ſo very injurious to the king's affairs, that the council, to prevent its ill effects, were forced to publiſh a declaration, that the meaning of the oath was, that they ſwore to maintain the religion profeſſed in 1580. But notwithſtanding this, the tables cauſed a proteſtation againſt the proclamation to be publicly read, to ſhew, as they pretended, that the king acted not with ſincerity; that by certain ambiguous clauſes, reſtrictions, and additions, he took away with one hand what he gave with the other; and reſerved to himſelf a liberty to maintain at a more convenient ſeaſon, the innovations he ſeemed to depart from.

During the interval between the publiſhing of the proclamation and the general aſſembly, the high commiſſioner and council uſed all poſſible endeavours to make all ſorts of people ſign the confeſſion of faith as ſent by the king; and the tables on their part forgot nothing to oppoſe it. But there paſſed at this time a thing of great importance, which muſt not be omitted. Many lords, barons, gentlemen, miniſters, burgeſſes, who were not commiſſioners to the general aſſembly, preſented to the preſbytery of Edinburgh, an information againſt David Lindſey biſhop of Edinburgh, and at the ſame time againſt all the reſt of the biſhops. The ſubſtance of the information, which contained ſeveral articles, ſome whereof doubtleſs were much aggravated, was, that Lindſey and his brethren had not performed the conditions required of them by the Montroſs aſſembly. The deſign of this information was to prevail with the preſbytery to ſummon, as they did accordingly, the biſhops to appear before the aſſembly which was to be held at Glaſgow. For as the abolition of epiſcopacy was now reſolved, it was neceſſary that the general aſſembly ſhould have ſome ground or pretence to proſecute and to try the biſhops. And for this the information was intended.

The general aſſembly met at Glaſgow on the day appointed, conſiſting of ſuch members as the tables had deſired, or rather preſcribed [e]. The king's party was ſo weak, that they durſt not make any oppoſition, and the matters to be debated had been directed by the tables, who had ſent their inſtructions to the commiſſioners. In a word, as in the aſſembly of 1610, and the following ones, king James had ſo managed as to have every thing tranſacted as he pleaſed, the tables had now taken the ſame precaution to cauſe whatever they did not approve to be annulled. Wherefore the marquis of Hamilton's grand aim, was viſibly to raiſe conteſts and diſputes which ſhould afford him occaſion to diſſolve the aſſembly.

The firſt day was ſpent in reading the king's commiſſion. The ſecond day, a letter from the king containing nothing extraordinary was read [f]. Then the aſſembly proceeded to the choice of a moderator: but at the ſame time Dr. Hamilton preſented from the biſhops a declinator, that is, a proteſtation againſt the legality of the aſſembly, and the high commiſſioner would have this declinator read firſt. But it was objected, there was no aſſembly without a moderator, and conſequently it was neceſſary to begin with his election. The high commiſſioner ſeeing he could not prevail, proteſted againſt the refuſal to read the declinator before the choice of a moderator, and ordered his proteſtation to be entered. Before the moderator was choſen, the high commiſſioner entered a ſecond proteſtation, that this choice ſhould prejudice neither the king's prerogative, nor any law of the kingdom, nor bar the king from taking legal exceptions, either againſt the perſon elected, or the election itſelf. After that, they unanimouſly choſe Mr. Alexander Henderſon, a miniſter, for moderator.

The third day, the high commiſſioner urged, that the biſhops declinator might be read. But he was told, the aſſembly was not formed till the commiſſions of elections were examined, and the commiſſioners that were preſent known to be duly authorized. This affair was of more importance than it ſeems at firſt ſight. As the declinator contained reaſons to ſhew that the election of all the commiſſioners, or at leaſt of the greateſt part, was null, it was eaſy to perceive, that theſe reaſons would come too late after the power of the commiſſioners ſhould be allowed, and they admitted for members of the aſſembly. The high commiſſioner not being able to obtain his deſire, entered a third proteſtation on that head; and a fourth, the ſame day, againſt the choice of Mr. Archibald Johnſton for clerk regiſter of the aſſembly [g], becauſe he had been clerk of the general table at Edinburgh.

The fourth day, the commiſſions of elections were examined. But the high commiſſioner firſt entered a fifth proteſtation, to take exception againſt their elections in his own due time.

The examination of the commiſſions not being ended the fourth day, was continued the fifth. It may be imagined, that the elections which were agreeable to the inſtructions of the tables, were generally approved, and that means were not wanting to weaken or entirely reject thoſe which were otherwiſe.

The ſixth day, the 27th of November, was read at laſt the biſhops declinator, wherein they pretended to prove by ſeveral reaſons the illegality of the aſſembly. After the reading of the declinator, the high commiſſioner cauſed to be read ſome other proteſtations, ſent him from ſeveral places, againſt the lay-elders right of voting in the general aſſemblies and elections of the miniſters by lay-men.

The ſeventh day, the 28th of November, was moved in the aſſembly to debate, whether the biſhops cauſe ſhould be judged, notwithſtanding their declinator. As after ſeveral ſpeeches on this ſubject, the moderator was going to put the queſtion, the high commiſſioner roſe up and ſaid, ſince they pretended to aſſume a right to judge the biſhops, he could not give his conſent nor ſtay any longer with them. Then after a long ſpeech, wherein he repreſented his majeſty's gracious conceſſions in his laſt declaration, he diſſolved the aſſembly in the name and by the authority of the king, alleging theſe four principal reaſons:

1. Lay-elders were introduced into the aſſembly to vote there, which was not warranted by the laws, practice, or cuſtom of the church or kingdom, and which ſuppoſing there was ſuch a law or cuſtom, had been diſcontinued for above forty years.

2. The miniſters choſen commiſſioners, were elected by lay-elders, contrary to cuſtom and practice.

3. The few commiſſioners choſen contrary to the inſtructions of the tables, had been thrown out by mere cavils.

4. The cited biſhops were to be tried by perſons who had already declared againſt them.

It may be obſerved concerning theſe reaſons, that the high commiſſioner was not ignorant, before the meeting of the aſſembly, of the manner of electing the commiſſioners, or that the biſhops cauſe was to be brought before the general aſſembly. Conſequently theſe reaſons would have been as ſtrong to hinder the aſſembly from meeting as they were to diſſolve it the ſeventh day. But he was unwilling to give the male-contents the advantage of juſtly complaining that he had amuſed them with the hopes of an aſſembly, which he intended not to hold. He expected to find in the proceedings of the aſſembly cauſes or pretences to diſſolve it, and his frequent proteſtations were ſo many expedients which he intended to uſe at a proper ſeaſon. But as, in all appearance, he had the king's poſitive order to diſſolve the aſſembly in caſe they ſhould take upon them to try the biſhops, and as this was properly the firſt thing that was moved, it was not in his power to ſtay for other pretences. He was forced therefore to uſe the ſame reaſons for diſſolving, as might have ſerved to hinder the meeting, of the aſſembly.

The king found not in the aſſembly the obedience he expected, though with little reaſon, conſidering how the Scots ſtood affected. It was eaſy to foreſee, that the covenanters who had reſolved to hold an aſſembly, though the king ſhould not have given his conſent, were not diſpoſed to break up after a ſeven-days-ſeſſion without having finiſhed any affair. They had a mind to aboliſh epiſcopacy entirely, with all the innovations introduced into the kirk ſince the laſt forty years; and after all the ſteps they had taken, it was not likely they would ſuddenly relinquiſh their projects, and return to petitions and ſupplications, which had hitherto proved fruitleſs. They ſaw moreover, that the king uſed all ſorts of means to prevent his conſenting to their deſires; or if he feigned to have any condeſcenſion for them, it was only to gain time, and that he reſerved to himſelf the power of maintaining the innovation at a more favourable opportunity. This was their belief at leaſt, and the ſudden diſſolution of an aſſembly ſo earneſtly deſired, confirmed them in it. Wherefore they were unwilling to neglect ſo fair an opportunity. They had the whole kingdom on their ſide, and knew that the great diſcontents which reigned in England, would not ſuffer the king to make any conſiderable efforts againſt Scotland. Upon theſe accounts it was that the aſſembly of Glaſgow continued their ſeſſion by their own authority, notwithſtanding their diſſolution in the king's name, and the proclamation publiſhed the next day[h], to which they were contented to anſwer, as uſual, by proteſtation. Thus the king had the mortification to ſee his authority contemned, and the acts of parliament procured by his father to introduce the hierarchy into the kirk ſerve for foundation to a Scotiſh rebellion. Hence ſovereigns ſhould learn not to introduce any innovations but what are abſolutely neceſſary. It is certain, the reformation had been eſtabliſhed in Scotland upon the preſbyterian plan, in the ſame manner as in Switzerland, Geneva, France, Germany, the Low-countries: that this government ſubſiſted there till James VI. became king of England; that this prince was poſſeſſed with the deſign of introducing epiſcopal government, and that Charles his ſon and ſucceſſor was no leſs eager to purſue the ſame project. The queſtion is not to know, whether epiſcopal government be good or bad in itſelf; but ſuppoſing it good and even excellent, the point is to know, whether the church of Scotland could not be without it, and whether Charles I. had ſufficient reaſon to hazard the peace of that kingdom and his own, in order to ſupport a deſign, the execution whereof was not abſolutely neceſſary.

[e] It conſiſted of about two hundred and ſixty commiſſioners. Some of theſe members could neither read nor write, and yet theſe were to judge of hereſy, and condemn Arminius his tenets. Burnet's Mem. of Hamil. p. 98.

[f] And then the marquis of Hamilton made a ſpeech, and after that, tendered to the aſſembly the king's conceſſions, which were much the ſame with thoſe already mentioned above. See Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 844, 845.

The general aſſembly having continued their ſeſſion themſelves, contrary to the king's order, loſt no time to begin and finiſh what had been reſolved in the tables. Here follows a ſhort liſt of ſome of their acts, which will ſhew how much they endeavoured to aboliſh, as far as in them lay, all innovations.

"An act bearing the aſſemblies proteſtation againſt the diſſolution thereof.

"An act annulling the ſix aſſemblies holden at Linlithgow 1606, and 1608, at Glaſgow 1610, at Aberdeen 1616, at St. Andrew's 1617, at Perth 1618.

"Act renewing the privileges of yearly general aſſemblies, and oftener (pro re nata) and appointing the third Wedneſday in July 1639, in Edinburgh, for the next general aſſembly.

"Act that none be choſen ruling-elders to ſit in preſbyteries provincial or general aſſemblies, but thoſe who ſubſcribe the covenant."

Theſe acts ſhew, the king was not in the wrong when he ſaid, the general aſſemblies of Scotland had uſurped a kind of ſovereignty in religious affairs, ſince this aſſembly is ſeen boldly to annul, by their authority, things eſtabliſhed by acts of parliament. But, as I ſaid, in the diſpute between the king and his Scotch ſubjects, the queſtion was not to examine the right of the parties, but to uſe the moſt effectual means to attain their reſpective ends. This was the courſe taken by the general aſſembly of Glaſgow. As the parliament was to meet the next May, and they knew they ſhould be ſupported, they were willing to give the parliament an occaſion to aboliſh all the innovations complained of, upon the foundation of its being the general ſentiment of the kirk. It muſt be further remarked concerning this aſſembly, that before the ſeſſions began, the tables had uſed their utmoſt endeavours to hinder the ſigning the confeſſion of faith in 1580, with the obligatory clauſe annexed by the king. But as this did not prevent its being ſubſcribed by many, the aſſembly of Glaſgow thought proper to explain the confeſſion, and decide, that it virtually contained the abolition of epiſcopacy, though the biſhops were not mentioned. So by this explication, they who had ſigned the confeſſion by the king's order, had ſubſcribed to the abolition of epiſcopal government. The high commiſſioner hearing the aſſembly of Glaſgow were upon this explication, made haſte and publiſhed a quite different one, wherein he endeavoured to prove, that epiſcopacy ſubſiſted in 1580, and conſequently the ſigning of the confeſſion of that year, could not be deemed an abjuration of epiſcopacy. A very long and particular anſwer was made to this explication. But without entering into a diſcuſſion of the facts alleged on both ſides, I ſhall only obſerve, that what I ſaid heretofore, concerning the ambiguity in the name of biſhops, muſt be chiefly applied to theſe two papers. The marquis proved very well, that the name, title, temporal rights of the biſhops, were not aboliſhed by the parliament, till the year 1580; but he very lamely proved, that till then the kirk of Scotland had been governed by biſhops. The benefice had ſubſiſted till that year, but the office was aboliſhed, if not by act of parliament, at leaſt by the cuſtom and practice of the kirk. On the other hand, the authors of the anſwer evidently ſhewed, that epiſcopacy, as to the office, was aboliſhed by the general aſſemblies as far as lay in their power, and by the practice of the kirk: but they could not prove that the order of biſhops was aboliſhed till the year 1592.

[1639] Hitherto I have endeavoured to ſhew the riſe of the troubles of Scotland, to the end it may be the better conceived how far the Engliſh ought to have been concerned in the war which broke out preſently after between the king and his ſubjects of Scotland. There were two parties in England, the courtiers and rigid epiſcopalians, who being religiouſly attached to the hierarchy, verily believed the Scots were in the wrong to reject ſo obſtinately this hierarchy eſtabliſhed thirty years by acts of parliament. Theſe looked upon the Scots as rebels, and wiſhed to ſee them puniſhed as ſuch. The other party conſiſted of puritans: under which name were included not only the church puritans, but alſo the ſtate puritans, that is, all thoſe that were diſſatisfied with the government, and thought the king aſſumed a power which belonged not to him. This party, though without poſts or employments and continually oppreſſed, was however much ſuperior in number to the other, as plainly appeared afterwards. Theſe, far from diſapproving the conduct of the Scots, ſaid that the king's, James and Charles, having manifeſtly introduced innovations into the kirk, the Scots could not be juſtly blamed for deſiring things might be reſtored to their former ſtate. When therefore, the hiſtory of theſe troubles is read, the authors are to be diſtinguiſhed. Some repreſent the conduct of the Scots as a real rebellion, flowing from a ſettled deſign of breaking all the bands of ſubjection and obedience to the king, and of utterly deſtroying monarchical government. Others, on the contrary, ſpeak of the king's behaviour to the Scots as really tyrannical, and pretend he had no leſs deſign to render himſelf abſolute in Scotland than in England.

The king's party in Scotland was extremly weak, and conſequently he had no other way left, than to uſe the forces of England to reduce the Scots to obedience. Accordingly, he took that courſe[i]. As ſoon as he heard that the general aſſembly of Glaſgow continued their ſeſſion by their own authority, and that the people approved of their conduct, he reſolved to levy an army in England to reduce the malecontents of Scotland to their duty. But as the Engliſh might

[i] This was the courſe the marquis of Hamilton had from the beginning adviſed him to take; namely, to ſend his fleet quickly with two thouſand land ſoldiers in it, and ſend down arms to the northern counties of England; to garriſon Berwick with fifteen hundred men, and Carliſle with five hundred; and to come himſelf in perſon with the royal army. Burnet's Mem. of Hamil. p. 54, 82, 98.

Upon

naturally aſk, by what reaſon were they bound to venture their lives in defence of the intereſts of the king in Scotland, he thought this objection ſhould be obviated, by ſuppoſing the Scots to have already levied an army for the invaſion of England. From thence he inferred, it was incumbent upon him to provide for the defence of the kingdom by raiſing ſufficient forces to repel the attacks of his enemies. There was little probability that the Scots ſhould think of invading England, if they were left unmoleſted, but it was neceſſary to excite the Engliſh with the dread of an imaginary danger.

The king thought not proper to call a parliament to enable him to raiſe the forces he wanted. Experience had taught him, that he was not to expect any great aſſiſtance from the parliament, unleſs he would alter his maxims, and redreſs the people's grievances, which he did not intend. On the contrary he flattered himſelf that he ſhould eaſily reduce the Scots, and then be ſtill more abſolute in England. He choſe therefore to ſuppoſe a defenſive war, and on that ſuppoſition ſummoned the nobility to attend him at York the 1ſt of April following, each with as many horſe as he could raiſe, and to inform the court within a fortnight of the number that could be brought. In this manner the kings of England formerly prepared to withſtand the invaſions with which they were threatened. But the ancient manner and this differed very much in two reſpects. Firſt, there were certain crown-lands, the poſſeſſors whereof were obliged to find the king troops, according to the frontiers that were like to be invaded. Moſt of theſe lands lay in the northern counties, becauſe of the neighbourhood of Scotland, which was the only place from whence invaſions were to be feared by land. But the tenants of ſuch lands lying in Kent or Suſſex were not bound to furniſh troops for the defence of the northern borders againſt the Scots; or the tenants in the north, to defend the ſouthern frontiers when threatened by the French. Whereas Charles I. without making any diſtinction of counties, or putting any difference between thoſe that did, and thoſe that did not hold theſe crown-lands, directed his ſummons to all the nobles in general. Again, this method of raiſing troops was anciently uſed, only when the kingdom was actually invaded, or in danger of being ſo, or at leaſt when there was a war proclaimed, and judged neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom. But Charles I. was contented to ſuppoſe only, though contrary to all appearance, that the Scots intended to invade England, and under colour of defending the kingdom, his real deſign was to attack the Scots on account of his own intereſts.

But, as having troops was not ſufficient without money to ſubſiſt them, the king uſed two ways, beſides thoſe already in practice, as ſhip-money and others, to increaſe his revenues. The firſt was to demand voluntary contributions of the clergy by means of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Laud writ for that purpoſe a circular letter to the biſhops and all the clergy, to exhort them to contribute liberally for the defence of the kingdom, which was in extreme danger of a Scotch invaſion. He added, by way of poſtſcript, that his majeſty expected from the clergy a larger ſum than what they were wont to give in the uſual way. The ſecond means uſed by the king was, to put the queen upon writing to the catholics, to incite them to aid the king on this urgent occaſion. Theſe two means brought in very near what the king expected.

Beſides the horſe to be brought by the nobility to York, all the counties were obliged to find ſuch a number of foot, horſe, dragoons, artillery-horſes, and a certain quantity of ammunition. The whole amounted to nineteen thouſand four hundred and eighty-three foot, twelve hundred and thirty-three horſe [k], beſides the troops of the nobility, and thirteen hundred and fifty horſes for the carriages. Moreover, the king equipped a fleet of ſixteen men of war, the command whereof was given to the marquis of Hamilton, who was come back to his majeſty.

The king departed for York the 27th of March, his coronation-day, and on the 9th of April publiſhed a proclamation to revoke ſundry monopolies, licences and commiſſions, which he had granted by his letters-patents. But very likely, this was only to amuſe the people, and the proclamation was not executed, ſince the next year he publiſhed another to revoke the ſame monopolies, which ſhould have been aboliſhed by this. On the 29th of May the king reviewed his army, which conſiſted of nineteen thouſand ſix hundred and fourteen men, beſides five thouſand on board the fleet, his own guards, and the garriſons of Berwick and Carliſle.

Whilſt the king was making his preparations, the Scots were not idle. They had alſo drawn forces together [l], but their hopes were not ſo much built on their army as on their friends in England, and even at court. Some have ſuſpected the marquis of Hamilton, one of the king's favourites, of not having at this juncture faithfully ſerved his maſter. As it was the king's intereſt to exaſperate the Engliſh againſt the Scots, and perſuade them that theſe were in manifeſt rebellion; it was the Scots intereſt on the contrary to ſhew, they had never any ill deſign againſt England, and if they took up arms, it was only in their own defence. They knew the ſucceſs of the war depended upon the aſſiſtance England ſhould freely give the king, and not upon the aid he ſhould extort by force in virtue of his prerogative. And therefore their friends in England had adviſed them to mind two things eſpecially. Firſt to clear themſelves as fully as poſſible from the crime of rebellion, which the king laid to their charge. Secondly, to avoid every thing that might excite the Engliſh to engage in the war, for fear of giving the king advantage of being able to ſay, they were undertaking an offenſive war. They punctually followed theſe two advices, the former by diſperſing in England by means of their emiſſaries a great number of papers, wherein they ſet forth with all poſſible clearneſs the cauſes of their diſcontents and the king's intentions. They forgot not to inſinuate, that it concerned England no leſs than Scotland, to oppoſe the arbitrary power aſſumed by the king, as well in eccleſiaſtical as civil affairs. They followed the ſecond advice, by obeying with entire ſubmiſſion a proclamation publiſhed by the king in Scotland, to forbid the Scotch army to approach within ten miles of the borders of England. By this obedience they evidently ſhewed, the war was not offenſive on their ſide. It is not unlikely, that ſome of their friends had counſelled the king to publiſh that proclamation, on purpoſe to afford them an opportunity to give this proof of it.

But this was not the only advantage the Scots reaped from the counſels given the king by their ſecret friends. He was perſuaded that their obedience to his proclamation was the effect of their fear, and was thereby induced to ſend another proclamation to Edinburgh, commanding the Scots to lay down their arms on pain of being declared guilty of treaſon; offering however pardon to all who ſhould comply with his orders and return to their duty. Nothing could be more prejudicial to him in Scotland than ſuch a proclamation, which ſhewed he required a ſpeedy obedience without any conditions; but the magiſtrates of Edinburgh would not ſuffer it to be publiſhed. The ſame notion, that the Scots were intimidated, cauſed him to commit another error in detaching the earl of Holland with three thouſand foot and a hundred horſe, into Scotland by way of Kelſey. Leſley, general of the Scots, being informed of the earl of Holland's march, ſent five or ſix thouſand foot and five hundred horſe againſt him, who made him halt on a ſudden. He ſent however a trumpet to command them to retire according to their promiſe: it was anſwered, he would do much better to withdraw himſelf; and indeed he found it proper to take their advice. The earl of Holland's march, which came to nothing, freed the Scots from their promiſe of not approaching the borders, and on the morrow Leſley marched towards Kelſey with about twelve thouſand men.

The king began then to perceive that the obedience of the Scots was not owing to their fear, and that hitherto he had followed wrong counſels; wherefore he took a ſudden reſolution to ſtand upon the defenſive, and that very day writ to the marquis of Hamilton, who was in the Firth with the fleet, to order him not to begin hoſtilities, though he had been ſent thither to take all poſſible advantages upon the Scots. But this reſolution was taken a little late, after what he had juſt done, at leaſt if he had no other deſign to make the public believe he had undertaken the war only in his own defence. But he had a ſtronger reaſon not to engage too far; for upon notice of the Scots approach, moſt of his generals had adviſed him not to give battle, though he was much ſuperior in number of troops, which he could aſcribe only to their unwillingneſs to venture their lives in his ſervice.

The two armies were ſo near one another, that a battle was expected every day, though in truth both ſides were alike reſolved to ſtand upon the defenſive: but, when it was leaſt expected, the lord Dumfermling a Scotchman came to the king's camp with a trumpet, and preſented to his majeſty, in the name of the Scots, a very humble petition, intreating him to appoint commiſſioners to negotiate a peace. The king anſwered, he had ſent a proclamation to Edinburgh, whereby he offered his ſubjects of Scotland the free enjoyment of their religion and laws, with a pardon to ſuch as ſhould return to their duty: that this proclamation had been rejected with contempt; but he deſired it might be publiſhed in the Scotch army, after which he would be graciouſly pleaſed to hear their petitions. The lord Dumfermling returning with this anſwer, the Scotch general ordered the proclamation to be publicly read in the army, which done, the king appointed five commiſſioners to treat with the Scots [m].

In the conference held the 11th of June, between the commiſſioners of both parties, the Scots deſired three things, namely:

"1. That the acts at the late aſſembly at Glaſgow ſhould be ratified in the enſuing parliament.

"2. That all matters eccleſiaſtical might be determined by the aſſemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by parliament.

"3. That his majeſty's ſhips and forces by land be recalled; that all perſons, ſhips, and goods arreſted be reſtored, and that all excommunicate perſons, incendiaries, and informers againſt the kingdom, who had cauſed theſe commotions for their own private ends, might be returned, to ſuffer their deſerved cenſure and puniſhment."

Upon this the king deſiring the Scots to give in writing the reaſons and grounds of their demands, the lord Lowdon, one of the Scotiſh deputies, ſaid, their deſires were only to enjoy their religion and liberties according to the eccleſiaſtical and civil laws of the kingdom, and that they would not inſiſt upon any point that was not ſo warranted, humbly offering all civil and temporal obedience to his majeſty, which could be required or expected of loyal ſubjects. The king replied, if this was all that was deſired, the peace would ſoon be concluded: and indeed he granted immediately what the lord Lowden demanded, in the very ſame words and on the ſame terms.

Then the Scotiſh deputies gave in writing the reaſons and grounds of their three demands, and added, it was alſo deſired that parliaments might be held at ſet times, once at leaſt in two or three years, by reaſon of his majeſty's abſence, which hindered his ſubjects in their complaints and grievances to have immediate acceſs to his majeſty. They took occaſion likewiſe to declare in this paper, that it had always been far from their thoughts to refuſe due obedience to their native king, or to make an invaſion upon England. They ſaid, theſe were calumnies, the authors whereof they moſt humbly deſired might be made a public example.

It was the 15th of June before the king returned his anſwer, which muſt have embarraſſed him. He had filled all England with complaints concerning the horrible rebellion of the Scots, and yet theſe ſame people whom he would have to be deemed rebels, deſired only to enjoy their religion and liberties. On the other hand, he had levied a great army, and prepared a fleet on pretence to defend England againſt the invaſion the Scots were meditating; but they ſolemnly declared they never intended any ſuch thing. At laſt he gave his anſwer to this effect:

"1. That he could not ratify or approve the acts of the general aſſembly at Glaſgow.

"2. That notwithſtanding he was pleaſed to confirm and make good whatſoever his commiſſioner had granted and promiſed in his name.

"3. That according to the petitioners deſire, all matters eccleſiaſtical ſhould be determined by the kirk, and matters civil by the parliament.

"4. That a free general aſſembly ſhould be held at Edinburgh the 6th day of Auguſt, and a parliament at the ſame place the 20th of Auguſt next enſuing.

"5. That upon the Scots diſarming and diſbanding their forces, diſſolving and diſcharging all their pretended tables and conventions, and reſtoring to every one whatſoever had been taken and detained from them ſince the late pretended general aſſembly, his majeſty would preſently after recal his fleet, and retire his land forces, and cauſe reſtitution to be made to all perſons of their ſhips and goods, detained and arreſted ſince the aforeſaid aſſembly."

Upon this anſwer the ſeven following articles were at laſt agreed on, wherein, however, there was no mention of the principal reaſons of the quarrel, becauſe theſe matters were to be examined by the general aſſembly and parliament of Scotland. So, though theſe articles were called articles of pacification, it could not but be a very doubtful peace, ſince there was nothing yet decided concerning the grounds of the war.

Articles agreed upon,

"1. The forces of Scotland to be diſbanded and diſſolved, within eight-and-forty hours after the publication of his majeſty's declaration being agreed upon.

"2. His majeſty's caſtles, forts, ammunitions of all ſorts, and royal honours to be delivered after the ſaid publication, ſo ſoon as his majeſty can ſend to receive them.

"3. His majeſty's ſhips to depart preſently after the delivery of the caſtles, with the firſt fair wind, and in the mean time no interruption of trade or fiſhing.

"4. His majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to cauſe to be reſtored all perſons, goods, and ſhips, detained and arreſted ſince the 1ſt day of November laſt paſt.

"5. There ſhall be no meetings, treatings, conſultations, or convocations of his majeſty's lieges, but ſuch as are warranted by act of parliament.

"6. All fortifications to deſiſt, and no farther working therein, and they to be remitted to his majeſty's pleaſure.

"7. To reſtore to every one of his majeſty's good ſubjects their liberties, lands, houſes, goods and means whatſoever, taken or detained from them by whatſoever means ſince the aforeſaid time."

Purſuant to theſe articles the Scots diſbanded their troops, but in ſuch a manner, if we may believe the king's friends, that they could eaſily re-aſſemble them in caſe of neceſſity [n]. This ſeems to me very probable, ſince it is certain the readineſs ſhewn by the two parties to conclude a peace, was an occaſion of miſtruſt to both [o].

As the general aſſembly and parliament were to meet in Auguſt, the king appointed the earl of Traquair to repreſent his perſon in quality of high commiſſioner. This lord, who was treaſurer of Scotland, was entirely devoted to him; and it was with him that the Scotiſh biſhops and archbiſhop of Canterbury held, before the war, a ſtrict correſpondence, in order to accompliſh the king's deſigns. The king gave him the following inſtructions, ſigned with his own hand.

Inſtructions given to the earl of Traquair, lord high commiſſioner for Scotland.

"AT the firſt meeting of the aſſembly, before it be brought in diſpute who ſhall preſide, you ſhall appoint him who was moderator in the laſt aſſembly, to preſide in this till a new moderator be choſen.

"We allow that lay-elders ſhall be admitted members of this aſſembly; but in caſe of the election of commiſſioners for preſbyteries, the lay-elders have had voice, you ſhall declare againſt the informality thereof, as alſo againſt lay-elders having voice in fundamental points of religion.

"At the firſt opening of the aſſembly, you ſhall ſtrive to make the aſſembly ſenſible of our goodneſs, that notwithſtanding all that is paſt, whereby we might have been juſtly moved not to hearken to their petitions, yet we have been graciouſly pleaſed to grant a free general aſſembly; and for great and weighty conſiderations, have commanded the archbiſhops and biſhops not to appear at this aſſembly.

"You ſhall not make uſe of the aſſeſſors in public, except you find you ſhall be able to carry their having vote in the aſſembly.

"You ſhall by all means ſhun the diſpute about our power in aſſemblies; and if it ſhall be urged or offered to be diſputed, whether we have the negative voice, or the ſole power of indicting, and conſequently of diſſolving, except you ſee clearly that you can carry the ſame in our favour, ſtop the diſpute; and rather than it be decided againſt us, ſtop the courſe of the aſſembly until we be advertiſed.

Hence

notwithstanding our own inclination, or any other considerations, we are contented, for our people's full satisfaction, to remit episcopacy and the estate of bishops to the freedom of the assembly; but so, as no respect be had to the determination of the point in the last assembly.

"But in giving way to the abolishing of episcopacy, be careful that it be done without the appearing of any warrant from the bishops; and if any offer to appear for them, you are to enquire for their warrant, and carry the dispute so, as the conclusion seem not to be made in prejudice of episcopacy as unlawful, but only in satisfaction to the people for settling the present disorders, and such other reasons of state: but herein you must be careful that our intentions appear not to any.

"You shall labour that ministers deposed by the last assembly, or commissions flowing from them, for no other cause but the subscribing the petition or declinator against the last assembly, be, upon their submission to the determination of this assembly, reponed in their own places; and such other ministers as are deposed for no other faults, that they be tried of new; and if that cannot be, strive that commissions may be directed from this assembly, for trying and censuring them, according to the nature of their process.

"That immediately upon the conclusion of this assembly, you indict another at some convenient time, as near the expiring of the year as you can, and if you find that Aberdeen be not a place agreeable, let Glasgow be the place; and if that cannot give content, let it be elsewhere.

"The general assembly is not to meddle with any thing that is civil, or which formerly hath been established by act of parliament, but upon his majesty's special command or warrant.

"We will not allow any commissioner from the assembly, nor no such act as may give ground for the continuing of the tables or conventicles.

"In case episcopacy be abolished at this assembly, you are to labour that we may have the power of chusing of so many ministers as may represent the fourteen bishops in parliament: or if that cannot be, that fourteen others whom we shall present be agreed to, with a power to chuse the lords of the articles for the nobility for this time, until the business be further considered upon.

"We allow that episcopacy be abolished, for the reasons contained in the articles; and the covenant 1580, for satisfaction of our people, be subscribed; provided it be so conceived, that thereby our subjects be not forced to abjure episcopacy as a point of popery, or contrary to God's law, or the protestant religion; but if they require it to be abjured as contrary to the constitution of the church of Scotland, you are to give way to it rather than to make a breach.

"After all assembly business is ended, and immediately before prayers, you shall in the fairest way that you can, protest, that in respect of his majesty's resolution of not coming in person, and that his instructions to you were upon short advertisement, whereupon many things may have occurred, wherein you have not had his majesty's pleasure; and for such other reasons as occasion may furnish, you are to protest, that in case any thing hath escaped you, or hath been condescended upon in this present assembly, prejudicial to his majesty's service, that his majesty may be heard for redress thereof in his own time and place[p].

"At Berwick the 27th of July, 1639."

Further instructions to the earl of Traquaire.

"Right trusty,

"WE have hitherto commanded Hamilton to answer several of your letters, but that on the 16th of August being of more weight than any of your former, we have thought fit to answer it ourself.

"And whereas you say, that nothing will satisfy them, except in terminis the last assembly be named and ratified, or that way be given to the discharging of episcopacy, as abjured in that church, as contrary to the confession of faith 1580, and the constitutions of the same, you being yet in some hope that the word abjured may be got changed, and that in drawing up the words of the act, it be only condemned as contrary to the constitution of the church: we in this point leave you to your instructions, they being full, if you consider what we have said concerning episcopacy, and subscribing the confession of faith 1580, we thinking it fit to declare hereupon unto you, that let their madness be what it will, further than we have declared in our instructions, in these points, we will not go.

"For the service-book, and book of canons, though we have been and are content they be discharged, yet we will never give our voice nor assent that they be condemned as containing divers heads of popery and superstition: in like manner, though we have been and are content that the high commission be discharged, yet we will never acknowledge that it is without law, or destructive to the civil and ecclesiastical judicatories of that our kingdom: nor that the five articles of Perth, though discharged with our approbation, be condemned as contrary to the aforesaid confession. As concerning the late assemblies, we cannot give our consent to have them declared null, since they were so notoriously our father (of happy memory) his acts: it seemed strange that we having condescended to the taking away of these things that they complained of, which were done in those assemblies, they will not be content therewith, without laying an aspersion on our father's actions. Wherefore if the assembly will, in despite of your endeavour, conclude contrary to this, you are to protest against their proceedings in these points, and be sure not to ratify them in parliament.

"Concerning the yearly indiction of general assemblies, and the confession of faith, we commanded Hamilton, in his of the 16th, to answer that point to this effect, that we think it infinitely to our prejudice, that we should consent to tie ourself for the keeping yearly of their assemblies, not needing to repeat the reasons, they being well enough known to you; seeing at Berwick it was conceived upon debate of that point, that your having power to indict a new one within the year, would save that dispute, which you are by all means to eschew. But if this will not give satisfaction, you are by no means to give your assent to any such act, nor to ratify the the same in parliament.

"The article in your instructions, which is only that the covenant 1580; shall be subscribed, you must have an especial care of, and how you proceed therein; that the bond be the same which was in our father's time, mutatis mutandis; and that you give your assent no other ways to the interpretations thereof, 'than may stand with our future intentions well known to you;' nor is the same otherwise to be ratified in parliament.

"Thus you have our pleasure fully signified in every particular of your letter; which you will find no ways contrary to our resolution taken at Berwick, and our instructions given to you there. But if the madness of our subjects be such, that they will not rest satisfied with what we have given you power and authority to condescend to, which notwithstanding all their insolencies we shall allow you to make good to them, we take God to witness, that what misery soever shall fall to that country hereafter, it is no fault of ours, but their own procurement. And hereupon we do command you, that if you cannot compose this business according to our instructions, and what we have now written, that you prorogue the parliament till the next spring; and that you think upon some course how you may make publicly known to all our subjects what we had given you power to condescend to. And because it is not improbable, that this way may produce a present rupture, you are to warn and assist Ruthven for the defence of the castle of Edinburgh; and to take in general the like care of all our houses and forts in that kingdom; and likewise to advertise all such who are affected to our service, that timeously they may secure themselves; and so we bid you heartily farewell."

It is plain from these instructions, that the king had some private intentions, but which were known to the earl of Traquair. The following letter may help to discover part of these intentions, at least with respect to the bishops.

His majesty's letter to the archbishop of St. Andrew's.

"Right trusty, and well-beloved counsellor, and reverend father in God, we greet you well.

"YOUR letter, and the rest of the bishops (sent by the elect of Cathness) to my lord of Canterbury, hath been by him communicated to us: and after serious consideration of the contents thereof, we have thought fit ourself to return this answer to you for direction, according to our promise, which you are to communicate to the rest of your brethren.

"We do in part approve of what you have advised, concerning the prorogating of the assembly and parliament, and must acknowledge it to be grounded upon reason enough, were reason only to be thought on in this business: but considering the present state of our affairs, and what we have promised in the articles of pacification, we may not (as we conceive) without great prejudice to our self and service, condescend thereunto; wherefore we are resolved (rather necessitated) to hold the assembly and parliament at the time and place appointed; and for that end we have nominated the earl of Traquaire our commissioner, to whom we have given instructions, not only how to carry himſelf at the ſame, but a charge alſo to have a ſpecial care of your lordſhips, and thoſe of the inferior clergy, who have ſuffered for their duty to God, and obedience to our commands. And we do hereby aſſure you, that it ſhall be ſtill one of our chiefeſt ſtudies, how to rectify and eſtabliſh the goverment of that church aright, and to repair your loſſes, which we deſire you to be moſt confident of.

"As for your meeting to treat of the affairs of the church, we do not ſee at this time how that can be done; for within our kingdom of Scotland we cannot promiſe you any place of ſafety; and in any other of our dominions we cannot hold it convenient, all things conſidered; wherefore we conceive, that the beſt way would be for your lordſhips to give in, by way of proteſtation, or remonſtrance, your exceptions againſt this aſſembly and parliament to our commiſſioner, which may be ſent by any mean man, ſo he be truſty, and deliver it at his entering into the church; but we would not have it to be either read or argued in this meeting, where nothing but partiality is to be expected, but to be repreſented to us by him; which we promiſe to take ſo into conſideration, as becometh a prince ſenſible of his own intereſt and honour, joined with the equity of your deſires; and you may reſt ſecure, that though perhaps we may give way for the preſent, to that which will be prejudicial both to the church and our own government, yet we ſhall not leave thinking in time how to remedy both.

"We muſt likewiſe intimate unto you, that we are ſo far from conceiving it expedient for you, or any of my lords of the clergy to be preſent at this meeting, as we do abſolutely diſcharge your going thither; and for your abſence, this ſhall be to you, and every of you, a ſufficient warrant: in the interim, your beſt courſe will be to remain in our kingdom of England, till ſuch time as you receive our farther order, where we ſhall provide for your ſubſiſtence; though not in a meaſure as we could wiſh, yet, in ſuch a way as you ſhall not be in want.

"Thus you have our pleaſure briefly ſignified unto you, which we doubt not but you will take in good part: you cannot but know, that what we do in this, we are neceſſitated to; ſo we bid you farewell.

"Whitehall, Aug. 6. 1639. C. R."

I have already obſerved, that the late peace between the king and his ſubjects of Scotland, did not properly conſiſt in the ſeven articles of pacification, ſince there was no mention there of the true ground of the quarrel, but only of what paſſed after the breach. Indeed both parties agreed to lay down their arms; but the peace could not be ſaid to be concluded, ſo long as the motives of rupture ſtill ſubſiſted. If the demands of the Scots, and the king's anſwer be conſidered, ſuch ambiguity on both ſides will appear, that the peace muſt have been deemed very doubtful. The Scots reduced their demands to this, "That they might enjoy their religion and liberties, according to the eccleſiaſtical and civil laws of the kingdom, offering in return all obedience to his majeſty, which could be required or expected of loyal ſubjects." The king granted this their deſire in the ſame words, and on the ſame conditions. But there was a palpable ambiguity as well in the demand, as in the anſwer. The Scots underſtood by the laws of the kingdom, thoſe that were in force before king James's acceſſion to England, and all the innovations by them complained of; but the king meant ſuch as were enacted ſince that time. The condition was no leſs equivocal, for the obedience promiſed by the Scots, related to the obſervance of the ancient laws, but that expected by the king, was founded upon the late laws. Both parties muſt have perceived the equivocation in what was to be the foundation of the peace, ſince neither of the parties could be ignorant of the occaſion of the breach. But however, both ſides feigned not to perceive it, in order to be freed from their embarraſſment in taking up arms. The Scots had flattered themſelves, that conſidering the diſcontents which reigned in England, the king would not be able to raiſe an army to reduce them to obedience. But contrary to their expectation, they ſaw him near their borders, at the head of twenty thouſand men, whilſt they had not above twelve thouſand, without reckoning his fleet, which interrupted their trade. It was therefore their intereſt to endeavour by all means to avoid a deciſion of the quarrel by arms. The loſs of a battle would have certainly reduced them to ſlavery. Beſides, their friends in England diſſuaded them from running any hazard, and made them hope, they ſhould, very ſhortly, put it out of the king's power to hurt them. For theſe reaſons, they were contented with the general demand of their religion and liberties, in order to gain time, knowing, that when matters came to be diſcuſſed, they ſhould find means to include all their pretenſions in this general demand. The king, on his ſide, was no leſs embarraſſed. Though he had an army ſuperior in number of troops, he was apprehenſive of treacheries, or at leaſt, that the Engliſh ſubjects would not cheerfully venture their lives for his ſake: ſo that the loſs of a battle would not only have occaſioned the loſs of Scotland, but even put his affairs in England in a very ill ſituation. Therefore, though he could not poſſibly be ignorant of what the Scots meant by their religion and laws, finding they did not explain themſelves more clearly, he took them at their word, in a belief, that at a more convenient ſeaſon, it would be in his power to give theſe terms the ſenſe that to him ſeemed moſt natural. It may therefore be affirmed, that this peace, which yet decided nothing, was concluded upon very uncertain foundations, and that both parties when they laid down, were in much the ſame ſtate as when they took up their arms. But it was eaſy to foreſee, a time would come, when it would be neceſſary to explain what hitherto remained in obſcurity.

The biſhops failed not, according to the king's advice, to preſent a declinator or proteſtation to the high commiſſioner [q], who receiving it publicly as he was going into the church, was contented with ſending it to the king, without communicating it to the aſſembly [r]. The king was deſirous to have ſuch a paper in his hands, that he might uſe it upon occaſion, or at a more proper time.

In this general aſſembly held at Edinburgh by the king's order, the high commiſſioner had ſufficient intereſt to hinder any mention of the former aſſembly at Glaſgow. Nevertheleſs, there paſſed ſeveral acts very diſagreeable to the king, to which however the high commiſſioner gave his conſent.

The firſt contained the cauſes of the evils that had lately happened in the kirk of Scotland. Theſe cauſes, being ſix in number, were in ſubſtance: "1. The preſſing of the ſervice-book, the books of canons and of conſecration and ordination, and the high commiſſion. 2. The five articles of Perth. 3. The changing the government of the kirk into epiſcopal government. 4. The civil places conferred on kirkmen. 5. The keeping and authorizing the aſſemblies in 1606, 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, and 1618. 6. The want of lawful and free general aſſemblies." It was therefore ordained by this act, that all theſe things ſhould be aboliſhed, and the kirk reſtored to its former ſtate. To this act the high commiſſioner conſented verbally, and promiſed to have it ratified in the enſuing parliament. Another act alſo paſſed for the better keeping the lord's-day.

After which followed a ſupplication of the general aſſembly to the commiſſioner, deſiring that a book called, The large Declaration; and written by Dr. Balcanquel, dean of Durham, a Scotchman, againſt his countrymen, might be called in. To this the commiſſioner gave no other anſwer, but that he would "impart the ſame to his majeſty."

Then was preſented to the high commiſſioner another ſupplication from the aſſembly, and the lords of the privy-council, wherein they petitioned, that it might be enjoined by act of council, that the confeſſion and covenant ſhould be ſubſcribed by all his majeſty's ſubjects in Scotland, of what rank ſoever. The high commiſſioner anſwered, by advice of the council, That he thought himſelf bound in conſcience to approve of the covenant, and as earl of Traquaire, would ſubſcribe it as heartily as any ſubject in the kingdom; but as the king's commiſſioner he could not do it, unleſs a clauſe was added, that this covenant was the ſame with that ſubſcribed by king James VI. in the years 1580, 1581, and 1590. Whereupon the aſſembly made a new act, enjoining all the members of the kirk to ſign the covenant, with this clauſe prefixed to the names of the ſubſcribers:

"We ſubſcribe this covenant according to the explanation it hath received from the general aſſembly, that is, as declaring the five articles of Perth, the government of the kirk by biſhops, and the beſtowing civil places on kirkmen, to be unlawful within this kirk."

After that, the aſſembly reſolved to preſent a petition to the king, to pray him to cauſe the acts to be ratified by the parliament. That done, they appointed the laſt Tueſday in July 1640, for holding another general aſſembly at Aberdeen, without conſulting the high commiſſioner.

The acts paſſed in this aſſembly plainly ſhew what the Scots meant by their religion, namely, that profeſſed in 1580. The aſſembly had alſo determined, contrary to the king's preten-

[q] The earl of Traquair. The king is always preſent in the general aſſembly, by himſelf or commiſſioner.

[r] The king, in his letter to archbiſhop Spotiſwood, ordered him to give in a proteſtation againſt the aſſembly, but that it ſhould not be read or argued in the meeting, where, as he ſays, nothing but partiality was to be expected. Ruſhworth, tom. III. p. 952.

They

ſions, that epiſcopacy was aboliſhed [s] by the confeſſion of faith in the year 1580, though the biſhops were not ſo much as mentioned. Whereas, the king pretended, the religion of the kingdom was that which was actually profeſſed ſince the year 1606, and ſince eſtabliſhed by ſeveral acts of parliament and general aſſemblies. On the contrary, the aſſembly of Edinburgh declared, that the aſſemblies held from 1606 to 1618, were void, and thereby annulled the acts of parliament by which they were confirmed and ratified. As to the covenant, the ſame aſſembly, in pretending to admit of the clauſe annexed by the earl of Traquair, had rendered it of no effect, by an additional explanation. The earl was much blamed for not ſtoutly oppoſing this interpretation; nay, when he came to give the king an account of his commiſſion, a Scotch biſhop [t] accuſed him of treaſon, and offered to ſuffer as a traitor, if he did not make good his accuſation.

By what had paſſed in the aſſembly, the king ſaw plainly what he was to expect from the parliament, which met preſently after the ſeparation of the aſſembly. Before the ratification of the acts of the aſſembly was propoſed, they preſented to the high-commiſſioner ſome acts, which ſhewed they were no leſs bent to maintain the privileges of the people, and guard againſt the artifices by which the court had for forty years cauſed the parliament to paſs what they pleaſed. I have mentioned elſewhere the manner of chuſing the lords of the articles in the parliament of Scotland, but it is neceſſary to explain it a little more fully, for the better underſtanding how advantageous to the king this method was grown. Ever ſince the reign of David Bruce, that is, for about three hundred years, it had been cuſtomary in Scotland, that when the parliament met, there were elected a certain number of noblemen, biſhops, barons, and burgeſſes, who were called lords of the articles. The buſineſs of this ſelect committee was to examine and prepare the bills which were to be moved in parliament; and as they had power to reject ſuch as they did not judge neceſſary or convenient, it ſeldom happened that thoſe they admitted were ever thrown out. The manner of election, ſettled at a time when the inconveniences could not be foreſeen, was thus: The body of the nobility nominated eight biſhops, theſe biſhops named eight lords, the ſixteen elect biſhops and lords choſe eight barons [a], theſe twenty-four elected eight burgeſſes [b]. This cuſtom ſubſiſted without many inconveniences, till James VI. attempted to reſtore epiſcopacy. That prince, as we have ſeen, began with reſtoring the biſhops and lay-abbots, to their ſeats in parliament; and thereby had the votes of all the repreſentatives of the church at his command. So the nobility, in chuſing eight biſhops, could name none but what were devoted to the king, from whom they received their benefices. Theſe eight biſhops made it their chief care to name eight lords, on whom the king could depend. Theſe ſixteen never failed to chuſe eight barons of the ſame party, and conſequently, the eight burgeſſes elected by the twenty-four, were likewiſe friends of the court. By this means, the king obtained of the parliament the forementioned acts, to reſtore epiſcopal government in the kirk, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the general aſſemblies. This gave occaſion alſo to the complaint publicly diſperſed in writing, that Charles I. in his journey to Scotland, had uſed unlawful methods to obtain the two acts concerning religion, of which I have ſpoken. It is ſaid, that among the eight lords then choſen by the biſhops, there were three ſuſpected of popery.

As ſince that time the face of affairs had been much changed in Scotland, and the king had no longer any power there, the parliament, which met by his majeſty's order at Edinburgh in the year 1639, reſolved to prevent the inconveniences flowing from the election of the lords of the articles. To that purpoſe they preſented to the high-commiſſioner an act, declaring null and void whatever ſhould be done in parliament, before the ancient way of electing the lords of the articles ſhould be altered. This act was founded not only upon the forementioned inconveniences, but chiefly upon the parliament's diſpoſition to aboliſh entirely the order of biſhops, from whence followed an abſolute neceſſity to alter the manner of chuſing the lords of the articles. Beſides, in all appearance, the parliament was willing to obviate thereby the king's demand, that fourteen miniſters or lay-abbots of his chuſing might ſupply the place of the biſhops [c].

Beſides this act, which was very material at this juncture, the parliament preſented alſo ſeveral others, all tending to leſſen the king's prerogative.

"2. By the ſecond it was enacted, that the coin ſhould not be meddled with, but by advice of parliament.

"3. By the third, that no ſtranger ſhould be entruſted with keeping of any caſtles, nor other perſon put in them, but by advice of the eſtates." This was becauſe the king had lately made two Engliſhmen governors of the caſtles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton.

"4. That no patent of honour be granted to any ſtranger, but ſuch as have a competency of land-rent in Scotland.

"5. That no commiſſion of juſticiary or lieutenancy may be granted but for a limited time.

"6. They proteſted againſt the precedency of the lord-treaſurer, and lord privy-ſeal, becauſe as they alleged, the ſame was not warranted by a poſitive law."

There were others of the ſame nature, all prejudicial to the king, but which it is needleſs to inſert. It may well be thought, the high-commiſſioner did not believe himſelf ſufficiently authoriſed to give his conſent to all theſe acts, without informing his majeſty.

The king ſeeing what courſe his affairs were taking in the parliament of Scotland, plainly perceived by theſe firſt proceedings, that his commiſſioner would be little able to follow his inſtructions, and therefore, ordered him by letter only to prorogue the parliament till the 2d of June the next year 1640, and if he met with oppoſition, to declare that the members who ſhould continue to aſſemble were guilty of high-treaſon. This order, being ſignified to the parliament, met not with that compliance the king perhaps had expected. They broke up however, but in ſuch a manner as was no leſs diſagreeable to the king, than if they had continued their ſeſſion. Before they parted, they made a declaration, importing that the earl of Traquair had not power to prorogue the parliament upon the king's letters, without the conſent of the parliament itſelf. That this order was owing to miſinformations, the parliament not having given the king any offence or cauſe of complaint. That hitherto the parliament were never prorogued without their own conſent, and conſequently this prorogation was contrary to the uſage of the kingdom. They complained moreover, that the earl of Traquair and the council had ſeveral ways violated the privileges of the parliament, during this ſeſſion. In ſhort, they declared, that though they might lawfully remain aſſembled, notwithſtanding the prorogation they were willing to break up, in order to give the king a proof of their obedience; but however, thought proper to leave a committee of ſome of each eſtate, to preſent a remonſtrance to his majeſty and attend his gracious anſwer, and to aſſure the king on all occaſions of the parliament's ſincere intention to pay him all due obedience. The declaration concluded with a proteſtation, that if any outrages and inſolencies ſhould be committed, they could not be imputed to them, ſince they were conſtrained to uſe the propereſt means to ſecure the kirk and ſtate from the impending miſery and confuſion.

Purſuant to the power given them by the parliament, the committee ſent the earl of Dumfermling and the lord Lowdon to preſent a remonſtrance to his majeſty. But the king refuſed to give theſe deputies audience, as coming without warrant from the high-commiſſioner, and without communicating to him the occaſion of their journey. After their departure, the king ſent for the earl of Traquair, and ordered him to report to the council what had paſſed in Scotland ſince the pacification. It was upon this lord's report, and without hearing what the Scots had to ſay in their defence, that the council of England unanimouſly declared, it was abſolutely neceſſary to reduce the Scots to their duty by force of arms. Mean while, as this reſolution ſeemed a little too haſty, ſince it was not yet known what the Scots might plead in their vindication, the king perceiving how prejudicial this precipitation might be to him, gave the committee of Edinburgh leave to ſend their deputies. But this was more for decency, than to ſee whether there would be any reaſon to alter the reſolution already taken, the king not being ignorant of what could be ſaid on this occaſion.

[1640] Purſuant to the king's permiſſion, four deputies came preſently after, namely, the earl of Dumfermling, the lord Lowdon, Sir William Douglaſs, and Mr. Robert Berkley, and preſented to him two petitions. The firſt

[c] The parliament allowed the high-commiſſioner to name the eight lords, who ſhould have been named by the biſhops, but proteſted it ſhould be no precedent for the future; and they went on roundly to take away the lords of the articles entirely. When it was debated about what was to be brought in, in lieu of the biſhops, the commiſſioner urged for the king to have fourteen lay-abbots to repreſent the third eſtate; but it was voted, that the third eſtate ſhould be completed by ſmall barons, who were to repreſent the commonalty. Ruſhworth, tom. III. p. 955.

was from the late general aſſembly held at Edinburgh, who, after thanking him for being pleaſed to conſent that eccleſiaſtical affairs ſhould be determined in the aſſembly of the kirk, prayed him to ratify their conſtitutions by the parliament. By the other petition, the four deputies deſired to be heard before ſome of the counſellors of both kingdoms, and that the earl of Traquair's report to the council of England might be given them in writing under his hand. The king thought not proper to grant either of theſe articles. However, he appointed a committee of the council to hear them, to which the deputies would not agree, ſaying, they were ſent to his majeſty to juſtify the proceedings of the parliament of Scotland, and not to the council of England, who had no juriſdiction over the Scots. To remove this objection, the king was pleaſed to hear them himſelf, in the preſence of the committee he had appointed. The lord Lowdon made a long ſpeech in vindication of their tranſactions in Scotland; for that was the ſole motive of the deputation. But the king feigning to believe, and being very willing to ſuppoſe they were come to treat with him of an agreement, objected to them, that their powers were inſufficient, ſince they could neither offer nor accept of any terms. A few days after, the council of England declared, that the Scotch deputies had power only to juſtify the proceedings of their countrymen. And indeed, they had been ſent only for that purpoſe, and not to treat with the king[d].

It was reſolved, as I ſaid, in the council of England, to reduce the Scots to obedience by force. It is neceſſary therefore to ſhew upon what this reſolution was founded. Though the king was by no means pleaſed with the acts of the general aſſembly of Edinburgh, he had no reaſon however to complain, ſince they were approved by his high-commiſſioner, authorized for that purpoſe by a commiſſion under the great ſeal. Wherefore being deſirous to hinder theſe acts from being ratified by the parliament, he thought it more proper to ground the breach occaſioned by the prorogation of the parliament of Scotland, upon the proceedings of the parliament than upon thoſe of the aſſembly. He complained therefore,

"1. That under pretence of his having promiſed a free parliament, they had carried that freedom ſo far as to imagine, that it was not to be limited with their own conditions, ſubſcribed by the lord Lowdon, which were, to enjoy their religion and liberties, according to the eccleſiaſtical and civil laws of their kingdom. For it was evident, that the parliament had far exceeded the bounds eſtabliſhed by the laws.

"2. If they object, that they aſſume this liberty by our allowing of the covenant, and commanding our former high-commiſſioner the lord marquis of Hamilton, and other our ſubjects to ſubſcribe it; the anſwer is very ready, that there is a great difference between the covenant and band ſubſcribed by our commandment, and their band; for that covenant and band was made by our late father king James of bleſſed memory, anno 1580, and obligeth thoſe that ſwear to it, that they ſhould mutually aſſiſt one another, as they ſhould be commanded by the king, or any authorized by him. But this new band was made without our conſent, and by it they ſwear, mutually to aſſiſt one another, not accepting the king. Neither can the earl of Traquair's ſubſcription or allowance of the covenant be any warrant for their rebellious courſes, ſeeing they did humbly ſupplicate, 'that they may be allowed and warranted to ſubſcribe it;' which clearly evinces, that what they did before, and of themſelves, without warrant of authority, was neither laudable nor warrantable. Beſides, it appears by what is prefixt to the earl of Traquair's ſubſcription, that by the covenant he meant the ſame with that of 1580.

"3. Since the parliament, they have, without any authority or commiſſion from us, taken upon them to levy and raiſe forces in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; and have aſſigned them a rendezvous, and a day to be in a readineſs to march.

"4. They have made proviſions of great quantities of artillery, munition and arms, from foreign parts, which they have ready in magazine to make uſe of againſt us their ſovereign.

"5. They have of themſelves laid taxes and impoſitions of ten marks in every hundred upon all and every our ſubjects, according to their ſeveral revenues; and this they exacted with the greateſt rigour and tyranny that can be imagined.

"6. They have cauſed to be framed and publiſhed, ſundry falſe, ſeditious and ſcandalous papers and pamphlets; and amongſt others, one entitled, An Information from the eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland, to the kingdom of England, &c. which we have cauſed to be burnt by the hand of the hangman.

"7. They have refuſed the lord Eſtrick, governor of our caſtle at Edinburgh, timber, and other materials neceſſary for reparation of the works lately fallen down there, notwithſtanding our expreſs commandment by our letters to them, upon their allegiance to furniſh them.

"8. They have committed ſundry outrages and violences upon the perſons of ſome of the garriſons at Edinburgh, that came out of the caſtle to buy victuals.

"9. They have begun to raiſe works and fortifications againſt the ſaid caſtle, thereby to block up that our royal fort, and to render it unuſeful. And they have fortified ſundry other places in that our kingdom, and particularly Inſgarvy, where they have mounted divers pieces of ordnance.

"10. They have lately impriſoned the lord of Southeſk, and ſundry others of quality, for not adhering to them, and for their fidelity to us.

"11. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh have upon ſundry occaſions refuſed to yield us due obedience, alleging, that they have delivered up the power of governing the town into the hands of the committee of the pretended tables, by which they have not only voluntarily diſabled themſelves to ſerve us, but have incurred the guilt of high treaſon, by conferring upon any that power of government which they derive and hold from us alone."

Of theſe eleven articles nine were inconſiderable. As after the prorogation of the parliament, the Scots had great reaſon to fear the king intended to renew the war, the precautions they took for their defence, could not be deemed a juſt cauſe of invading them, though their fears had been vain. At leaſt, all theſe proceedings could have been eaſily repaired by the concluſion of a good peace. But the moſt material article, on which the king chiefly inſiſted, was,

"12. A letter communicated to him by the earl of Traquair, and which had been intercepted by his lordſhip. It was written to the king of France by the chief of the malecontents to deſire his aſſiſtance. The letter follows, with this indorſement, 'Au Roy,' which, as his majeſty obſerved, is in France always underſtood from thoſe ſubjects only to their natural prince.

"SIR,

"YOUR majeſty being the refuge and ſanctuary of afflicted princes and ſtates, we have found it neceſſary to ſend this Gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to repreſent unto your majeſty the candour and ingenuity, as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions, which we deſire to be engraven and written to the whole world with a beam[e] of the ſun, as well as to your majeſty. We therefore moſt humbly beſeech you (Sir) to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he ſhall ſay on our part, touching us and our affairs; being moſt aſſured (Sir) of an aſſiſtance equal to your wonted clemency heretofore, and ſo often ſhewed to this nation, which will not yield the glory to any other whatſoever to be eternally, Sir,

"Your majeſty's moſt humble, moſt obedient,
"and moſt affectionate ſervants,

Rothes. Montroſe. Leſly. Marre.
Montgomery.
Lowdon. Forreſter."

This letter, though no date appears, was writ before the peace. At leaſt, the lord Lowdon, who was committed to the Tower on that account, affirmed it, and I do not find he was ever contradicted. On the other hand, the king who pretended to receive great advantages from this letter, never ſaid it was penned ſince the ſigning of the articles of pacification. From whence it may be inferred, either the ſub-

[d] During theſe commiſſioners ſtay in England, many ſecret councils were held with them by the diſcontented Engliſh; chiefly by the favourers of preſbytery, and thoſe who had ſuffered in the ſtar chamber, or high-commiſſion. The earls of Eſſex, Bedford, and Holland; the lord Say, Mr. Hampden, and Pym, and others of great intereſt and quality, were deep in with them. Whitelock, p. 3. The lord Savile in particular, with great vehemence preſſed them to engage in a new war, and among other motives, brought them engagements in writing from moſt of the greateſt peers in England, to join with them, and aſſiſt them when they ſhould come into England with an army. But theſe engagements were diſcovered at the treaty of Rippon to have been a baſe forgery. Burnet's Mem. of Hamil. p. 165. Hiſtory of his Time. p. 37. Hiſtory of the Stuarts, p. 141, &c.

[e] It is in the original Raye (which ſignifies a Thornback) inſtead of Rais or Rayon; for which reaſon it ſeems, after the letter was ſigned by ſix of the covenanting lords, it was rejected by the lord Maitland, becauſe it was falſe French; and ſo it was laid aſide, and never again taken into conſideration: but one taking up the letter, brought it to Traquair. Mem. of Duke Hamilton, p. 161.——It was ſaid, however, that the Scots were encouraged to take up arms from cardinal Richelieu, by his chaplains, Chamberlain and Con. Scots; and by letters which a page of his brought to ſeveral in England and Scotland. Whitelock, p. 33. Coke. p. 325.

Sir

ſcribers forgot to date it, or the date was not ſerviceable to the king who produced it. However this be, though the letter was never ſent to France, ſince it was put into the hands of the earl of Traquair in Scotland, the king, who had reſolved to renew the war, made great uſe of it to vindicate his conduct. He pretended, the Scots deſigned to introduce a foreign army into their country to invade England, and therefore he was indiſpenſably obliged to defend his Engliſh ſubjects. But it will be ſeen hereafter, that he did not reap from it all the advantages he expected.

Upon this foundation however, he reſolved to renew the war with Scotland. But though he alleged many reaſons, as we have ſeen, it is certain, the chief motive was the abolition of epiſcopacy, to which he could not conſent. If this ſingle point could have been adjuſted, the reſt were not conſiderable enough to oblige the two parties to take up arms again. So the whole queſtion of right between Charles and the Scots was reduced to this: whether James and Charles could alter the government of the kirk of Scotland, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the kirk itſelf; and whether the Scots might demand the abolition of epiſcopacy, eſtabliſhed upon the ruins of preſbytery, on the pretence of artifices practiſed by the court to get theſe acts paſſed.

The war being reſolved, the king took all poſſible meaſures to have a numerous army, by taxing, as uſual, each county to find a certain number of troops. On the other hand, a ſea-fight between the Spaniards and Dutch, near the coaſt of England, furniſhed the king with a pretence to renew his warrants for the payment of ſhip-money. As on this occaſion the Dutch, who were the aggreſſors, had ſhewn little regard to the ſovereignty of the ſea aſſumed by the king, his majeſty loudly complained of the affront he had received, and upon this foundation ſeemed bent to equip a powerful fleet to preſerve the dominion of the ſea, and defend the kingdom. Wherefore he ordered ſhip-money, as well as the arrears of that tax, to be levied with great ſeverity. The ſheriff of Northamptonſhire having ſent to court a petition of the county againſt ſhip-money [f], the council reprimanded him very ſharply, commanding him to do his office on pain of exemplary puniſhment. On the other hand, ſir John Finch being made lord-keeper [g] upon the death of the lord Coventry, made a ſpeech to the judges, to exhort them to uſe in their circuits all their authority to promote this tax. So it was evident the king was reſolved to compaſs his ends, let what would be the conſequence, and that this impoſition was grown by degrees a ſtanding tax upon the people.

At laſt, the king appointed Algernoon Piercy earl of Northumberland for general of the army againſt Scotland, and gave him for lieutenant-general Thomas lord Wentworth, deputy of Ireland, lately made earl of Strafford. As he always dreaded the correſpondents the Scots had in England, and for that reaſon durſt not truſt his council with all his affairs, he appointed a ſecret council, conſiſting of three perſons only, namely, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the marquis of Hamilton, and the earl of Strafford [h]. Theſe three entirely directed the king's moſt important affairs, and were the perſons, that after mature deliberation adviſed him to call a parliament. But as the king objected to them, that before the ſubſidies, which the parliament ſhould grant, could be paid, he ſhould be reduced to great ſtraits; the ſecret council provided againſt this inconvenience, by adviſing him to borrow of each of his counſellors or others, who ſhould be willing to lend, the ſums he ſhould want to ſupply his preſent occaſions. The earl of Strafford alone ſubſcribed 20,000l. The example of the counſellors being followed by ſome other lords, the king was enabled to make preparations for the war, before he had received any aid from the parliament. So the parliament was called for the 13th of April, and a few days after the king publiſhed a proclamation, to revoke the ſame patents which had ſerved to eſtabliſh monopolies, though they had been revoked once before without any effect.

The parliament being aſſembled at Weſtminſter, on the day appointed, the king went to the houſe of lords, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THERE was never a king that had a more great and weighty cauſe to call his people together than myſelf; I will not trouble you with the particulars; I have informed my lord-keeper, and commanded him to ſpeak; and deſire your attention."

Then ſir John Finch lord-keeper, ſpoke thus:

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons,

"You are here this day aſſembled by his majeſty's gracious writ and royal command, to hold a parliament, the general, ancient, and greateſt council of this renowned kingdom. By you, as by a ſelect choice and abſtract, the whole kingdom is preſented to his majeſty's royal view, and made happy in the beholding of his excellent and ſacred perſon. All of you, not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but in your perſons that are of the houſe of commons, every one, even the meaneſt of his majeſty's ſubjects, are graciouſly allowed to participate and ſhare in the honour of thoſe counſels, that concern the great and weighty affairs of the king and kingdom. You come all armed with the votes and ſuffrages of the whole nation: and I aſſure myſelf, your hearts are filled with the zealous and humble affection to his majeſty's perſon and government, that ſo juſt, ſo pious, and ſo gracious a king, hath reaſon to expect from all his ſubjects. I doubt not, but you rejoice at this day's meeting, and methinks you ſhould do ſo too; and good reaſon you have to do ſo, and with all humbleneſs of heart to acknowledge, the great goodneſs of his majeſty, who ſequeſtring the memory of all former diſcouragements in preceding aſſemblies, is now of a fatherly affection to his people, and a confidence that they will not be failing in their duty to him, who is pleaſed graciouſly to invite you and all his loving ſubjects to a ſacred unity of hearts and affections, in the ſervices of him and of the common-wealth, and in the execution of thoſe counſels that tend only to the honour of his majeſty, and to the good preſervation of you all. His majeſty's kingly reſolutions are ſeated in the ark of his ſacred breaſt, and it were a preſumption of too high a nature, for any Uzzah uncalled to touch it: yet his majeſty's is now pleaſed to lay by the ſhining beams of majeſty, as Phœbus did to Phaeton, that the diſtance between ſovereignty and ſubjection ſhould not bar you of that filial freedom of acceſs to his perſon and counſels, only let us beware how, with the ſon of Clymene, we aim at the guiding of the chariot, as if that were the only teſtimony of fatherly affection: and let us ever remember, that though the king ſometimes lays by the beams and rays of majeſty, he never lays by majeſty itſelf.

"In former parliaments you have been adviſed with, for the preventing and diverting of thoſe dangers, which by foreign and more remote counſels, might have tended to the diſhonour and ruin of this nation; therein his majeſty's great wiſdom and providence hath for many years eaſed you of that trouble, his majeſty having with great judgment and prudence not only ſeen and prevented our danger, but kept up the honour and ſplendor of the Engliſh crown, of which at this day we find the happy and comfortable experience; Almighty God having vouchſafed ſuch ſucceſs to his majeſty's counſels, that our fleece is dry, when it raineth blood in all the neighbouring ſtates. But what availeth this kingdom, Si foras hoſtem non inveniat, ſi modo domi inveniat? You are now ſummoned to counſels and reſolutions that more nearly concern you, to prevent a danger and diſhonour that knocks at our gates, and that moves from ſuch, from whom we had little reaſon to ſuſpect it. It is well known upon what happy and ſolid counſels one of our wiſeſt kings made a match with Scotland for his eldeſt daughter. We cannot forget (I am ſure we ſhould not) the bleſſed ſucceſs that waited upon thoſe counſels, when the crown of England deſcended upon king James of ever bleſſed and famous memory, who with the fulneſs of joy to all true Engliſh hearts, made his entry not by bloodſhed. The wall of ſeparation was thereby taken away; and that glorious king, to make his word good, faciam eos in gentem unam, made all England rejoice, and Scotland I am ſure had no reaſon to be ſorry for it: they participated of Engliſh honours, the wealth and revenue of this nation they ſhared in, and no good thing was with-holden from them; ſuch was the largeneſs of heart in that moſt excellent king, and ſuch was the comfort we took in this fraternity, or rather unity: when both of us had but one brazen wall of fortification to look unto, the ſea, and all things ſo equally and evenly carried

To theſe were added the earl of Northumberland, for ornament; the biſhop of London, for his place, being lord-treaſurer; the two ſecretaries, Vane and Windebank, for ſervice and intelligence: only the marquis of Hamilton by his ſkill and intereſt meddled juſt ſo far, and no farther, than he had a mind. between us, that Tros Tyriuſque nullo diſcrimine habentur. His majeſty, our moſt gracious ſovereign, became heir, as well to his father's virtues as to his kingdoms, Pacatumque regit, &c. and in his gracious and tender affection to that nation, hath given as many indulgent teſtimonies of love and benignity as they could expect. Thus became we both like a land flowing with milk and honey: peace and plenty dwelt in our ſtreets, and we have had all our bleſſings crowned with the ſweet hopes of perpetuity. God found out for my lord the king a companion mete for him, his royal conſort, our moſt gracious queen, who, as ſhe is not to be paralleled for her perſon and virtue, ſo hath ſhe made his majeſty and the whole kingdom moſt happy and bleſſed in the ſweeteſt pledges of their love, and our hopes, which ever ſtood like olive-branches about the throne or table: but which I ſorrow for, Civiles furores patriæ nimia infelicitas, and when his majeſty had moſt reaſon to expect a grateful return of loyalty and obedience from all the Scotiſh nation, ſome men of Belial, ſome Zeba, hath blown the trumpet there, and by their inſolencies and rebellious actions drawn many after them, to the utter deſertion of his majeſty's government; and his majeſty's and his kingly father's love and bounty to that nation quite forgotten, his goodneſs and piety unremembered.

"They have lead a multitude after them into a courſe of diſloyalty and rebellious treaſon, ſuch as former times have not left in mention, nor this preſent age can any where equal; they have taken up arms againſt the Lord's anointed, their rightful prince, and undoubted ſovereign, and following the wicked counſels of ſome Ahithophel, they have ſeized on the trophies of honour, and inveſted themſelves with regal power and authority: ſuch, and ſo many acts of diſloyalty and diſobedience, as (let their pretences be what they will be) no true Engliſh or chriſtian heart, but muſt acknowledge them to be the effects of foul and horrid treaſon.

"The laſt ſummer his majeſty, at his own charge, and at the vaſt expence of many of his faithful and loving ſubjects of England, went with an army, and then they took upon them the boldneſs to out-face and brave his royal army, with another of their own raiſing; yet for all this, his majeſty's goodneſs was not leſſened by that, nor could his gracious nature forget what he was to them, nor what they were to him; but conſidering with himſelf they were ſuch quos nec vincere, nec vinci glorioſum fuerat, out of his piety and clemency, choſe rather to paſs by their former miſcarriages, upon their humble proteſtations of future loyalty and obedience, than by juſt vengeance to puniſh their rebellion.

"But his majeſty (who is ever awake for the good and ſafety of all his ſubjects) hath ſince too plainly diſcovered, that they did but prevaricate with him to divert the ſtorm which hung over their heads, and by gaining time to purchaſe themſelves more advantage for purſuing their rebellious purpoſes.

"For ſince his majeſty came from Berwick, it is come to his certain knowledge, that inſtead of performing that loyalty and obedience, which by the laws of God, of nature, and nations, they owe unto him, they have addreſſed themſelves to foreign ſtates, and treated with them to deliver themſelves up to their protection and power (as by God's great providence and goodneſs, his gracious majeſty is able to ſhew under the hands of the prime ring-leaders of that faction) than which nothing could be of more dangerous conſequence to this and his majeſty's other kingdoms. Whoſoever they be that do, or ſhall wiſh England ill, they may know it to be of too tough a complexion and courage, to be aſſailed in the face, or to be ſet upon at the fore-door: and therefore it is not unlikely, but they may (as in former times) find out a poſtern-gate.

"There were heretofore two of them, Scotland and Ireland, and both of them had their ſeveral defences.

"Ireland, through his majeſty's juſt and prudent government, is not only reduced from the diſtemper of former times, but ſettled in ſuch a condition of peace, and during his majeſty's happy reign ſo altered and civilized, that inſtead of being a charge to him (as it was to his predeceſſors) hath yielded to him ſome revenue, and his ſubjects there do daily give very acceptable teſtimonies of their loyal and dutiful affection, both to his perſon and government. And now lately at the parliament aſſembled, they have not only with full and free conſent, made his majeſty a cheerful aid towards his preſent preparations, to reduce his diſaffected ſubjects in Scotland to their due obedience, but they have alſo profeſſed and promiſed, that they will be ready with their perſons and eſtates, to the uttermoſt of their ability, for his majeſty's future ſupply, as his great occaſions, by the continuance of his forces againſt that diſtemper, ſhall require; ſo that the hopes of hurting England that way, are quite extinct.

"Scotland then only remains, whither (as to a weak and diſtempered part of the body) all the rheums and fluxes of factious humours make away.

"His majeſty hath taken all theſe and much more into his princely conſideration; and to avoid a manifeſt and apparent miſchief, threatened to this and his other kingdoms, hath reſolved, by the means of a powerful army, to reduce them to the juſt and modeſt conditions of obedience.

"It is a courſe his majeſty takes no delight in, but is forced unto it; for ſuch is his majeſty's grace and goodneſs to all his ſubjects, and ſuch it is and will be to them (how undutiful and rebellious ſoever they now are) that if they put themſelves into a way of humility becoming them, his majeſty's piety and clemency will ſoon appear to all the world: but his majeſty will not endure to have his honour weighed at the common beam; nor admit any to ſtep between him and his virtue: and therefore as he will upon no terms admit the mediation of any perſon whatſoever, ſo he ſhall judge it as high preſumption in any perſon to offer it, and as that which he muſt account moſt dangerous to his honour, to have any conceit, that the ſolicitation of others can, by any poſſibility, better incline him to his people than he is, and ever will be out of his own grace and goodneſs.

"The charge of ſuch an army hath been thoroughly adviſed, and muſt needs amount to a very great ſum, ſuch as cannot be imagined to be found in his majeſty's coffers, which, how empty ſoever, have neither yet been exhauſted by unneceſſary triumphs, or ſumptuous buildings, or other magnificence whatſoever, but moſt of his own revenue, and whatſoever hath come from his ſubjects, hath been by him employed for the common good and preſervation of the kingdom. And like vapours ariſing out of the earth, and gathered in a cloud, are fallen in ſweet and refreſhing ſhowers upon the ſame ground. Wherefore his majeſty hath now at this time called this parliament, the ſecond means under God's bleſſing to avert theſe public calamities threatened to all his kingdoms, by the mutinous behaviour of them.

"And as his majeſty's predeceſſors have accuſtomed to do with your fore-fathers, ſo his majeſty now offers you the honour of working together with himſelf, for the good of him and his, and for the common preſervation of yourſelves and your poſterity.

"Counſels and deliberations that tend to benefit or profit, may endure diſputes and debates, becauſe they ſeem only accompanied with perſuaſions; but deliberations that tend to preſervation are waited upon by neceſſity, and cannot endure either debate or delay; of ſuch nature are the bleeding evils that are now to be provided againſt.

"This ſummer muſt not be loſt, nor any minute of time foreſtowed, to reduce them of Scotland, leſt by protraction here they gain time and advantage to frame their parties with foreign ſtates.

"His majeſty doth therefore deſire, upon theſe preſſing and urgent occaſions, that you will for a while lay aſide all other debates, and that you would paſs an act for ſuch and ſo many ſubſidies, as you in your hearty affection to him, and to your common good, ſhall think fit and convenient for ſo great an action; and withal, that you would haſten the payment of it, as ſoon as may be: and his majeſty aſſures you all, that he would not have propoſed any thing out of the ordinary way, but that ſuch is the ſtraitneſs of time, that unleſs the ſubſidies be forthwith paſſed, it is not poſſible for him to put in order ſuch things as muſt be prepared before ſo great an army can be brought into the field.

"And indeed had not his majeſty upon the credit of his ſervants, and ſecurity out of his own ſtate, taken up and iſſued between three and four hundred thouſand pounds, it had not been poſſible for his majeſty to have provided thoſe things to begin with, which were neceſſary for ſo great an enterpriſe, and without which we could not have ſecured Berwick and Carliſle, or avoided thoſe affronts which the inſolency of that faction might have put upon us, by injuring the perſons and fortunes of his loyal ſubjects in the northern parts.

"To avoid all queſtion and diſpute that may ariſe, touching his majeſty taking tunnage and poundage, his majeſty hath commanded me to declare unto you, that he hath taken it only de facto, according to the example of former kings, from the death of their paſt predeceſſors, until the parliament had paſſed an act for it themſelves. That in like manner, his majeſty deſires not to claim it, but by grant of parliament; for this purpoſe his majeſty hath cauſed a bill to be prepared in the ſame form as it paſſed to his royal father of bleſſed memory, adding only words to give it him, from the firſt of his majeſty's reign.

"This and the bill of ſubſidies his majeſty expects (for the the preſſing reaſons before delivered unto you) may be diſpatched with all ſpeed, which his majeſty commanded me to tell you he ſhall graciouſly accept, as the welcome pledges of your loving, happy, and dutiful affection to him, his perſon and government.

And his majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to give you his royal word, that afterwards he will give you time for conſidering of ſuch petitions as you ſhall conceive to be good for the commonwealth, even now before you part, according as the ſeaſon of the year, and the great affairs in hand, will permit; and what is now omitted, his majeſty will give you time to perfect towards winter, when your own leiſure and conveniency may better attend it, he knowing well that theſe ſubſidies can be but of little uſe, without that more ample ſupply which his majeſty expects upon the happy concluſion of this ſeſſion, and therein his majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed (according to the ancient way of parliaments) to ſtay till your juſt grievances be heard and redreſſed.

"And his majeſty aſſures you, that he will go along with you for your advantage, though all the gracious expreſſions of a juſt, a pious, and gracious king, to the end there may be ſuch a happy concluſion of this parliament, that it may be a cauſe of many more meetings with you. I have now delivered what I have in command from his majeſty."

When the lord keeper had ended his ſpeech, the king ſaid,

"My lords,

"YOU ſhall ſee he hath ſpoken nothing hyperbolically, or nothing but what I ſhall make good one way or other.

"And becauſe he did mention a letter by my ſubjects in Scotland, who did ſeek to draw in foreign power for aid, here is the original letter, which I ſhall command him to read unto you.

"And becauſe it may touch a neighbour of mine, whom I will ſay nothing of but that which is juſt (God forbid I ſhould) for my part, I think it was never accepted of by him: indeed it was a letter to the French king, but I know not that ever he had it; for by chance I intercepted it as it was going unto him; and therefore I hope you will underſtand me right in that."

His majeſty delivering the letter to the lord-keeper, his lordſhip began to read it, and obſerved as follows:

"The ſuperſcription of the letter is this, AU ROY. For the nature of which ſuperſcription, it is well known to all that know the ſtyle of France, that it is never written by any Frenchman to any, but to their own king; and therefore being directed (AU ROY) it is to their own king, for ſo in effect they do by that ſuperſcription acknowledge."

Then his lordſhip having read the letter both in French and Engliſh, the king added as follows:

"Of theſe gentlemen that have ſet their hands to this letter, here is one, and I believe you would think it very ſtrange if I ſhould not lay him faſt; and therefore I have ſigned a warrant to lay him cloſe priſoner in the Tower.

"My lords, I think (but that I will not ſay poſitively, becauſe I will not ſay any thing here but what I am ſure of) I think I have the gentleman, that ſhould have carried the letter, faſt enough; but I know not, I may be miſtaken."

The king being withdrawn, the commons returned to their houſe, and choſe ſerjeant Glanvile for their ſpeaker.

The king imagined the parliament would take fire at hearing the letter written by the Scotiſh lords to the king of France. And therefore immediately after the commons had preſented their ſpeaker, and appointed their committees, the lord Cottington reported to the upper houſe, that by his majeſty's command, he and ſecretary Windebank, with the attorney general, had examined the lord Lowdon in the Tower, and that Lowdon owned the letter to be his hand-writing, but alleged it was penned before the pacification, and never ſent [i]. However, neither the lords nor commons would interpoſe in the affair. Some days after, the king ſent a meſſage to the to the commons by ſecretary Windebank, repreſenting to them the affronts and indignities he had received from the Scots: but the ſecretary's ſpeech was heard with great coldneſs, without producing any apparent effect. Inſtead of concerning themſelves with the affairs of Scotland, the commons eagerly received a petition from the county of Hertford, complaining of ſundry grievances, as ſhip-money, monopolies, ſtar chamber, high commiſſion. Several ſpeeches not very favourable to the king, were made on this occaſion. The next day were read petitions from divers counties upon the ſame ſubject; after which Mr. Pym roſe up, and reducing the grievances of the people to three heads, namely, the privileges of parliament, innovations in religion, propriety of goods and eſtates, made a long ſpeech to ſhew, that in all theſe things the nation's rights had been violated.

On the 18th, it was moved to ſend for the rolls of the ſtar chamber, to examine the proceſs againſt ſir John Elliot and others. Then it was ordered, that the court-rolls containing Mr. Hampden's trial for refuſing to pay ſhip-money, ſhould be laid before the houſe. On the 20th, the ſpeaker being examined, anſwered, that he had refuſed to put the queſtion by his majeſty's expreſs command; whereupon it was immediately voted to be a breach of privilege. On the 21ſt, both houſes were ordered to attend the king at Whitehall, where the lord keeper ſpoke to them in this manner, in the king's preſence.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"YOU may well remember, upon the beginning of this parliament, his majeſty commanded me to deliver unto you the cauſes of calling it, which was for the aſſiſtance and ſupply of his majeſty in ſo great, weighty, and important affairs, as ever king of England had to require at his ſubjects hands.

"I am now to put you in mind what I then ſaid unto you, and withal to let you know that ſuch and ſo great are his majeſty occaſions at this time, that if the ſupply be not ſpeedy, it will be of no uſe at all: For the army is now marching, and doth ſtand his majeſty in at leaſt one hundred thouſand pounds a month, and if there be not means uſed to go on with this as is fitting, his majeſty's deſign will be loſt, and the charge all caſt away. It is not a great and ample ſupply for the perfecting of the work, that his majeſty doth now expect, but it is ſuch a ſupply, as without which, the charge will be loſt, and the deſign fruſtrated, being built upon thoſe weighty reaſons which tend to the infinite good of the kingdom, and preſervation of you all.

"This done, his majeſty will give you ſcope and liberty to preſent your juſt grievances unto him, and he will hear them with a gracious ear, and give them ſuch an anſwer, as you and all the kingdom ſhall have reaſon to joy therein.

"His majeſty taketh notice of one particular, and that is concerning ſhip-money; wherein his majeſty hath commanded me to declare thus much unto you: Firſt, his majeſty never had it in his royal heart to make an annual revenue of it, nor ever had a thought to make the leaſt benefit or profit of it: but whatſoever he did or intended in it, it was for the common good of you all; for the honour, glory, and ſplendor of this nation, and that every one of us are made ſharers and partakers in the benefits, fruits, and ſucceſſes of it, which otherwiſe you would have felt the woes of it. He hath been ſo far from making the leaſt benefit of it, that he hath expended great ſums of money out of his own coffers to work with, to thoſe neceſſary ends I have named unto you.

"The accompts of ſuch moneys ſo received, have been brought to the council-table, the moneys delivered to ſir William Ruſſel the treaſurer of the navy, and by them all it may appear, whether there hath been a fulneſs and clearneſs of truth in the diſburſements thereof, for the good and ſafety of the kingdom.

"It is true, his majeſty had once intended this year not to have taken that courſe, but an army, which his majeſty, ſo juſt a king, for the preſervation of the kingdom, hath now taken into conſideration; and I muſt tell you, that his majeſty prizeth nothing more than his honour, and he will not loſe for any earthly thing, his honour in the leaſt; they cannot make thoſe expreſſions of love, duty, and affection to him, which the graciouſneſs of his nature will not exceed in.

"Of all his kingdoms this ought to be the neareſt and deareſt unto him; yet for his kingdom of Ireland, the laſt parliament before this, the very ſecond day of the parliament they gave him ſix ſubſidies, they relied upon his gracious words, the ſucceſs was, that, before the end of the parliament they had all they deſired granted, and had with it an advantage. This laſt parliament there, it is well known unto you all, what a cheerful ſupply they have given unto his majeſty, for their hearts went with it; and let it not be apprehended, that ſubſidies there are of a ſmall value; there is not a ſubſidy that is granted, but it is worth fifty or ſixty thouſand pounds at the leaſt: conſider that kingdom, what [i] There were (ſays Burnet) ſome ill inſtruments about the king, who adviſed him to proceed capitally againſt Lowdon, which it is believed went very far. However, the marquis of Hamilton, with the king's permiſſion, tried to gain Lowdon to the king, and finding him pliant, they came to a private agreement, and Lowdon was enlarged, and permitted to go down to Scotland, having promiſed to do the king ſervice. See Burnet's Memoirs, p. 170, 171.

So

proportion it holdeth with this of England, and you will find that it is a conſiderable gift, as hath been given in many years. It hath wrought this effect, that certainly his majeſty will make it apparent to all the world, what a good conſtruction, and how graciouſly he doth eſteem and interpret this act of theirs. I have directed hitherto my ſpeech to you that are of the houſe of commons; now I ſhall addreſs myſelf to your lordſhips.

"It is true, the proper and natural ſupply proceeds from the houſe of commons, yet in aid at this time, his majeſty hath called you hither, and hoped he ſhall not find the houſe of commons backward to his deſires, nor your lordſhips to concur with them.

"To you of the houſe of commons, I did forget one thing of an objection that might perhaps be made; that tunnage and poundage is given towards the maintenance of a fleet at ſea, let me tell you the tunnage and poundage was never intended but for ordinary preſervation of the ſea, not that that ſhould be to defend the dominion of the narrow ſeas, when the natives of all the princes of chriſtendom, are ſo increaſed as they are. It is fit for his majeſty (as things now ſtand) to have ſuch a ſtrength at ſea, as may be a terror to others abroad.

"His majeſty was once reſolved, that no ſhipping-writs ſhould have iſſued out this year, but he was enforced for your good, and the good of the kingdom, and for his honour, upon neceſſary and weighty reaſons to ſend forth writs, and thoſe reaſons were theſe.

"It was of neceſſity for his majeſty to prepare an army to reduce his diſaffected ſubjects of Scotland to their due obedience. This very year all the neighbouring princes are preparing with great fleets of ſhips, ſo as it is time, for his majeſty to put himſelf into a ſtrength that he may be able to preſerve the dominion of the narrow ſeas, without which this kingdom will be loſt, he not being able to maintain his right of being the moderator of the ſea, whereby there may be freedom and commerce of trade, which adds exceedingly to the flouriſhing of this kingdom. Another reaſon for ſhipping-writs this year is, that thoſe of Algier are grown to that inſolence, that they are provided of a fleet of ſixty ſail of ſhips, and have taken divers ſhips, and one called the Rebecca of London, well known to the merchants upon the Exchange, taken upon the coaſt of Spain, worth at leaſt two hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds. And therefore the writ having gone out upon thoſe weighty reaſons, before it was poſſible the parliament could give any ſupply to provide for thoſe things, his majeſty cannot this year forbear it, but he doth expect your concurrence in the levying of it for the future. I ſhall ſpeak that unto you by his majeſty's command, which may comfort any Engliſh heart; his majeſty hath no thoughts of inriching himſelf by the moneys coming in upon theſe writs; he doth deſire but to live as it behoves a king of England, able to defend you and this nation in honour and in luſtre, which is famous abroad, and glorious at home, and to live but like ſuch a king, as every true Engliſh heart deſireth their king ſhould be.

"Be maſters of your own way, ſettle it ſo ſecure and ſo ſafe, that it may never come to the leaſt benefit and advantage to himſelf, but for the common good and thoſe neceſſary ends wherein you ſhall all ſhare in your plenty, peace, honour, and whatſoever any Engliſhman can glory in. His majeſty commands me to tell you, you ſhall propound nothing wherein you may receive all ſecurity for the property of your goods, and nothing for ſecuring your own liberties, wherein he will not moſt readily liſten unto you; and be as willing to grant, as you to aſk. His majeſty doth now offer unto you the reaſons, occaſions, and the way to make this the moſt bleſſed and moſt happy parliament that ever was, and that may produce ſuch effects, that the king may delight in his people, and the people in their king. And he layeth before you not only the counſel to do ſo; but he will tell you the way, and that is, by putting an obligation of truſt and confidence upon him, which ſhall more ſecure you than all that you can invent, or fears or jealouſies can imagine to be provided for; it is a courſe that good manners, duty, and reaſon ſhould require of you, to take into conſideration."

This ſpeech was not capable of hindering the commons from proceeding in the examination of the grievances, and thereby they inverted the order preſcribed them by the king. He was extremely troubled to ſee the time paſs away to no purpoſe, and that the commons ſhould ſo little regard him, as not to rely on his promiſe to hearken to their grievances when the affair of ſupply ſhould be ended. In ſhort, perceiving the commons were not much moved by whatever he could repreſent to them, he ſo managed, that the lords demanded a conference, where they endeavoured to ſhew, that the affair of ſupply ought to precede that of grievances. This conference ſerved only to retard the king's affairs. The commons taking offence, that the lords ſhould meddle with what did not belong to them, voted it to be a breach of privilege [k]. Several days were ſpent in this conteſt, and many conferences held, in which, contrary to the king's expectation, much time was loſt. Wherefore, on the 2d of May, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons for a poſitive anſwer concerning the ſupply he expected. But as they made no haſte to anſwer, on the 4th of May his majeſty ſent ſir Henry Vane ſecretary of ſtate, with the following meſſage:

"His majeſty (the better to facilitate your reſolutions) this day has thought fit to let you know, that of his grace and favour he is pleaſed, upon your granting twelve ſubſidies to be preſently paſſed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviſo, that it ſhall not determine the ſeſſions, his majeſty will not only for the preſent forbear the levying any ſhip-money, but will give way to the utter aboliſhing of it, by any courſe that yourſelves ſhall like beſt."

The commons having taken this offer into conſideration, great debates enſued, many thinking the king's demand exorbitant [l]. However, the lord Clarendon, who was then a member of the houſe, affirms, that notwithſtanding the clamours of thoſe who oppoſed the court, the houſe was inclined by degrees to give the king ſome ſatisfaction. But as the houſe could not come to a reſolution the firſt day, ſir Henry Vane was deſired to acquaint his majeſty, that they hoped to return him an anſwer on the next. Mean while, the king was maliciouſly informed, that the commons ſought only to gain time, in order to vote on the morrow againſt the war with Scotland [m]. The king unfortunately gave entire credit to this information, the falſhood whereof he perceived not till it was too late to repair his error. So, the next day, going to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, he made the following ſpeech, addreſſing himſelf only to the lords:

"My Lords,

"THERE can no occaſion of my coming to this houſe be ſo unpleaſing to me, as this at this time. The fear of doing that which I am to do this day, made me not long ſince come into this houſe, where I expreſt as well my fears, as the remedy which I thought neceſſary for the eſchewing of what is to follow.

"I muſt confeſs and acknowledge, that you my lords of the higher houſe, did give me ſo willing an ear, and with ſuch an affection did ſhew yourſelves, that certainly I may ſay, that if there had been any means to have given an happy end to this parliament, you took it; ſo that it was neither your lordſhips fault nor mine, that it is not ſo. Therefore, in the firſt place, I muſt thank you my lords for your good endeavours.

"My lords, I hope you remember what, the firſt day of the parliament, my lord-keeper ſaid to you in my name, and what likewiſe he ſaid in the banqueting-houſe in Whitehall, and what lately I ſaid unto you, in this place myſelf. I name all this unto you, not doubting that you do not well remember it, but to ſhew you that I never ſaid any thing in way of favour to my people, but (by the grace of God) I will punctually and really perform it.

"I know that they have inſiſted very much on grievances; I will not ſay, but there may be ſome, though I will confidently affirm, that there are not by many degrees ſo many as the public voice doth make them. Wherefore I deſire you take notice, now eſpecially at this time, that out of parliament I ſhall be as ready (if not more willing) to hear and redreſs any juſt grievances, as in parliament.

"There is one thing much ſpoken of, I mean as to matters of religion. Concerning which, albeit I expreſſed myſelf fully the laſt day in this place, yet I think it fit again, on this occaſion to tell you, that as I am concerned, ſo I ſhall

[l] Whitelock ſays, ſir Henry Vane eſcaped not without cenſures. "That his commiſſion from the king was but to demand ſix ſubſidies, and that his miſtake in requiring twelve ſubſidies, was on purpoſe to raiſe the houſe to animoſity." Which, adds he, took effect, but whether intended ſo or not, is hard to judge. Whitelock's Mem. p. 34. See Nalſon, tom. I. p. 343.

[m] The lord Clarendon ſays, ſir Henry Vane, and the ſolicitor general, made a worſe repreſentation of the humour and affection of the houſe than it deſerved, and undertook to know, that if they came together again, they would paſs ſuch a vote againſt ſhip-money, as would blaſt that revenue, and other branches of the receipt. Vol. I. p. 110.

He

be moſt careful to preſerve that purity of religion, which I thank God is ſo well eſtabliſhed in the church of England, and that, as well out of as in parliament.

" My lords, I ſhall not trouble you long with words, it being not my faſhion; wherefore to conclude, what I offered the laſt day to the houſe of commons, I think it is very well known to you all; as likewiſe how they accepted it, which I deſire not to remember, but wiſh they had remembered, how at firſt they were told by my lord keeper, that delay was the worſt kind of denial; yet I will not lay this fault on the whole houſe of commons; I will not judge ſo uncharitably of thoſe, whom, for the moſt part, I take to be loyal and well-affected ſubjects, but it hath been the malicious cunning of ſome few ſeditiouſly affected men, that hath been the cauſe of this miſunderſtanding.

" I ſhall now end as I have begun, in giving you thanks for your affections ſhewn to me at this time, deſiring you to go on and aſſiſt me in the maintaining of that regal power that is truly mine. As for the liberty of the people, that they now ſo much ſtartle at; know, my lords, that no king in the world ſhall be more careful in the propriety of their goods, liberty of their perſons, and true religion, than I ſhall.

" And now, my lord-keeper, do as I have commanded you."

The lord-keeper then added,

" My lords, and you the gentlemen of the houſe of commons, The king's majeſty doth diſſolve this parliament."

Next day, officers were ſent by the council to ſearch the lord Brook's pockets and ſtudy for papers, he being ſuſpected of holding intelligence with the Scots. Henry Bellaſis, knight of the ſhire for the county of York, and ſir John Hotham, were examined in council, and committed to the Fleet, for refuſing to anſwer to queſtions concerning things done in parliament. John Crew, eſq; afterwards lord Crew, who had been chairman of the committee for the affairs of religion, refuſing to deliver to the clerk of the houſe of commons, ſuch petitions and papers as he had received, was ſent to the Tower.

The lord Clarendon owns, the king had no ſooner diſſolved the parliament, but he was heartily ſorry for it [n]. Nevertheleſs, he publiſhed the following declaration to juſtify his conduct.

His majeſty's declaration to all his loving ſubjects, of the cauſes which moved him to diſſolve the laſt parliament.

" THE king's moſt excellent majeſty well knoweth, that the calling, adjourning, proroguing and diſſolving of parliaments, are undoubted prerogatives inſeparably annexed to his imperial crown; of which he is not bound to render any account, but to God alone, no more than of his other regal actions.

" Nevertheleſs, his majeſty (whoſe piety and goodneſs have made him ever ſo order and govern all things, that the clearneſs and candour of his royal heart may appear to all his ſubjects, eſpecially in thoſe great and public matters of ſtate, that have relation to the weale and ſafety of his people, and the honour of his royal perſon and government) hath thought fit (for avoiding and preventing all ſiniſter conſtructions and miſinterpretation, which the malice of ſome ill-affected perſons to his crown and ſovereignty, hath or may practiſe, to infuſe into the minds and ears of his good and faithful ſubjects) to ſet down by way of declaration, the true cauſes, as well of his aſſembling, as of his diſſolving the late parliament.

" It is not unknown to moſt of his majeſty's loving ſubjects, what diſcouragements he hath formerly had, by the undutiful and ſeditious carriage of divers of the lower houſe, in preceding aſſemblies of parliaments, enough to have made him averſe to thoſe ancient and accuſtomed ways of calling his people together; when inſtead of dutiful expreſſions towards his perſon and government, they vented their own malice and diſaffections to the ſtate, and by their ſubtle and malignant courſes, endeavoured nothing more than to bring into contempt and diſorder all government and magiſtracy.

" Yet his majeſty well conſidering, that but few were guilty of that ſeditious and undutiful behaviour, and hopeing that time and experience had made his loving ſubjects ſenſible of the diſtemper the whole kingdom was like to be put into, by the ill-governed actions of thoſe men; and his majeſty being over-deſirous to tread in the ſteps of his moſt noble progenitors, was pleaſed to iſſue forth his writs under the great ſeal of England for a parliament, to be holden the 13th day of April laſt. At which day his majeſty, by the lord keeper of his great ſeal, was graciouſly pleaſed to let both houſes of parliament know how deſirous he was, That all his people would unite their hearts and affections in the execution of thoſe counſels that might tend to the honour of his majeſty, the ſafety of his kingdoms, and the good and preſervation of all his people. And withal, how confident he was, that they would not be failing in their duties and affections to him and to the public.

" He had lain open to them the manifeſt and apparent miſchiefs threatened to this and all his other kingdoms, by the mutinous and rebellious behaviour of divers of the Scotiſh nation, who had by their examples drawn many of his ſubjects there into a courſe of diſloyalty and diſobedience, not fit for his majeſty in honour, ſafety, or wiſdom, to endure.

" How (to ſtrengthen themſelves in their diſloyal courſes) they had addreſt themſelves to foreign ſtates, and treated with them to deliver themſelves up to their protection and defence, as was made apparent under the hands of the prime ringleaders of that rebellious faction.

" Theſe courſes of theirs tending ſo much to the ruin and overthrow of this famous monarchy, united by the deſcent of the crown of England upon his majeſty and his father of bleſſed memory: his majeſty (in his great wiſdom, and in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him by God, and by the fundamental laws of both kingdoms, for the protection and government of them) reſolved to ſuppreſs, and thereby to vindicate that ſovereign power intruſted to him.

" He had by the laſt ſummer's trial found, that his grace and goodneſs was abuſed, and that, contrary to his expectation and their faithful promiſes, they had (ſince his being at Berwick, and the pacification there made) purſued their former rebellious deſigns: and therefore it was neceſſary now for his majeſty by power to reduce them to the juſt and modeſt condition of their obedience and ſubjection, which whenever they ſhould be brought unto, or ſeeing their own errors, ſhould put themſelves into a way of humility and obedience becoming them, his majeſty ſhould need no other mediator for clemency and mercy to them, than his own piety and goodneſs, and the tender affection he hath ever borne to that his native kingdom.

" This being of ſo great weight and conſequence to the whole kingdom, and the charge of an army fit to maſter ſuch a buſineſs amounting to ſuch a ſum as his majeſty hath no means to raiſe, having not only emptied his own coffers, but iſſued between three and four hundred thouſand pounds, which he borrowed of his ſervants upon ſecurity of his own eſtate, to provide ſuch things as were neceſſary to begin ſuch an action with; his majeſty, after the example of his predeceſſors, reſorted to his people in their repreſentative body the parliament, whom he deſired (with all the expreſſions of grace and goodneſs which could poſſibly come from him) that taking into ſerious and dutiful conſideration the nature of theſe bleeding evils, and how dangerous it was to loſe the leaſt minute of time, leſt thereby thoſe of Scotland ſhould gain the opportunity to frame their parties with foreign ſtates; and that they would for a while lay aſide all other debates, and paſs an act for the ſpeedy payment of ſo many ſubſidies, as might enable his majeſty to put in readineſs for this ſummer's expedition thoſe things which were to be prepared before ſo great an army could be brought into the field.

" For further ſupply neceſſary for ſo great undertaking, his majeſty declared, that he expected it not till their might be a happy concluſion of that ſeſſion, and till there juſt grievances might be firſt graciouſly heard and relieved.

" Wherein as his majeſty would moſt willingly have given them the precedence before matter of ſupply, if the great neceſſity of his occaſions could have permitted; ſo he was graciouſly pleaſed for their full aſſurance and ſatisfaction therein, to give them his royal word, that without determining the ſeſſion (upon granting of the ſubſidies) he would give them, before they parted, as much time as the ſeaſon of the year, and the great affair in hand would permit, for conſidering all ſuch petitions as they conceived to be good for the commonwealth, and what they would not now finiſh, they ſhould have full time to perfect towards winter: his

Though the lord Clarendon lays the blame upon ſir Henry Vane; yet Whitelock ſays, it was chiefly by Laud's, and the ſecret council's advice, that the parliament was diſſolved. Whitelock's Memoirs, p. 32. Dugdale ſays, the queen was the cauſe of it. View of the Troubles, p. 61. The lord Clarendon ſays, there could not a greater damp have ſeized upon the ſpirits of the whole nation than this diſſolution cauſed, and men had much of the miſery in view, which ſhortly after fell out. It could never be hoped that more ſober and diſpaſſionate men would ever meet together in that place, or fewer who brought ill purpoſes with them: nor could any man imagine what offence they had given which put the king upon that reſolution. Vol. I. p. 140.

majeſty graciouſly aſſuring them, that he would go along with them for their advantage, through all the expreſſions of a gracious and pious king, to the end there might be ſuch a happy concluſion of that, as might be the cauſe of many more meetings with them in parliament.

" From their firſt aſſembling until the 21ſt of April, the houſe of commons did nothing that could give his majeſty any content or confidence in their ſpeedy ſupplying of him: whereupon he commanded both the houſes to attend him in the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall in the afternoon of the 21ſt of April, where (by the lord-keeper) his majeſty put them in mind of the end for which they were aſſembled, which was for his majeſty's ſupplies; that if it were not ſpeedy, it would be of no uſe to him, part of the army then marching at the charge of above a hundred thouſand pounds a month; which would all be loſt if his majeſty were not preſently ſupplied, ſo as it was not poſſible to be longer forborne.

" Yet his majeſty then expreſſed, that the ſupply he for the preſent deſired, was only to enable him to go on with his deſigns for three or four months, and that he expected no further ſupply till all their juſt grievances were relieved.

" And becauſe his majeſty had taken notice of ſome miſapprehenſions about the levying of ſhip-money, his majeſty commanded the lord-keeper to let them know that he never had any intention to make any revenue of it, nor had ever made any, but that all the money collected had been paid to the treaſurer of the navy, and by him expended, beſides great ſums of money every year out of his majeſty's own purſe.

" That his majeſty had once reſolved this year to have levied none, but that he was forced to alter his reſolution, in regard he was of neceſſity to ſend an army for reducing thoſe of Scotland, during which time it was requiſite the ſeas ſhould be well guarded.

" And beſides, his majeſty had knowledge of the great fleets prepared by all neighbouring princes this year, and of the inſolencies committed by thoſe of Algiers, with the ſtore of ſhips they had in readineſs.

" And therefore though his majeſty for this preſent year could not forbear it, but expected their concurrence in the levying of it, yet for the future, to give all his ſubjects aſſurance how juſt and royal his intentions were, and that all his aim was, but to live like their king, able to defend himſelf and them; to be uſeful to his friends, and conſiderable to his enemies; to maintain the ſovereignty of the ſeas, and ſo make the kingdom flouriſh in trade and commerce: he was graciouſly pleaſed to let them know, that the ordinary revenue now taken by the crown, could not ſerve the turn: and therefore that it muſt be by ſhip-money, or ſome other way, wherein he was willing to leave it to their conſiderations what better courſe to find out, and to ſettle it how they would (ſo the thing were done) which ſo much imported the honour and ſafety of the kingdom.

" And his majeſty, for his part, would moſt readily and cheerfully grant any thing they could deſire, for ſecuring them in the property of their goods and eſtates, and in the liberty of their perſons. His majeſty telling them, it was in their power to make this as happy a parliament as ever was, and to be the cauſe of the king's delighting to meet with his people, and his people with him.

" That there was no ſuch way to effect this, as by putting obligations of truſt and confidence upon him, which as it was the way of good manners with a king, ſo it was a ſurer and ſafer courſe for themſelves, than any their own jealouſies and fears could invent; his majeſty being a prince that deſerved their truſt, and could not loſe the honour of it; and a prince of ſuch a gracious nature, that diſdained his people ſhould overcome him by kindneſs.

" He had made this good to ſome other ſubjects of his, and if they followed his counſel, they ſhould be ſure not to repent it, being the people that were neareſt and deareſt unto him, and ſubjects whom he did and had reaſon to value more than the ſubjects of any his other kingdoms.

" His majeſty having thus graciouſly expreſſed himſelf unto them, he expected the houſe of commons would have the next day taken into conſideration the matter of ſupply, and laid aſide all other debates, till that was reſolved of, according to his deſire.

" But inſtead of giving an anſwer therein, ſuch as the preſſing and urgent occaſions required, they fell into diſcourſes and debates about their pretended grievances, and raiſed up ſo many and of ſo ſeveral natures, that in a parliamentary way they could not but ſpend more time than his majeſty's great and weighty affairs could poſſibly afford.

" His majeſty foreſeeing in his great wiſdom, that they were not in the way to make this a happy parliament (which he ſo much deſired and hoped) that nothing might be wanting on his part to bring them into the right way, for his honour, the ſafety of the kingdom, and their own good, he reſolved to deſire the aſſiſtance of the lords of the higher houſe, as perſons in rank and degree neareſt to the royal throne; and who having received honour from him and his royal progenitors, he doubted not would, for thoſe and many other reaſons, be moved in honour and dutiful affection to his perſon and crown, to diſpoſe the houſe of commons to expreſs their duties to his majeſty, in expediting the matter of ſupply for which they were called together, and which required ſo preſent a diſpatch.

" For this purpoſe, his majeſty in his royal perſon came again to the lords houſe on Wedneſday the 24th day of April, where himſelf declared to the lords the cauſe of his coming, which was to put them in mind of what had been by the lord keeper in his name delivered to both the houſes the firſt day of the parliament, and after at Whitehall: how contrary to his expectation, the houſe of commons having held conſultation of matter of religion, property of goods, and liberty of parliament, and voted ſome things concerning thoſe three heads, had thereby given them the precedence before the matter of his ſupply. That his neceſſities were ſuch, they could not bear delay; that whatever he had by the lord-keeper promiſed he would perform, if the houſe of commons would truſt him.

" For religion, that his heart and conſcience went together with the religion eſtabliſhed in the church of England: and he would give order to his archbiſhops and biſhops, that no innovation in matter of religion ſhould creep in.

" For the ſhip-money, that he never made, nor intended to make any profit to himſelf of it, but only to preſerve the dominion of the ſeas; which was ſo neceſſary, that without it the kingdom could not ſubſiſt. But for the way and means, by ſhip-money or otherwiſe, he left it to them.

" For property of goods and liberty of parliament, he ever intended his people ſhould enjoy them; holding no king ſo great, as he that was king of a rich and free people; and if they had not property of goods and liberty of perſons, they would be neither rich nor free.

" That, if the houſe of commons would not firſt truſt him, all his affairs would be diſordered, and his buſineſs loſt. That though they truſted him in part at firſt, yet before the parliament ended he muſt totally truſt them; and in concluſion, they muſt for execution of all things wholly truſt him.

" Therefore ſince the matter was no more, than who ſhould be firſt truſted; and that the truſt of him firſt, was but a truſt in part, his majeſty deſired the lords to take into their conſiderations his and their own honour, the ſafety and welfare of this kingdom, with the danger it was in, and that they would by their advice diſpoſe the houſe of commons to give his ſupply the precedence before the grievances.

" His majeſty being departed, the lords took into ſerious conſideration what his majeſty had commended to their care, and forthwith laying aſide all other debates, their lordſhips delivered their votes in theſe words: 'We are of opinion, that the matter of his majeſty's ſupply ſhould have precedence, and be reſolved of, before any other matter whatſoever. And we think fit, there ſhall be a conference deſired with the houſe of commons, to diſpoſe them thereunto.'

" Accordingly, the next day being Saturday, the 25th day of April, a conference was had in the painted chamber by a committee of both houſes, where the lord keeper (by the lords command) told the houſe of commons of his majeſty's being the day before in perſon in the higher houſe, how graciouſly he had expreſt himſelf in matters of religion, property of goods, and liberty of parliament; and that he would therein graciouſly hear and relieve them, and give them what in reaſon could be deſired, with the effect of what elſe had been graciouſly delivered unto them by his majeſty; as well touching his conſtant zeal and affection to the religion eſtabliſhed in the church of England, as touching the ſhip-money.

" By all the proceedings herein declared, it is evident to all men, how willing and deſirous his majeſty hath been to make uſe of the ancient and noble way of parliaments uſed and inſtituted by his royal predeceſſors, for the preſervation and honour of this famous monarchy: and that on his majeſty's part nothing was wanting, that could be expected from a king, whereby this parliament might have had a happy concluſion, for the comfort and content of his majeſty's ſubjects, and for the good and ſafety of this kingdom.

" On the contrary it is apparent, how thoſe of the houſe of commons (whoſe ſiniſter and malicious courſes enforced his majeſty to diſſolve this parliament) have vitiated and abuſed that ancient and noble way of parliament, perverting the the ſame to their own unworthy ends, and forgetting the true uſe and inſtitution of parliaments.

"For whereas, theſe meetings and aſſemblies of his majeſty, with the peers and commons of this realm, were in their firſt original, and in the practice of all ſucceeding ages, ordained and held as pledges and teſtimonies of affection between the king and his people; the king for his part graciouſly hearing and redreſſing ſuch grievances, as his people in humble and dutiful manner ſhould repreſent unto him; and the ſubjects on their part (as teſtimonies of their duty) ſupplying his majeſty upon all extraordinary occaſions, for ſupport of his honour and ſovereignty, and for preſerving the kingdom in glory and ſafety.

"Thoſe ill-affected members of the houſe of commons, inſtead of an humble and dutiful way of preſenting their grievances to his majeſty, have taken upon them to be the guiders and directors in all matters that concern his majeſty's government, both temporal and eccleſiaſtical: and (as if kings were bound to give an account of their regal acts, and of their manner of government to their ſubjects aſſembled in parliament) they have, in a very audacious and inſolent way, entered into examination and cenſuring of the preſent government, traduced his majeſty's adminiſtration of juſtice, rendered, as much as in them lay, odious to the reſt of his majeſty's ſubjects, not only the officers and miniſters of ſtate, but even his majeſty's very government, which hath been ſo juſt and gracious, that never did this, or any other nation, enjoy more bleſſings and happineſs, than hath been by all his majeſty's ſubjects enjoyed ever ſince his majeſty's acceſs to the crown: nor did this kingdom ever ſo flouriſh in trade and commerce, as at this preſent, or partake of more peace and plenty in all kinds whatſoever.

"And whereas, the ordinary revenues of the crown not ſufficing to defray extraordinary charges, it hath ever been the uſuage in all parliaments, to aid and aſſiſt the kings of this realm with free and fitting ſupply towards the maintenance of their wars, and for making good their royal undertakings; whereby the kingdom, intruſted to their protection, might be held up in ſplendour and greatneſs:

"Theſe ill-affected perſons of the houſe of commons, have been ſo far from treading in the ſteps of their anceſtors, by their dutiful expreſſions in this kind, that contrarily they have introduced a way of bargaining and contracting with the king; as if nothing ought to be given him by them, but what he ſhould buy or purchaſe of them, either by quitting ſomewhat of his royal prerogative, or by diminiſhing and leſſening his revenues; which courſes of theirs, how repugnant they are to the duty of ſubjects, how unfit for his majeſty in honour to permit and ſuffer, and what hazard and diſhonour they ſubject this kingdom to, all men may eaſily judge, that will but equally and impartially weigh them.

"His majeſty hath been by this means reduced to ſuch ſtraits and extremities, that were not his care of the public good and ſafety the greater, theſe men (as much as in them lies) would quickly bring ruin and confuſion to the ſtate, and render contemptible this glorious monarchy.

"But this frowardneſs and undutiful behaviour of theirs cannot leſſen his majeſty's care of preſerving the kingdoms entruſted to his protection and government, nor his gracious and tender affection to his people, for whoſe good and comfort his majeſty, by God's gracious aſſiſtance, will ſo provide, that all his loving ſubjects may ſtill enjoy the happineſs of living under the bleſſed ſhade and protection of his royal ſcepter.

"In the mean time, to the end all his majeſty's loving ſubjects may know how graciouſly his majeſty is inclined to hear and redreſs all the juſt grievances of his people, as well out of parliament as in parliament, his majeſty doth hereby further declare his royal will and pleaſure, that all his loving ſubjects, who have any juſt cauſe to preſent, or complain of any grievances or oppreſſions, may freely addreſs themſelves by their humble petitions to his ſacred majeſty, who will graciouſly hear their complaints, and give ſuch fitting redreſs therein, that all his people ſhall have juſt cauſe to acknowledge his grace and goodneſs towards them; and to be fully ſatisfied, that no perſons or aſſemblies can more prevail with his majeſty, than the piety and juſtice of his own royal nature, and the tender affection he doth and ſhall ever bear to all his people and loving ſubjects."

After the reading of this declaration, the inſerting it here at length will perhaps be thought needleſs, ſince it contains nothing but what was related before. However, it is of uſe to ſhew, that the king and his adverſaries agreed as to facts, and diſputed only upon the conſequences and point of right.

Though the parliament was diſſolved, the king however continued the convocation, under the title of ſynod. Since the time of the reformation, it had been always cuſtomary to aſſemble the clergy, at the ſame time with the parliament, and this aſſembly of the clergy was called the convocation, and always begun and ended with the parliament. The king not thinking himſelf bound to a ſtrict obſervance of this cuſtom, diſſolved the parliament, and continued the convocation, contrary to the opinion of ſeveral [o], who believed that he thereby exceeded his power. But the judges of the realm determined, that notwithſtanding the diſſolution of the parliament, the convocation ſubſiſted, unleſs diſſolved by the king's writ [p]. The convocation therefore continued a month longer, and in that time did two things which gave occaſion to great complaints in the enſuing parliament. Firſt, they made certain canons, whereby all clergymen and graduates in the univerſities were enjoined to take the following oath [q].

"I A. B. do ſwear, that I approve the doctrine and diſcipline, or government eſtabliſhed in the church of England, as containing all things neceſſary to ſalvation: and that I will not endeavour, by myſelf or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any popiſh doctrine, contrary to that which is ſo eſtabliſhed: nor will I ever give my conſent to alter the government of this church, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans and archdeacons, &c. as it now ſtands eſtabliſhed, and as by right it ought to ſtand; nor yet ever to ſubject it to the uſurpations and ſuperſtitions of the ſee of Rome. And all theſe things I do plainly and ſincerely acknowledge and ſwear, according to the plain and common ſenſe and underſtanding of the ſame words, without any equivocation, or mental evaſion, or ſecret reſervation whatſoever. And this I do heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the faith of a chriſtian. So help me God in Jeſus Chriſt."

This oath was thought very ſtrange for ſeveral reaſons. 1. It was not liked that the clergy ſhould take upon them to enjoin oaths, which, according to the general opinion, belonged to the parliament only. 2. The et cætera after the word archdeacons, offended many, becauſe thoſe that ſwore could not tell what they were to underſtand by this abbreviation. The preſcribing ſuch an oath was affirmed to be a confinement and tying down of the civil legiſlature, ſince thereby the government was deprived of the liberty of making any alteration in the diſcipline of the church, which nevertheleſs might be altered without any danger to ſalvation. 4. It was objected, that the perſon was to declare, "he took the oath moſt willingly," though he was conſtrained thereto under very ſevere penalties.

The ſecond thing the convocation did before they broke up, was the granting the king, for the Scotch war, a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound for ſix years [r]. This proceeding, which tended to diminiſh the parliament's power, was no leſs diſliked than the former. It is true, that to juſtify it, a precedent was alleged; for it muſt be obſerved, that in this reign, examples or precedents in favour of the crown, were looked upon as ſo many laws. The clergy, it ſeems, in the year 1585, after having granted Elizabeth a ſubſidy approved by the parliament, made of themſelves an addition of two ſhillings in the pound, which the queen accepted without conſulting the parliament. But, beſides that this was a ſingle precedent, there was a great difference between the time of Elizabeth, and that of Charles I. In Elizabeth's days, every one was pleaſed with the government. It was believed the queen was not capable of making an ill uſe of theſe unuſual favours, but employed the money given her ſolely for the good of the kingdom. It was not the ſame in the time of Charles I. The king was not truſted at all; it was known by experience, that he would draw from the leaſt

Wherefore he was ſuſpended; but afterwards he ſubmitted, took the oath, and in a letter to the archbiſhop Laud, ſays, he was encouraged to diſſent by biſhop Montague, though at that inſtant he could have proved that Montague did viſit, and hold correſpondence, with the pope's agent, &c. Theſe precedent, conſequences deſtructive of the liberties of parliaments, and in fine, the number of the male-contents was infinite: nay the king ſeemed to do all that lay in his power to increaſe it, or at leaſt not to regard it. And what ſtill more inflamed the people's diſcontent, was the ſeeing the popiſh recuſants not only tolerated, but moreover protected, countenanced, and conſidered as the beſt ſubjects. They reſorted publicly to maſs to Somerſet-houſe, and returned from thence in great multitudes, as if their churches had been allowed by authority. A public agent from Rome reſided at London, count Rozetti by name, who openly went to court in great pomp, and whoſe houſe was the general rendezvous of the catholics. The queen had prevailed with the king to receive this agent as a ſort of nuncio, and by that, as well as by the avowed protection ſhe afforded thoſe of her religion, ſhe ſo drew upon herſelf the people's hatred, that they were even wanting in that outward reſpect they ought to have paid her.

All theſe diſcontents were fomented by the Scots, who ſeeing themſelves upon the point of being attacked, were extremely diligent by means of their emiſſaries, to incenſe the people againſt the king. In juſtifying their own conduct, they forgot not to inſinuate to the Engliſh, that the tyranny which was intended to be eſtabliſhed in Scotland, was in order to introduce the like into England. And that if the king laboured to ſupport the hierarchy erected in the kirk of Scotland by his father and himſelf, it was not ſo much for the ſake of epiſcopal government, as in order to eſtabliſh in that kingdom an arbitrary power, which would be one day fatal to the Engliſh. Nay, that there was great danger, that after the accompliſhment of his deſigns, he would reſtore popery in his kingdoms, ſince he could refuſe nothing to the queen, to Laud, and the other enemies of the proteſtant religion. The king himſelf by his conduct rendered thoſe inſinuations ſo plauſible, that beſides the preſbyterians, who were very numerous, there were many church of England men, who could not forbear dreading that the king's zeal for the church was only to engage them to be ſubſervient to his more hidden deſigns. Be this as it will, the kingdom was full of ſuſpicions, fears, jealouſies, diviſions, ſo that if the king had been well informed, he might eaſily have ſeen there were but very few that ſerved him willingly and cheerfully in the war he was going to wage with Scotland. This he had cauſe to know preſently after.

The king being engaged in a war with Scotland, without having received any ſupply from the parliament, was in great ſtraits. He even foreſaw, that it would not be poſſible for him to maintain his army, unleſs he had recourſe to extraordinary methods to raiſe money. Accordingly, he made uſe of the following expedients, to ſupply in part what he had expected from the parliament. 1. He ordered that the counties ſhould advance coat and conduct-money for their reſpective troops[s]. 2. He bought upon credit of the Eaſt-India merchants all their pepper, and ſold it again for ready money. 3. He took forty thouſand pounds worth of the bullion, which the merchants had brought into the mint to be coined, which ſum was afterwards punctually repaid[t]. 4. He would have borrowed two hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London, but had the mortification to meet with a denial. He was ſo diſpleaſed at it, that he reſolved to be revenged in this manner. The city, having ſome time before ſettled a colony at Londonderry in Ireland, had obtained a patent from the king for certain lands in that country. The Londoners had no ſooner refuſed to lend the king the money, but the lord mayor and the ſheriffs were cited before the ſtar chamber, to anſwer to the charge of having abuſed the patent, by uſurping more lands than the king had granted to the city. Upon this charge, whether well or ill-grounded, the Londoners were condemned to forfeit their rights, and grievouſly fined, but upon payment of the fine their patent was reſtored[u]. They had but too many opportunities afterwards to be revenged of the king in their turn. On the other hand, the writ to levy ſhip-money having been ſent to the city of London, as well as to all the other towns in the kingdom, it appeared that the lord mayor and city council had neglected to levy this tax, or at leaſt, they had not diſtrained any one perſon for non-payment, according to the tenor of the writ. For this reaſon the council ſent the following order to the attorney general.

At Whitehall, July 5, 1640. Preſent, &c.

"WHEREAS the lord mayor of London and the two ſheriffs did this day appear before his majeſty and the board, to give an account of their proceedings upon the writ for the ſhip buſineſs this preſent year: foraſmuch as it did appear, that beſides all former neglects in the execution of that writ, his majeſty having reſpited the information againſt them for the ſame; yet they have not ſince diſtrained any one perſon according to the ſaid writ. It was this day ordered by his majeſty, with the advice of the board, that his majeſty's attorney general ſhall forthwith prefer an information in the ſtar chamber againſt the lord mayor, and ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, for their contempt and default in the execution of the ſaid writ; and ſhall forthwith proceed againſt them, de die in diem, until the cauſe be ready for hearing: and if upon examination of the ſaid cauſe, his majeſty's attorney general ſhall find ſufficient cauſe againſt any of the aldermen, that then he do prefer one other information againſt the ſaid aldermen; and in like manner do proceed againſt them apart."

Thus the king, inſtead of relinquiſhing this odious tax, continued to exact it with great rigour, though his affairs were then at a criſis, which ſhould have inſpired him with a dread, that in caſe the ſucceſs of the Scotch war did not anſwer his expectations, he ſhould be little able to ſupport himſelf. But in all appearance, he thought himſelf ſecure of victory.

Part of the army deſigned againſt Scotland was now upon the frontiers, under the command of the lord Conway, general of the horſe, whilſt the reſt lay encamped near York. The earl of Northumberland, who was to command under the king, remained ſick at London, and the earl of Strafford, who was lieutenant general, had not been able to depart ſoon enough, becauſe he was a very neceſſary member of the king's ſecret council. The lord Conway being advanced as far as Newcaſtle, with three thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe, was informed that Leſley, general of the Scots[x] was preparing to march at the head of two and twenty thouſand men, in order to enter England. And indeed, he paſſed the Tweed the 20th of Auguſt, the very day the king departed from London for York, where he arrived on the 23d. Leſley purſuing his march came the 27th to Newburn, on the north-ſide of the Tine, four miles from Newcaſtle. At his arrival, he found the lord Conway poſted with his troops on the ſouth-ſide of the river, where he had raiſed breaſt-works over againſt the two fords, to oppoſe his paſſage. It is needleſs to give a particular account of this action. It ſuffices to ſay, the Scots forced the paſſage of the Tine, after a fight very faintly maintained by the Engliſh. The lord Conway was ſeized with ſo great terror, that he left Newcaſtle the next day and retreated to Durham, where not thinking himſelf yet ſafe, he went and joined the king's army, which was advanced to Northampton. The king's troops had no ſooner quitted Newcaſtle, but the Scots entered, and found there the artillery and ſtores ordered thither by the king, who deſigned that place for the magazine of his army.

The entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcaſtle, broke all the king's meaſures. Though in this firſt action he had not loſt above three or four hundred men, this inconſiderable loſs produced however great effects all to the king's diſadvantage. 1. The earl of Strafford having ſpoken a little too roughly to the officers and ſoldiers, who were returned from the defeat of Newburn, diſpleaſed the whole army, and thereby put the vanquiſhed upon magnifying in their own vindication the valour and number of the Scotch troops. This could not but produce a very ill effect in the king's army, which before was not very well inclined. 2. The Engliſh male-contents were more at eaſe, and ſpoke more boldly againſt the government, knowing it was no proper ſeaſon to ſilence them. 3. The Scots did not loſe this opportunity to ſhew the Engliſh, by as moderate a conduct as the juncture could allow, that their deſign in entering England

[s] Theſe troops were preſſed out of the militia of each county. Their allowance was eight-pence a day; and their whole number amounted to 16,800. There were forces raiſed in the ſame manner to go by ſea. What number of theſe were furniſhed by each county, ſee in Nalſon. tom. I. p. 381, 386. London found 1200. Eſſex and Kent 700 a piece, &c. In all 10,000. The firſt were to be at the rendezvous the 10th of May, and the latter the 25th or 27th.

[t] The bullion of the mint was ordered to be ſeized; but the merchants repreſenting to his majeſty and council the great prejudice it would be to his majeſty's honour, reputation and intereſt, both at home and abroad, the deſign was laid aſide, and 40,000 l. taken up of the merchants concerned in the Mint, upon credit of the cuſtoms. There was likewiſe a deſign to debaſe the coin, but it was laid aſide by the remarks of ſir Thomas Rowe, in a ſpeech at the council table. Nalſon, tom. I. p. 391.—The ſeveral methods, and particularly a voluntary loan of ſome lords of the council, and other gentlemen, brought the king in 300,000 l. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 111.

land was not to injure the Engliſh, but only to procure acceſs to the king in order to lay their grievances before him. By this means they ſeparated, as much as they could, the king's cauſe from that of the people of England, which did the king an unſpeakable prejudice. 4. The conſternation cauſed by the Newburn defeat, and, on the other hand, the moderation of the Scots, who, notwithſtanding the ſucceſs of their arms, affected to deſire only an accommodation, inclined the whole nation to peace. None but the court party uſed their utmoſt endeavours, though in vain, to inſpire the Engliſh with a deſire of revenge. 5. As in the king's preſent circumſtances, with an army of enemies before him, and numberleſs male-contents in all the reſt of the kingdom, as well as in his own army, it was not poſſible for him to raiſe money by the ſame methods he had till then practiſed, there reſulted a general opinion that a parliament was abſolutely neceſſary. To this it was that the Scots and the Engliſh male-contents deſired to lead him, though againſt his will, knowing it was hardly poſſible that a new parliament ſhould be diſpoſed in his favour.

The Scots had in England more correſpondents than the king had till now imagined, but he perceived it not, till his affairs began to decline. They had diſperſed two manifeſtos, of which one was entitled, "Six conſiderations of the lawfulneſs of their expedition into England," and the other, "Intentions of the Scots and their army manifeſted to their brethren of England." In theſe two papers they were extremely careful to ſhew, that the motive of their armament and entry into England was not to invade that kingdom, but only to defend themſelves againſt ſome particular perſons, their ſworn enemies, among whom they named as the principal, the earl of Strafford and the archbiſhop of Canterbury. They ſaid, in their preſent ſituation, their conntry being blocked up by ſea and land, and their trade interrupted, it was not poſſible to wait any longer the coming of their enemies to attack them, without being expoſed to certain ruin. They compared themſelves to a man who, when his houſe is beſet and his enemies ready to aſſault it, ſallies out himſelf and attacks them in hopes of averting by a vigorous effort the impending ruin. They maintained, it was the king that had broke the peace, and having granted that the general aſſembly ſhould regulate the affairs of the kirk, and its regulations be ratified in parliament, had without any lawful cauſe prorogued the parliament, before what the general aſſembly had judged neceſſary was confirmed. Nay, he had denied to give audience to the deputies of the parliament, and though he had agreed other deputies ſhould be ſent to him, it was only to amuſe them, ſince the war with Scotland had been already determined in the council, and the parliaments of Ireland and England convened in order for ſupplies. They repreſented the juſtice and equity of the late parliament of England in denying the king money for a war ſo notoriouſly unjuſt. In ſhort, for it would be too tedious to relate all the particulars contained in theſe two papers, their aim was to demonſtrate to the people of England, 1. The juſtice of their cauſe. 2. The artifices of their enemies to ſurpriſe them. 3. The neceſſity they were under of taking up arms in their own lawful defence, and to prevent their ruin. 4. They ſaid, notwithſtanding their entry into England, the war was defenſive on their part: and 5. That they intended not to offer any injury or violence, or inrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the Engliſh, but only to procure acceſs to his majeſty to preſent their grievances, which was denied them, unleſs they would entirely deliver themſelves to the mercy of their enemies. 6. They called God to witneſs, this was their intention; and the better to gain belief, they made uſe of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions and moſt ſolemn oaths. 7. Laſtly, they forgot not to inſinuate to the Engliſh, that they had the ſame cauſe to maintain, ſince the liberties of England were equally in danger with thoſe of Scotland.

Theſe manifeſtos, which were doubtleſs owing to the counſels of ſome of the Engliſh male- contents, produced ſuch an effect upon the people, the army, and the lords themſelves who were not wholly devoted to the court, that the king might very eaſily ſee how difficult it would be to ſupport the war, and to what danger he would be expoſed, if he hazarded a battle at ſuch a juncture. Nothing was more diſadvantageous to the king, than the extreme deſire expreſſed by the Scots to end the quarrel by an agreement, which ſhewed their aim was not to make war upon the Engliſh, whereas it was the king's intereſt to engage them both in a national quarrel. Wherefore the Scots did not fail to improve the advantage of their moderate conduct. As ſoon as they were maſters of Newcaſtle, they ſent a very humble petition to the king, beſeeching him to give ear to their complaints, and cure their evils by the advice of the parliament of England. The king who was preſſed on all ſides, had already ſummoned the nobility to meet him at York the 24th of September, to give their advice upon the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He therefore told the Scots, that their petition was expreſſed in ſuch general terms, that he could not give them a poſitive anſwer. But if they would ſpeak more plainly, and declare the particulars of their demands, he would give ſuch anſwers as the peers who were to meet at York ſhould think proper. Upon this they ſent their demands to the king the 8th of September, namely:

"1. That his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to command, that the laſt acts of parliament may be publiſhed in his highneſs's name, as our ſovereign lord, with the eſtates of parliament convened by his majeſty's authority.

"2. That the caſtles of Edinburgh and other ſtrengths of the kingdom of Scotland may, according to the firſt foundation, be furniſhed and uſed for our defence and ſecurity.

"3. That our countrymen in his majeſty's dominions of England and Ireland may be freed from cenſure for ſubſcribing the covenant, and be no more preſſed with oaths and ſubſcriptions unwarrantable by our laws, and contrary to our national oath and covenant approved by his majeſty.

"4. That the common incendiaries which have been the authors of this combuſtion may receive their juſt cenſure.

"5. That all our ſhips and goods, with all the damage thereof, may be reſtored.

"6. That the wrongs, loſſes, and charges which all this time we have ſuſtained, may be repaired.

"7. That the declarations made againſt us as traitors, may be recalled in the end, by the advice and counſel of the ſtates of England convened in parliament. His majeſty may be pleaſed to remove the garriſons from the borders, and any impediments which may ſtop free trade."

It appears by this laſt article, how careful the Scots were to loſe no opportunity to gain the people of England to their intereſt. Of this they alſo gave the following inſtance: as the Londoners had all their coals from Newcaſtle, and could by no means be without that trade, the Scots were no ſooner maſters of Newcaſtle, but they writ to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, "That knowing how neceſſary the free traffick of coals was for their city, and other places of England, they had, as a teſtimony of greateſt reſpect and good-will to the city of London, ſent two noblemen to declare to the maſters of ſhips, who, poſſeſſed with needleſs fears, were haſtening out of the river, that their purpoſe was not to ſtop, but to uſe their beſt means to continue that trade."

This letter anſwered the expectations of the Scots: preſently after, it was publicly talked at London of preſenting a petition to the king, to pray him to ſummon a parliament. The privy council, left by the king at London, having ſome notice of this deſign, endeavoured to prevent it by a letter directed to the lord mayor and aldermen: but they could not ſucceed. So a petition was reſolved, and ſent to his majeſty at York by ſome of the aldermen and common-council, which was as follows:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"BEING moved by the duty and obedience which by the laws your petitioners owe unto your ſacred majeſty, they humbly preſent unto your princely and pious wiſdom the ſeveral preſſing grievances following, viz.

"1. The preſſing and unuſual impoſitions upon merchandiſe, importing and exporting, and the urging and levying of ſhip-money, notwithſtanding both which, merchants ſhips and goods have been taken and deſtroyed both by Turkiſh and other pyrates.

"2. The multitude of monopolies, patents, and warrants, whereby trade in the city and other parts of the kingdom is much decayed.

"3. The ſundry innovations in matter of religion.

"4. The oath and canons lately enjoined by the late convocation, whereby your petitioners are in danger to be deprived of their miniſters.

"5. The great concourſe of papiſts, and their inhabitations in London and the ſuburbs, whereby they have more means and opportunity of plotting and executing their deſigns againſt the religion eſtabliſhed.

"6. The ſeldom calling, and ſudden diſſolutions of parliaments, without the redreſs of your ſubjects grievances.

"7. The impriſonment of divers citizens for non-payment of ſhip-money and impoſitions, and the proſecution of many others in the ſtar chamber, for not conforming themſelves to committees in patents of monopolies, whereby trade is reſtrained.

"8. The great danger your ſacred perſon is expoſed unto in the preſent war, and the various fears that ſeized upon your petitioners and their families, by reaſon thereof, which grievances and fears have occaſioned ſo great a ſtop and diſtraction in trade, that your petitioners can neither buy, ſell, receive, or pay as formerly, and tends to the utter ruin of the inhabitants of the city, the decay of navigation and cloathing, and the manufactures of this kingdom.

" Your humble petitioners conceiving that the ſaid grievances are contrary to the laws of this kingdom, and finding by experience that they are not redreſſed by the ordinary courſe of juſtice, do therefore moſt humbly beſeech your moſt ſacred majeſty to cauſe a parliament to be ſummoned with all convenient ſpeed, whereby they may be relieved in the premiſes.

" And your petitioners," &c.

Within a few days, this petition was followed by another from twelve lords, in behalf of themſelves and divers others.

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" THE ſenſe of that duty and ſervice which we owe unto your ſacred majeſty, and our earneſt affection to the good and welfare of this your realm of England, have moved us in all humility to beſeech your royal majeſty to give us leave to offer unto your moſt princely wiſdom, the apprehenſion which we and other your faithful ſubjects have conceived of the great diſtempers and dangers now threatening the church and ſtate of your royal perſon, and the fitteſt means by which they may be prevented.

" The evils and dangers whereof your majeſty may be pleaſed to take notice are theſe:

" 1. That your ſacred majeſty is expoſed to hazard and danger in the preſent expedition againſt the Scotiſh army, and by the occaſion of the war your revenue is much waſted, your ſubjects burdened with coat and conduct-money, billeting of ſoldiers, and other military charges, and divers rapines and diſorders committed in ſeveral parts in this your realm, by the ſoldiers raiſed for that ſervice, and your whole kingdom become full of fear and diſcontent.

" 2. The ſundry innovations in matters of religion; the oath and canons lately impoſed upon the clergy, and other your majeſty's ſubjects.

" 3. The great increaſe of popery, and employing of popiſh recuſants and others ill affected to the religion by law eſtabliſhed, in places of power and truſt, and eſpecially commanding of men and arms both in the field and other counties of this realm; whereas by the laws they are not permitted to have arms in their own houſes.

" 4. The great miſchief which may fall upon this kingdom, if the intentions which have been credibly reported, of bringing in of Iriſh forces, ſhall take effect.

" 5. The urging of ſhip-money, and proſecution of ſome ſheriffs in the ſtar chamber for not levying of it.

" 6. The heavy charges of merchandiſe, to the diſcouragement of trade, the multitude of monopolies or other patentees, whereby the commodities and manufactures of the kingdom are much burdened, to the great and univerſal grievance of your people.

" 7. The great grief of your ſubjects by the intermiſſion of parliaments, in the late former diſſolving of ſuch as have been called, with the hoped effects which otherwiſe they might have procured.

" For a remedy whereof, and prevention of the danger that may enſue to your royal perſon, and to the whole ſtate, who do in all humility and faithfulneſs beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty, that you would be pleaſed to ſummon a parliament within ſome ſhort and convenient time, whereby the cauſe of theſe, and other great grievances, which your poor petitioners now lie under, may be taken away, and the authors and counſellors of them may be there brought to ſuch legal trial and condign puniſhment as the nature of the offence does require: and that the preſent war may be compoſed by your majeſty's wiſdom without blood-ſhed, in ſuch manner as may conduce to the honour and ſafety of your majeſty's perſon, and content of your people, and continuance of both of your kingdoms againſt the common enemy of the reformed religion[s]."

[s] The king's anſwer to this petition was, " That before the receipt thereof, he well foreſaw the danger that threatened himſelf and crown, and therefore reſolved to ſummon all the peers to his preſence the 24th of September, and with them to conſult, what in this caſe is fitteſt to be done for his honour, and the ſafety of the kingdom; where the petitioners with the reſt, might offer any thing conducing to theſe ends." Whitelock's Memoirs, p. 36.

Preſently after, the king having called the Yorkſhire gentry together, propoſed to them the payment of the trained-bands for two months. The propoſal being accepted, the gentlemen prepared an addreſs to inform the king of their conſent, but withal they beſought his majeſty to endeavour to compoſe the differences with the Scots, and to ſummon a parliament. The earl of Strafford being deſired to preſent the addreſs to the king, refuſed it unleſs the clauſe about calling a parliament was left out, alleging he knew the king fully deſigned it. But the gentlemen were unwilling to leave out theſe words, and delivered their addreſs themſelves.

The king perceiving by the petitions which were preſented to him, that it was the nation's fervent deſire a parliament ſhould be called, did not doubt it would be the firſt advice the peers, when aſſembled, would give him. He reſolved therefore to prevent that advice, by ſummoning a parliament to meet on the 3d of November, for fear, if he delayed it any longer, he might be thought to be forced to it. The great council of the peers being aſſembled at York the 24th of September, the king ſpoke to them as follows:

" My lords,

" UPON ſudden invaſions where the dangers are near and inſtant, it hath been the cuſtom of my predeceſſors to aſſemble the great council of the peers, and by their advice and aſſiſtance to give a timely remedy to ſuch evils, which could not admit a delay ſo long as muſt of neceſſity be allowed for the aſſembling of the parliament.

" This being our condition at this time, and an army of rebels lodged within this kingdom, I thought it moſt fit to conform myſelf to the practice of my predeceſſors in like caſes; that with your advice and aſſiſtance we might juſtly proceed to the chaſtiſement of theſe inſolencies, and ſecuring of my good ſubjects.

" In the firſt place, I muſt let you know that I deſire nothing more than to be rightly underſtood of my people. And to that end I have of myſelf reſolved to call a parliament, having already given order to my lord keeper to iſſue the writs inſtantly, ſo that the parliament may be aſſembled by the 3d of November next; whither if my ſubjects bring thoſe good affections which become them towards me, it ſhall not fail on my part to make it a happy meeting. In the mean time there are two points wherein I ſhall deſire your advice, which indeed were the chief cauſe of your meeting.

" Firſt, what anſwer to give to the petition of the rebels, and in what manner to treat with them. Of which, that you may give a ſure judgment, I have ordered that your lordſhips ſhall be clearly and truly informed of the ſtate of the whole buſineſs, and upon what reaſons the advices that my privy-council unanimouſly gave me, were grounded.

" The ſecond is, how my army ſhall be kept on foot and maintained, until the ſupplies of a parliament may be had; for ſo long as the Scotch army remains in England, I think no man will counſel me to diſband mine: for that would be an unſpeakable loſs to all this part of the kingdom, by ſubjecting them to the greedy appetite of the rebels, beſides the diſhonour that would thereby fall upon this nation."

When the king had thus ſpoken to the lords, he commanded to be read the reaſons which had induced his council to adviſe the levying an army againſt the Scots, and the petition of the Scots preſented to the king ſince their taking of Newcaſtle, as alſo the king's anſwer, and their particular demands. Then the earl of Traquair, by the king's order, explained theſe demands to the peers, and endeavoured to ſhew how ſome of them ſubverted the fundamental laws of the kingdom of Scotland, others the juſt prerogative and dignity of his majeſty, and of which many were to the detriment of the king's profit, and prejudice of divers good ſubjects there. The reſult of the deliberations of the peers was, that certain of themſelves ſhould be ſent as commiſſioners to treat with the Scots, and endeavour to conclude a peace. Purſuant to this reſolution ſixteen peers were choſen for commiſſioners[t], to whom were added by the king as aſſiſtants, the earls of Traquair, Morton, and Lanerick ſecretary of Scotland, ſir Henry Vane, ſir Lewis Steward, and ſir John Burrough. It was farther agreed, that the treaty ſhould begin at Rippon[u] the 1ſt of October, and that the earl of Lanerick ſhould ſignify this reſolution to the Scots.

This article being diſpatched, the king deſired the lords to conſider of means to maintain the army during the treaty. It

Clarendon, tom. I. p. 123. Ruſhworth, tom. III. p. 1276.

[u] York was named firſt, but the Scots refuſed to treat there, " as not ſecure is ſtrange the king ſhould undertake this war without having any ſupply from the parliament, and ſhould be ſo ill provided for the payment of his army, that within a month after the opening of the campaign, he was unable to maintain it. For my part I cannot deviſe any other reaſon of this conduct, except that for the ſupport of this war he had depended upon ſuch means as were no longer in his power to employ. However this be, the earl of Strafford having informed the peers of the number of troops the king had on foot, namely, about four-and-twenty thouſand men, declared that the payment of this army amounted to threeſcore thouſand pounds a month, and that to keep the army together for three months, no leſs would ſerve than the ſum of 200,000l. He added, if the army ſhould diſband, all Yorkſhire would be loſt in two days, and the whole kingdom endangered. Whereupon it was reſolved, that a letter, ſubſcribed by all the peers preſent, ſhould be ſent to the city of London for lending the 200,000l. upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould be agree on, each of the peers offering to become bound.

The Scots having appointed their commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh, the negotiation began at Rippon the 1ſt of October[w]. But before the principal point of the treaty was conſidered, certain preliminary articles were to be ſettled, which the Scots propoſed as abſolutely neceſſary to a happy concluſion. They repreſented therefore, that their army had ſtopped at Newcaſtle by his majeſty's expreſs order: that they ſubſiſted by means of the contributions raiſed upon Cumberland, Newcaſtle, and Durham; and as the negotiation might laſt ſome time, it was neceſſary before all things to provide for the ſubſiſtence of their troops during the treaty. This was the principal article on which they inſiſted, as a preliminary to the treaty. There were alſo other articles, which I do not think abſolutely neceſſary to be mentioned, ſince it will appear preſently what was the principal point by the preliminaries that were agreed on. I ſhall only add, that the Scots would never ſuffer the earl of Traquair to aſſiſt at the treaty, becauſe he was one of thoſe they called incendiaries, againſt whom they demanded ſevere juſtice. After many debates, the commiſſioners of the two nations agreed at laſt, the 16th of October, on the following preliminaries.

" 1. That the Scotch army ſhall have for a competent maintenance, the ſum of 850l. per diem; and that the payment thereof ſhall continue for two months, in caſe the treaty ſhall ſo long laſt; which payment to be made weekly upon the Friday of every week.

" 2. The days of the returning of the army to be numbered within the days of the allowed maintenance.

" 3. That the Scotch army ſhall content themſelves with the aforeſaid maintenance, and ſhall neither moleſt papiſts, prelates, nor their adherents, nor any other perſons of whatſoever quality.

" 4. That the inhabitants of the ſaid counties ſhall alſo have liberty to return peaceably to their own dwellings, and ſhall be refuſed no courteſy, it being always preſuppoſed, that the fit lodging of their army ſhall be allowed.

" 5. That the army be furniſhed with coals in a regular way, and not at the pleaſure of the ſoldiers.

" 6. That there be a proviſion of forage, at the prices to be ſet down in a table, which muſt alſo contain the particular prices of all ſorts of victuals, and other neceſſaries for the army, to be indifferently agreed upon by perſons nominated on both ſides.

" 7. That free trade and commerce between both nations be reſtored, and not to be interrupted but upon the warning of three months. But no victuals, arms, nor ammunition, to be imported into Newcaſtle, &c.

" 8. That victuals and other neceſſaries for the army be free of cuſtom; and that his majeſty's cuſtom of coals and other ware be left free to be levied by his own officers.

" 9. That there be a freedom to furniſh neceſſaries for both armies, and liberty be granted for milling, brewing, &c.

" 10. That the arrears of the contributions due to the Scotch army, be completely paid to October 19.

" 11. That there be a ceſſation of arms, according to the particulars to be agreed upon.

" 12. As for ſecuring the ſum of 850l. per diem above ſpecified, there is a committee appointed, who have power to treat with Northumberland, the biſhopric of Durham, Newcaſtle, and (if need require) with Cumberland and Weſtmoreland, about the payment of it.

" 13. The lords will, before their going from York, ſettle a committee, who ſhall have charge to ſee the contribution orderly raiſed and paid; and that there ſhall likewiſe be a committee nominated, to whom either the Scotch commiſſioners, or the committees of the country, may weekly give an account of the carriage of the buſineſs."

The Scots had the addreſs to prolong the ſigning of theſe preliminaries till the 16th of October, after which it ſtill remained to agree on the conditions of the truce. It was therefore almoſt impoſſible to enter into a diſcuſſion of the articles, which were to be the chief ſubject of the treaty, before the 3d of November, the day appointed for the meeting of the parliament. The lords, as well thoſe at Rippon as thoſe at York, being indiſpenſably obliged to repair to London, it would have been needleſs to begin the negociation at Rippon, where the time would ſcarce have allowed it to be opened. Wherefore the Engliſh commiſſioners, whether of themſelves, or by the ſuggeſtion of the Scots, propoſed to the king the removal of the treaty from Rippon to London; and the king was forced to conſent to it, though he plainly perceived the Scots expected to find many friends at London, and even in the parliament, as indeed was the caſe. One may venture to ſay, that on occaſion of this treaty, the king committed three capital errors. Firſt, in ſummoning the parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, ſince he could not be ignorant how much the city of London was diſſatisfied with the government, and conſequently ready to countenance ſuch reſolutions as the parliament might take againſt it. Whereas, had he ſummoned the parliament to meet at York, or in any other place at a diſtance from London, he would thereby have broken in part the meaſures of the Scots and Engliſh malecontents. He had but too much cauſe afterwards to be ſenſible of this error. The ſecond was, the removal of the treaty to London, where the Scots had their principal correſpondents. The third, in taking ſo ſhort a time for the meeting of the parliament, ſo that he had only the month of October to conclude a peace with the Scots, a ſpace hardly ſufficient to agree with them on the preliminaries and terms of the ceſſation, before the king and peers would be obliged to leave York and go to London. If he had not been in ſuch haſte to fix the meeting of the parliament to the 3d of November, he might have either concluded the treaty with the Scots by granting what he could not have helped, or at leaſt, left them without excuſe, if they had obſtinately perſiſted in any unreaſonable demands. Whereas, not being able to finiſh the negociation at Rippon, he was forced to remove the conferences to London, a city well affected to the Scots, and where they could better than any where elſe, take juſt meaſures, either with the chief inhabitants, or with their friends in parliament. The king was ſufficiently convinced of theſe errors, when it was too late to retrieve them.

Not to omit any thing, which to me ſeems material in this hiſtory, I thought proper to add here the earl of Briſtol's proceſs at the beginning of king Charles's reign. For, it is not foreign to the purpoſe. On the contrary, this proceſs, with the earl's anſwers, may be of ſervice to clear the latter part of the reign of James I. as to the negociation of the marriage of prince Charles with the Spaniſh infanta, and the reſtitution of the Palatinate. It may alſo give an idea of the character of Charles I. and the duke of Buckingham. But it could not be inſerted in any other place, without a too great interruption of the thread of the hiſtory.

ſecure for their commiſſioners, ſo long as the earl of Strafford commanded there in chief, who had proclaimed them traitors in Ireland before the king had done it in England." This was the firſt public appearance of the Scots enmity againſt Strafford, and it is ſtrange it ſhould not be more regarded. Whitelock, p. 36.

[w] The Scotiſh commiſſioners were the earl of Dunfermling, lord Lowdon, ſir Patrick Hepburne, ſir William Douglas, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderſon, Mr. Johnſton. Ruſhworth, tom. III. p. 1282.

PROCEEDINGS againſt the EARL of BRISTOL.

THE earl of Briſtol, who had been embaſſador in Spain to negociate prince Charles marriage with the Spaniſh infanta, was confined at his return to England, without being ſuffered to come into the king's preſence. As long as king James lived, the duke of Buckingham, who was the cauſe of the earl's diſgrace, pretended however to be willing to adjuſt this affair, if he would but anſwer to ſome queſtions or objections before the commiſſioners appointed by the king. The earl anſwered thoſe queſtions, but his reconciliation was not advanced by it. On the contrary, he found himſelf much farther from it by the death of king James, and the acceſſion of Charles I. to the crown. The earl of Briſtol finding himſelf on very ill terms, wiſhed to come off if poſſible without injuring his honour. To that end, he applied to to the lord Conway ſecretary of ſtate, to deſire him to intercede for him with his majeſty. There paſſed ſome letters between theſe two lords upon that ſubject, and at laſt, during the ſecond parliament of king Charles in 1626, the earl received from the lord Conway, the following letter:

My lord,

I RECEIVED a letter from your lordſhip, dated the 4th of this month, written in anſwer to a former letter, which I directed to your lordſhip by his majeſty's commandment. This laſt letter, according to my duty, I have ſhewed unto his majeſty, who hath peruſed it, and hath commanded me to write back to you again, that he finds himſelf nothing ſatisfied therewith. The queſtion propounded to your lordſhip from his majeſty, was plain and clear, whether you did rather chuſe to ſit ſtill, without being queſtioned for any errors paſt in your negotiation in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon granted in parliament, whereof you may have the benefit: or whether, for the clearing of your innocency (whereof yourſelf, and your friends and followers are ſo confident), you will be content to wave the advantage of that pardon, and put yourſelf into a legal way of examination for the trial thereof? His majeſty's purpoſe thereby, is not to prevent you of any favours the law hath given you: but if your aſſurance be ſuch as your words and letters import, he conceives it ſtands not with that public and reſolute profeſſion of your integrity to decline your trial. His majeſty leaves the choice to yourſelf, and requires from you a direct anſwer, without circumlocution, or bargaining with him for future favours beforehand; but if you have a deſire to make uſe of that pardon, which cannot be denied you, nor is any way deſired to be taken from you, his majeſty expects you ſhould at the leaſt forbear to magnify your ſervice, and out of an opinion of your innocency, caſt an aſperſion upon his majeſty's juſtice, in not affording you that preſent fulneſs of liberty and favour, which cannot be drawn from him, but in his good time, and according to his good pleaſure.

Thus much I have in commandment to write to your lordſhip, and to require your anſwer clearly and plainly, by this meſſenger ſent on purpoſe for it: and ſo remain,

Your lordſhip's humble ſervant,

Whitehall, 24 March, 1626. Edw. Conway.

The earl of Briſtol's anſwer.

My lord,

I HAVE received your letter of the 24th of March, the 28th, and I am infinitely grieved to underſtand, that my former anſwer to yours of the 4th of March, hath not ſatisfied his majeſty, which I will endeavour to do in this, to the beſt of my underſtanding; and to that end, ſhall anſwer to the particular points of your preſent letter, with the greateſt clearneſs I am able.

Firſt, whereas you ſay in your letter, that the queſtion propounded to me was plain and clear, viz. Whether I would chuſe to ſit ſtill, without being queſtioned for any errors paſt in my negociation with Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon, whereof I may take the benefit? Or whether, being content to wave the advantage of that pardon, I ſhall put myſelf into a legal way of examination for the tryal thereof, &c.

Firſt, your lordſhip may be pleaſed to remember, your laſt propoſition was, whether I deſired to reſt in the ſecurity I was in, which you now expreſs, whether I will chuſe to ſit ſtill?

Secondly, your propoſition was, whether I would acknowledge the gracious favour of his majeſty that now is, who had been pleaſed not to queſtion my actions, when it is beſt known to your lordſhip, that by a commiſſion of the lords, I was queſtioned upon twenty articles, divers involving felony and treaſon. Although it be true, that when I had ſo anſwered (as I am confident their lordſhips would have cleared me), I was ſo unhappy, as their lordſhips never met more about that buſineſs.

But now your propoſition is, whether I will now chuſe to ſit ſtill without being further queſtioned for errors paſt? whereas before it was required I ſhould acknowledge that I have not been queſtioned at all, which is a different thing. But conferring both your letters together, and gathering the ſenſe and meaning, by making the latter an explanation of the former, which I could have wiſhed your lordſhip would have more clearly explained, I return unto your lordſhip this plain and direct anſwer.

That underſtanding by the ſecurity I am in, and ſitting ſtill, and not being further queſtioned, I am reſtored to the bare freedom and liberty of a ſubject and peer (for a man being called in queſtion by his majeſty, if after his majeſty ſhall be pleaſed out of his goodneſs, that he reſt quiet and ſecure, and that he ſhall not be farther queſtioned, I conceive that it is not apparent that his liberty naturally revolveth unto him, when by his majeſty's grace he is pleaſed to declare, he ſhall not be farther queſtioned, but may live in further ſecurity). So that underſtanding your letter in this ſort (for no direct anſwer can be made, until the ſenſe of the queſtion be truly ſtated), I do moſt humbly acknowledge and accept his majeſty's grace and favour, and ſhall not wave any thing that ſhall come to me by the pardon of the 21 Jac. regis, nor by the pardon of his majeſty's coronation; and am ſo far from bargaining, as you are pleaſed to expreſs it, for future favour (though I hope my humble and ſubmiſſive courſe of petitioning his majeſty, neither hath, nor ſhall deſerve ſo hard an expreſſion), that I ſhall not preſume ſo much as to preſs for any favour, until my dutiful and loyal behaviour may move his majeſty's royal and gracious heart thereunto, but receive with all humbleneſs, this my freedom and liberty; the which I ſhall only make uſe of in ſuch ſort, as I ſhall judge may be moſt agreeable to his majeſty's pleaſure.

As for the ſecond part of your letter, wherein you ſay, that if I deſire to make uſe of that pardon, his majeſty expects that I ſhould at leaſt forbear to magnify my ſervices; or out of an opinion of my own innocency caſt an aſperſion upon his majeſty's juſtice. To this point I anſwer, that as I hope I ſhall never err in that ſort of immodeſty of valuing my ſervices, which I acknowledge to have been accompanied with infinite weakneſs and diſabilities; ſo I truſt it ſhall not diſpleaſe, that I make uſe to my own comfort, and the honour of my poſterity, of thoſe many written teſtimonies which my late moſt bleſſed maſter hath left me, of his gracious acceptance of my ſervices for the ſpace of twenty years. So likewiſe I hope the modeſt avowing of mine innocency will not be thought to caſt any aſperſion upon his majeſty's honour or juſtice. I muſt freely confeſs unto your lordſhip, I am much afflicted to ſee inferences of this nature made, both in your lordſhip's laſt letter and in this. For if it ſhall be inferred as a thing reflecting upon the king's honour, that a man queſtioned, ſhall not endeavour to defend his own innocency before he be convicted, it will be impoſſible for any man to be ſafe; for the honour of his majeſty is too ſacred a thing for any ſubject, how innocent ſoever, to conteſt againſt. So likewiſe, God forbid that it ſhould be brought into conſequences (as in your former letter), as a tax upon the government and juſtice of his late majeſty, and majeſty that now is, that I ſhould have ſuffered ſo long time, not being guilty. For as I never have been heard ſo much as to repine of injuſtice in their majeſties in all my ſufferings, ſo I well know, that the long continuance of my troubles may well be attributed unto other cauſes; as to my own errors of paſſion, or other accidents; for your lordſhip may well remember that my affairs were almoſt two years ſince upon the point of a happy accommodation, had it not been interrupted by the unfortunate miſtaking of the ſpeeches I uſed to Mr. Clark.

I ſhall conclude by intreating your lordſhip's favour, that I may underſtand from you, as I hope for my comfort, that this letter hath given his majeſty ſatisfaction; or if there ſhould yet remain any ſcruple, that I may have a clear and plain ſignification of the king's pleaſure, which I ſhall obey with all humility.

Your lordſhip's humble ſervant,

Briſtol.

Not long after, the earl of Briſtol being informed that the houſe of commons were ill-affected to the duke of Buckingham, believed he ought to improve that juncture. For which purpoſe he petitioned the houſe of lords, ſhewing that he being a peer of the realm, had not received a ſummons to parliament, and deſired their lordſhips to mediate with his majeſty, that he might enjoy the liberty of a ſubject, and the privilege of his peerage, after almoſt two years reſtraint without being brought to a trial. And if any charge be brought in againſt him, he prayed that he might be tried by parliament.

Upon which petition, it was reſolved in a committee of the upper houſe, that their lordſhips ſhould humbly beſeech his majeſty, that a writ of ſummons might be ſent to the earl of Briſtol.

Hereupon the duke of Buckingham ſignified to the houſe, that upon the earl of Briſtol's petition to the king, his majeſty had ſent him his writ of ſummons: and withal, ſhewed the lords a copy of a letter written from the king unto the ſaid earl, being as followeth:

"We have received your letter addreſſed unto us by Buckingham, ingham, and cannot but wonder that you ſhould through forgetfulneſs, make requeſt to us of favour, as if you ſtood evenly capable of it, when you know what your behaviour in Spain deſerved of us, which you are to examine by the obſervations we made, and know you well remember; how at our firſt coming into Spain, taking upon you to be ſo wiſe as to foreſee our intention to change our religion, you were ſo far from diſſuading us, that you offered your advice and ſecrecy to concur in it; and in many other conferences preſſing to ſhew how convenient it was to be a Roman catholic; it being impoſſible in your opinion to do any great action otherwiſe: And how much wrong, diſadvantage, and diſſervice you did to the treaty, and to the right and intereſt of our dear brother and ſiſter, and their children; what diſadvantage, inconvenience, and hazard you intangled us in by your artifices, putting off and delaying our return home; the great eſtimation you made of that eſtate, and the low price you ſet this kingdom at; ſtill maintaining that we under colour of friendſhip to Spain did what was in our power againſt them, which they ſaid, you very well knew: and laſt of all, your approving of thoſe conditions, that our nephew ſhould be brought up in the emperor's court, to which ſir Walter Aſhton then ſaid, that he durſt not give his conſent for fear of his head: you replying unto him, that without ſome ſuch great action, neither marriage nor peace could be had.

The lord keeper to the earl of Briſtol.

My very good lord,

BY his majeſty's commandment, I herewith ſend unto your lordſhip your writ of ſummons for the parliament; but withal to ſignify his majeſty's pleaſure herein further, that howſoever he gives way to the awarding of the writ; yet his meaning is thereby, not to diſcharge any former directions for reſtraint of your lordſhip's coming hither, but that you continue under the ſame reſtriction as you did before; ſo as your lordſhip's perſonal attendance is to be forborne, and therein I doubt not but your lordſhip will readily give his majeſty ſatisfaction. And ſo I commend my ſervice very heartily unto your lordſhip, and remain,

Your lordſhip's aſſured friend and ſervant,

Dorſet Court, March 31, 1626. Tho. Coventry, C. S.

The earl of Briſtol's anſwer to the lord keeper.

May it pleaſe your lordſhip,

I HAVE received your lordſhip's letter of the 31ſt of March, and with it his majeſty's writ of ſummons for the parliament; in the one his majeſty commandeth me, that all excuſes ſet aſide, upon my faith and allegiance, I fail not to come and attend his majeſty; and this under the great ſeal of England. In the other, as in a letter miſſive, his majeſty's pleaſure is intimated by your lordſhip, that my perſonal attendance ſhould be forborne: I muſt crave leave ingenuouſly to confeſs unto your lordſhip, that I want judgment rightly to direct myſelf in this caſe; as likewiſe that I am ignorant how far this may trench upon the privileges of the peers of this land, and upon mine and their ſafety hereafter: for if the writ be not obeyed, the law calleth it a miſpriſon, and highly fineable, whereof we have had late examples; and a miſſive letter being avowed or not, is to be doubted would not be adjudged a ſufficient diſcharge againſt the great ſeal of England. On the other ſide, if the letter be not obeyed, a peer may, "de facto," be committed upon a contempt, in the interim, and the queſtion cleared afterwards; ſo that in this caſe it is above mine abilities. I can only anſwer your lordſhip, that I will moſt exactly obey; and to the end I may underſtand which obedience will be, in all kinds moſt ſuitable to my duty, I will preſently repair to my private lodging at London, and there remain until in this, and other cauſes, I ſhall have petitioned his majeſty, and underſtand his further pleaſure. For the ſecond part of your lordſhip's letter, where your lordſhip ſaith, "That his majeſty's meaning is not thereby to diſcharge any former directions for reſtraint of your lordſhip's coming hither, but that you continue under the ſame reſtriction as before; ſo that your lordſhip's perſonal attendance here is to be forborne:" I conceive your lordſhip intendeth this touching my coming to parliament only; for as touching my coming to London, I never had at any time one word of prohibition, or colourable pretence of reſtraint; but on the contrary, having his late majeſty's expreſs leave to come to London, to follow my affairs: out of my reſpect to his majeſty, then prince, and to the duke of Buckingham, I forbore to come until I might know, whether my coming would not be diſagreeable unto them. Whereunto his majeſty was pleaſed to anſwer both under the hand of the duke, and of Mr. Secretary Conway, that he took my reſpect unto him herein in very good part, and would wiſh me to make uſe of the leave the king had given me: ſince which time I never received any letter or meſſage of reſtraint; only his majeſty by his letter, bearing date June the laſt, commandeth me to remain as I was in the time of the king his father, which was with liberty to come to London to follow my own affairs as I pleaſed, as will appear unto your lordſhip, if you will afford me ſo much favour as to peruſe them. I have writ this much unto your lordſhip, becauſe I would not, through miſunderſtanding, fall into diſpleaſure by my coming up, and to intreat your lordſhip to inform his majeſty thereof, and that my lord Conway, by whoſe warrant I was only reſtained in the late king's time of famous memory, may produce any one word, that may have ſo much as any colourable pretence of debarring my coming up to London. I beſeech your lordſhip to pardon my deſire to have things clearly underſtood; for the want of that formerly hath cauſed all my troubles; and when any thing is miſinformed concerning me, I have little or no means to clear it; ſo that my chief labour is to avoid miſunderſtanding. I ſhall conclude with beſeeching your lordſhip to do me this favour, to let his majeſty underſtand, that my coming up is only rightly to underſtand his pleaſure, whereunto I ſhall in all things moſt dutifully and humbly conform myſelf. And ſo with my humble ſervice to your lordſhip, I recommend you to God's holy protection, and remain,

Your lordſhip's moſt humble ſervant,

Sherborn, April 12, 1626. Briſtol.

The earl of Briſtol's ſecond petition preſented to the houſe of lords, April 19, 1626.

The humble petition of John earl of Briſtol,

Humbly ſhewing unto your lordſhips,

THAT he hath lately received his writ of parliament, for which he returneth unto your lordſhips moſt humble thanks, but jointly with it a letter from my lord keeper, commanding him in his majeſty's name to forbear his perſonal attendance; and although he ſhall ever obey the leaſt intimation of his majeſty's pleaſure, yet he moſt humbly offereth unto your lordſhips wiſe conſiderations as too high a point for him, how far this may trench upon the liberty and ſafety of the peers, and the authority of their letters patents, to be in this ſort diſcharged by a letter miſſive of any ſubject, without the king's hand; and for your lordſhips due information, he hath annexed a copy of the ſaid lord keeper's letter, and his anſwer thereunto.

He further humbly petitioneth your lordſhips, that having been, for the ſpace of two years, highly wronged in point of his liberty, and of his honour, by many ſiniſter aſperſions which have been caſt upon him, without being permitted to anſwer for himſelf; which hath been done by the power and induſtry of the duke of Buckingham, to keep him from the preſence of his majeſty and the parliament, leſt he ſhould diſcover many crimes concerning the ſaid duke.

He therefore moſt humbly beſeecheth, that he may be heard both in the point of his wrong, and of his accuſation of the ſaid duke; wherein he will make it appear, how infinitely the ſaid duke hath both abuſed their majeſties, the ſtate, and both the houſes of parliament. And this he is moſt confident will not be denied, ſince the court of parliament never refuſeth to hear the pooreſt ſubject ſeeking for redreſs of wrongs, nor the accuſation againſt any, be he never ſo powerful: and herein he beſeecheth your lordſhips to mediate to his majeſty, for the ſuppliant's coming to the houſe, in ſuch ſort as you ſhall think fitting; aſſuring his majeſty, that all he ſhould ſay, ſhall not only tend to the ſervice of his majeſty and the ſtate, but highly to the honour of his majeſty's royal perſon, and of his princely virtues: and your ſuppliant ſhall ever pray for your lordſhips proſperity.

Hereupon the lord keeper delivered this meſſage from the king to the houſe of lords.

That his majeſty hath heard of a petition preferred unto this houſe by the earl of Briſtol, ſo void of duty and reſpects to his majeſty, that he hath great cauſe to puniſh him: that he hath alſo heard with what duty and reſpectfulneſs to his majeſty their lordſhips have proceeded therein, which his majeſty conceiveth to have been upon the knowledge they have, that he hath been reſtrained for matters of ſtate; and his majeſty doth therefore give their lordſhips thanks for the ſame, and is reſolved to put the cauſe upon the honour and juſtice of their lordſhips and this houſe. And thereupon his majeſty commanded him (the lord keeper) to ſignify to their lordſhips his royal pleaſure, that the earl of Briſtol be ſent for as a delinquent, to anſwer in this houſe his offences, committed in his negotiations before his majeſty's being in Spain, and his offences ſince his majeſty's coming from Spain, and his ſcandalizing the duke of Buckingham immediately, and his majeſty by reflection, with whoſe privity, and by whoſe direction, the duke did guide his actions, and without which he did nothing. All which his majeſty will cauſe to be charged againſt him before their lordſhips in this houſe.

The lords appointed a committee to attend the king, and to preſent their humble thanks to his majeſty, for the truſt and confidence he had placed in the honour and juſtice of their houſe.

On Monday the 1ſt of May, the gentleman uſher brought the earl of Briſtol to the bar, according to their lordſhips order; and the lord keeper acquainted them, that the king had commanded his attorney general, to charge the earl of Briſtol before their lordſhips with high treaſon, and other offences and miſdemeanours of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal courſe againſt him, according to the juſtice and uſual proceedings of parliament.

Articles of accuſation againſt the earl of Briſtol, preſented to the upper houſe by the king's attorney general.

I. Offences done and committed by the earl of Briſtol, before his majeſty's going into Spain, when he was prince.

I. THAT the ſaid earl being truſted and employed by the ſaid late king as his embaſſador to Ferdinando, then and now emperor of Germany; and to Philip the IVth, then and now king of Spain, in annis 1621, 22, 23. And having commiſſion, and particular and ſpecial direction, to treat with the ſaid emperor and the king of Spain, for the plenary reſtoring of ſuch parts of the dominions, territories, and poſſeſſions of the count Palatine of Rhine, who married with the moſt excellent lady Elizabeth his now royal conſort, the only daughter of the ſaid late king James; which were then wrongfully and in hoſtile manner taken, and poſſeſſed with and by the armies of the ſaid emperor and king of Spain, or any other; and for the preſerving and keeping ſuch other parts thereof as were not then loſt, but were then in the protection of the ſaid late king James, and to the uſe of the ſaid count Palatine and his children: and alſo to treat with the ſaid king of Spain for a marriage to be had between the moſt high and excellent prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only ſon and heir-apparent of the ſaid king James, and now our moſt ſovereign lord, and the moſt illuſtrious lady Donna Maria the infanta of Spain, ſiſter to the now king of Spain: he, the ſaid earl, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and contrary to the truſt and duty of an embaſſador, at Madrid in the kingdom of Spain, to advance and further the deſigns of the ſaid king of Spain againſt our ſaid ſovereign lord, his children, friends and allies, falſely, willingly, and traiterouſly, and as a traitor to our ſaid late ſovereign lord the king, by ſundry letters and other meſſages ſent by the ſaid earl from Madrid, in the year aforeſaid, unto king James and his miniſters of ſtate of England, did confidently and reſolutely inform, adviſe, and aſſure the ſaid late king, that the ſaid emperor and king of Spain would really, fully and effectually make reſtitution and plenary reſtauration to the ſaid count Palatine, and his children, of the ſaid dominions, territories, and poſſeſſions of the ſaid count Palatine, and of the ſaid electoral dignity: and that the ſaid king of Spain did really, fully and effectually intend the ſaid marriage between the ſaid lady his ſiſter, and the ſaid prince our now ſovereign lord, according to articles formerly propounded between the ſaid kings: whereas in truth, the ſaid emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, never really intended ſuch reſtitution as aforeſaid; and whereas the ſaid king of Spain never really intended the marriage according to thoſe articles propounded, but the ſaid emperor and king of Spain, intended only by thoſe treaties, to gain time to compaſs their own ends and purpoſes, to the detriment of this kingdom (of all which, the ſaid earl of Briſtol neither was nor could be ignorant) the ſaid late king James by entertaining thoſe treaties, and continuing them upon thoſe falſe aſſurances given unto him by the ſaid earl, as aforeſaid, was made ſecure, and loſt the opportunity of time, and thereby the ſaid dominions, territories and poſſeſſions of the ſaid count Palatine, and the electoral dignity became utterly loſt; and ſome parts thereof were taken out of the actual poſſeſſion of the ſaid king James, unto whoſe protection and ſafe keeping they were put, and committed to the ſaid count Palatine; and the moſt excellent lady Elizabeth his wife, and their children, are now utterly diſpoſſeſſed and bereaved thereof, to the high diſhonour of our ſaid late ſovereign lord king James, to the diſheriſon of the ſaid late king's children, and their poſterity, of their ancient patrimony, and to the diſadvantage and diſcouraging of the reſt of the princes of Germany, and other kings and princes in amity and league with his majeſty.

II. That the ſaid earl of Briſtol being embaſſador for his late majeſty king James as aforeſaid, in annis ſupradictis, and having received perfect, plain, and particular inſtructions and directions from his ſaid late majeſty, that he ſhould put the king of Spain to a ſpeedy and punctual anſwer, touching the treaties aforeſaid: and the ſaid earl well underſtanding the effect of thoſe inſtructions and directions ſo given unto him, and taking preciſe knowledge thereof; and alſo knowing how much it concerned his late majeſty in honour and ſafety (as his great affairs then ſtood) to put theſe treaties to a ſpeedy concluſion: yet nevertheleſs, he the ſaid earl, falſely, willingly and traiterouſly, contrary to his allegiance, and contrary to the truſt and duty of an embaſſador, continued thoſe treaties upon generalities, without effectual preſſing the ſaid king of Spain unto particular concluſions, according to his majeſty's directions as aforeſaid; and ſo the ſaid earl intended to have continued the ſaid treaties upon generalities, and without reducing them to certainties and to direct concluſions, to the high diſhonour of his ſaid late majeſty, and to the extreme danger and detriment of his majeſty's perſon, his crown and dominions, confederates and allies.

III. That the ſaid earl of Briſtol being embaſſador for his ſaid late majeſty as aforeſaid, in the years aforeſaid, to the intent to diſcourage the ſaid late king James, for the taking up of arms, entering into hoſtility with the ſaid king of Spain, and for reſiſting him and his forces, from attempting the invaſion of his ſaid late majeſty's dominions, and the dominions of his ſaid late majeſty's confederates, friends, and allies; the ſaid king of Spain having long thirſted after an univerſal monarchy in theſe weſtern parts of the world, hath many times, both by words and letters to the ſaid late king and his miniſters, extolled and magnified the greatneſs and power of the ſaid king of Spain, and repreſented unto his ſaid late majeſty, the ſuppoſed dangers which would enſue unto him, if a war ſhould happen between them; and affirmed, and inſinuated unto his ſaid late majeſty, that if ſuch a war ſhould enſue, his ſaid late majeſty, during the reſt of his life, muſt expect neither to hunt, nor hawk, nor eat his meat in quiet: whereby the ſaid earl of Briſtol did cunningly and traiterouſly ſtrive to retard the reſolutions of the ſaid late king, to declare himſelf an enemy to the ſaid king of Spain (who, under colour of treaties and alliances, had ſo much abuſed him), and to reſiſt his arms and forces, to the loſs of opportunity of time, which cannot be recalled or regained, and to the extreme danger, diſhonour, and detriment of this kingdom.

IV. The ſaid earl of Briſtol, upon his diſpatch out of this realm of England, in his embaſſage aforeſaid, having communication with divers perſons of London, within this realm of England, before his going into Spain, in and about his embaſſage concerning the ſaid treaty, for the negociation whereof, the ſaid earl purpoſely was ſent; and he the ſaid earl being then told, there was little probability that theſe treaties would or could have any ſucceſs, he the ſaid earl acknowledged as much; and yet nevertheleſs, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and to the faith and truth of an embaſſador, he the ſaid earl ſaid and affirmed, that he cared not what the ſucceſs thereof would be; for he would take care to have his inſtructions, and purſue them punctually; and howſoever the buſineſs went, he would make his fortune thereby, or uſed words at that time to ſuch effect; whereby it plainly appeareth, that the ſaid earl, from the begining herein, intended not the ſervice or honour of his late majeſty, but his own corrupt and ſiniſter ends, and for his own advancement.

V. That from the beginning of his negociation, and throughout the whole management thereof, by the ſaid earl of Briſtol, and during his ſaid embaſſage, he the ſaid earl, contrary to his faith and duty to God, the true religion profeſſed by the church of England, and the peace of this church and ſtate, did intend and reſolve, that if the ſaid marriage ſo treated of as aforeſaid, ſhould by his miniſtry be effected, that thereby the Romiſh religion, and profeſſors thereof, ſhould be advanced within this realm, and other his majeſty's realms and dominions, and the true religion and profeſſors thereof, diſcouraged and diſcountenanced. And to that end and purpoſe, the ſaid earl, during the time aforeſaid, by letters unto his late majeſty and otherwiſe, often counſelled and perſuaded his ſaid late majeſty to ſet at liberty the jeſuits and prieſts of the Romiſh religion; which, according to the good, religious and public laws of this kingdom, were impriſoned or reſtrained, and to grant, and to allow unto the papiſts, and profeſſors of the Romiſh religion, free toleration, and ſilencing of all the laws made, and ſtanding in force againſt them.

VI. That

VI. That by the falſe informations and intelligence of the ſaid earl of Briſtol, during the time aforeſaid, unto his ſaid late majeſty, and to his majeſty that now is (being then prince) concerning the ſaid treaties; and by the aſſurances aforeſaid given by the ſaid earl, his ſaid late majeſty, and the prince, his now majeſty, being put in hopes, and by the ſaid long delay uſed, without producing any effect, their majeſties being put into jealouſies, and juſt ſuſpicion, that there was no ſuch ſincerity uſed towards them as they expected; and with ſo many anſwers from the earl, had on their part been undertaken, the ſaid prince, our now gracious ſovereign, was inforced, out of his love to his country, to his allies, friends, and confederates, and to the peace of Chriſtendom, who all ſuffered by thoſe intolerable delays, in his own perſon to undertake his long and dangerous journey into Spain, that thereby he might either ſpeedily conclude thoſe treaties, or perfectly diſcover, that on the emperor's, and the king of Spain's part, there was no true and real intention to bring the ſame to concluſion, upon any fit and honourable terms and conditions, and did abſolutely and ſpeedily break them off. By which journey, the perſon of the ſaid prince, being then heir-apparent to the crown of this realm, and in his perſon, the peace and ſafety of this kingdom, did undergo ſuch apparent, and ſuch inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good ſubjects do even tremble.

II. Offences done and committed by the ſaid earl, during the time of the prince's being in Spain.

VII. THAT at the prince's coming into Spain, during the time aforeſaid, the earl of Briſtol, cunningly, falſely, and traiterouſly, moved and perſuaded the prince, being then in the power of a foreign king of the Romiſh religion, to change his religion, which was done in this manner. At the prince's firſt coming to the ſaid earl, he aſked the prince, for what he came thither? The prince at firſt not conceiving the earl's meaning, anſwered, You know as well as I. The earl replied, Sir, ſervants can never ſerve their maſters induſtriouſly, although they may do it faithfully, unleſs they know their meanings fully. Give me leave therefore to tell you what they ſay in the town is the cauſe of your coming, that you mean to change your religion, and to declare it here, and yet cunningly to diſguiſe it. The earl added further, Sir, I do not ſpeak this, that I will perſuade you to do it, or that I will promiſe you to follow your example, though you will do it; but as your faithful ſervant, if you will truſt me with ſo great a ſecret, I will endeavour to carry it the diſcreeteſt way I can. The prince being moved at this unexpected motion, again ſaid unto him, I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you ſhould conceive I would be ſo baſe and unworthy, as for a wife to change my religion. The ſaid earl replying, he deſired the prince to pardon him if he had offended him, it was but out of his deſire to ſerve him. Which perſuaſions of the ſaid earl were the more dangerous, becauſe the more ſubtle; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful ſervant, to God and his maſter, if he had found the prince ſtaggering in his religion, to have prevented ſo great an error, and to have perſuaded againſt it, ſo to have avoided the dangerous conſequence thereof to the true religion, and to the ſtate, if ſuch a thing ſhould have happened.

VIII. That afterwards, during the prince's being in Spain, the ſaid earl having conference with the ſaid prince about the Romiſh religion, he endeavoured falſely and traiterouſly to perſuade the prince to change his religion, and to become a Roman catholic, and to become obedient to the uſurped authority of the pope of Rome: and to that end and purpoſe, the ſaid earl traiterouſly uſed theſe words unto the ſaid prince, that the ſtate of England never did any great thing but when they were under the obedience of the pope of Rome, and that it was impoſſible they could do any thing of note otherwiſe.

IX. That during the time of the prince's being in Spain, the prince conſulting and adviſing with the ſaid earl, and others, about a new offer made by the king of Spain, touching the Palatinate's eldeſt ſon, to marry with the emperor's daughter, but then he muſt be bred up in the emperor's court; the ſaid earl delivered his opinion, that the propoſition was reaſonable; whereat, when ſir Walter Aſton, then preſent, falling into ſome paſſion, ſaid, that he durſt not for his head conſent to it; the earl of Briſtol replied, that he ſaw no ſuch great inconvenience in it; for that he might be bred up in the emperor's court in our religion. But when the extreme danger, and, in a manner, the impoſſibility thereof, was preſſed unto the ſaid earl, he ſaid again, that without ſome great action, the peace of Chriſtendom would never be had; which was ſo dangerous and ſo deſperate a council, that one near the crown of England ſhould be poiſoned in his religion, and become an untriend to our ſtate, that the conſequences thereof, both for the preſent and future times, were infinitely dangerous; and yet hereunto did his diſaffection to our religion, the blindneſs in his judgment, miſled by his ſiniſter reſpects, and the too much regard he had to the houſe of Auſtria, lead him.

III. Offences done and committed by the ſaid earl, after the prince's coming from Spain.

X. THAT when the prince had clearly found himſelf and his father deluded in theſe treaties, and hereupon reſolved to return from the court of Spain; yet becauſe it behoved him to part freely, he left the powers of the deſponſories with the earl of Briſtol, to be delivered upon the return of the diſpenſation from Rome, which the king of Spain inſiſted upon; and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the marriage. The prince foreſeeing and fearing, leſt after the deſponſories, the infanta that ſhould then be his wife, might be put into a monaſtery, wrote a letter back to the ſaid earl from Segovia, thereby commanding him not to make uſe of the ſaid powers, until he could give him aſſurance, that a monaſtery ſhould not rob him of his wife; which letter the ſaid earl received, and with ſpeed returned an anſwer thereto in England, perſuading againſt this direction, yet promiſing obedience thereunto. Shortly after which, the prince ſent another letter to the ſaid earl into Spain, diſcharging him of his father's command. But his late majeſty, by the ſame meſſenger, ſent him a more expreſs direction, not to diſpatch the deſponſories, until a full concluſion were had of the other treaty of the Palatinate with this of the marriage; for his majeſty ſaid, that he would not have one daughter to laugh, and leave the other daughter weeping. In which diſpatch, although there were ſome miſtaking, yet in the next following, the ſame was corrected, and the earl of Briſtol tied to the ſame reſtriction, which himſelf confeſſed in one of his diſpatches afterwards, and promiſed to obey punctually the king's command therein; yet nevertheleſs, contrary to his duty and allegiance, in another letter ſent immediately after, he declared, that he had ſet a day for the deſponſories, without any aſſurance, or ſo much as treating of thoſe things which were commanded to him as reſtrictions; and that ſo ſhort a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good ſucceſs in the journey, had not concurred, the prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither ſure of a wife, nor any aſſurance given of the temporal articles. All which, in his high preſumption, he adventured to do, being an expreſs breach of his inſtructions; and if the ſame had not been prevented by his late majeſty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite diſhonour and prejudice of his majeſty.

XI. Laſtly, That he hath offended in a high and contemptuous manner, in preferring a ſcandalous petition to this honourable houſe, to the diſhonour of his majeſty of bleſſed memory, deceaſed, and of his ſacred majeſty that now is, which are no ways ſufferable in a ſubject towards his ſovereign; and in one article of that petition ſpecially, wherein he gives his now majeſty the lie, in denying and offering to falſify that relation which his majeſty affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both houſes of parliament.

Robert Heath, [Attorney general.]

The earl of Briſtol, upon the attorney general's accuſing him of high-treaſon, thus expreſſed himſelf:

"That he had exhibited his petition to the houſe, April 19, that he might come up and be heard in his accuſation of the duke of Buckingham, and that thereupon, he being a peer of this realm, is now charged with treaſon: That he had heretofore informed the late king of the duke's unfaithful ſervice, and thereupon the duke laboured that he might be clapt up in the Tower, preſently upon his return out of Spain: That he importuned the late king, that he might be heard before himſelf, and his majeſty promiſed it; "I pray God (ſaid he) that the promiſe did him no hurt, for he died ſhortly after." And for the king's promiſe, he vouched the lord chamberlain for a witneſs; and he deſired the lords to take notice, that their houſe was poſſeſſed already of his ſaid petition, and of his accuſation of the ſaid duke: And therefore deſired firſt, that they would receive his charge againſt the duke and the lord Conway, and not to invalid his teſtimony againſt them by the king's charge againſt him; and that he might not be impeached, till his charge of ſo high a nature be firſt heard.

"So he tendered to the houſe the articles againſt the duke, which the clerk received, and he withdrew, and his petition exhibited the 19th of April was read; and the lords reſolved upon the queſtion, that the ſaid earl's charge againſt the duke of Buckingham and the lord Conway ſhould be preſently read."

The

The earl being ſhortly after called in again to the bar ofthe lord's houſe, concerning his articles againſt the duke, made this ſpeech.

Firſt, he craved pardon of their lordſhips for his earneſt ſpeeches the other day, confeſſing them to have been in paſſion, ſaying, that unexpected accuſation of treaſon would warm any honeſt heart, but would hereafter amend it. Then he returned their lordſhips humble thanks for their manner of proceeding againſt him; and deſired to know, from Mr. Attorney, whether that was his whole charge or not. Mr. Attorney anſwered, that he had commandment to open no more againſt him; peradventure, upon the opening of the charge, ſome particulars might ariſe, and be urged, but no new matter ſhould.

Then the earl deſired to know of Mr. Attorney, who was the relator to his charge, and that he might underſtand who was his accuſer. Mr. Attorney anſwered, that the king himſelf out of his own mouth, had given him directions for his own relation againſt him; and corrected many things that were added. Unto which the earl anſwered, that he would not conteſt with the king, neither did it beſeem him ſo to do; neither eſteemed he his life or his fortunes ſo much, as to ſave them by conteſting with his ſovereign; and therefore would make no reply or anſwer, were it not that his religion and honour were jointly queſtioned with his life; but that being to deſcend to his poſterity, for their ſakes he was an humble ſuitor unto his majeſty, that he would not take indignation at his own juſt defence, yet would he be ready to make any humble ſubmiſſion to his majeſty; and heartily deſired ſome means might be made, that he might make it perſonally to himſelf, wherein he would ſubmit himſelf moſt willingly to ſome ſuch act of humiliation and ſubmiſſion (not wronging his innocency), that never ſubject did towards his ſovereign: and alſo that his majeſty would be pleaſed to ſet himſelf in his throne of juſtice, and declare out of his royal juſtice, that he would have the duke and him upon equal terms, and that neither of their cauſes ſhould be advanced before the other's.

Theſe were his humble petitions, which he beſought their lordſhips to preſent unto his majeſty, and to take it into their conſiderations, of how dangerous a conſequence it would be, if the king ſhould be accuſer, judge, witneſs, and ſhould have the confiſcation. As touching the charge againſt him, he ſaid, He had once anſwered it all, except that of his petition; and he doubted not but to clear himſelf before their lordſhips, of every particular of it. He ſaid he expected not to have heard of this again, having once anſwered it: he rather expected to have been charged with ſome practice with Spain againſt the ſtate; or the receipt of ten or twenty thouſand pounds, for the perſuading and procuring of the delivery up of ſome town, of which the crown was in poſſeſſion, as might be the town of Fluſhing, the Brill, or the like; or for being the means of lending the king's ſhips to a foreign nation, and that againſt thoſe of our own religion; or for revealing his majeſty's higheſt ſecrets, which none above two or three dares know; or for treating the greateſt affairs[a], as it were by his own authority, without formal inſtructions in the points; for having taken rewards; or been corrupted by a foreign prince; or to have broken his inſtructions in any eccleſiaſtical point; or, as the law calleth it, to have committed an overt act of diſloyalty; and not to be charged, after ſeven embaſſages, with diſcourſes and inferences.

Then he deſired their lordſhips, that he might have a copy of his charge in writing, and time allowed him for his anſwer, and counſel aſſigned him to plead his cauſe; and ſaid, there was a great difference between the duke of Buckingham and him; for the duke was accuſed of treaſon and yet at large, and in the king's favour: and he being accuſed but of that which he had long ſince anſwered, was a priſoner: and therefore he moved, that they might be put in equal condition.

And as touching the lord Conway, in as much as he had given in articles againſt him, he deſired his lordſhip, he might not meddle in that particular buſineſs, or uſe the king's name againſt him, ex officio; he alſo beſought their lordſhips to be ſuitors to his majeſty on his behalf, that all the particular diſpatches of his own embaſſages, and ſir Walter Aſton's, might be brought thither, and that he might make uſe of them for his defence, as his evidence: then he deſired their lordſhips, not to think it tedious for him to proceed, and lay open his caſe unto them: which being granted, he began as followeth.

He ſaid, that he had the honour to ſerve the late king his maſter, of happy memory, for the ſpace of twenty years, and a long time as a counſellor, and in ſeven foreign embaſſages: in all which time, in point of his negociacion, he had never received one check or rebuke, until the return of the duke of Buckingham out of Spain; and therefore, from thence he would begin his preſent narration.

The very day that his majeſty departed from Spain, he was pleaſed to tell him, that he had no ways offended him, but did him the honour to truſt him with the cuſtody of the powers for his marriage; and after his return into England, wrote unto him ſome letters, which did in no kind expreſs any diſtruſt or diſpleaſure againſt him. About the ſame time, he wrote unto his majeſty ſeveral letters, as in duty he was bound, not for any earthly reſpect whatſoever, to conceal from him the true eſtate of his affairs; in which letters he ſet down truly and honeſtly, that he conceived, that the diſtaſtes grown there betwixt the king of Spain and his miniſters, and the duke of Buckingham, would diſorder and utterly overthrow all his affairs, if his wiſdom prevented it not; hinc illæ lachrymæ: the duke of Buckingham got a ſight and knowledge of the letters; and fearing, leſt the earl at his return ſhould diſcover unto his ſaid late majeſty, his practices and miſdemeanours in Spain, he reſolved, that his acceſs to the king was no ways to be admitted, and therefore laboured and endeavoured, that he might be committed to the Tower preſently upon his arrival; and conceiving that the lord marquis Hamilton, in regard of his friendſhip with the earl, and the alliance which was then intended between them, might oppoſe his courſe, he earneſtly preſſed him therein, and moved him to deal with my lord chamberlain to the ſame purpoſe, vowing, that there was no hurt intended to the earl, but only that he feared, that if he ſhould be admitted to the king, he would croſs and diſturb the courſe of affairs. But they were ſo honourable, that neither of them would condeſcend thereunto; and ſo that intention of his took no effect.

This deſign of the duke not taking, he fell upon other things, indeed to have frightened the earl out of his country and honour; and thereupon laid ſome great and ſiniſter aſperſions upon him in both houſes of parliament, thinking thereby to have terrified him, that he ſhould not return, ſaying, that if he kept not himſelf where he was, and laid hold of thoſe great offers which he heard were made unto him in Spain, it would be worſe with him.

"Here the earl deſired my lord chamberlain, that he would be pleaſed upon his honour to deliver what he knew of the matter. Whereupon the lord chamberlain atteſted the truth of what the earl had ſaid concerning the duke of Buckingham, the marquis of Hamilton, and himſelf."

Then the earl of Briſtol proceeded and ſaid, that the knowledge of theſe aſperſions caſt upon him in the parliament, came firſt unto him at Bourdeaux in France, where he was coming home at leiſure, in the company of his wife and family, having formerly ſent a poſt on purpoſe to the lord Conway, to know if his ſpeedy return would be any way uſeful to his majeſty's ſervice: who anſwered him, that he might very well return at leiſure with his family. And in the mean time, he was fallen upon by the duke of Buckingham in parliament, in ſuch ſort as your lordſhips well remember, of whoſe declaration, he ſaid, he would boldly affirm unto their lordſhips, that there was ſcarce any one thing concerning him in it, which was not contrary to, or different from the truth.

From Bourdeaux the earl took poſt, making haſte, for that he hoped to clear his honour in parliament before it ſhould break up; and being arrived at Calais, he ſent over to have one of the king's ſhips, for which there was public order given: but although both wind and weather were as fair as could be, and the king's ſhips lay at Boloigne, having carried over count Mansfield, and might every day within three hours have been with him, yet the ſhip came not in eight days expectance; ſo that the earl, fearing the parliament would be diſſolved, was enforced to paſs the ſea in a boat with ſix oars, as he did, having with him thirty or forty thouſand pounds of the king's jewels.

Upon his landing at Dover, hoping that if his arreſt ſhould have been deferred till his coming to London, he might have gotten directly to the king's preſence, which the duke reſolved was by no means to be admitted: the earl was there, by a letter of the lord Conway's, delivered unto him by a ſervant of his, in his majeſty's name, commanded to retire himſelf to his houſe, and not to come to the court, or the king's preſence, until he ſhould have anſwered unto certain queſtions, which his majeſty would appoint ſome of the lords of the council to aſk him. Hereupon he ſent preſently to his

[a] Of all theſe things was the duke of Buckingham accuſed by the public. Rapin.

majeſty, who ſent him word, that his reſtraint was neither for any ill-meaning unto him, nor that it ſhould laſt long, but was intended for his good, to keep the parliament from falling violently upon him. And the ſame reaſon the duke alleged to ſome of his friends; and all thoſe his troubles, which have followed upon his firſt reſtraint, have been procured by the duke's art, under colour of favour. But the earl having received his meſſage from the king, became a moſt humble ſuitor unto his majeſty, that he would expoſe him to the parliament; for that if he had not ſerved him honeſtly in all things, he deſerved no favour, but to be proceeded againſt with all ſeverity. And in this particular he preſſed the king, as far as could ſtand with duty and good manners; but received anſwer from his majeſty, that there ſhould but few more days paſs, before he would put an end to his affairs. And about this time the parliament was diſſolved.

He ſtill continued his ſolicitation to be admitted to the king's preſence, who ſent him word, and confirmed it by oath: That as ſoon as he ſhould have anſwered the queſtions which the commiſſioners were to propound to him, he would both ſee him and hear him, and wondered that he ſhould ſo much doubt thereof. He then ſolicited with all earneſtneſs to have the queſtions ſent unto him, which was promiſed ſhould be within a few days. In the interim, his majeſty being deſirous that the buſineſs ſhould have been accommodated, ſent ſecretly to him by a gentleman (who is ready to depoſe it) this meſſage; "That he ſhould write a fair letter to the duke, and leave the reſt to him." Hereupon the duke ſent a gentleman (one Mr. Clark) with fair propoſitions, offering to procure him whatſoever he could reaſonably pretend; only he muſt not be admitted to the king's preſence for ſome time; and that the duke would have the diſpoſing of his vice chamberlain's place, having been therein formerly engaged. The earl told the gentleman, That to condeſcend to any ſuch courſe were jointly to confeſs himſelf faulty in ſome kind, which he would not do for any reſpect in the world; and let him know the great wrong that the duke had already done him; and therefore it would be more honourable for him to procure him ſome reparation, than to preſs him farther. Moreover, not by way of meſſage, but by way of information of the ſaid Mr. Clark, he let him know, how fit it were for the duke not to preſs theſe things, who could not but be conſcious of his own faults, and know his innocency; and withal ſhewed him a paper that he had made ready for the king, containing the particulars wherein the duke had diſparaged him.

Mr. Clarke making the duke acquainted herewith, the duke wrote a letter the next day to the earl, bearing date 7 Julij, telling him that he had willingly intended the accommodation of his affairs; but by what he had now ſaid to Mr. Clark, he was diſobliged, unleſs he ſhould be pleaſed to relent it. Whereupon the earl anſwered with that directneſs he thought befitting him in point of honour. The courſe of mediation was interrupted, and the duke ſo far incenſed, that he ſwore he would have him queſtioned for his life. In the interim (which the earl deſired might be known to the lords) his late majeſty was ſo far from thinking him a delinquent, or any way diſhoneſt, that he was often heard to ſay and ſwear, That he held him an honeſt man, and that he would anſwer for him, that he had neither committed felony nor treaſon. And this divers are ready to depoſe. The which he well confirmed, for that he gave general leave to all gentlemen of the court, privy counſellors, and to his ſecretary of ſtate, to have free acceſs unto him; yea even ſo far as to admit of viſits and intercourſes with Spaniſh embaſſadors, and the Paedre Maeſtre, as is beſt known to my lord Conway, by whoſe letter he received his majeſty's leave in that particular.

Then he reſumed the ſtate of his buſineſs where he left it, which was in the hands of the commiſſioners, and they were to frame interrogatories for him; the which, although they had promiſed ſhould be ſent within a few days, yet ſuch art was uſed, that ſix or ſeven weeks were ſpent in the framing of them, to the end that his majeſty's progreſs beginning, there might be no means for the farther clearing of the buſineſs: and ſo ſuppoſing that for the anſwering of the twenty interrogatories of ſo high a nature, the earl would take ſome time, they cauſed the ſaid interrogatories to be delivered unto him within a few days before the beginning of the progreſs; but he uſed ſo much diligence, that he made ready to anſwer in perſona, though it were in the nature of a delinquent. Unto which his majeſty anſwered moſt graciouſly, That out of his favour, and for that he would not do him wrong, he would not admit of it, but that he would ſend his anſwer, and he would inſtantly put an end to his buſineſſes; as will appear by letters. Hereupon the duke was put into a great ſtrait how to keep him any longer from his majeſty, but deſired that only a few queſtions more might be aſked of him; which the king upon great urging and inſtance, condeſcended unto, ſo that the queſtions might be preſently ſent him: But herein were ſuch artifices uſed, that the bringing of any was delayed until the king had begun his progreſs; and then within a day or two, the lord Conway ſent him word, that he had orders indeed for the ſending of him ſome more queſtions, but out of his affection to him he forbore the ſending of them, unleſs he ſhould preſs for them. Whereupon the earl inſtantly wrote unto him, that they might be ſent unto him. My lord Conway made him anſwer by his letter, that he wiſhed rather the courſe of mediation might be purſued, for that would but further exaſperate; but if he would needs have the queſtions they ſhould be ſent to him. Whereupon he ſent to ſolicit his lordſhip for them with all earneſtneſs, inſomuch as to petition his late majeſty twice, that the ſaid queſtions might be ſent: but when the turn was ſerved of keeping him from the king's preſence, the ſaid queſtions were never more heard of till this day.

So likewiſe the earl having ſent his anſwer to all the commiſſioners, who moſt of them made not nice to declare, that they were fully ſatisfied; and when it was perceived that the commiſſioners would certainly clear him, and that he thereby ſhould be reſtored unto his majeſty's favour, they were never more permitted to meet: a proceeding, which, as he conceived, their lordſhips would think hardly to be paralleled, that a commiſſion ſhould be appointed to condemn, if there had been cauſe, but not to clear.

After the progreſs was ended, he began again to ſolicit his majeſty, and wrote particularly unto the duke of Buckingham. Whereupon the duke was pleaſed to ſend four or five propoſitions, which he deſired he ſhould acknowledge; the which propoſitions contained nothing but what hath been already propounded and ſatisfied in the former interrogatories: and if he would make his acknowledgment, he then promiſed to imploy his force and power with the king and prince, that he ſhould be admitted to kiſs their hands, and be received into their gracious favour; but otherwiſe, in a menacing ſort, that he ſhould lay his hands upon his breaſt, and ſo that would be beſt for him. And in the preface of the ſaid propoſitions, he writeth theſe words which follow, "It is an aſſertion not granted, that the earl of Briſtol, by his anſwer hath ſatisfied either the king, the prince, or me, of his innocency." A preſumptuous commination for any ſubject.

But theſe propoſitions were ſo unjuſt, that he wrote unto the duke, that inſtead of an acknowledgment, he had ſent him an anſwer unto them; unto which, if either himſelf, or any man living was able to reply, he would ſubmit himſelf to any thing that ſhould be demanded. But this no way ſatisfied the duke, although it did his late majeſty, who, in the duke's preſence, ſaid, "I were to be accounted a tyrant, to enjoin an innocent man to confeſs faults, of which he was not guilty." And thereupon ſent him word, that he ſhould make his anſwer, but acknowledge nothing he was not faulty in. And although he had received this meſſage from the king's own mouth, as will be depoſed, yet the duke at the ſame time wrote unto him, that the concluſion of all that has been treated with his majeſty, was, that he ſhould make the acknowledgment in ſuch manner, as was ſet down in this paper. And at this time likewiſe it was that his majeſty ſent him word, that he would hear him concerning the duke of Buckingham, as well as he had heard the duke concerning him. And this was not long before his majeſty's ſickneſs: and in the interim, as he had heard by ſeveral ways the king ſuffered much, and was infinitely preſſed by the duke concerning the ſaid earl and his affairs; and this he ſaid, was the ſuffering he had ſpoken of to their lordſhips the other day.

The earl craved leave of their lordſhips to ſpecify ſome other particulars, whereby it ſhould appear, that his majeſty was in no kind ill-opinioned of him till his dying day, viz. That ſeveral perſons will depoſe, that they have heard his majeſty ſay, that he eſteemed him an honeſt man; and that he was pleaſed to accept of toys by way of preſent from him, graciouſly, and in good part; and at laſt was likewiſe pleaſed to give him leave to come to London, and to follow his own affairs; and that his pleaſure was ſignified unto him by the duke his own letter. Whereupon he determined to come to London, intimating to the duke his intention of going to his lodgings in Whitehall; but the duke was therewith incenſed again, and ſaid, he miſtook the king's meaning, which was, that he might privately follow his own buſineſs. And this he ſaid, was the true ſtate and conditions when it pleaſed God to take unto his mercy his late moſt gracious majeſty.

Upon his majeſty's coming to the crown, he ſaid, he wrote a moſt humble letter unto his majeſty, imploring his grace and goodneſs, and deſiring the duke's mediation. But he was pleaſed to anſwer by his letter of 7 May 1625, that the reſolution was to proceed againſt him, without a plain and direct confeſſion of the point which he had formerly required him to acknowledge; and in a courtly manner of menace telleth him, that he would take the freedom to adviſe him, to bethink himſelf in time what would be moſt for his good. But in the interim, his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed that his writ of parliament ſhould be ſent him; and thereupon he wrote unto the duke of the receipt of the ſaid writ, but that he ſhould do nothing but what he ſhould underſtand to be moſt agreeable to his majeſty's pleaſure. Whereunto the duke anſwered in his letter of May, in this manner: "I have acquainted his majeſty with your requeſt towards him, touching our ſummons to the parliament, which he taketh very well, and would have you rather make excuſe for your abſence, notwithſtanding your writ, than to come yourſelf in perſon." Whereupon he ſent humbly to deſire a letter of leave under his majeſty's hand for his warrant; but inſtead thereof, he received from the lord Conway an abſolute prohibition, and to reſtrain and confine him in ſuch ſort, as he hath been in the late king's time: and although he was indeed abſolutely ſet free, he could never get cleared by the lord Conway, though he ſent him all the papers to examine; and when he could make no farther reply, he ſaid, he conceived he was under reſtraint, and that his liberty expired with the late king's death; when indeed reſtraint may expire, but liberty is natural. After this he continued for the ſpace of three quarters of a year in the country without moving, in which time he was removed from thoſe places and offices he held during his late majeſty's life; and the greateſt part of his eſtate being laid out in their majeſties ſervice, by their particular appointment, he could never be admitted ſo much as to the clearing of accompts. Yet hereof he never made the leaſt complaint: but againſt the time of his majeſty's coronation, he thought it fit to lay hold of that occaſion, when princes do acts of grace and favour, to be a moſt humble ſuitor to his majeſty for his grace and goodneſs; and addreſſed his letters unto the duke of Buckingham, from whom he received a letter all written in his own hand, and therein a letter incloſed from his majeſty, ſo different from ſome gracious meſſage which he had received from his majeſty ſince the ſaid earl returned into England, upon the occaſion of a great ſickneſs, and likewiſe from his ſpeeches ſeveral times delivered to his wife, to wit, that he had never offended him, and that for his faults he no ways held them criminal, but to be expiated by any eaſy acknowledgment; that he confeſſed he knew not what judgment to make of the ſaid letter, neither hath preſumed hitherto to make any anſwer thereto; although by reducing the occaſion of ſpeeches and circumſtances to his majeſty's memory, he no ways doubteth but he ſhall be able to give unto his majeſty ſuch ſatisfaction to every particular, that his majeſty would not remain with the leaſt ſcruple in any one point.

After this, he ſaid, that his writ of parliament was detained; whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to the lord keeper, that he would be a ſuitor to his majeſty for him in that behalf: which diligences not taking effect, by petition he became a ſuitor to their lordſhips for their honourable mediation to his majeſty, and thereupon his writ of parliament was awarded; but the duke of Buckingham upon that took occaſion, as he had publiſhed copies of the ſaid letter over all the kingdom, to read it likewiſe unto that honourable houſe, as was beſt known to their lordſhips, and the writ was accompanied with a prohibition from the lord keeper; whereupon he addreſſed himſelf for juſtice to that honourable houſe (being poſſeſſed of his cauſe by his petition), for both redreſs of his own wrongs, and likewiſe of complaints againſt the duke for many crimes. And that honourable houſe being poſſeſſed of his cauſe by his petition, there is preferred againſt him a ſucceeding complaint, amounting as high as treaſon (as it is pretended) although he for divers years hath not been queſtioned; yet ſince his complaint againſt the duke, he hath been fetched up like a priſoner, and brought into the houſe as a delinquent; and the duke, of whom he hath complained for his great crimes, is admitted ſtill to ſit in the houſe as one of his judges. The which, with all that he hath formerly ſaid, together with his life, fortunes and honour, he did with all willingneſs, humility, and duty, ſubmit to the juſtice and honour of that houſe.

Then the lords aſked him, when he would bring in his anſwer? He promiſed to anſwer as ſoon as might be, but knew not how far he ſhould have occaſion to uſe his ancient diſpatches. The lord keeper told him, that Mr. Attorney might help him by letting him know it. The Attorney ſaid, that his charge ſhould in nothing look further back than to the year 1621, which he deſired might be recorded.

Whereupon the earl thanking their lordſhips for their patience, he was carried away by Mr. Maxwell the gentleman-uſher, in whoſe houſe and cuſtody he remainded.

Then were read the earl's articles againſt the duke and the lord Conway; viz.

Articles of the earl of Briſtol, whereby he chargeth the duke of Buckingham, bearing date the 1ſt day of May 1626.

I. THAT the duke of Buckingham did ſecretly combine with the condé of Gondomar, embaſſador for the king of Spain, before his, the ſaid embaſſador's, laſt return into Spain, in the ſummer, anno 1622, to carry his majeſty (then prince) into Spain, to the end he might be informed and inſtructed in the Roman religion, and thereby have perverted the prince, and ſubverted the true religion eſtabliſhed in England: from which miſery this kingdom (next under God's mercy) hath, by the wiſe, religious, and conſtant carriage of his majeſty, been almoſt miraculouſly delivered, conſidering the many bold and ſubtle attempts of the ſaid duke in that kind.

II. That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and ſent into Spain; and ſuch meſſages at his return framed, as might ſerve for a ground to ſet on foot this conſpiracy: the which was done accordingly, and thereby the king and prince highly abuſed, and their conſents thereby firſt gotten to the ſaid journey, that is to ſay, after the return of the ſaid Mr. Porter, which was about the end of December, or the beginning of January 1622, whereas the ſaid duke had plotted it many months before.

III. That the ſaid duke, at his arrival in Spain, nouriſhed the Spaniſh miniſters, not only in the belief of his own being popiſhly affected, but did (both by abſenting himſelf from all exerciſes of religion, conſtantly uſed in the earl of Briſtol's houſe, and frequented by all other proteſtant Engliſh, and by conforming himſelf to pleaſe the Spaniards in divers rites of their religion, even ſo far as to kneel and adore their ſacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the prince his converſion: the which converſion, he endeavoured to procure by all means poſſible; and thereby cauſe the Spaniſh miniſters to propound far worſe conditions for religion, than had been formerly by the earl of Briſtol, and ſir Walter Aſton, ſettled and ſigned under their majeſty's hands, with a clauſe in the king of Spain's anſwer of December 12, 1622, that they held the articles agreed upon ſufficient, and ſuch as ought to induce the pope to the granting of the diſpenſation.

IV. That the duke of Buckingham having ſeveral times in the preſence of the earl of Briſtol, moved and preſſed his late majeſty, at the inſtance of the condé of Gondomar, to write a letter unto the pope; and to that purpoſe having once brought a letter ready drawn, wherewith the earl of Briſtol, by his majeſty's being made acquainted, did ſo ſtrongly oppoſe the writing of any ſuch letter, that during the abode of the ſaid earl of Briſtol in England, the ſaid duke could not obtain it; yet not long after the earl was gone, he procured ſuch a letter to be written from his ſaid late majeſty unto the pope, and to have him ſtiled [Sanctiſſime Pater.]

V. That the pope being informed of the duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of religion, ſent unto the ſaid duke a particular bull in parchment, for to perſuade and encourage him in the perverſion of his majeſty then prince.

VI. That the ſaid duke's behaviour in Spain was ſuch, that he thereby ſo incenſed the king of Spain and his miniſters, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor further dealing with him. Whereupon the ſaid duke, ſeeing that the match would be now to his diſadvantage, endeavoured to break it, not for any ſervice to the kingdom, nor diſlike of the match in itſelf, nor for that he found (as ſince he had pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the ſaid match, but out of his particular ends, and his indignation.

VII. That after he intended to croſs the marriage, he put in practice divers undue courſes; as namely, making uſe of the letters of his majeſty (then prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as likewiſe concealing divers things of high importance from his late majeſty, and thereby overthrew his majeſty's purpoſes, and advanced his own ends.

VIII. That the ſaid duke, as he had with his ſkill and artifices formerly abuſed their majeſties, ſo to the ſame end he afterwards abuſed both houſes of parliament, by his ſiniſter relation of the carriage of affairs, as ſhall be made appear almoſt in every particular, that he ſpake unto the ſaid houſes.

IX. As for ſcandal given by his perſonal behaviour, as alſo the employing of his power with the king of Spain for the procuring of favours and offices which he beſtowed upon baſe and unworthy perſons, for the recompence and heir of his luſt; luſt: theſe things, as neither fit for the earl of Briſtol to ſpeak, nor indeed for the houſe to hear, he leaveth to your lordſhips wiſdom, how far you will be pleaſed to have them examined; it having been indeed a great infamy and diſhonour to this nation, that a perſon of the duke's great quality and employments, a privy counſellor, and embaſſador, eminent in his maſter's favour, and ſolely truſted with the perſon of the prince, ſhould leave behind him in a foreign court ſo much ſcandal as he did by his ill behaviour.

X. That the duke hath been in great part the cauſe of the ruin and misfortune of the prince Palatine, and his eſtates, inaſmuch as thoſe affairs had relation unto this kingdom.

XI. That the duke of Buckingham hath in his relations to both houſes of parliament, wronged the earl of Briſtol in point of his honour, by many ſiniſter aſperſions which he hath laid upon him, and in point of his liberty by many undue courſes, through his power and practices.

XII. That the earl of Briſtol did reveal unto his late majeſty, both by word and letter, in what ſort the ſaid duke had diſſerved him, and abuſed his truſt: and that the king by ſeveral ways ſent him word, that he ſhould reſt aſſured, he would hear the ſaid earl, but that he ſhould leave it to him to take his own time. And thereupon, a few days before his ſickneſs, he ſent the earl word, that he would hear him againſt the ſaid duke, as well as he had heard the ſaid duke againſt him. Which the duke himſelf heard; and not long after his bleſſed majeſty ſickened and died, having been in the interim much vexed and preſſed by the ſaid duke.

Articles of the earl of Briſtol againſt the lord Conway, bearing date 1 Maij 1626.

I. THAT the lord Conway is ſo great a ſervant of the duke of Buckingham's, that he hath not ſtuck to ſend the earl of Briſtol plain word, that if buſineſſes could not be accommodated betwixt him and the duke, he muſt then adhere and declare himſelf for the ſaid duke; and therefore unfit to be a judge in any thing that concerneth the duke or the earl.

II. That the ſaid lord Conway profeſſeth himſelf to be a ſecretary of the duke of Buckingham's creation, and ſo acknowledgeth it under his own hand: and although that he be the king's ſecretary of ſtate, and a privy counſellor, he uſually beginneth his letters to the duke [Moſt gracious patron.]

III. That as a creature of the ſaid duke's, the ſaid lord Conway hath been made the inſtrument of keeping the earl of Briſtol from the king's preſence, and of impriſoning of him by warrants only under his own hand; for which he cannot (as the earl conceiveth) produce any ſufficient warrant.

IV. That by the ſpace of twelve months laſt paſt, the ſaid lord Conway hath been the cauſe of the earl's reſtraint, only by miſinforming his majeſty, and procuring a letter of reſtraint upon undue grounds: and when it was made apparent unto him, that the ſaid earl was reſtored to his liberty, freely to follow his own affairs, by his late majeſty of bleſſed memory, he replied, that that liberty given him by his majeſty expired with the king's death.

V. That the earl of Briſtol's mother lying ſick upon her death-bed, deſired for her comfort to ſee her ſon, and to give him her laſt bleſſing: whereupon the earl writ to the lord Conway, to deſire him to move the king for his leave: which he putting off from day to day, told the perſon employed, that by reaſon of the duke's ſickneſs, he could not find opportunity to get the duke's leave to move the king: and having ſpoken with the duke, he made a negative anſwer in the king's name. Whereupon when the earl acquainted the king by ſome of his bed chamber, his majeſty was in a very great anger, ſwearing the ſecretary had never moved him, and that to deny the ſaid earl leave, was a barbarous part; and thereupon ſent him preſently free leave, which the ſecretary hearing of, ſent afterwards a letter of leave, but with divers clauſes and limitations, differing from the leave ſent him from the king's own mouth.

VI. That the having the buſineſſes of the earl of Briſtol in his own hands, and the earl being commanded by the king to addreſs himſelf in his occaſions unto his lordſhip, he would never deliver any meſſage from the ſaid earl, without acquainting the ſaid duke, and receiving his directions, and in a noble manner of freeneſs, ſtuck not to ſend him word.

VII. That the earl of Briſtol having received from the lord Conway twenty interrogatories in his late majeſty's name, drawn up by a commiſſion of the lords appointed to ſearch into the proceedings and employments of the ſaid earl, in which ſearch there was more than two months ſpent, divers of the ſaid interrogatories involving felony and treaſon; and his majeſty having been pleaſed to aſſure the ſaid earl, both by meſſage and letters, that upon ſatisfaction given to himſelf and the commiſſioners by his anſwers, he would preſently put an end to the earl of Briſtol's buſineſs. The earl of Briſtol having ſo fully anſwered, as would admit of no reply; and that many of the commiſſioners declared themſelves to be fully ſatisfied: the ſaid lord Conway (being the ſecretary in the commiſſion, to whom it properly belonged to call the lords to aſſemble) perceiving the earl of Briſtol was like to be cleared, never moved for any further meeting, neither have they ever been permitted to meet until this day, whereby the troubles of the earl of Briſtol have been kept on foot till this preſent, and the ſaid earl's impriſonment hath been enlarged twenty months. And by the artifices of the ſaid duke of Buckingham and the ſaid lord Conway (as ſhall be made appear), the ſaid earl hath been inſenſibly involved and ſtaulked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your lorſhips will judge to be a very conſiderable caſe.

VIII. That for a colour of keeping the earl from his late majeſty's preſence, it being pretended, after the anſwer to the twenty interrogatories, that there were ſome few queſtions more to be added, whereunto when he ſhould have anſwered, his majeſty ſwore ſolemnly, that without any delay he ſhould be admitted to his preſence, and that within two or three days he ſhould have the ſaid queſtions ſent unto him; the lord Conway, notwithſtanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his majeſty's directions for the ſending of the ſaid articles, and was often thereunto ſolicited on the behalf of the ſaid earl, would never ſend the ſaid queſtions, and at laſt anſwered, that he had no more to do with the earl's buſineſſes.

IX. That the earl of Briſtol being ſet free by his late majeſty to come to London, to follow his own affairs as he pleaſed, and thereupon having his writ of parliament ſent unto him, without any letter of prohibition; but the earl of Briſtol, out of his great deſire to conform all his actions to that which he ſhould underſtand would beſt pleaſe his majeſty, ſent to know, whether his going or ſtay would be moſt agreeable unto his majeſty? Who was pleaſed to anſwer by a letter from my lord duke of Buckingham, that he took in very good part the ſaid earl's reſpect unto him; but wiſhed him to make ſome excuſe for the preſent: the which accordingly he did, and moved, that he might have a letter under the king's hand to warrant his abſence; but under colour of this letter of leave, upon the earl of Briſtol's own motion and deſire, the lord Conway ſent a letter from his majeſty, abſolutely forbidding his coming to parliament, and therein likewiſe was inſerted a clauſe, that the earl ſhould remain reſtrained as he was in the time of his late majeſty; and ſo thereby a colour of reſtraint under his majeſty's hand was gotten, which could never be procured in his late majeſty's time; whereby the earl of Briſtol hath been unduly reſtrained ever ſince, without being able to procure any redreſs, or to make the lord Conway willing to underſtand his caſe, although he ſent him all the papers whereby he might clearly ſee that the earl was not under reſtraint in his late majeſty's time; but never other anſwer could be procured from him, but that he judged the ſaid earl to be under reſtraint, and that his liberty was expired by the late king's death, as is aforeſaid.

X. That the lord Conway, knowing that the match for the marrying of the king of Bohemia's eldeſt ſon with the emperor's daughter, and being bred in the emperor's court, was allowed and propounded by his late majeſty: and that his majeſty, by his letters unto his ſon-in-law, declareth, that he thinketh it the faireſt and cleareſt way for the accommodation of his affairs, and that he will take ſufficient care for his breeding in true religion. And notwithſtanding that the ſaid earl received a copy of the ſaid letter by the ſaid king's order, with other papers, ſetting down all that had been done in the ſaid buſineſs, and his majeſty's aſſent thereunto from the lord Conway himſelf; yet hath he ſuffered all to be charged as a crime againſt the earl of Briſtol, both in the twentieth interrogatory, and in his majeſty's laſt letter, that he ſhould conſent to the breeding of the young prince in the emperor's court. And further, in the interrogatory he allegeth, it is an aggravation againſt the ſaid earl, that the breeding of the ſaid prince in the emperor's court, inferred to the perverſion of his religion, when he knew that the ſaid breeding was never thought nor ſpoken of by the king, nor any other, but with that expreſs clauſe and condition, that he ſhould be bred in his own religion, and have ſuch tutors and ſervants as his father ſhould appoint.

XI. That the lord Conway had been the cauſe of all the earl of Briſtol's troubles, by his dubious and intrapping diſpatches, and inferring, that the ſaid earl hath failed in his directions, when it ſhall be made appear, that his diſpatches contained no ſuch directions as he hath alleged were given.

The houſe not being ſatisfied to commit the earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the gentlemantleman-uſher; and further ordered, that the king's charge againſt the earl of Briſtol be firſt heard, and then the charge of the ſaid earl againſt the duke; yet ſo, that the earl's teſtimony againſt the duke be not prevented, prejudiced, or impeached.

The day following, the lord keeper delivered a meſſage from the king to the houſe of lords.

A meſſage from the king to the houſe of lords.

"THAT his majeſty taketh notice of the articles exhibited againſt the duke of Buckingham by the earl of Briſtol: and he obſerveth that many of them are ſuch, as himſelf is able to ſay more of his own knowledge than any man, for the duke's ſincere carriage in them: that one of them, touching the narrative made in parliament in the one and twentieth of king James, trencheth as far upon himſelf as the duke; for that his majeſty went as far as the duke in that declaration; and that all of them have been cloſed in the earl's own breaſt now for theſe two years, contrary to his duty, if he had known any crime of that nature by the duke; and now he vents it by way of recrimination againſt the duke, whom he knows to be a principal witneſs to prove his majeſty's charge.

"And therefore, that his majeſty gave them thanks, that they gave no way to the earl of Briſtol's unreaſonable motion, of putting the duke under the ſame reſtraint that they had put the earl, thereby eſchewing what the earl aimeth at, to alter their dutiful proceedings towards his majeſty: that thereby they had made his majeſty confident, that as they have, ſo they will put a difference between his majeſty's charge, againſt one that appeareth as a delinquent, and the recrimination of the earl of Briſtol againſt his majeſty's witneſs; and they will not equal them by a proceeding pari paſſu."

In the mean time, the king not being very ſure of the lords, endeavoured to take the earl's cauſe out of the upper houſe, and to proceed by way of indictment in the King's-Bench: but the lords would not conſent to it, for which they alleged ſeveral reaſons, that were confirmed by the judges, who declared, "That a peer of the realm, impeached for treaſon, was to be tried in parliament.

The upper houſe being willing to ſecure the earl of Briſtol from being over-powered by the duke of Buckingham's exhorbitant authority, aſked the judges opinion upon the two following queſtions:

"1. Whether the king could be a witneſs in caſe of treaſon?

"2. Admitting that he could, yet whether he might be ſo in the preſent caſe, i. e. when the king is the informer?"

Before the judges brought in their anſwer, this meſſage and command came from the king to them, That in this general queſtion they ſhould not deliver any opinion, but if any point came in particular, they, upon mature deliberation, might give their advice.

About the middle of May, the earl of Briſtol gave in his anſwer to the articles brought againſt him; upon the delivering of which, he made the following ſpeech:

The earl of Briſtol's ſpeech, by way of introduction, before he gave in his anſwer.

"I AM not inſenſible upon what diſadvantages I come to trial in this cauſe: for firſt, I am fallen into his majeſty's heavy diſpleaſure, and am to encounter with a potent adverſary, highly in favour, and am accuſed for treaſon; for which all counſel and friends abandon me, as a man infected with the plague; I am become bound and under reſtraint; whereas a man who is to encounter for his life and honour, and with a ſtrong adverſary, had need to come upon equal terms.

"But as to the matter, I find myſelf charged with divers articles of high treaſon; but looking into them with the eyes of my beſt underſtanding, with the opinion alſo of my counſel lately aſſigned me, and taking them apart one article from another, I find not any thing in them like treaſon, or that hath ſo much as the ſhew or countenance of a fault, either in act or words; only by laying all things together, and by wreſting the wreſts with a ſtrained conſtruction, directly contrary to the true ſenſe and meaning of them, and the occaſion whereupon they were ſpoken, it is informed, and that by the way of inference only, that the intent was evil, and the matter to prove the intent to be evil, depends upon two props, viz. ill-affection to religion, and too much affection to Spain; which if I ſhall clear, the inference grounded upon theſe props will fall of itſelf.

"Therefore I crave leave of your lordſhips, before I give my anſwer to the charge, that I may give you an account of theſe two particulars; and I humbly beſeech you that what I ſhall ſpeak in my juſt defence, may not be conceived to proceed of vain oſtentation.

"And firſt for religion: I was in my childhood bred in the proteſtant religion, and rather after the ſtricter manner than otherwiſe. When I grew in years fit, I travelled into France, Italy, and Rome itſelf: in all which travels, I can produce ſome that I conſorted withal, who will witneſs with me, that I ever conſtantly uſed the religion I profeſſed without the leaſt prevarication, no man being able to charge me that ſo much as out of curioſity I ever was preſent at any of the exerciſes belonging to the Roman religion, or did the leaſt act of conformity to any of their rights or ceremonies.

"Secondly, after my return home, I was received into the ſervice of his late majeſty, of bleſſed memory, whom I ſerved ſome years as a gentleman of his privy chamber, and carver, in which time none of his majeſty's ſervants received the holy ſacrament, frequented ſermons, and other exerciſes of our religion, more than I.

"Thirdly, in that time of my youth, not to avoid idleneſs, but out of affection to religion, I tranſlated that excellent book of our faith, and great points of our religion, written by monſieur Moulins; which his late majeſty having ſometimes after ſeen, approved ſo well, that he would needs have it printed; which accordingly was printed in the name of Mr. Sampford my chaplain, to whom I gave the honour: but it was my own act, as Mr. Sampford will not deny, though to this hour I never had before ſpoken it.

"Fourthly, about ſeven or eight and twenty years of my age, I was employed embaſſador into Spain, in that great buſineſs of the treaty of the marriage; and whereas others before me carried with them but one chaplain, I had two, viz. Mr. Sampford and Mr. Boſwel; and at my arrival at the court of Spain, I cauſed it to be publiſhed, that ſuch a day (God willing) I propoſed to have a communion, to the end that ſuch Engliſh as were in the town, might reſort thither. Whereat the duke de Lerma, and other the great miniſters of Spain, took offence, and told me, they might well perceive I brought no good affection to the buſineſs I came about, that would ſo publicly and avowedly in that court, where never the like was done, proclaim there a communion; and with high expreſſions perſuaded me to decline it. Whereunto I anſwered, I came to do my maſter's ſervice which I would heartily and effectually endeavour, but would not omit my ſervice to God, no though by my maſter commanded. And at the communion there were preſent one hundred perſons, ſome of them brothers, kinſmen, and near dependants upon ſome of their lordſhips, whom I ſee there in my eye. This I did in Spain; the like I did in Germany, in the emperor's courts, in my embaſſage thither.

"Fifthly, I had in my ſeveral employments into Spain and Germany, above five hundred perſons of all qualities attending upon me, and never one perverted in religion; my children carefully inſtructed and bred in the ſame religion. I had conſtantly every Sabbath a ſermon in my houſe; and ſacraments, and other exerciſes of our religion frequented.

"Sixthly, a foul-mouthed Shimei railed againſt our late king and religion in Spain; how I cauſed that to be revenged by a near kinſman of my own, is well known.

"Seventhly, one of the Engliſh dying in the town of Madrid, of whoſe religion there was ſome queſtion made; and the king's chaplains telling me, that they at the day of his death had been with him, and taken an account of his faith, and that he died a proteſtant: I cauſed him to be brought home to my houſe, and there buried according to our rites; whereat much ado was made, and it was threatened, that the inquiſitors and other officers, would come and fetch him out, and bury him after their manner; I ſtood upon it, and that it was the king of England's houſe, and openly proteſted, that whoſoever ſhould come thither with ſuch intent, I would ſhoot him with a piece; and exhorted all my people, that if ſuch an attempt ſhould be, they ſhould rather, than ſuffer ſuch a diſhonour to our religion, die with me in that quarrel, and hoped ſuch Engliſh as were in the town would do the like.

"Eighthly, there having been a monaſtery for Engliſh jeſuits founded and ſettled at Madrid before my coming thither, and the Engliſh arms ſet up, I laboured to ſuppreſs it, and having written thereof to the late king, his majeſty adviſed me not to run my head againſt the rock, for it was an impoſſible thing for me to do: yet I undertook it, and it pleaſed God to bleſs my endeavours, that I abſolutely diſſolved and overthrew it. For which the biſhop of Wincheſter, Montague (now with God), wrote unto me by his majeſty's direction, a letter of his majeſty's gracious acceptance of ſo great a ſervice; telling me, beſides the ſervice I had had done to the church and common wealth, it ſhould remain a trophy of honour to me and my poſterity for ever: and the king himſelf, with his own hand, wrote unto me, beginning his letter, "Good fortune Digby, your good luck in your ſervice well deſerves that ſtyle."

"Ninthly, in all negociations in Spain, in point of religion, I ever ſtraitened my inſtructions.

"Tenthly, the match with Spain, was not moved by me; I ever adviſed a proteſtant match, and ſhewed many reaſons, both of conſcience and ſtate; but if with a catholic, then rather with Spain than France, ſo as good conditions might be made for religion; as appears by a letter I wrote, and delivered to the prince, at his firſt going upon the employment; for which I had like then to have been ruined for being a puritan, as I am now for being a papiſt, and all by one and the ſame hand.

"Eleventhly, and I appeal to the teſtimony of Dr. Maſon and Dr. Wren, the king's chaplains with me in Spain; and to Mr. Sampford, Mr. Boſwel, and Mr. Frewin, my own chaplains there. And that ſuch papiſts as have been my ancient acquaintance and friends, being men of worth, well known to many of their lordſhips, may be examined upon oath, whether I have not in all places, as well in Spain as in England, and at all times upon fit occaſions, avowed myſelf a proteſtant, without the leaſt prevarication? Or whether I did ever any the leaſt act that was not ſuitable to the ſame profeſſion? And that Mr. Frewin, and Mr. Wake, my own chaplains, may give their teſtimonies, whether in the time of ſeveral dangerous ſickneſſes, which I had of late years fallen into, I have not in the time of ſuch my ſickneſſes (when no man can be ſuppoſed to diſſemble with the world, being ready to leave it) made before them a confeſſion of my faith, and made my peace with God, reſolving to die as befitted a proteſtant, and a good chriſtian. This I tell your lordſhips was the religion I was bred in, have ever profeſſed and lived in, and was reſolved by God's grace to die in; and and yet was ſo unhappy, by reaſon of employment, to be diſtaſteful to many good men, that I have been ſuſpected even by them, not well knowing me: and this hath been the riſe the duke hath now taken againſt me. Then for my love to Spain, I wonder from whence that opinion ſhould grow, ſince I was there hated and ſhamed, as the man whom of all others, they deſired to have the leaſt to do withal, having ſtood ever ſtricter in point of religion, than by my inſtructions I might have done; as after the capitulation concluded on, they underſtood by ſome intelligence, which cauſed their hatred towards me.

"Sure I am, I ſhewed it not by the ſervice I did them; for divers years together there was not a letter ſent by that king to any other ſtate, that the king my maſter had not a copy of before, or by that time it came to the place whether it was directed. There was not any great action on foot, whereof I had not the private inſtructions, and ſent them hither: not any expedition by ſea or land, wherein I had not ſome miniſters or intelligencers, that gave me from time to time advertiſements of their actions, and moſt private intentions, whereof I advertiſed his majeſty from time to time. I uſed ſuch induſtry, as to get all the papers of that king's private cabinet into my hands: took copies and notes of ſuch of them as I thought uſeful, and upon every of them ſet my private mark before they were conveyed back again, to the end, that if I ſhould have had an occaſion to have charged him with any thing mentioned in the ſame papers, I might have let him ſee I knew it, by telling him what paper it was, and marked with ſuch a mark.

"There was not a port in Spain, that I had not cauſed the depth of it to be ſounded; nor a fort whereof I knew not the ſtrength, both for the garriſon, munition, and other matters of advantage and diſadvantage; inſomuch as if it ſhould pleaſe the king to appoint a committee of the lords to take an account of me, I ſhould, by the ſtores I gathered there, and brought with me, make it appear, I was as uſeful a ſervant to his majeſty in a war, as in a peace. Whereas at his majeſty's coming out of Spain, the powers of the deſponſories were to be depoſited in ſome man's hands; and the duke, upon pretence of doing me honour, but intending to break my neck by it, moved they might be left with me, and the king of Spain was contented; and ſo they were put into my hands, not as an attorney only for the prince: but the king of Spain having taken the ſubſtitution of them by his ſecretary of ſtate, entered in a legal form; whereby that king was then become intereſted in them by their occupation, as well as the prince by granting of them. And becoming the inſtrumentum ſtipulatum, wherein they were both intereſted, they were depoſited in my hands, as an indifferent perſon, truſted between the king of Spain and the prince, with a declaration of the truſt. And now the duke was returned out of Spain, he plotted my ruin, and put it in execution in this manner: He concealed that the powers were to expire at Chriſtmaſs, and procured his majeſty to write a letter, (not a direct command) but expreſſing a deſire that the deſponſories ſhould not be till one of the days in Chriſtmaſs, intending thereby to draw me into a dilemma, that if I proceeded in the match, this letter ſhould, as now it is, have been enforced againſt me, as a breach of inſtructions: if I had not proceeded, then I had broken my truſt between the prince and king of Spain, overthrown the marriage ſo long ſought and laboured, it being the main ſcope of my embaſſage, contrary to expreſs warrant, and that upon a letter I muſt needs know to be a miſtake. And when I had written into England, to have a direct warrant in the point, the duke then ſeeing that plot would not take, he dealt with divers great lords, as well known to ſome of their lordſhips there preſent, to have me, upon my arrival in England, committed to the Tower, before I ſhould ever come to ſpeak with the king; which the Spaniſh embaſſador here in England, having gotten private notice of, gave advertiſement thereof to that king; who thereupon foreſeeing my danger, and conſulting with his council and divines, what were fit for him in honour and conſcience to do in that caſe, they reſolved, that ſeeing my ſufferings grew by being an honeſt man, and endeavouring to perform the truſt repoſed in me by that king as well as the prince; that king was bound both in honour and conſcience, not only to preſerve me from ruin, but to make me reparation for any loſs I ſhould ſuſtain by occaſion of the truſt: whereupon, at my departure going to court to take my leave, the condé Olivares told me what was plotted againſt me in England; and in reſpect of the danger, by reaſon of the greatneſs of my adverſary, perſuaded me to ſtay there, and in his maſter's name made an offer, not in ſecret, but in the preſence of ſir Walter Aſton."

Here the earl of Briſtol explained wherein thoſe offers conſiſted, namely, in a blank ſigned by the king of Spain, wherein the earl might ſet down his own conditions, both in point of title and fortune. But all this he refuſed, as well as a large ſum of money offered by the king. Then the earl concluded in the following manner:

"Upon what grounds and hope came I to encounter with thoſe dangers? Not upon hope of my greatneſs in court, and ſtrength of friends there to boulſter out an ill cauſe; no ſure, my ſtrength was too weak, and my adverſaries too powerful. But I knew my conſcience was clear, and my cauſe good, and truſt in God Almighty. And to him now, and to their lordſhips judgments, recommend myſelf and my cauſe."

The anſwer of the earl of Briſtol to the articles of accuſation brought againſt him by his majeſty's attorney general.

I. THE firſt article he denieth; and becauſe the matters contained in the ſaid article conſiſt of ſeveral parts, viz. the loſs of the ſaid Palatinate, and the match with the ſaid lady of Spain, and of the ſeveral employments, as of one extraordinary embaſſage to the emperor, and another to the king of Spain, in the years 1621, 22, and 23. He humbly craves leave of this moſt honourable court to ſeparate the buſineſſes, and diſtinguiſh the times.

And beginning with the Palatinate firſt, to give an account of his embaſſage to the emperor, and ſo to make as brief a deduction as he could of the whole carriage in that buſineſs, from the beginning of his employment to the time he left it. In his embaſſage to the emperor, he propounded all things faithfully according to his inſtructions; and the anſwers which he returned to his late majeſty of bleſſed memory, were the very ſame and no other than ſuch as were given by the emperor under his hand and imperial ſeal; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully ſent unto his ſaid majeſty, and withal did honeſtly and truly advertiſe his ſaid majeſty, what he underſtood and thought then upon the place; but was ſo far from giving to his majeſty any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote unto the lords of the council here in England from Vienna, 26 July 1624, in ſuch ſort as followeth:

"I AM further to inform your lordſhips, that there may be a diſpatch made preſently into Spain, to his majeſty's embaſſador Mr. Cottington, that they deal effectually for the repairing and ripening of the buſineſs againſt my coming; that they uſe ſome plain and direct language, letting the miniſters there know, that the late letter ſent by the king of Spain to the emperor, was colder and more reſerved than his maſter had reaſon to expect. I ſhall conclude with telling your lordſhips, that although I deſpair not of good ſucceſs in that knotty buſineſs, yet I hope his majeſty and your lordſhips lay not aſide the care of all fitting preparations for war, in caſe a peace cannot be honourably had. And amongſt other things, I moſt earneſtly commend unto your lordſhips, and by your lordſhips unto his majeſty, the continuing yet abroad, for ſome ſmall time, of ſir Robert Manſel's fleet upon the coaſts of Spain; which, in caſe his majeſty ſhould be ill uſed, will prove the beſt argument we can uſe for the reſtitution of the Palatinate."

And this his advice, he ſaith, was wholly intended by his actions, by being the cauſe, as he returned homeward out of Germany, to bring down count Mansfield, whereby the town of Frankendale was relieved, by ſupplying of his majeſty's army, when in great diſtreſs, with moneys and plate, to the value of ten thouſand pounds, merely out of his zeal and affection to the good of the king and his children, having no warrant or order, but that his heart was ever really bent in effects more than in ſhews, to ſerve the king's ſon-in-law and his cauſe, as by the diſcourſe of this buſineſs will appear. And how acceptable theſe ſervices were, will more appear, by the letters of the queen of Bohemia, in theſe words following:

"My lord,

"HAVING underſtood from Heidelburgh, how you have ſhewed your affection to the king and me in all things, and in the help of money you have lent our ſoldiers; I cannot let ſo great obligations paſs, without giving many thanks for it by theſe lines, ſince I have no other means to ſhew my gratefulneſs unto you: howſoever, aſſure yourſelf that I will never be forgetful of the teſtimonies you give of your love, which I intreat you to continue, in doing the king and me all good offices you can to his majeſty. You have been an eye witneſs of the miſerable eſtate our countries are in; I intreat you therefore to ſolicit his majeſty for our help. You having given me an aſſurance of you affection; I intreat you now to ſhew it in helping of us by your good endeavours to his majeſty, and you ſhall ever bind me to continue, as I am already, "Your very affectionate friend,

"ELIZABETH."

Which letters were ſeconded with others about the ſame time, both from the king of Bohemia and council of Heidelburgh, to the ſame effect; and how much ſatisfaction his late majeſty received in that behalf, and touching that buſineſs, will plainly appear ſeveral ways, and particularly by his ſpeech in parliament. And the ſaid earl likewiſe appealeth to both houſes of parliament, to whom by his late majeſty's order, he gave a juſt and true account of that employment, with what true zeal he proceeded; and how he preſſed that ſingle treaty, and promiſes no longer to be relied on, but that a fitting preparation for war might go along hand in hand with any treaty of accommodation. And for a concluſion, among many of his late majeſty's approbations of his carriage in this employment, he humbly deſired that a letter of the duke of Buckingham's under his own hand, bearing date the 11th of October 1621, may be produced, being as followeth:

"My lord,

"I AM exceeding glad that your lordſhip hath carried yourſelf ſo well in this employment, that his majeſty is infinitely pleaſed with your ſervice you have done, for which he commanded me to give your lordſhip thanks in his name, until he ſee you himſelf. You, of all men, have cauſe to commend his majeſty's choice of ſuch a man, that unleſs your heart had gone with the buſineſs, you could never have brought it to ſo good a paſs. Amongſt other things, his majeſty liketh well the care of clearing his honour, whereof he will adviſe further with your lordſhip at your next coming over. I hope you will not find your negociation with the infanta of ſuch difficulty as you ſeem to fear in your letter, ſeeing my brother Edward hath brought with him a letter from his majeſty's ſon-in-law, whereby he putteth himſelf ſolely to his majeſty's advice and pleaſure for his ſubmiſſion, as you will perceive by the copy of the letter itſelf, which I here ſend your lordſhip; wherein, though there may be many things impertinent, yet of that point you may make good uſe for the accompliſhment of the buſineſs, wherein I have written to the Spaniſh embaſſador to uſe his means and credit likewiſe; which I aſſure myſelf he will effectually do, eſpecially ſeeing the impediments are taken away by count Mansfield's compoſition, and the conformity of his majeſty's ſon-in-law, to this ſubmiſſion. For the money your lordſhip hath ſo ſeaſonably laid forth, his majeſty will ſee you ſhall ſuſtain no loſs, holding it very unconſcionable you ſhould ſuffer by the care of his ſervice; which you have ſhewed ſo much to his contentment, to the great joy of your lordſhip's faithful ſervant,

"GEO. BUCKINGHAM."

Having given this account of his employment with the emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make it known, in what ſort, before this his employment, he endeavoured to ſerve the prince Palatine, and his cauſe, which will beſt appear by his majeſty's own teſtimony, upon the going of ſir Francis Netherſole to the prince Palatine; at which time his majeſty being, out of his royal and juſt heart, deſirous to do a faithful ſervant right, commanded ſir Francis Netherſole to let the prince Palatine underſtand how good a ſervant the ſaid earl had been unto him and how active in his affairs, as will beſt appear by a diſpatch of ſir Francis Netherſole, written all with his own hand to ſir George Calvert, dated in Prague, Auguſt 11, 1620, and ſent by his late majeſty to the ſaid earl for his comfort, being as followeth:

"Right honourable,

"THAT you may be the better aſſured that I have neither forgotten nor neglected the commandments received from his majeſty by your honour; you will be pleaſed to have the patience to hear me report what I ſaid to this king upon the delivery of my lord deputy's letters to his majeſty; which was, that the king my maſter, whoſe juſtice is ſo renowned over the world, did uſe to ſhew in nothing more than in vindicating his ſervants from wrongful opinions, whereof he knew noble hearts more ſenſible than of injuries done to their perſons or fortunes; that out of his royal diſpoſition, his majeſty having found my lord Digby miſtaken by ſome of his own people at home, by occaſion of his being by him employed in the affairs with Spain, having thereupon received a jealouſy, that the ſame noble lord might be alſo miſreported; hitherto his majeſty's hands in that reſpect gave me a particular commandment, to aſſure his majeſty he had not a more truly affectionate ſervant in England: and for proof thereof, to let his majeſty underſtand, that whereas the baron of Doncaſter, now his majeſty's embaſſador for England, had, ſince his coming hither, obtained but three great boons for his majeſty's ſervice, viz. the loan of money from the king of Denmark, the contribution in England of the city and countries, and the ſending embaſſadors to the contrary parties, that my lord Digby had been the firſt propounder of all thoſe to the king my maſter, before his majeſty's embaſſador, or any other of his majeſty's ſervants in England! although his lordſhip were contented that others who were but ſet on, ſhould carry away the thanks and prayers, becauſe his lordſhip, being known to be the firſt mover therein, might poſſibly weaken the credit he hath in Spain, and ſo render himſelf the more valuable to ſerve both his own maſter and his majeſty; in which reſpect I humbly prayed his late majeſty to keep this to himſelf."

By which teſtimony it may appear, as the ſaid earl conceiveth, how he, the ſaid earl, beſtowed himſelf before his embaſſage, and in his ſaid embaſſage with his ſaid late majeſty's approbation thereof. Now he humbly craved leave to give your lordſhips account how he proceeded after his return from the emperor's court.

As ſoon as he came into England, he diſcovered unto his majeſty and the lords of the council, in what great want he had left the forces in the Palatinate, and ſolicited the preſent ſending away of money; thereupon 30,000l. were borrowed of ſir Peter Vanlore, ſir Baptiſt Hicks, and ſir William Cortine, and preſently ſent unto the Palatinate, beſides the 10,000l. which he lent, for which he paid the intereſt out of his purſe for ſix months, having alſo given, not long before, 500l. by way of benevolence, to the ſervice of the ſaid Palatinate.

Now in the interim, betwixt his returns from the Engliſh coaſts, which was in November 1621, and his going into Spain in May 1622, he firſt gave his account as aforeſaid of his embaſſage to both houſes of parliament, and moved them effectually as was poſſible for the ſupplying of his majeſty, and that the money might be wholly employed for the ſuccour of the Palatinate.

The parliament being diſſolved, he ſolicited with great care and induſtry the ſettling of ſome courſe for the ſupplying of the Palatinate, and his majeſty was perſuaded to maintain eight thouſand foot, and ſixteen hundred horſe, under his ſtandard, and at his own purſe, in the Palatinate, to eſtabliſh a certain courſe for due payment of the ſaid army; the lord Chicheſter was, upon the ſaid earl's motion, ſent for out of Ireland, and the ſaid earl, by his majeſty's command, took order for his diſpatch. In this eſtate the ſaid earl left his affairs at his departure towards Spain in May 1622, nothing doubting but that all things would have effectually and conſtantly been purſued, according to the order which was ſettled and reſolved on at his departure.

A

At his arrival at the court of Spain, he preſently proceeded according to his inſtructions, preſſing the buſineſs of the Palatinate as effectually as he could, and faithfully laboured and effected from time to time (as far as to the point of negociation) all particulars that were given him in charge, as it will appear by his late majeſty's letter upon every particular occaſion; and if by the accidents of war for that ſummer, the marquis of Baden, the count Mansfield, and the duke of Brunſwick, received each of them an overthrow (the ordering of whoſe affairs his majeſty ſo far complained of to his ſon-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his majeſty's letters on the 3d of June 1622, and alſo by his letters unto ſir Horace Vere, and the lord Chicheſter of the ſame date, if there was not a ſpeedy redreſs) if by any of thoſe accidents thoſe buſineſſes have miſcarried, the ſaid earl hopes he ſhall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him or to his employment, having ſo far and ſo honeſtly, with his beſt affections, employed his care and utmoſt ſervices in the buſineſſes, as his majeſty was pleaſed, by many ſeveral letters upon ſeveral occaſions, to ſignify his gracious receptance of his ſervice, as in his letters of November 24, 1622, written as followeth, viz.

"Your diſpatches are in all points ſo full, and in them we receive ſo good ſatisfaction, as in this we ſhall not need to enlarge any farther, but only tell you, we are well pleaſed with this diligent and diſcreet employment of your endeavours, and all that concerneth our ſervice; ſo we are likewiſe with the whole proceedings of our embaſſador, ſir Walter Aſton.

"Thus we bid you heartily farewel."

Newmarket,
November 24, 1622.

And afterwards his majeſty was likewiſe pleaſed in his letters of January 8, 1622, a little before our gracious ſovereign lord the king, then prince, his coming into Spain, as followeth:

"Concerning that knotty and unfortunate affair of the Palatinate, to ſay the truth, as things ſtand, I know not what you could have done more than you have done already."

And whereas it is objected, the Palatinate ſhould be loſt by the hopes he, the ſaid earl, gave by his letters out of Spain, it is an objection of impoſſibility; but there was nothing left but Manheim and Frankendale, when his firſt letters out of Spain could poſſibly come to his late majeſty's hands; for he did not begin to negociate that buſineſs until Auguſt 1622, and about that time Heidelburgh, and all but Manheim and Frankendale was loſt; and Manheim he had ſaved by his induſtry, had it not been ſo ſuddenly delivered, as is by his majeſty acknowledged by letter of 24 November 1622, written thus, viz.

"And howſoever the order given to the infanta, for the relief of Manheim, arrived too late, and after the town was yielded to Tilly; yet muſt we acknowledge it to be a good effect of your negociation, and an argument of that king's ſincere and ſound intention."

And Frankendale being by the ſaid earl's means once ſaved, was again the ſecond time ſaved merely by the ſaid earl's induſtry, and procuring a letter from the king of Spain, dated the 2d of February 1623. Whereupon followed the treaty of ſequeſtration, which hath ſince continued. And he, the ſaid earl, was ſo far from hindering ſuccours by any letter or council of his, that he was the ſolicitor, and in great part the procurer of moſt of the ſuccours that had been ſent thither, as is formerly ſet down. And when his royal majeſty that now is, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at the court of Spain, they found the buſineſs of the Palatinate in ſo fair a way, that the Spaniſh miniſters told them the king ſhould give his late majeſty a blank, in which we might frame our own conditions; and the ſame he confirmeth unto us now; and the like touching this blank was likewiſe acknowledged by the duke of Buckingham, in his ſpeech in parliament, after the return of his majeſty out of Spain. And it will appear by the teſtimony of ſir Walter Aſton, and by his and the ſaid earl's diſpatches, that the ſaid earl wanted not induſtry and zeal in the buſineſs: inſomuch as the laſt anſwer the ſaid earl procured herein from the king of Spain, was fuller than he the ſaid earl was ordered by his late majeſty's lateſt letters to inſiſt upon. So, as by that which hath been alleged, the ſaid earl hopeth your lordſhips will be ſatisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor induſtry, but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully ſerved their majeſties and the prince Palatine in this cauſe: and for aſſurance in that affair, he had all that could be between Chriſtian princes; and if in the ſaid aſſurances there hath been any deceit, as by the ſaid articles is intimated, which he never knew nor believed, he referred it to God to puniſh their wickedneſs; for betwixt princes there can be no greater tie than their words, their hands, and ſeals, all which he procured in that behalf; and both the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton were ſo confident that the buſineſs would be ended to his late majeſty's ſatisfaction, that in a joint diſpatch to his late majeſty of 24 November 1623, after his own majeſty's return into England, they wrote as followeth, viz.

"We hope that your majeſty may, according to your deſire ſignified to me the earl of Briſtol, by the letters of October 8, give to your majeſty's royal daughter this Chriſtmaſs the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and ſufferings, as unto the prince your ſon in the congratulation of being arrived to a moſt excellent princeſs."

And having thus given your lordſhips an account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will by your lordſhips good favours, proceed to the other part of that charge concerning the marriage.

And firſt touching his hopes and aſſurances, that he is charged to have given to his late majeſty, and his miniſters of ſtate here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the ſaid match, when, he ſaid, he knew he never meant it: He ſaith, he never gave any hopes of their real proceedings, but ſuch, and the very ſame that were firſt given to him, without adding or diminiſhing; neither could he have done otherwiſe, either with honeſty or ſafety. And he further ſaith, that the hopes he gave were not upon any intelligence; but as well in that of the match, as the other of the Palatinate, his advertiſements were grounded upon all the aſſurances both of word and writing, that could poſſibly paſs between Chriſtians, as will be made evidently appear by his diſpatch of 9 September 1623, which he humbly deſires may be read, if the length of it may not diſpleaſe. The ſubſtance being to ſhew all the engagements and promiſes of the king of Spain, that he really intended the match. And the cauſes why the condé Olivares pretended to the duke of Buckingham, that the match was not formerly meant, was only thereby to free himſelf from treating any longer with the ſaid earl, to the end that he might treat for larger conditions, in point of religion with the ſaid duke: The ſaid condé Olivares taking advantage of having the perſon of his majeſty, then prince, in his hands. And with this diſpatch the ſaid earl acquainted his majeſty that now is, in Spain, before he ſent it.

And by this diſpatch the earl doubted not, but that it will appear to this honourable court, that whilſt the treating of this buſineſs was in hand, he proceeded in that, not only with care and induſtry, but with ſome meaſure of vigilancy. And for clearing an objection that hath been alleged, that the match was never meant before the duke's coming into Spain, nor after; the earl craveth leave to ſet down ſome few reaſons of many, which cauſed him to believe that the ſaid match was, and hath been really meant, and that it was ſo conceived by both their majeſties, and the king of Spain, and their miniſters on both ſides.

For 1ſt, The duke of Buckingham certified his late majeſty, that the buſineſs of the marriage was brought to a happy concluſion; whereupon his late majeſty was pleaſed to give orders to the duke and earl, to proceed in the buſineſs; which his ſaid majeſty would not have treated till the ſaid marriage was concluded, as will appear by a letter of his ſaid late majeſty, jointly to the duke of Buckingham, and the ſaid earl, of the 23d July 1623.

2dly, It will appear by letters of the ſaid lord Conway to the duke of Buckingham, bearing date September 4, 1623, that the ſaid duke had good aſſurance of the concluſion of the ſaid match; and upon this confidence were all things put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and the lord Conway and others faithfully agreed and ſettled all the points of immunity and liberty for the Roman catholics, and for the uſe of their religion, as was ſet down in their declaration, Auguſt 9, 1623, hereafter mentioned in the anſwer of the fifth article of this charge.

3dly, The very day his now majeſty and the duke of Buckingham departed from the Eſcurial in Spain, towards England, the ſaid duke ſolemnly ſwore to the treaty of the ſaid marriage, and the furtherance of it all that ſhould be in his power, upon the holy evangeliſts, in the preſence of the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton.

4thly, The treaty of the ſaid marriage had been formerly ſigned, ſealed, and ſolemnly ſworn by the king of Spain: And when his majeſty, and that king took their leaves, he did ſolemnly, in the words of a king, faithfully and punctually proteſt to perform all that had been capitulated in the treaty of marriage; and thereupon embraced his majeſty at his departure, and ſent the very next day a letter, written all with his own hand, to his majeſty, vowing and proteſting to make all good that he had capitulated or promiſed unto his majeſty majeſty at his departure the day before. So that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the marriage, as by Mr. Attorney is pretended, yet certainly the earl hath not been ſlightly deceived; neither can it be, as he conceiveth, any fault in him, ſince not only his late majeſty, but alſo his majeſty that now is, and the duke of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, and that upon other grounds than miſ-information, ſuggeſtions, and perſuaſions of the ſaid earl, that the marriage was really intended: And to that effect, both his late majeſty of bleſſed memory, and his moſt excellent majeſty that now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him, the ſaid earl, ſeveral letters, aſſuring him, that their intents and pleaſures, were to have the ſaid match proceeded in, and thereupon the proxies of his majeſty, then prince, were again inrolled and ſent unto the ſaid earl. So that the ſaid earl having ſo many and ſo great cauſes to be aſſured that the match was really intended on both ſides, he conceiveth it will be hard for Mr. Attorney to make good that part of his charge, wherein he affirmeth, that the earl ſhould know the contrary, or the aſſurance to be upon falſe grounds, as in the ſaid article is alleged.

II. To the ſecond article, he directly denieth all the ſuppoſed offences wherewith he ſtands charged by the ſaid article. And for a clear declaration and manifeſtation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, he ſaith, Firſt, As to the continuing the treaties upon generalities, that the temporal articles were by agreements on both ſides not to be treated or ſettled until ſuch time as the articles of religion were fully agreed on; for that it was held moſt proper and honourable for both ſides, firſt, to ſee if the difficulty of religion might be removed, before they paſſed to any further engagements. And the ſaid articles of religion, by reaſon of the pope's new demands ſent into England by Mr. Gage, were not ſigned nor condeſcended to by his late majeſty, nor his majeſty that now is, then prince, till January 5, 1622; and were then ſent away in poſt out of England to the ſaid earl by Mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid in Spain, about the 25th of the ſame month. But the earl's care was ſuch, to have no time ſpent in the ſettling of the temporal articles, that before he would condeſcend ſo much as de bene eſſe unto the articles of religion, that they ſhould be ſent back to Rome, he procured the king of Spain to promiſe, that within the time limited for procuring the deſponſories, which was by March or April following at the furtheſt, all temporal articles ſhould be ſettled and agreed, to the end that the infanta might be delivered at the ſpring, as by the king of Spain his anſwer in writing was declared to be the king's intention; and accordingly ſir Walter Aſton and the ſaid earl did not deal in general, but did moſt induſtriouſly labour to ſettle all in particular, viz. That the portion ſhould be two millions, it appearing that it was ſo agreed by the late king of Spain[t]; that the diſpenſation coming, the deſponſories ſhould be within forty days after; and that don Duarté de Portugal ſhould be the man that ſhould attend the infanta in the journey. And all other particulars neceſſary for the concluſion of the ſaid treaties, were, by ſir Walter Aſton and the ſaid earl, and the Spaniſh commiſſioners, drawn up into heads, in writing, and after many debates, they were conſulted with that king; and 2 Martij 1623 ſtilo vet. the condé Gondomar, and the ſecretary don Andreas de Prada, were appointed to come home to the houſe of the ſaid earl, to ſignify unto ſir Walter Aſton and himſelf, as they did, that the king of Spain had declared his reſolution in all the particulars, and given them order to come to a ſpeedy concluſion with them in all things: And that king's anſwer to that concluſion, the earl ſaw and read, all written with the king of Spain's own hand.

On the 7th day of the ſaid month of March 1623, the king's majeſty then prince, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid; and the Spaniards took new laws, and the negociation was put into a new form. So that whereas it is objected againſt the earl, that he entertained and continued the treaties ſo long upon generalities, he conceives it is not meant upon the ſpiritual articles; for they were ſuch as were ſent from Rome into England, from thence they came to the earl: And for the temporal articles, they were not to be ſettled and treated till the articles of religion were concluded. He conceiveth it cannot be alleged with any colour, that his majeſty was entertained with generalities, ſince the time that the ſaid articles of religion were brought unto the ſaid earl by Mr. Simon Digby, being about the 25th of January, there were but ſix weeks until March 7 following, when his majeſty, then prince, arrived in Madrid; and in the interim, all the above-mentioued particulars were ſettled: And the time that hath been ſpent in this treaty, hath not been through his, the ſaid earl's default, in continuing upon generalities, without preſſing to particulars, but hath been cauſed, as well by difficulties which the buſineſs brought with it, as alſo with exterior accidents, viz. The wars of Bohemia, the death of two popes, and the late king of Spain, without the leaſt fault of the ſaid earl, as is acknowleged by the late king of bleſſed memory, in the ſaid earl his inſtructions, on the 14th of March 1621.

Neither could any delay therein be attributed to him the ſaid earl; for he was employed in thoſe times into Germany and Flanders, and ſir Walter Aſton and ſir Francis Cottington, for the ſpace of three or four years, were reſident in Spain; from whence the hopes they gave were upon all the diſcreet grounds that miniſters can expect from a ſtate: But the earl re-aſſumed his buſineſs ſix months before his majeſty's coming into Spain; and he was ſo deſirous to ſee his majeſty, then prince, beſtowed, that he preſſed nothing ſo much, both to the king and prince, as that the prince might loſe no more time, and rather to break the match with Spain, than ſuffer any further delays; as will appear by his diſpatches from his firſt arrival at the court of Spain, until his majeſty, then prince, his coming. For in his letters of June 20, 1622, being the firſt he wrote after his firſt audience, he was ſo deſirous that no time might be loſt, that in them he craved leave of his majeſty, that in caſe he ſhould find any delays in Spain, he might, without expecting any order, take his leave and come home.

Upon the return of ſir Francis Cottington, in September following, he wrote both to the king, and his majeſty, then prince. To the king as followeth:

"I ſhall preſume to add to that which Mr. Cottington ſhall deliver unto your majeſty by word of mouth, of the preſent eſtate of the match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a ſpeedy iſſue: That your majeſty will be pleaſed poſitively to declare, what you will do in point of religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this king ſhould procure the diſpenſation, or conclude the match without it; and in caſe there ſhall be any farther delay therein, that I may then declare your majeſty to be free and diſengaged, to beſtow the prince in ſuch ſort as you ſhall judge moſt convenient."

And to that prince at the ſame time, wrote in theſe ſubſequent words, viz.

"That which will be neceſſary for his majeſty preſently to do on his majeſty's part, is to declare himſelf, how far he will be pleaſed to yield in point of religion, as Mr. Cottington will approve unto your highneſs: And that he ſet a prefixed time to break or conclude the match, either with the diſpenſation, or without the ſame. And for the reſt, it may be left to my negociation. But your highneſs may be pleaſed to haſten his majeſty's reſolution with all poſſible ſpeed."

And the ſaid earl ſaith, that having received from his ſaid late majeſty his reſolution in point of religion, and a limited time according to his deſire, he was ſo preciſe and punctual therein, that although the making or breaking of the marriage depended upon it, he would not give one month's reſpite longer time for the procuring of the diſpenſation, until he had firſt acquainted his late majeſty therein, and received his directions under his own hand; as will appear by his majeſty's letters of October 25, 1622, as followeth:

"Right truſty and well beloved couſin and counſellor, we greet you heartily well. Whereas by your laſt letter written to our ſecretary, dated September 29, you are deſirous to have our pleaſure ſignified unto you under our own hand, whether we will be content or not to grant a month's time longer, for the coming of the diſpenſation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in caſe they ſhall there conclude all things elſe for our contentment, with a reſolution to ſend the infanta hither the next ſpring; we do hereby declare unto you, that in that caſe you ſhall not break with them for a month's longer delay. We alſo wiſh you not to trouble yourſelf with the raſh cenſure of other men, in caſe your buſineſs ſhould not ſucceed; reſting in that full aſſurance of our juſtice and wiſdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful ſervant by the effect of things ſo contingent and variable. And with this aſſurance we bid you heartily farewel."

And he further ſaith, That when he had agreed to the articles of religion, and that a certain time was ſet for the coming of the diſpenſation, and a concluſion of the match, although he would bind himſelf to nothing, without his majeſty's approbation, yet for that no time might be loſt, he agreed to the propoſitions de bene eſſe, ſent by Mr. Porter December 10, 1622, to the end the articles might be immediately ſent to Rome, without loſing ſo much time as to hear firſt from England: And humbly moved, that in caſe his majeſty ſhould like of the ſaid articles, he would ſend his approbation directly to Rome for the gaining of time; which his majeſty was pleaſed to do. And at the ſame time he wrote both to his ſaid late majeſty, and his majeſty, then prince, as followeth, viz. to his majeſty.

"This is the true ſtate of the buſineſs as it now ſtandeth. If your majeſty approve of what is done, I hope it will be a happy and a ſhort concluſion: If your majeſty think it not fit to allow and condeſcend to the ſaid articles, I have done the uttermoſt of my endeavours, and ſhall humbly perſuade your majeſty not to loſe a day longer in the treaty; ſo much it importeth your majeſty and your kingdoms that the prince were beſtowed."

And to the prince, in letters of the like date, in this ſort.

"I have preſumed to write to his majeſty, that which I think my duty to ſay to your highneſs, That in caſe you ſhall not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be loſt in this treaty: For it is of ſo great conſequence that your highneſs were beſtowed, that it importeth almoſt as much that you were ſpeedily, as fitly matched. But I hope his majeſty, and your highneſs, will in ſuch ſort approve of this laſt agreement, as you will ſpeedily bring this long treaty to a happy concluſion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better terms; therefore I deal clearly with your highneſs, and do not only moſt humbly perſuade, but on my knees beg it of you, that you either reſolve to conclude this match as you may, or ſpeedily to break it, and beſtow yourſelf elſewhere; for no leſs than the happineſs of your kingdom, and the ſecurity of the king your father, and yourſelf, depend upon it."

All which things being conſidered, the earl moſt humbly ſubmitteth himſelf to the judgment of that moſt high and honourable court, whether the delays which accidents have brought forth in this buſineſs, can be attributed to his fault; ſince on the one ſide it will evidently appear to your lordſhips, that he never moved his majeſty and the prince to admit of delays, but rather to think of ſome other courſe; and it will on the other ſide appear by all the diſpatches, that he preſſed things with the miniſters of Spain to as ſpeedy a concluſion, as the uttermoſt terms of fair negociation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended, that the Spaniards ſhould take occaſion, by entertaining the ſaid treaties, to abuſe his ſaid late majeſty (which he knoweth not) yet, he ſaith, he uſed all the vigilancy and induſtry that a careful miniſter could do, and had from the Spaniards all the aſſurances by oaths, words and writings, which could be expected from Chriſtians; the which, without adding or diminiſhing, he faithfully preſented unto his late majeſty; and his ſaid late majeſty was pleaſed in thoſe times, to conceive upon thoſe aſſurances, that they dealt really with him: And he conceiveth that his majeſty that now is, then prince, and the duke of Buckingham, were pleaſed to write as much to the late king's majeſty, at their firſt coming into Spain, and that all which the earl had written touching that employment, was there avowed by the condé Olivares and condé Gondomar, to the ſaid prince and the duke, at their arrival at Madrid; and he hoped, that if that diſpatch may be peruſed, it will as well appear and be adjudged, that he ſerved his majeſty with ſome meaſure of vigilancy, as well as fulneſs of fidelity.

III. To the third article the ſaid earl ſaith, That he did not, either by words or by letters to his late majeſty or his miniſters, extol or magnify the greatneſs and power of the king of Spain, nor repreſented to his late majeſty the ſuppoſed danger that might enſue unto him if a war ſhould happen between him and the king of Spain, nor affirmed, nor inſinuated the ſame, as in the ſaid article is mentioned; but if he did at any time ſpeak or write of the power and greatneſs of the king of Spain, or repreſent any danger to his ſaid late majeſty that might enſue by entering into hoſtility with the ſaid king of Spain, it was as a faithful counſellor and ſervant to his majeſty, by way of his advice and opinion, which he ever delivered ſincerely, faithfully, and truly, according to the preſent occaſion, and in no wiſe with ſuch an intent as in the ſaid articles is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpoſe whatſoever.

But he hath been ſo far from diſſuading his late majeſty to take arms, that he hath upon all juſt occaſions adviſed, that all fitting preparations for war might be made, as beginning with the year 1621, from which time he is only charged, will appear by his ſpeech in parliament preſently after his return out of Germany; and that he hoped his majeſty would no longer rely upon ſingle treaties, but make all fitting preparations for war; and that the parliament would enable his majeſty thereunto; and by the care he took before his going again upon his embaſſage into Spain, that the eſtabliſhment of an army under his majeſty's own ſtandard of horſe and foot, and under his own pay, might be ſettled and provided for; as likewiſe his advice to the lords of the council, that his majeſty might have a curb upon the king of Spain upon all occaſions, by continuing of ſir Robert Manſel's fleet on the coaſts of Spain, as will appear by his letter written from Vienna, 26th of July 1621, mentioned in the anſwer to the firſt article. By all which it appeareth, that he laboured and endeavoured as much as in him lay, that his majeſty might be well prepared for any occaſions of war that ſhould happen. And he no way remembered to have diſcouraged, or to have ſpoken or written any thing, that might have been underſtood to have tended to the diſcouraging of his ſaid late majeſty for the taking of arms, and entering into hoſtility with Spain, or for reſiſting of him and his forces, from attempting the invaſions of his late majeſty's dominions, or the dominions of his late majeſty's confederates, friends or allies, as by the ſaid articles is charged againſt him; neither remembereth that he had any cauſe ſo to do. But if he have in any kind ſpoken or written of Spain, or the power thereof, it may have been to his late majeſty, or to his majeſty that now is, by way of diſcourſe, ſpeaking of the ſolidneſs of the Spaniſh proceeding, of their ſerious and deliberate debating of buſineſſes before they reſolve on them, of the conſtant purſuing of them when they are once reſolved, wiſhed that England and other nations would therein imitate them: For he ſuppoſeth the right way to impeach their greatneſs was to grow as wiſe as they, and to beat them at their own weapons. But otherwiſe he is confident never to have been heard to ſpeak or write any thing, that might have any terror or diſcouragement to his late majeſty or his chief miniſters, knowing that England well ordered, need to take little terror at the power of Spain, having almoſt in all attempts and enterpriſes won honour upon them. And as for the preventing of dangers that might enſue upon a war, though he knew not what is aimed at in that particular, yet he is moſt confident, out of the integrity of his own conſcience, that he neither ſaid, nor adviſed any thing but what befitted a faithful counſellor and embaſſador, which was truly to deliver his opinion as he underſtood it upon the preſent occaſion: and as for affirming that his majeſty's quiet ſhould be diſturbed, and he not be permitted to hawk or to hunt, he remembereth not what diſcourſe he may have had, or written to any perſon, how fit it might be upon the being broiled in a great war, ſeriouſly to intend it, and make it our whole work. But as he is confident it will appear, that what diſcourſe ſoever it might have been, it wanted not true zeal and affection which he hath ever borne to the king's ſervice; and he hoped it will not be found to want due reſpect and reverence on his part, which he ought to ſhew to ſo gracious a maſter. Neither can it be conceived, that the conſiderations of hunting and fowling, ſhould be conſiderations worthy of ſo great and prudent a king, to withhold from a war for the good of Chriſtendom, and his kingdom, if he ſhould have been juſtly provoked thereunto.

IV. To the fourth article the ſaid earl ſaith, That he did not any thing contrary to his duty or allegiance, or contrary to the faith and duty of an embaſſador, as by this article is alleged; but did intend the ſervice and honour of his late majeſty; and no corrupt and ſiniſter ends of his own advancement, as by this article is ſo alleged. And as for the conference, which is pretended he ſhould hold concerning the treaty, that being told there was little probability that the ſaid treaties would or could have good ſucceſs, he ſhould acknowledge as much; and yet ſaid, he cared not what the ſucceſs thereof might be, but that he would take care to have his inſtructions perfect, and to purſue them punctually, and would make his fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not ever remember to have held ſuch diſcourſe. Though it be true, the time hath been many years ſince, when he thought the match very unlike to be effected, in regard unequal anſwers were given in prince Henry's days, and of the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of religion; and ſaith further, that the reviving of the treaty of the ſaid match for his majeſty that now is, was not by his means, for he ever declared his opinion clearly, both to his late majeſty, and to his majeſty that now is, that in the firſt place, he wiſhed and adviſed a proteſtant match, but in the duty of a ſervant, underſtanding that both their majeſties deſired the match really with Spain, he did really and faithfully intend the ſervice and honour of their majeſties, and effectually endeavoured to procure their ends. And it is very likely he might ſay, he would get his inſtructions perfect, and purſue them punctually, as he conceiveth was lawful and fit for him; but the latter part of this conference, that he ſhould ſay he would make his fortune by it, or any other words to that effect, he was in anno 1621, and ever ſince, of that rank and quality, both in regard of his employments, fortunes, and his majeſty's favour, that he aſſureth himſelf he did not, and dares anſwer ſo far for his diſcretion, that it was impoſſible for him to hold ſo mean and unworthy diſcourſe.

V. To the fifth article he ſaith, That what is therein alleged, is ſo far from being ſo, that contrarily upon all occaſions to the utmoſt of his power, he did labour to prevent all the inconveniencies in point of religion, that might come by matching with a princeſs of a different religion, as well appeareth by the paper of his opinion, that his majeſty ſhould marry with a lady of his own religion, hereafter mentioned in his anſwer to the ſeventh article. And for further proof thereof, he ſaith, that in the whole treaty with Spain, he ſtood more ſtrict in points of religion, than by his inſtructions he needed to have done, as will appear by the teſtimony of ſir Walter Aſton, and his diſpatches of the 12th of December 1622, and other diſpatches, which he deſireth may be read. And as for concealing or perſuading to ſet at liberty the prieſts or jeſuits, he utterly denieth to have done any ſuch thing, as before he hath anſwered. Although it be true, that the embaſſage in Spain be far different from the employment of other places, where there is a body of our reformed religion, and where his majeſty hath kindred and allies; whereby his majeſty's miniſters may be informed of the neceſſary occurrences of ſtate, without the helps of prieſts or jeſuits. But in Spain there being none but Roman catholics, nor any manner of correſpondency or intelligence but by them, the embaſſadors muſt make uſe of all ſorts of people, eſpecially of jeſuits and prieſts, and to that end embaſſadors ſent thither have a large and particular warrant under the king's hand, to treat and make uſe of prieſts and jeſuits, and all other ſorts of men, unleſs it be ſuch as are proclaimed rebels. And divers times the miniſters employed in Spain, to gratify ſome whom there they employed for the king's ſervice, have, as he believeth, at their particular ſuit, moved his majeſty to extend grace and favour to ſome particular friend and kinſman of his, being a Roman catholic, and impriſoned in England; and that he remembereth to have happened to others, but doth not remember himſelf to have written to his late majeſty in that kind: and as concerning his advice and counſel, to ſet at liberty jeſuits and prieſts, and the granting to the papiſts a toleration, or the filencing of the laws againſt them, he ſaid, that his late majeſty was engaged by the treaty of Madrid 1617, in divers matters concerning religion; likewiſe by promiſe to condé Gondomar, and his letters to the king of Spain, April 1620, wherein he is pleaſed to promiſe ſome particulars in favour of Roman catholics, as by the ſaid letters will appear: and underſtanding the ſaid earl had ſufficient warrant under the king's own hand, to aſſure the king of Spain, whatſoever was agreed in the ſaid article, or in the ſaid letters, his majeſty would ſincerely perform; yet the ſaid earl was ſo cautious in that point, that when, for the concluſion of the match, the other articles of religion being allowed, it was preſſed by the Spaniſh miniſters, that a clauſe of convenience might be inſerted, with proteſtation, that the form and way thereof ſhould be wholly left to his majeſty's wiſdom and clemency, and that his majeſty's Roman catholic ſubjects ſhould acknowledge this grace to have come from the king's majeſty's mercy and goodneſs: yet the ſaid earl would not condeſcend hereunto, de bene eſſe, as by his letters to maſter ſecretary Calvert, 8 October 1622, will appear, hereby to give his majeſty time to have recourſe unto his ſecond conſultation, and to take it into conſideration before he would engage or bind himſelf in this point: but his late majeſty, and his majeſty that now is, were pleaſed to condeſcend hereunto, by ſigning the ſaid articles with their own hands, and likewiſe by writing their private letters of the 8th of January 1622, to that effect to the king of Spain, as by the ſaid letters will appear. Neither did the ſaid earl, by letters or otherwiſe, ever counſel or perſuade his late majeſty, to grant or allow unto the papiſts or profeſſors of the Romiſh religion a free toleration, and filencing of the laws made and ſtanding in force againſt them, but ever proteſted againſt any ſuch toleration; and when any ſuch proviſion hath been offered to be made in Spain, he ever refuſed ſo much as to give ear to it, or to ſuffer it to be propounded; although it be true, that he hath ſince ſeen a paper touching pardons, ſuſpenſions, and diſpenſations for the Roman catholics, bearing date the 7th of Auguſt 1623, ſigned by the lord Conway and others, which in effect is little leſs than a toleration; which paper is that which followeth:

Saliſbury, 7 Auguſt 1623.

The declaration touching the pardons, ſuſpenſions, and diſpenſations of the Roman catholics.

This declaration having been inſerted, in the reign of king James I. under the year 1623, there is, I think, no occaſion of repeating it here.

But this declaration, the ſaid earl ſaith and affirmeth, was the effect of the duke of Buckingham's negociation, and treated and concluded by the lord Conway, with the Spaniſh embaſſador here, whilſt the prince was in Spain; neither was his privity or advice in it: for if he had known it, he ſhould have proteſted againſt it. All which, together with the difference betwixt the conditions of religion agreed at the treaty of Madrid, 12 December 1622, by the ſaid earl, and the ſaid ſir Walter Aſton, being by their lordſhips conſidered, the ſaid earl doubteth not but that it will manifeſtly appear, whoſe endeavour it was to advance the Romiſh religion, and the profeſſors thereof; and judges the ſaid earl moſt unfortunate to be charged with an article of this kind.

VI. To the ſixth article the earl ſaith, That the aſſurances which he gave his late majeſty, and his majeſty that now is, concerning the treaties, were ſuch, that it had been diſhoneſty and breach of his duty and truſt for him to have held them back, being the ſame that were given him by the emperor, and the king of Spain, and their miniſters, upon as great aſſurances as can paſs between miniſters of princes in the like caſe. And for the delays of Spain, they could never be ſo ill, and with ſo little colour complained of, as at the time of his majeſty's coming thither; for that a certain time was before then prefixed for the coming of the diſpenſation, viz. in April 1623, at the fartheſt, which was next month after the prince's arrival at Madrid; the deſponſories were to be within four days following, and the infanta begin her journey into England twenty days after: ſo as three months patience longer would have ſhewed the iſſue of the buſineſs without putting of the perſon of the prince, being heir apparent to the crown, in ſo imminent a hazard for the trying of an experiment. And it is an argument of great ſuſpicion, becauſe the Spaniards were ſuſpected to have dealt falſely, and ſo the leſs to be truſted with the perſon of the prince, to be put into their hands to try concluſions: but the truth is, though that was made the pretended ground, and the occaſion of the journey, it was neither the aſſurances of the ſaid earl, nor the jealouſies of Spain, but other motives that were the original cauſe of his majeſty's ſaid journey, as ſhall be ſufficiently made apparent in due time. And the ſaid earl having got an inkling of it by ſomething that was let fall from the condé Gondomar to that purpoſe, inſtantly diſpatched away by Mr. Griſly to his late majeſty, to have his journey prevented; who upon the confines of France, met with his majeſty and the duke of Buckingham on his journey towards Spain, and told them as much. So that although he confeſſeth what is laid in the charge to be true, viz. that by the ſaid journey the perſon of the prince, the peace and ſafety of the kingdom did undergo further danger (at the remembrance thereof the hearts of all good ſubjects do tremble) yet the blame is due to the authors and adviſers of the ſame journey, and not to the ſaid earl; and although it pleaſed God, to the exceeding great joy and comfort of the ſaid earl, and of all good men, to ſend his gracious majeſty home with ſafety, yet never was the perſon of any prince, upon ſuch grounds, expoſed to ſo great an hazard; and in ſuch caſes, not the ſucceſs, but the counſellors are conſiderable.

VII. To the ſeventh article the ſaid earl ſaith, That he did not move or perſuade his majeſty, then prince, to change his religion, neither in the manner in the ſaid article mentioned, nor in any other manner whatſoever; neither doth he conceive, that the charge in itſelf as it is laid, will in any reaſonable conſtruction bear any ſuch inference as is made therein; ſo as he conceiveth, he needeth not make any further or other anſwer thereunto. Yet that it may appear, that the manner he uſed to the ſame prince was not traiterouſly, falſely, or cunningly, nor without ground, or to any ſuch intent as in the ſaid article is ſuppoſed; and to manifeſt unto this moſt high and honourable court, how far he was from all ſuch intention, he ſaith, that he doth acknowledge, that within few days after his majeſty's coming into Spain, whilſt he had the great honour to have his majeſty lodged at his houſe, and to have ſo royal a gueſt, finding by the Spaniſh miniſters, that there was a general opinion, that his majeſty's coming thither was with an intention to become a Roman catholic; and the

condé Gondomar having that very morning preſſed the earl not to hinder ſo pious a work (as he termed it) of his majeſty's converſion, and ſeeming to be aſſured of the duke of Buckingham's aſſiſtance therein, his majeſty being all alone in a withdrawing room in the ſaid earl's houſe, the ſaid earl kneeled unto him, and told him, that he had a buſineſs to impart unto him, which highly imported his majeſty to know, ſo that he might be aſſured his boldneſs therein might be pardoned; which his majeſty graciouſly promiſed. And thereupon the ſaid earl told his majeſty, that the general opinion of the court was, that his majeſty's coming into Spain was with an intent to be a Roman catholic, and there to declare it. And he confeſſeth, that at the ſame time, in regard of thoſe things he had heard, he humbly beſought his majeſty to deal freely with him as a ſervant, of whoſe fidelity he might be confident, or words to that effect: but he was ſo far from perſuading his majeſty to be a Roman catholic, that without reſpecting his majeſty's anſwer, he declared himſelf to be a proteſtant, and ſo ſhould always continue; yet he ſaid, he ſhould always ſerve his majeſty, and labour to advance his, and the king his father's affairs, with as much fidelity and honeſty, as any catholic whatſoever; and his majeſty was pleaſed then to make unto the ſaid earl a full and clear declaration of his religion, and of his conſtant reſolution therein; and ſeemed to be much diſpleaſed, that any ſhould have ſo unworthy an opinion of him, as to think he would for a wife, or any other earthly reſpect whatſoever, ſo much as waver in his religion. Whereupon the earl beſought his majeſty to pardon his boldneſs, and then intreated him not to ſuffer his buſineſs to be overthrown, by permitting that conceit of his converſion any longer to remain in the Spaniards, nor to any thing that might give them hope therein; alleging, that it was impoſſible the marriage could be without a diſpenſation; and ſo long as the Spaniards, who were to procure the diſpenſation, ſhould have hope of his majeſty's converſion, they would never content themſelves with a part; to which they were tied by the articles agreed upon with the ſaid earl and ſir Walter Aſton. At which time his majeſty was pleaſed to approve of his opinion, and ſaid, he would expect the diſpenſation, and did thereupon afterwards ſend Mr. Andrews to Rome to haſten it; and the next day the ſaid earl dealt very roundly with the condé Olivares, and Gondomar, telling them it was a diſcourteous manner of proceeding, to preſs his majeſty to further conditions than were formerly agreed upon in point of religion, and to make his conditions the worſe for the great obligation he had put upon them, by putting himſelf into their hands; whereat they took ſuch great offence, that they eſtranged themſelves from him for a long time after. And that the ſaid earl did thus proceed with the ſaid condé, and that it was not a new-framed anſwer to ſatisfy preſent objection; but that which really and indeed paſſed, will really appear by his diſpatches unto his late majeſty of bleſſed memory; and before his majeſty that now is, came out of Spain, they were there ſhewed unto his majeſty, bearing date the 9th of September 1623. So that although it be true, that he the ſaid earl did not diſſuade his majeſty, for that there was no cauſe for it; yet without expecting his majeſty's anſwer, he firſt made a clear and true profeſſion of his own religion; and when his majeſty had declared to him his zeal and conſtancy, he humbly beſought him, that the Spaniards might not for any reſpect be longer held in hopes of that point. And becauſe point of religion is that which all men of honour and honeſty would chiefly deſire to clear, eſpecially having an imputation of that nature laid upon them, as the ſaid earl hath in the ſaid article; he humbly beſeecheth your lordſhips, that he may not ſeem to digreſs from his charge; intending your lordſhips ſatisfaction in that particular, not by the aforeſaid verbal diſcourſe only, which he profeſſeth was in much zeal to religion and dutiful care to the prince in that kind, but by ſome written teſtimony of his former opinion both of the match and religion. When he was firſt employed into Spain for the treaty of his marriage 1617, his late majeſty having commanded him to give an account thereof unto his majeſty that now is, he at his departure towards Spain, preſumed to give unto his majeſty that now is, his opinion in writing ſigned with his own hand, to be kept as a teſtimony of future action, the copy whereof is this as followeth:

"SIR,

"THE opinion which I have ever preſumed humbly to offer unto his majeſty concerning your highneſs's marriage, hath been, that both in regard of conſcience and ſatisfaction unto his majeſty's people and allies; likewiſe for the ſecurity and quiet of your majeſty's eſtates, your highneſs might take for wife ſome proteſtant princeſs, although ſhe neither were daughter to a king, nor had ſo ample a portion as might relieve the king's preſent neceſſities and wants; for then there might be many ways found to help the king's wants, either by ſome few years providence and frugality, or by winning the affections of the people, to the ſupplying of his majeſty by way of ſubſidies in parliament; whereas contrariwiſe, if the number and power of the papiſts ſhall be increaſed, as undoubtedly they will be by your highneſs's matching with any catholic princeſs, through the conceſſion which muſt be of neceſſity for the exerciſe of her religion for herſelf and family, within your highneſs's courts, and thereby by degrees theſe two different religions ſhall grow to an equality of power; it will be great hazard and diſquiet to the ſtate, and not to be redreſſed without great danger, and courſes of more violence than is uſual for this ſtate to put in practice. But in caſe his majeſty, out of his wiſdom and conſideration beſt known to himſelf, hold it fitteſt that your highneſs match with France, or Spain, or any other catholic, either for that the preſent time affordeth no proteſtant princeſs, who is for years or blood ſuitable for your highneſs, or that can in any conſiderable meaſure by the portion, ſupply his majeſty's preſent wants, I then conceive that the match by which this ſtate ſhall ſuffer leaſt inconveniency and cumbers, and whereby his majeſty's neceſſities ſhall by the greatneſs of the portion be the moſt relieved, is with Spain, if ſuch a match may be made with ſuch conditions of religion, as other catholic princes will contract themſelves withal.

"Thus much I thought fit humbly to preſent unto your highneſs, for that I ſee my employment liable to the cenſure of many worthy perſons, with whom though I concur in my opinion, yet I ſeem much to differ from them many ways; for that it is more proper to me to be true to my maſter's ends and ſervices, than by the declaring this, to procure their ſatisfaction: only to your highneſs I thought fit to make this declaration, and ſhall be a ſuitor to you for your favour, as you ſhall ſee me really labour to put this in effect. And if his majeſty ſhall, either upon motion of parliament, or any other propoſition that can be made unto him, think fit to proceed with a proteſtant match, as I ſhall wiſh as well unto it as any man living, ſo I hope in ſuch ſort to manage the preſent buſineſs that I have in hand, that it ſhall rather much further, than any way croſs or hinder it. But in caſe his majeſty ſhall not be drawn to any propoſition for a proteſtant match, I then conceived, that your highneſs both doth, and will approve, that I really and effectually labour to procure a match for your highneſs in Spain, upon ſuch conditions, in point of religion and portion, as to his majeſty ſhall ſeem fit."

Beſides which declaration of his opinion, he hath all the days of his life, and in all places, lived and allowed himſelf to be a proteſtant, never having done any the leaſt act that was not ſuitable to that profeſſion: and in all his former employments, for the ſpace of fourteen years, of more than five hundred perſons of all qualities that attended on him, there was never one perverted in his religion, ſaving two Iriſh footmen, who in Ireland had been bred papiſts. And he humbly deſired the teſtimony of doctor Maſon, and doctor Wren, his majeſty's chaplains, who were with his majeſty in Spain; and of Mr. Sampford, one of the prebends of Canterbury, Mr. Boſwel, parſon of St. Lawrence in London, and Mr. Frewen, divinity-reader in Magdalen college in Oxford, and now one of his majeſty's chaplains, who were his majeſty's chaplains in Spain; as well for the frequent uſe of the ſacrament, as conſtant profeſſion and exerciſes of religion, and the teſtimony of ſuch catholics as are known to have been his ancient acquaintance and friends, to examine them upon oath, whether publicly or privately, in Spain or in England, they had known him in any kind to make ſhew, or ſo much as to forbear, upon all occaſions, to declare the religion he profeſſeth. And that the ſaid Mr. Frewen and Mr. Wake may be alſo examined, whether in extremity of ſeveral ſickneſſes whereinto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever ſettled his conſcience with them towards God, and made a confeſſion of his faith; reſolving, as befitting a proteſtant or good chriſtian.

VIII. To the eighth article the earl ſaith, That he did not at any time, or in any place, endeavour to perſuade the prince, touching his religion, to become a Roman catholic, and to be obedient to the uſurped authority of Rome; neither did the ſaid earl, to that end and purpoſe or otherwiſe, uſe unto his majeſty, then prince, the words in the article mentioned. But the ſaid earl acknowlegeth, That upon occaſion of a letter that came to his majeſty, then prince, putting his majeſty in mind of the great actions of his royal progenitors in the holy war, that the great kings of theſe times did did not only employ their forces, but in their perſons went into the Holy Land; the earl believeth, that by way of diſcourſe only, and not otherwiſe, he may have ſaid, That in regard of the difference in religion, it was of more difficulty to undertake ſuch great actions now, than in former ages; and it might well be inſtanced in the preſent treaty of the marriage, wherein the pope's conſent was to be obtained. And to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he is confident there was very many that have, nay, few of nearneſs about his late majeſty, that have not often heard his majeſty ſay, That he was the true martyr, that ſuffered more for his religion than all the princes of Chriſtendom beſides; inſtancing in divers particulars, but eſpecially in this, That he could not match his children with kings of his own rank, without the pope's leave.

But the ſaid earl ſaith, He never alleged any ſuch thing to any other purpoſe, than to ſhew, that only conſcience, and love to truth (in which regard proteſtants ſuffered much), not any temporal reſpects, made men conſtant and zealous to the profeſſion of our religion. By which diſcourſe he ever attributed much to the honour and ſecurity of the proteſtant religion; but never uſed it as an argument to perſuade to the contrary, as in the accuſation is inſinuated.

Beſides, he conceiveth, by way of anſwer thereunto, the ſaid queſtion may be aſked, which his majeſty was pleaſed to aſk of the earl in the ſeventh article, viz. "What the ſaid earl ſaw in his majeſty, that he ſhould think him ſo unworthy, as to change his religion for a wife, or any earthly reſpect whatſoever?" So why ſhould it be thought, that being more fit to undertake great actions in the world (being a mere moral and temporal reſpect) ſhould be an argument to perſuade in conſcience ſo religious and wiſe a prince, and ſo well inſtructed as his majeſty is, as though the ſoul of a chriſtian prince was to be wrought upon, in point of truth and belief, by temporal and worldly reſpects of conveniences and greatneſs? It were neceſſary, for the proving, that the ſaid earl perſuaded his majeſty touching religion, to produce ſome arguments that he uſed out of ſcripture, to ſatisfy him in point of conſcience in ſome tenets of the Roman church, or that he produced any conference with the learned men for his ſatisfaction in point of religion: Otherwiſe the articles uſed in this againſt the ſaid earl, do (as he conceiveth) carry little ſtrength to prove the charge of perſuading his majeſty, either in regard of itſelf, or in regard of his majeſty's piety.

IX. To the ninth article, the ſaid earl ſaith, That there was a diſcourſe in Spain of the way of accommodating the prince Palatine his affairs; and by way of diſcourſe it was moved, That the marriage of his eldeſt ſon with a daughter of the emperor, and his ſon to be bred in the emperor's court, would be the faireſt way for the pacifying of, and accommodating thoſe buſineſſes. And the earl, by way of diſcourſe, and not otherwiſe, did ſay, That he thought his late majeſty could not be averſe, either to the ſaid match, or to the breeding of the prince Palatine his ſon with the emperor; ſo as thereby, the whole patrimonial eſtate of the prince Palatine and the dignity electoral might be fully reſtored, and that his ſon might be bred in his own religion, and have ſuch preceptors, and ſuch a family, as his late majeſty and his father, meaning the prince Palatine, ſhould appoint; and they to have free exerciſe of religion: For ſo his late majeſty hath often declared himſelf to the ſaid earl, and wiſhed him to lay hold on any occaſion for entertaining of any ſuch propoſition. And otherwiſe than ſo, and upon the terms aforeſaid, and by that way of conference and diſcourſe only, he delivered not any opinion to his majeſty, at his majeſty's being in Spain: For the ſaid earl is very confident, that his majeſty was returned out of Spain before any propoſition was made for the ſaid marriage, other than by way of diſcourſe, as aforeſaid; the ſame as the ſaid earl believeth, being firſt moved and debated on by way of propoſition, between, Mr. ſecretary Calvert, and the embaſſador of the king of Spain, October 2, 1623. His late majeſty, upon a relation made unto him by a letter of Mr. ſecretary Calvert, approved of the ſaid propoſition, and declared the ſame to be the only way, as he conceived, to accommodate with honour thoſe great buſineſſes: And wrote to that purpoſe to his ſon-in-law the prince Palatine, by his letters dated 9th of November 1623, a copy of which he, together with Mr. ſecretary Calvert's relation, and the lord Conway, by his late majeſty's commandment, ſent unto the ſaid earl, the tenor of which tranſlated out of French, is as followeth:

"We have thought good, that we may provide beſt and moſt ſoundly for your affairs, not only to procure, but alſo to aſſure your peace, were to cut up by the very roots that evil, which hath been ſettled in the heart of the emperor, by the great diſpleaſure and enmity, he hath conceived againſt you. For the removing and quite extinguiſhing of which, it ſeemeth to us no better or more powerful means can be uſed, than a good alliance, which may be propoſed by us, between your eldeſt ſon, and the daughter of the ſaid emperor, upon the aſſurance we have, we ſhall not be refuſed in this matter, if you on your part will give your conſent. And for the more ſurety of the good ſucceſs thereof, we are determined, before any ſuch propoſition be made to the emperor, to intereſt the king of Spain with us in the buſineſs, who, we truſt, will lend us his helping hand, as well for the effecting of it, and bringing it to a good concluſion, as in procuring likewiſe, that the conditions be duly obſerved. Amongſt which conditions, if it happen that the emperor ſhould demand, that your ſon, during his minority, ſhould be brought up in his court, we ſhall tell you, that we, for our own part, ſee no reaſon why you ſhould ſtick at it, upon ſuch conditions as he might be tied unto, to wit, That the young prince ſhould have with him ſuch governor as you ſhall pleaſe to appoint him, although he be no Roman catholic; and that neither he, nor any of his, ſhould be any way forced in matter of their conſcience. And our meaning is, ſo to order our proceeding in this treaty, that before your ſaid ſon be put into the hands of the emperor, we will have a clear and certain aſſurance of an honourable, entire, and punctual reſtitution of all whatſoever belonging to you: As alſo we will take care to provide accordingly, as fully and exactly for the aſſurances requiſite for the liberty of conſcience, for him and his domeſtics, as they have done here with us, touching thoſe that have been granted them for the infanta. And therefore ſeeing there is no inconvenience at all, that may cauſe your averſeneſs or backwardneſs in this buſineſs, which we for our parts think to be the beſt, ſhorteſt, and moſt honourable way that you can take, for the compaſſing of the entire reſtitution, and making your peace ſure with the emperor, we hope your opinion will concur with us therein, and ſhall intreat you by the firſt, to ſend us your anſwer."

By which letters, after his majeſty's coming out of Spain, it appeareth to your lordſhips, that there was no propoſition of the marriage betwixt the ſon of the prince Palatine, and the emperor's daughter, when the letter was written; for therein his majeſty ſaith he was determined to intereſt the king of Spain in the buſineſs, before any ſuch propoſition ſhould be made to the emperor. And it will alſo thereby appear, that his late majeſty's inclination was of the conveniency thereof, which the ſaid earl hopeth will acquit him, if by way of diſcourſe only he declared what his majeſty's opinion was, which, with honeſty, he could not have concealed. And the ſaid earl ſaith, he doth not remember what anſwer ſir Walter Aſton made upon that diſcourſe which he then delivered, nor what replies the ſaid earl made; but ſure he is, whatſoever the ſaid earl ſaid, or what anſwer or reply ſoever was made, as it was by way of diſcourſe, and not otherwiſe, ſo it was according to that which he truly conceived to be the beſt and eaſieſt way to accommodate the buſineſs and to be his majeſty's pleaſure (which the ſaid ſir Walter Aſton may be ignorant of, as he is confident that he was) and not out of any diſaffection to our religion, or for any ſiniſter reſpect or regard to the houſe of Auſtria, as by the ſaid article is intimated: for he did not conceive the breeding of the prince Palatine's ſon with the emperor, having a governor appointed by his late majeſty and his father, and he and his domeſtics to have free uſe of their own religion, to be a matter of impoſſibility, or ſuch dangerous conſequence in point of religion, as to imply his converſion, as by the article it is intimated; well knowing that in the emperor's court, all princes there, though his priſoners, and others his counſellors and ſervants about his perſon, and ſo great command in his armies, being avowed proteſtants, have the free uſe of their religion: And it is not to be ſuppoſed, the ſon of the prince Palatine, grandchild to the king of Great Britain, ſhould be matched and no care taken to capitulate for the uſe of his religion, being ever granted to the meaneſt prince that is beſtowed. And his majeſty's ſpecial care in this point, is fully ſeen in the ſaid letter.

X. To the tenth article he ſaith, That by comparing of this article of his too much forwardneſs, with the ſecond article, whereby he is charged with continuing the treaty upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties, and direct concluſions, your lordſhip will perceive how impoſſible it was for him to avoid an exception. But for direct anſwer to the preſent charge, he ſaith he did not preſumptuouſly, nor yet to his knowledge, break his inſtructions nor ſet a day at all for the deſponſories; but was therein merely paſſive, in admitting the day nominated by the king of Spain according to the capitulation before made: nor did he presumptuously, wilfully, or willingly disobey any commandment or direction of his majesty that now is, then prince, which he could understand not to be countermanded, either by present or future instructions otherwise explained.

And for the better manifestation of the truth of his proceedings in, and concerning the same, he saith, that on the day of the departure of his majesty, then prince, from the Escurial in Spain, his highness delivered unto him, in presence of the commissioners, his proxies powers, with public declaration taken in writing by the secretary to the king of Spain, of the prince his pleasure, and how the said earl should use them, viz. That he should deliver them to the king of Spain, upon the coming of the dispensation cleared from Rome, according to that which hath been agreed, which was to be within ten days after the coming of the dispensation. And he farther saith, That it is true, that the prince afterwards by his letters sent by one Mr. Clarke, commanded him the said earl not to deliver the said proxies till he should have received security, that the infanta, after her being betrothed, should not enter into any religious order, and that before he proceeded, he should send to his majesty, then prince, such securities, as should be offered, that he might judge whether it were sufficient or not.

Whereupon the said earl, as became a faithful servant, presented unto his majesty that now is, then prince, such assurances as were offered unto him, for securing of that point, together with such reasons as he conceived were fit to be offered to their considerations; which gave unto his late majesty, and his majesty that now is, then prince, such satisfaction, as they were pleased to dispatch a post presently unto him, absolutely discharging him of that commandment, as by their several letters, dated October 8, 1623, will appear as followeth:

"We have received your letters by Grisley, and the copy of them to our dear son; and we cannot forbear to let you know how well we esteem that dutiful, discreet, and judicial relation, and humble advice to our son: whereupon, having fully deliberated with ourself, and communicated with our dear son, we have resolved, with the good liking of our son, to rest upon that security in point of doubt, for the infanta's taking a religious order, which you in your judgment shall think meet."

And by that other letter of his majesty that now is, then prince, as followeth, viz.

"Your letter to the king and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Laurence, hath so satisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting."

Whereby he was absolutely freed of that command; and being so freed thereof, he then remained under the order which his majesty, then prince, had left with him at his departure, which was to proceed according to the capitulations, and his highness's declaration, when he delivered the said proxies unto him: and so he intended to have done, till by his highness's letters, November 13, 1623, he was directly commanded the contrary, which commandment he directly and punctually obeyed.

And for such his intentions, till he was countermanded, he conceived he had not only sufficient warrant, but had highly offended if he had done otherwise. For first, for his proceedings to consumate the match, he had warrant and instruction under his late majesty's hand. Secondly, it was the main scope of his embassage. Thirdly, he was enjoined by the king and prince his commission, under the great seal. Fourthly, he had positive order under his majesty's hand, by letters since. Fifthly, it was agreed by capitulation, that it should be within so many days after the coming of the dispensation. Sixthly, his late majesty, and his majesty that now is, then prince, signified by their letters unto him, at the same time, when they discharged him of his commandment touching the infanta's entering into religion, that they intended to proceed in the marriage, as by his majesty's letters, October 8, 1623, will appear. Seventhly, The proxies were to that end left in his hands, and after again renewed, after his majesty's return into England. Eighthly, He had overthrown the marriage without order: For although sir Walter Aston and himself used all possible means for the gaining of time, and deferring the desponsories; yet the king of Spain caused it to be protested, That in case he the said earl should insist upon the deferring of the desponsories, he would free himself from the treaty by the said earl's infringing of the capitulations: and in truth, although the king of Spain should have condescended to have prolonged the desponsories, until one of the days of Christmas, as by the letter was required; yet the prince's proxies had been before that time expired, and he durst not, without a precise warrant, put such a scorn upon so noble a lady, whom he then conceived was likely to have been the prince his wife, as to nominate a day of marriage when the proxies were out of date, and he was himself sworn to the treaty. And lastly, he could not in honour and honesty, but endeavour to perform that public trust reposed in him, when the proxies were deposited in his hands, with public and legal declaration, with an instrument by a secretary of state to the king of Spain, leading and directing the use of them, and the same being then Instrumentum stipulatum, wherein as well the king of Spain was interested by the acceptation of the substitution, as the prince by granting of the proxies, he could not in honesty fail the public trust, without clear and undoubted warrant; which as soon as he had, he obeyed. So as the case standing thus, the said earl is very confident, that the supposed countermands, directions, and restrictions, when they should be perused and considered of, will appear to have been very slender and insufficient warrant against the aforesaid orders and reasons before specified: and is also as confident, that what is assured out of his, the said earl's dispatches, will also appear to be misunderstood; and that if he had proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before he received direct and express commandment to the contrary by the aforesaid letters, November 13, 1623. which he readily and punctually obeyed, he had not, under favour, broken his instructions, or deserved any blame for lack of assurance of the restitution of the Palatinate, and temporal articles.

And first, of the Palatinate, his said majesty did not send to the said earl express directions not to dispatch the desponsories, until a full conclusion were had of the other treaty of the Palatine, together with that of the marriage, as by the said articles is alleged; only his late majesty, by the aforesaid letters of October 8, required the said earl so to endeavour, that his majesty might have the joy of both at Christmas. Whereas his instructions of May 14, 1621, were express, that he should not make the business of the Palatinate a condition of the marriage. And his late majesty's letters of December 30, 1623, were fully to the same effect. Yet did the said earl, according to what was intimated by the said letter of October 8, so carefully provide therein, as that before the proxies were to be executed, he had an absolute answer in the business of the Palatinate, the same should be really restored according to his late majesty's desire; and the condé Olivares both in his majesty's name, and in his own, desired the said earl and sir Walter Aston, that they would assure his majesty of the real performance of the same, and intreated, if need were, they should engage their honour and life for it, as by their joint dispatches of November 23, 1623, will appear; and so much the said sir Walter Aston and the said earl agreed should be delivered to them in writing before they would have delivered their proxies, and so the said earl declared it; the which answer in writing should have been the same, which since was given them of January 8, 1623. And both sir Walter Aston and the said earl were confident therein, as they by their said letters of November 23, wrote to his late majesty as followeth, viz.

"That his majesty might according to his desire, signified to the said earl, by his letters of October 8, give, as well to his majesty's daughter that Christmas, the comfortable news of the expiring of her great troubles and sufferings, as to his son the prince, the congratulation of being married to a most worthy and excellent princess."

By which it will evidently appear, he meant not to leave the business of the Palatinate loose, when he intended to proceed to the marriage; but he confessed that he was ever of opinion, that the best pawn and assurance his late majesty could have of the real proceeding of the Palatinate, was, that they proceeded really to the effecting of the match; and of the same opinion was his late majesty also, and the lords commissioners here in England, as appeareth by his instructions, dated March 14, 1621, which opinion still continued in them, as appeareth by his late majesty's letters of January 7. 1622. And as for the temporal articles, the said earl saith, when the desponsories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembereth, on Friday, August 29, before the departure of his majesty, then prince, out of Spain, which was only hindered by the not coming of the dispensation, the prince appointed him and sir Walter Aston to meet with the Spanish commissioners, and they drew up the heads of the temporal articles, wherewith the prince and the duke of Buckingham were acquainted; and in case the dispensation had come, and the desponsories being performed on that day, there had been no other provision made for them before the marriage; but presently, upon the prince his departure, he, the said earl, caused them to be drawn into form, and sent them to his late majesty, Sept. 27, 1623, desiring to understand his majesty's pleasure with all speed, especially if he disapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any dislike thereof, until the aforesaid letters of November 13, 1623, which put off the desponsories. So as it appeareth the said earl was so far from breaking his instructions, or from having any intention to have proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before his majesty and the prince were satisfied of this point of the infanta entering into religion, or before convenient assurance, as well for the restitution of the Palatinate, as performances of the temporal articles, that he deserveth, as he conceiveth under favour, no blame, so much as in intention; but if he had erred in intention only, (as he did not) the same being never reduced into act, the fault (as he conceiveth) was removed by his obedience before the intention was put into execution: For so it is in cases towards God. And as to the matter of aggravation against him, that he appointed so short a time for the desponsories, as that without extraordinary diligence the prince had been bound, he thereto saith, as he said before, that he set no day at all thereunto, nor could defer it after the dispensation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the match so long laboured in, and so much desired; yet he and sir Walter Aston having used all possible industry to discover how the motion of deferring the match would be taken; and finding an absolute resolution in the king of Spain to proceed punctually, and to require the proxies according to the capitulation, within ten days after the coming of the dispensation; and that time also getting advertisement from Rome, that the dispensation was granted, and would presently be there; he, the said earl, to the end, in so great a cause, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late majesty's pleasure, sent a dispatch of November 1, with all diligence unto his majesty, letting his majesty know, that it could not be possible for him to protract the marriage above four days, unless he should hazard the breaking, for which he had no warrant.

But that this was now no new resolution, nor the king so straitned in time, as by the said article is pretended, will appear by the said earl's dispatch of September 28, 1623. In which, upon scruple that was then made of the infanta's entering into religion, he wrote to the same effect, viz. "That if the dispensation should come, he knew no means how to detain the proxies above twenty or twenty four days." So that although no difficulty happened until the midst of November 1623, yet it was foreseen, that it must of necessity happen whensoever the dispensation should come; and then was warning of two months given thereof; viz. from September 24, until November 29, which was the time appointed for the desponsories.

So, as he most humbly submits himself unto your lordships, which of the two ways was the safer or dutifuller for him to take; whether upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown so great a business; or, on the other side, first, to have presented unto his majesty the truth and sincerity as he did, the true estate of his affairs, with his humble opinion therein, with an intimation, that if his majesty should resolve to break the match, that for the said earl his honest discharge of the public trust reposed in him, when the proxies were deposited in his hands, and for his sufficient warrant in so great a cause, his majesty would be graciously pleased to give clear and express order, (which he had not) and in the interim, whilst his majesty might take into consideration the great inconveniencies that might ensue, the said inconveniencies might be suspended, and the business kept upon fair terms, that his majesty might have his way and choice clear and unsoiled before him.

And as to the evil consequences which are pretended would have followed, if the said earl had proceeded to the consummation of the match, before he had express order and warrant to the contrary; he supposed his majesty should speedily have seen the marriage, which he so long sought to have effected; that the prince should have had a worthy lady whom he loved; that the portion was much greater than ever was given in money in Christendom, that the king of Spain had engaged himself for restitution of the Palatinate; for which the said earl conceived a daughter of Spain, and two millions, had been no ill-pawn; besides many other additions of advantage to the crown of England: whereas on the contrary side, he foresaw that the prince would be kept a year longer unmarried, a thing that so highly concerneth these kingdoms; he doubteth, that the recovery of the Palatinate from the emperor, and duke of Bavaria, by force, would prove a great difficulty, and that Christendom was like to fall into a general combustion: so that desiring that his majesty should have obtained his ends, and have had the honour and happiness, not only to have given peace, plenty, and increase, unto his own subjects and crowns, but to have propounded the greatest differences that had been these many years in Christendom: and by his piety and wisdom, to have prevented the shedding of so much Christian blood, as he feared would ensue, if these businesses were disordered. These reasons, he confessed, and the zeal unto his majesty's service, made him so earnestly desire the effecting of this business, and cannot but think himself an unfortunate man, (his majesty's affairs being so near settling to his majesty's content, as he conceiveth they were, and hoping to have been to his majesty, not only a faithful servant, but a successful servant) to see the whole estate of his affairs turned upside down, without any the least fault of his; and yet he, the only minister on the English and Spanish side, that remained under disgrace.

XI. To the eleventh article the said earl saith, that the article is grounded upon a petition by him preferred to this honourable house, supposed to be scandalous; which your lordships (as he conceiveth) according to the customs and privileges of the house of peers, would have been pleased first to have adjudged so to have been, either for matter appearing in itself, or upon hearing the said earl; for if the matter appearing in the petition itself be not to be excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral accidents, be taken for a scandal, till it be examined and found false. For a plain and direct answer thereunto he saith, that the said petition is such, as will not warrant any such inference, as by the said article is inforced. And that he hoped to justify the contents of the said petition in such sort, as shall not displease his majesty, nor deserve that expression which is used in the charge; but contrarily what he hath said, or shall say therein in his defence, shall in all things tend to the honour and service of his majesty, by reducing into his memory divers circumstances, and laying before him the passages of divers particulars, which by undue practices have been either concealed from his majesty, or mis-related unto him.

"Having thus offered to this high and honourable court, such proofs and reasons as he hoped shall, in your lordships wisdom and justice, clearly acquit him of any capital crime, or wilful offence; if it shall appear, that out of errors and judgment, too much ferventness and zeal to his majesty's service, or the ignorance of the laws of this realm, (wherewith he hath not been able to be so well acquainted as he ought, by reason of foreign employments by the space of many years) or by any other ways or means he hath fallen into the danger of the laws for any thing pardoned in the general pardon, made in the parliament holden at Westminster, 'anno vicesimo primo regni imp. Jacobi Angliæ, &c.' of blessed memory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the pardons, and the benefit thereof, (with this clause, that he doth and will aver, that he is none of the persons excepted out of the same (although he is very confident, he shall not need the help of any pardon, having received many significations, as well from his majesty's own mouth, that he had never offended his majesty, as lately, by several letters of the lord Conway, that he might rest in the security he was in, and sit still, and should be no farther questioned. But he hopes your lordships will not only find him so far from blame, but that he hath served his late majesty of blessed memory, and his most gracious son, the king's majesty that now is, with that fidelity, care, and industry, that your lordships will take course, as you, in your wisdoms, shall think fit, not only for upholding the honour and reputation of a peer in this realm, after so many employments, but likewise become humble and earnest suitors to his majesty on this behalf (which he humbly prayeth) that he may be restored to his majesty's good favour, which, above all worldly things, he most desireth."

This defence of the earl of Bristol seemed to me worthy to be transmitted to posterity, in a language more generally known than the English. Truth is visible throughout: the whole is perfectly coherent: nothing appears disguised, and the earl's innocence is so clearly seen, as to be almost beyond doubt. But on the other hand, there appears a furious persecution against this lord, from those who must have been convinced of his innocence. In this persecution is seen the extreme weakness of James I. who, contrary to his own knowledge, not only permitted the earl of Bristol to be oppressed, who had served him very faithfully, but also was induced to tell the parliament, in 1624, two things equally distant tant from the truth. The firſt, that when the prince and duke of Buckingham came to Madrid, they found the affair with which the earl of Briſtol was charged, as untouched, as if it had never been mentioned before. And yet, he had himſelf ſigned the articles of the treaty, and nothing was wanting but the pope's diſpenſation to celebrate the marriage, as manifeſtly appears in the earl of Briſtol's anſwer. The ſecond, that the affair upon which he conſulted the parliament, namely, whether he ſhould break the treaties with Spain, was yet, "Res integra," though theſe intreaties had been entirely broken two months before. But Charles I's prejudice againſt the earl of Briſtol is ſo ſurpriſing, that after having ſeen the earl's defence, one can hardly believe, a prince, ſo judicious in other reſpects, could be induced to dictate to his attorney-general, an accuſation ſo full of calumnies againſt a lord, whom certainly he could not think guilty, ſince no man knew no more of the affair than himſelf. This is a character which does not redound to his honour. He would have been more excuſable, if he had cauſed the duke of Buckingham to act alone, whoſe reputation ought not to have been more dear to him than his own. In ſhort, we ſee in the earl of Briſtol's defence, a clear and full explication of what paſſed in Spain, in the negociation of the two treaties, for the marriage, and for the reſtitution of the Palatinate, which is the principal ſubject of the reign of James I. The earl's defence undeniably ſhews alſo, what all the good writers affirm, that the duke of Buckingham's narrative to the parliament in 1624, was all falſe. And therefore I thought this narrative of the duke's would not be ill-placed after the earl of Briſtol's defence, that the reader, by comparing the one with the other, may be ſatisfied with his own eyes, how unworthily king James, the prince his ſon, and the duke of Buckingham, acted with the parliament, in order to cauſe them to adviſe a rupture with Spain, on which advice king Charles afterwards ſo ſtrenuouſly inſiſted.

The duke of Buckingham's narrative [a] of the tranſactions in Spain, delivered to both houſes of parliament, by order of king James I. in the year 1624.

The treaty of the marriage and reſtitution, united together by a reciprocal ſubordination. IV. The prince's return from Spain. V. ARTICLE I.

The motives of the prince's journey to Spain.

The negociation of ſir Richard Weſton chancellor of the Exchequer, with the archduchеſs of Bruſſels, miniſtred unto his majeſty the firſt occaſion of jealouſy, and made a kind of diſcovery of the Spaniards indirect dealing with this ſtate.

"After the duke had ſpoken theſe few words, there was read a letter of the 3d of October 1622, from the king to the earl of Briſtol, wherein Briſtol was required to let the king of Spain know, how ſenſible king James was of the emperor's proceedings towards him; and that he ſhould demand of the king of Spain a promiſe, under hand and ſeal, that Heidelbergh ſhould be delivered within ſeventy days after audience, and the like for Manheim and Frankendale, if they be taken; and if this be denied, to preſs to have leave to march through the king of Spain's territories with an army for the recovering of his children's patrimony; and that the king of Spain ſhould aſſiſt us with his forces."

Then the duke deſired the houſes to take for truth whatever he ſhould ſay, granted and atteſted by the prince's preſence; and ſhewed, that this letter was not put home to the utmoſt by the earl of Briſtol. Hereupon a diſpatch was ſent away to my lord of Briſtol, expreſly commanding him to preſs his directions more home than yet he had done, and in caſe he ſhould be denied or delayed by the king of Spain, then to take his leave and come away: this was not ſo fully exacted by my lord of Briſtol.

Porter, that carried theſe letters, was commanded not to ſtay above ten days, who after he had been there ſome four or five days, and ſaw nothing towards a diſpatch, went himſelf to the condé Olivares, (having been his creature) and deſired him that he would ſpeed his diſpatch. Olivares aſked him what he would have? Who replied, no more than what had been formerly promiſed, that in caſe the emperor ſhould deny the reſtitution of the Palatinate, the king of Spain ſhould aſſiſt our king by arms to recover it, or elſe give way to our forces to march thither through his country. Olivares replied, that this was a prepoſterous demand; what, to aſſiſt with arms againſt the king's uncle, and the catholic league! Porter ſpeaking to him of the marriage of our prince with the infanta of Spain, he told him, that he underſtood not a word of it [b].

Porter acquainted Briſtol herewith: he ſaid, he would call Olivares to an account, if he held this language with him, and would make him underſtand, that an earl of England was as good a man as a condé of Spain. But ſending for Porter the next morning, he changed his reſolution, and concluded to carry the buſineſs more calmly, and ſaid, the condé was ſo reſerved, becauſe he was ſhy and dainty to report thoſe myſteries with that freedom to him, who was not qualified as a public miniſter. The condé was angry with Porter for communicating what he ſaid to Briſtol. Mr. Porter returned with a diſpatch fraught with generalities, and without any one particular or certainty at all, made his relation to the prince's highneſs; who thereupon took his reſolution to go in perſon to Spain, and gave himſelf theſe reaſons for the enterprize.

He ſaw his father's negociation plainly eluded; matters of religion gained upon, and extorted [c]: his ſiſter's cauſe more and more deſperate; and that this was the way to put things off or on; and that in this particular, delay was worſe than a plain denial; and that, according to the uſual proverb, "a deſperate diſeaſe muſt have a deſperate remedy [d]."

Hereupon the king commanded the duke to accompany his highneſs in his journey.

ARTICLE II.

The treaty of the marriage ſevered, and by itſelf.

When the prince had arrived at Madrid, the condé gave him a viſit; magnified exceedingly the prince's journey; amplified the obligations his highneſs had put upon that king; and ſaid, that now without all peradventure, it muſt be a match, and we muſt part and divide the whole world betwixt us.

The next day the condé taking the duke into his coach, and Mr. Porter for his interpreter, falling into diſcourſe of the match, he ſaid unto the duke, let us diſpatch this match out of hand, and ſtrike it up without the pope; the duke anſwered, he liked the matter very well, but deſired to underſtand the means. The means, quoth the condé, is very eaſy; it is but the converſion of the prince; which we cannot conceive but his highneſs intended upon his reſolution for this journey.

The duke anſwered forthwith, that with freedom they came thither, and with freedom they would return again: they were no jugglers, neither came they to Spain to make new bargains [e]: that the prince was ſettled in his religion; his conſcience was troubled with no ſcruples in that kind: if they ſtruck any more upon that ſtring, they would mar all the harmony. Then ſaid the condé, there is no way but to ſend to Rome to haſten the diſpenſation; to which the duke aſſented. Hereupon the condé wrote his letter to the cardinal Ludovicio the pope's nephew; which being ſhewed to the duke, ſeemed to him to be very heavy; the duke therefore deſired to quicken it with this poſtſcript, "That now the prince being arrived, muſt not be ſent back without a wife; that delay to a ſuitor is a kind of refuſal; that clogging inſtructions would amount to a denial, and new conditions to an abſolute breach." The condé fell into choler, and ſaid directly it could not be done. This the prince affirmed to be acted in his preſence: but the earl of Briſtol made a more benign conſtruction thereof, the duke a right-down concluſion, that this people never intended either match or reſtitution; and ſo wiſhed his highneſs fairly at home again: however the meſſenger was diſpatched to Rome.

[a] This narrative has been collated with the record in Rymer, tom. xvii. p. 556, &c. by means whereof, ſeveral miſtakes that were in Ruſhworth, are rectified.

[b] The marriage had been now ſix years negociating at Madrid. There were ſome articles ſigned, which Gregory XV. had ſent back with his anſwers. Either therefore condé Olivares, or Porter, or the duke of Buckingham, did not ſpeak the truth. Rapin.

[c] Theſe matters became much worſe after the prince was in Spain. Rapin.

[d] All theſe reaſons are extremely weak. For ſuppoſing them to be true, they only prove at moſt the neceſſity of a rupture with Spain, but not of the prince's journey thither. Rapin.

[e] They however made new terms. Rapin.

That

Four or five days after his highneſs was placed to ſee his miſtreſs in her paſſage through the ſtreets, as ſhe made her viſits from church to church: but preſſing for acceſs, he was delayed, but at laſt obtained a viſit; but a very ſtrange one. He was not ſuffered to ſpeak unto her, but as they had ſet it down in words and ſyllables in writing; ſaying, they were no aſtrologers, and could not foreſee the event of this marriage: and therefore they reſolved to admit him as a prince only, and not as a ſuitor. But the condé ſalved this up with a compliment, that if the diſpenſation were once returned, he ſhould lye with her even that very night; nay, have her he ſhould upon any terms. If he could not be qualified to enjoy her as a wife, yet he ſhould have her as a miſtreſs.

Soon after, riding in a coach, it was urged by the condé, that the infanta was of a tender conſcience, and if ſhe ſhould come into England, and find the prince an enemy to her religion, it would quite diſhearten her. His highneſs conſented to hear her upon this ſubject, becauſe he was as like to convert her, as ſhe was to pervert him. A conference with divines was preſſed upon his highneſs, which he refuſed, and ſaid, if after a diſputation with them, they ſhould not prevail againſt a young man, they would remain much diſguſted, and ill affected to the whole negociation, this kind of importunity was ſtill uſed towards the prince, till the return of the diſpenſation.

Six weeks after the prince's arrival came the diſpenſation; but his highneſs underſtood from Rome, by Mr. Gage, that the diſpenſation was returned, much clogged in matter and manner, eſpecially with the annexed new condition. The king of Spain, before the receiving of the diſpenſation, was to take an oath to ſee all the articles performed; whereupon faculty was iſſued, really performed, or elſe to make war, in caſe of any failure, upon the king of England.

His highneſs ſignified his reſolution unto them, that he neither could nor would add or alter any thing of the firſt articles ſent to England.

A juncto of divines are appointed to meet and conſider, whether the king might ſafely take the oath. By this time the prince had gone through all the articles, ſitting in perſon with the committee; only leaving three undecided, that of the church, that of the nurſe, and that of the education of the children; which his highneſs reſerved till he ſhould ſpeak with the king. Then ſaid the condé, now buſineſs is in a better way than ever it was, a match, and without more ado ſhe was his wife.

But the next day came Gondomar, and ſpake unto the prince of the ſame match, as of a new thing, and told him plainly, that unleſs his highneſs came to all the conditions of the diſpenſation as they were ſent from Rome, clearly and entirely, nothing would be done; for they had no power to remove or alter a word of falſe Latin. Whereupon his highneſs was juſtly diſtaſted, and offered to break. Then they preſſed the prince, that he would be pleaſed to ſtay twenty days, until the king of Spain might receive an anſwer from England. The prince reſolved to ſtay, upon condition that ſir Francis Cottington might be diſpatched away within two days, and ſome meſſenger that might overtake him with the articles that ſhould be ſent after, as ſoon as ever they could be made ready: but the two days of their hammering ſpun out to twenty; at the end thereof they brought them with new additions.

The articles being at laſt ſent to England, the juncto of divines delivered their opinions, that the infanta could not be ſent over before the ſpring; at which his highneſs was offended, but the condé prevailed with him to ſtay, until their embaſſador ſhould certify out of England, that the articles were aſſented unto by king James, and put in execution, and then the lady ſhould go with the prince.

The biſhop of Segovia was pleaſed to ſay to the duke, that he had heard ſomething of the eſtate of our kingdom, and had received it from good hands; that our king could not make a toleration without a rebellion, and he eaſily believed it; becauſe the king of Spain is not able, in his dominions, to effect the like enterprize, without incurring the like danger: therefore he concluded, it was unſafe to ſend the lady thither at this time, becauſe we having granted as much in effect as a toleration, it was very probable ſhe ſhould be welcomed with a riſing and rebellion. To which the duke replied, that if the favors which the king his maſter had exhibited to his catholics, and the mediation of that king, and the advice of that very committee, of which that biſhop was one, be of ſo dangerous a conſequence; it ſeems their lordſhips, who gave the advice for that article, though they pretended religion, intended plain and open rebellion. But you muſt know quoth the duke, if his highneſs had been of my lord biſhop's opinion, that theſe connivances had amounted to a toleration, he had never accepted of theſe articles to have gained any alliance: for what was agreed unto, was but a temporary ſuſpenſion of penal laws, but no toleration; for that could not be done, but by conſent of parliament. Then Gondomar hereupon ſaid, that for his part, he did not hold it fit to ſend the infanta thither, before the articles be perfectly put in execution. And Gondomar privately infuſed to the prince his highneſs, being incenſed againſt the duke, that the duke was in heart (as he ſaid all his kindred were) a Roman catholic; and he ſaid to a jeſuit of great account and zeal in thoſe parts, that the duke was a moſt obſtinate, perverſe, and refractory puritan.

About this time it was reported, that the prince intended to ſteal away; whereupon they laid wait to intercept him: hereupon the duke was ſent to tell them, that although they had ſtole thither out of love, they would never ſteal thence out of fear.

About this time the prince ſent a meſſage to his father, that if he ſhould receive any advertiſement, that he was detained by that ſtate as a priſoner, he would be pleaſed, for his ſake, never to think upon him any longer as a ſon, but reflect upon the good of his ſiſter, and the ſafety of his own kingdoms.

ARTICLE III.

The treaty of the match and reſtitution reciprocally ſubordinated.

It is fit to obſerve this paſſage, which is the hinge whereupon all his highneſs's ſubſequent actions are turned and moved. He had never ſtaid a ſevennight longer in Spain; he had never left any proxy with Briſtol; he had never taken any oath at the eſcurial; or ſo much as ever written a compliment to the lady; but that he had ſtill before his eyes, as his cynoſure[f], the promiſe made by the condé, for the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

To haſten the delivery of the lady, the duke preſented unto the condé, how his maſter was now in years; the prince his only ſon; and he would ſuffer in honour and reputation, to return home without his wife. The condé conſented hereunto, and deſired the prince would name a day for his departure.

This news came to the infanta, who ſeemed to be apprehenſive of the prince's going away, and prevailed with his higneſs to return this compliment unto her, that rather than he would give her Alteza any diſguſt, he would ſtay for ſeven years.

By this time ſir Francis Cottington is arrived with all things perfected by the king, and letters from the embaſſadors of good ſatisfaction, and a command from the king to his highneſs, to make his return within one month.

Now began the condé to enter into the treaty for the reſtitution of the Palatinate, ſaying, the lady ſhould by no means go to England, before that buſineſs was accommodated. And it was projected, that there ſhould be a reſtitution of the land to the prince Palatine, upon a condition of marriage with the emperor's daughter, and that he ſhould be bred in the emperor's court[g]. The prince demanded of the condé whether, in caſe the emperor proved refractory, the king his maſter would aſſiſt him with arms, to reduce him to reaſonable terms? The condé anſwered negatively[h], becauſe they had a maxim of ſtate, that the king of Spain muſt never fight againſt the imperor; for they would not employ their forces againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

Hereupon his highneſs made his protiſtation to the condé: "Look to it, Sir, for if you hold yourſelf to that, there is an end of all; for without this you may not rely upon either marriage or friendſhip."

By this time the prince is grown cheap and vulgar in the court of Spain, ſo that they will ſcarce beſtow a viſit upon him, and the condé came very ſeldom to him: and two letters came to the duke's hands, which ſhewed that all the condé did, was nothing but flaſhes and lightning; notwithſtanding, he ſeemed at this time to be in a good humour, and told the duke, that now certainly it muſt be a match,

[f] That is, pole-ſtar.

[g] It appears by the earl of Briſtol's defence, which is confirmed by a letter from king James, that this propoſal was not actually made till after the prince's departure from Madrid. Rapin.

[h] Either the earl of Briſtol, or the duke of Buckingham, muſt in this point not have ſpoken the truth. Rapin.

The

and the devil could not break it: the duke replied, he thought ſo, and the match had need be very firm and ſtrong, it had been ſeven years in ſoadering. The condé denied it, and ſaid plainly, it had not been really intended ſeven months; and ſaid, I well fetch that out of my deſk, that ſhall aſſure you thereof; and ſo produced two letters, the firſt was written with the king of Spain's own hand, dated the 5th of November 1622; and the other from the condé Olivares, of the 8th of November 1622, being an anſwer to that letter [i].

"Theſe letters having been inſerted in the hiſtory of king James I. vol. II. page 444, there is no need of repeating them here over again."

ARTICLE IV.

The prince's return from Spain.

And now the prince returning for England, being engaged to leave his proxy, did depoſit the ſame in the hands of the earl of Briſtol, who was to keep it, and uſe it as his procurator; that is, as he ſhould receive his highneſs's directions from time to time: his order for the preſent was, ſaid the duke) that if the confirmation came from Rome clear and entire [k], (which it did not) then within ſo many days he ſhould deliver it to the king of Spain.

The ſecond direction ſent to him, was by a letter which his highneſs ſent him between his departure from the eſcurial, and coming to the ſea-ſide, to this effect: that for fear a monaſtry ſhould rob him of his wife, he ſhould ſtay the delivery of the powers until the doubts were cleared; and that his highneſs would ſend him in the premiſſes ſome farther directions: here becauſe my lord of Briſtol in his letter of the 1ſt of November 1623, doth preſs ſo vehemently the prince his highneſs concerning this proxy, and the prince vowed openly before both houſes [l], that he had never by oath or honour engaged himſelf not to revoke the powers more than by the clauſe, De non revocanda Procuratione, inſerted in the inſtrument itſelf, and that he conceived the clauſe to be matter of form; and although eſſentially of no binding power, yet uſually thruſt into every ſuch inſtrument; and that the Civilians do hold, that it is lawful by the civil and canon law, for any man to revoke his proxy of marriage, notwithſtanding it hath the clauſe, De non revocanda Procuratione inſerted in it: therefore as to this point the duke concluded, that the earl of Briſtol, in charging this matter ſo highly on the prince, had much forgot himſelf [m].

ARTICLE V.

The ſubſequent proceedings of his majeſty in both the treaties, ſince the return of his highneſs.

The prince, by the mercy of God, came to Royſton, and made his relation to the king of all that had paſſed. His majeſty was glad, and told him, that he had acted well the part of a ſon; and now the part of a father muſt come upon the ſtage, which was to provide with all circumſpection, that his only ſon ſhould not be married with a portion of tears to his only daughter. And therefore his majeſty commanded by an expreſs diſpatch, the ſtay of the proxy in the earl of Briſtol's hands, until he had ſome better aſſurance of the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

Then was read his majeſty's letter to the earl of Briſtol, dated the 8th of October 1623, wherein the earl of Briſtol was required by the king, "ſo to endeavour, that he might have the joy of both treaties at Chriſtmaſs;" namely, thoſe about the marriage, and the reſtitution of the Palatinate. This the duke would have had looked upon as a poſitive order, not to deliver up the procuration, till the reſtitution of the Palatinate was actually promiſed; concerning which matter, ſee the earl of Briſtol's anſwer to the tenth article of his accuſation.

After that the duke went on in the following manner: you would perceive that by this diſpatch, Briſtol would lay hold on all hints and emergent occaſions, to put off the deſponſories without this required aſſurance by arms firſt obtained; but the truth is he did not ſo.

For 1ſt, the confirmation came from Rome, clogged and mangled; and inſtead of challenging thereupon, he labours with no ſmall ſtrength of wit to hide and palliate the ſame [n].

2. In the temporal articles the portion was altered, from ſix hundred thouſand pounds in ready caſh, to eighty thouſand pounds in money, and a few jewels, and a penſion of twenty thouſand pounds per annum. Inſtead of quarrelling with this mean alteration, he ſeems to approve and applaud the payment [o].

3. For the aſſurance of reſtitution of the Palitinate, the main foundation, both of match and friendſhip, he is ſo far from providing for it before, (which was the method preſcribed by the king) that he leaves it to be mediated by the infanta after the marriage.

Laſtly, Inſtead of putting off the contract, as any man in the world (upon the diſpatch from Royſton) would have done, he comes to prefix a preciſe day for the deſponſories.

Now from this raſh fixing of the day for the deſponſories in Spain, which was controlled again by an expreſs [p], from hence iſſued an unneceſſary diſcourteſy put upon the king, and in a manner upon the infanta, by the earl of Briſtol: from that proceeded a great affront put upon the prince, the taking away the title la princeſſa from the infanta, and the debarring of our embaſſadors from any further acceſs to her perſon.

Then was produced an anſwer of the king of Spain, to the memorial of the Engliſh embaſſador, implying a refuſal to aſſiſt by arms for the recovery of the Palatinate, in caſe the emperor conſented not to a reſtitution.

ARTICLE VI.

This queſtion the duke ſtated after this manner: Whether this being the full effect and product of all the negociation, which I have opened unto you, be ſufficient Super totum materiam, for his majeſty to rely upon with any ſafety; as well for the marriage of his only ſon, as for the relief of his only daughter? Or, that theſe treaties ſet aſide, his majeſty were beſt to truſt to his own ſtrength, and to ſtand upon his own feet? So the duke ended with this concluſion, that if the bringing us from darkneſs to light, did deſerve any thanks, we owe it, and muſt wholly aſcribe it to the prince his highneſs.

It is needleſs, I think, to make upon this narrative, reflections which may occur to every reader, after having ſeen the earl of Briſtol's defence. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with obſerving, how little proper this narrative was to afford ſufficient information to the two houſes of parliament, to enable them, upon good grounds, to form their reſolutions concerning the queſtion propoſed to them by the king. And yet upon this alone it was that they reſolved to adviſe the king to break with Spain, and this haſty advice was the principal cauſe of the differences afterwards between Charles I. and his parliaments.

[i] The earl of Briſtol pretended, theſe letters were written with no other intent but to get the negociation out of his hands, becauſe the court of Spain was in hopes of obtaining better conditions from the duke of Buckingham. Rapin.

[k] It is very doubtful, whether this condition was inſerted in the princes's declaration. Ibid.

[l] About five months after. Ibid.

[m] See the earl of Briſtol's defence, Article X.

[n] This could not be true. For the diſpenſation did not come from Rome till the beginning of December 1623, and the king's abſolute order not to deliver the diſpenſation, was dated November 23. Therefore the earl of Briſtol had not time to write to England, to palliate the defects of the diſpenſation, ſuppoſing it to have had any. Rapin.

[o] This muſt be miſrepreſented; for if the earl of Briſtol had been guilty of ſuch prevarication, the king would not have failed to bring it as an article of accuſation againſt him, which alone would have been ſufficient to condemn him. Ibid.

[p] It was the prince himſelf, and the duke, who had agreed with the king of Spain on the day the marriage ſhould be ſolemnized, viz. ten days after the coming of the diſpenſation, which the earl of Briſtol altered not. Ibid.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XX.

Containing the ſecond Part of the Reign of CHARLES I. from the Year 1640, to 1642.

[1640.] THE king's affairs, at the meeting of the parliament, were in a very ill ſituation. Inſtead of ſubduing the Scots, as he had flattered himſelf, he had the mortification to ſee them enter England, force the paſſage of the Tyne, defeat a conſiderable body of his army, and render themſelves maſters of Newcaſtle. Moreover, he ſaw his own troops not very ready to ſerve him. They conſiſted, for the moſt part, of ſoldiers liſted againſt their wills in the ſeveral counties, and prejudiced like the reſt of the nation againſt the government. Beſides, the valour of the Scots being magnified by thoſe who had been routed, and by the king's private enemies, inſpired the Engliſh troops with ſome terror. Moreover, the king wanted money to pay them. His whole reſource was the two hundred thouſand pounds borrowed of the city of London, till it ſhould pleaſe the parliament to furniſh him with the neceſſary ſupplies. But he could hardly expect that the parliament would be favourable to him. It was univerſally believed he had called it againſt his inclination, and becauſe he could find no other way to free himſelf from his preſent circumſtances; what had paſſed in the four parliaments held ſince the beginning of his reign, the diſſolutions of theſe parliaments with heat and animoſity, the impriſonment of the members, the diſcontinuance of parliaments for twelve years, the taxes impoſed by the king's ſole authority during that ſpace, the monopolies upon all ſorts of goods and commodities, the decay of trade, the open protection granted by the king to the papiſts and arminians, the ſeverities exerciſed upon the preſbyterians, the innovations in religion, the almoſt univerſal ſuſpicion of a deſign to introduce popery, the exceſſive authority uſurped by the council and ſtar-chamber, the corruption of the judges, in a word, the principles of arbitrary power aſſerted by the court, bred a general diſcontent. The king was not ignorant of it, and till now had diſregarded it; but he began to dread the conſequences when he ſaw himſelf upon the point of being expoſed to the ill humour of a new parliament, who probably would not loſe the opportunity of labouring the redreſs of grievances, which the former parliaments had in vain demanded. Nevertheleſs he was ſo prejudiced and exaſperated againſt the Scots, that he ſtill hoped the new parliament would look upon their entrance into England as an invaſion, as a war made, not upon the king, but the kingdom, and would furniſh the means to drive them into their conutry and chaſtize their audaciouſneſs. But it was not long before he perceived his hopes ill-grounded.

The parliament met the 3d of November, according to the king's writs: there had never been a more numerous aſſembly, very few members being abſent [q]. Every one looked upon this as the faireſt opportunity that could poſſibly offer to cure the evils of the kingdom; and all the members, except ſuch as were entirely devoted to the king, were ready to contribute to the reſtoring of the government to its true and ancient conſtitution. Accordingly this was what the people expected. On the firſt day, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My Lords,

"THE knowledge I had of the deſires of my Scotiſh ſubjects, was the cauſe of my calling the laſt aſſembly of parliament; wherein, had I been believed, I ſincerely think that things had not fallen out as now we ſee. But it is no wonder that men are ſo ſlow to believe that ſo great a ſedition ſhould be raiſed on ſo little ground. But now, my lords, and gentlemen, the honor and ſafety of this kingdom lying ſo near at ſtake, I am reſolved to put myſelf freely and clearly on the love and affection of my Engliſh ſubjects, as theſe of my lords that did wait on me at York, very well remember I there declared.

"Therefore, my lords, I ſhall not mention my own intereſt, or that ſupport I might juſtly expect from you, till the common ſafety be ſecured; though I muſt tell you, I am not aſhamed to ſay, thoſe charges I have been at have been merely for the ſecurity and good of this kingdom; though the ſucceſs hath not been anſwerable to my deſires: therefore I ſhall only deſire you to conſider the beſt way both for the ſafety and ſecurity of this kingdom; wherein there are two parts chiefly conſiderable. Firſt, the chaſing out of rebels [r]. And ſecondly, that other, in ſatisfying your juſt grievances, wherein I promiſe you to concur ſo heartily and clearly with you, that all the world may ſee my intentions have ever been and ſhall be to make this a glorious and flouriſhing kingdom. There are only two things that I ſhall mention to you: the one is to tell you, that the loan of money which I lately had from the city of London, wherein the lords that waited on me at York aſſiſted me, will only maintain my army for two months, from the beginning of that time it was granted. Now, my lords and gentlemen, I leave it to your conſiderations what diſhonor and miſchief it might be, in caſe for want of money my army be diſbanded before the rebels be put out of this kingdom. Secondly, the ſecuring againſt the calamities the northern people endure at this time, and ſo long as the treaty is on foot: and in this I ſay not only they, but all this kingdom will ſuffer the harm: therefore I leave this alſo to your conſideration, for the ordering of thoſe great affairs, whereof you are to treat at this time. I am ſo confident of your love to me, and that your care is for the honor and ſafety of the kingdom, that I ſhall freely and willingly leave to you where to begin. Only this, that you may the better know the ſtate of all the affairs, I have commanded my lord keeper to give you a ſhort and free account of thoſe things that have happened in this interim, with this proteſtation, that if this account be not ſatisfactory as it ought to be, I ſhall whenſoever you deſire, give you a full and perfect account of every particular. One thing more I deſire of you, as one of the greateſt means to make this a happy parliament, that you on your parts, as I on mine, lay aſide all ſuſpicion one of another; for, as I promiſed my lords at York, it ſhall not be my fault if this be not a happy and good parliament."

After the king had done ſpeaking, the lord keeper Finch made his ſpeech. He began with encomiums of the king and queen, and then endeavoured to perſuade the two houſes that the calling of the parliament was wholly owing to his majeſty, who had reſolved it before he received any petition on that ſubject [s]. After that he endeavoured to ſhew, though in a very general manner, that the Scots had violated the late treaty, and the king, againſt his will, taken up arms by the unanimous advice of his council, to reduce them to obedience. He concluded with informing both houſes of what had paſſed as well in the beginning of the war as in the conferences at Rippon.

The commons being returned to their houſe, choſe for ſpeaker William Lenthall, bencher of Lincolns-Inn, who was propoſed by ſir Henry Vane, ſecretary of ſtate [t]. This choice being approved by the king, they appointed, accord-

[r] That is, the Scots. Some exception being taken at the king's calling them rebels, he explained and juſtified that expreſſion in a ſpeech to the lords, November 5. See Ruſhworth, tom. iv. p. 17. Whitelock, p. 38.

[s] And yet the lord Clarendon aſcribes the calling the parliament to the advice of the great council of peers at York. Rapin.

[t] The lord Clarendon ſays, the king deſigned ſir Thomas Gardiner, recorder of London to be ſpeaker: but he could not get himſelf elected for London, nor anyother borough. And no wonder, if it be true, as Whitelock ſays, ing to cuſtom, a committee to examine all queſtions that might ariſe about elections, returns, or other privileges of the houſe. Then it was reſolved, that a committee of the whole houſe ſhould meet on certain days of the week, for theſe five principal heads, namely, for religion, grievances, courts of juſtice, trade, and Ireland. Theſe were the articles which chiefly occaſioned the nation's complaints and murmurs, and the commons thereby evidently diſcovered their intentions.

As from the 3d of November 1640, to the 25th of Auguſt 1642, the hiſtory of this reign wholly conſiſts of parliamentary tranſactions, I think it neceſſary before all things to give a deſcription of this parliament, and of the different parties into which it was divided. It will afterwards be more eaſy to perceive the motives of their acts and reſolves, and withal the true grounds of the civil war that afflicted England.

Firſt, it is certain there was hardly a member of either houſe but what was diſpoſed to procure the redreſs of the grievances ſo long complained of. Theſe grievances were ſo manifeſt, that it was almoſt impoſſible, without ſubverting the conſtitution of the government, to find plauſible reaſons to juſtify the king's and the miniſtry's conduct, during the fifteen foregoing years. They were of ſuch a nature, that no man was free from them, not even thoſe who ſerved for inſtruments to impoſe them on the people, though they were in great meaſure indemnified ſome other way. In ſhort, they were of ſuch conſequence, that admitting the principles whereon they were founded, the neceſſary reſult was a total ſubverſion of the government, and an arbitrary power unknown to the Engliſh for many ages. It may therefore be affirmed, that from the very beginning of this parliament, the general ſentiment of both houſes was, that the preſent opportunity of applying proper remedies to the evils of the kingdom was not to be neglected.

But the members were divided upon a principal point, which however flowed from the general diſpoſition. Some were of opinion, that after all the grievances were redreſſed, the government ſhould be reſtored to its natural ſtate, ſuch as it was before the reigns of James and Charles, without any additions or alterations. Others, on the contrary, thought that after the redreſs of grievances, it would be neceſſary to uſe ſome effectual method to put it out of the king's power ever to invade the liberties of the people and the privileges of the parliament: but theſe carefully concealed their intentions, leſt they ſhould give occaſion to the others to ſuſpect a deſign to alter the eſtabliſhed government, and cauſe them to oppoſe even the moſt reaſonable things, out of fear of the conſequences. They hoped to find, or ſtart, in time, opportunities enough to inſpire the whole nation with a diſtruſt of the king, and by that means to accompliſh their ends.

Such being the general diſpoſition of the parliament, it is evident the entrance of the Scots into England was to be deemed a very conſiderable advantage, granted to the Engliſh by providence, to hinder the king from breaking the meaſures which might be taken againſt him. The king was under an abſolute neceſſity to maintain an army for his defence againſt the Scots, without having for that purpoſe other means than the aſſiſtance of the parliament: for the times being changed, the impoſing of arbitrary taxes could not be practiſed any longer, upon which probably he had depended in the beginning of the war, ſince, in a month after taking the field, he was deſtitute of money to pay his troops. So it was the parliament's intereſt to keep the king in his neceſſity, that he might not be able to oppoſe the reſolutions of the two houſes. It is not therefore to be thought ſtrange, that the parliament did not much attend to what the king moſt deſired, namely, to be enabled to drive the Scots out of the kingdom, ſince on the contrary the preſence of the Scots gave the two houſes a ſuperiority they were unwilling to loſe.

The ſentiments of the parliament were alſo very various with reſpect to religion. There were in the houſes rigid epiſcopalians, who believed biſhops eſſential to religion, and that without them there was no lawful ordination, nor conſequently any valid adminiſtration of the ſacraments: of this number were the biſhops, and almoſt all the king's party. There were moderate epiſcopalians, who being ſincerely attached to the church of England, had however different ideas of epiſcopacy: they had a veneration for epiſcopal government, as being very ancient in the church, and what they moſt liked; but though they had no deſign to alter it, they did not think it however ſo abſolutely neceſſary, but that religion might well ſubſiſt under any other kind of government: this was the prevailing opinion, and eſpouſed by a majority in both houſes. Wherefore it may be ſaid, that in the beginning of this parliament the members in general had no intention to attac the government of the church, eſtabliſhed in England ſince the reformation.

But there was in the two houſes another party more powerful by the ability of their leaders than by their number: I mean that of the preſbyterians, who were divided alſo into moderate and rigid. The former had no other view than to obtain ſome liberty and ſecurity againſt perſecution. The latter were of a different ſtamp. They conſidered epiſcopal government as repugnant to the word of God, and the juriſdiction of the biſhops as a real tyranny. Theſe were the particular objects of the hatred of the king, miniſtry, biſhops, and moſt of the clergy, becauſe their principles tended to the utter ruin of the church of England. For that reaſon they believed there was no ſafety for them, but in an entire change of epiſcopal into preſbyterian government. But they eaſily perceived, that to attain their ends the king was to be diſabled to oppoſe them, knowing that, as long as it was in his power, he would never conſent to that change. Their number was however ſo inconſiderable, that they would have made no figure in the parliament, had they not been ſupported by the Scots, whoſe aid they could not be without. Moreover, among theſe rigid preſbyterians lay concealed a certain ſet of men, known afterwards by the name of Independents, who held, concerning civil as well as eccleſiaſtical government, uncommon opinions, which they took care not to explain till they found occaſion to publiſh them. They were contented for ſome years to conceal themſelves among the rigid preſbyterians, in order at a proper time to accompliſh their deſigns more effectually. It was the particular intereſt of theſe men ſo to manage, that the government of the ſtate ſhould be changed, or rather overthrown, well knowing their party could never ſubſiſt but in anarchy. And therefore, without diſcovering their intentions, they improved all occaſions to ſow and cheriſh diſcord between the king and the parliament. The whole preſbyterian party was directed by the heads of the rigids and independents, men of great parts, who, without diſcovering themſelves more than was neceſſary, ſeemed to confine their deſigns to the redreſs of grievances, which was the general aim of the parliament, and wherein almoſt all were united. They found a double advantage in this conduct: firſt, they removed all ſuſpicion of their intending to change the government of church or ſtate, and withal preventing the union of the other members, who would not have failed to unite, in order to oppoſe ſuch a change. The ſecond advantage was, that by being ſolely intent at firſt upon the redreſs of grievances, they had frequent occaſions of exclaiming againſt the king's former adminiſtration, and fomenting the parliament's diſtruſt and jealouſy of him: for it was by that chiefly they hoped to be able to execute their projects.

Such being the diſpoſition of the parliament, it is eaſy to perceive the reaſon why the commons were ſo intent at firſt upon the redreſs of grievances, as well public as private. A great number of petitions upon that ſubject were preſented to them, within a few days after their meeting. Many members were likewiſe charged with the like petitions from their burroughs and ſhires, and ſeveral very mortifying ſpeeches to the king and his miniſters were made in the houſe [u]. Of all theſe ſpeeches I ſhall inſert only one, wherein are enumerated all the public grievances, of which the people thought to have reaſon to complain: it is that of Mr. Pym, member of parliament for Taviſtock in the county of Devon [x].

" Mr. Speaker,

" TO redreſs grievances will not hinder, but further the ſervice of the king: to take away the weights, does as much advantage motion, as to add wings.

" I ſhall, 1. Inſtance ſeveral heads of thoſe grievances we labour under. 2. Demonſtrate them to be as hurtful to the king as to the people. 3. That the remedies will prove equally good to both of them.

ſays, that ſuch a ſpirit of oppoſition to the court proceedings, was in the hearts and actions of moſt of the people, that very few of that party had the favour to be choſen members of this parliament. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 135. Whitelock, p. 37.

[u] Arthur Capel (afterwards lord Capel) preſented a petition for Hertfordſhire, ſir John Packington for Worceſterſhire, ſir John Culpeper for Kent, ſir Philip Muſgrave for Weſtmoreland, ſir Francis Seymour for Wilts, (theſe turned afterwards for the king); Henry Bellaſis and Ferdinando lord Fairfax for Yorkſhire, ſir Edmund Mountford for Norfolk, ſir Thomas Barrington for Eſſex, William Pierpont for Shropſhire, ſir Guy Palmer for Rutland, &c. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 21.

[x] Rapin, by miſtake, has inſerted in his hiſtory Mr. Pym's ſpeech which he ſpoke the 17th of Auguſt, in the laſt parliament, and of which mention is made in vol. II. page 555. Wherefore the tranſlator has inſerted here the true ſpeech, as it is found in Ruſhworth, Ibid.

" The

" The king can do no wrong; the law caſts all miſcarriages upon the miniſters: thus the influence of heaven conveyeth vigour into ſublunary creatures; but the malignity of all epidemical diſeaſes proceedeth from the ill-affected qualities of the earth or air.

" There are a threefold ſort of grievances: 1. Some againſt the privilege of parliament: 2. Others to the prejudice of religion: 3. Some againſt the liberty of the ſubject. For the firſt, the members are free from arreſts; to have liberty of ſpeech; a legiſlative, judiciary, and conciliary power; being the ſame to the body politic, as the faculties of the ſoul to a man.

" Theſe privileges have been broken: 1. In reſtraining the members from ſpeaking. 2. In forbidding the ſpeaker to put a queſtion; both of theſe practiſed in the laſt parliament. 3. By impriſoning divers members for matters done in parliament. 4. By proceedings againſt them for the ſame in the inferior courts. 5. Enjoining them to give ſecurity for their good behaviour, and continuing them in priſon even to their death. 6. In abrupt diſſolutions of parliament; the great grievance; like the execution of a man without being heard: it receives a being by the ſummons, and a civil death by diſſolution; not only thereby to die, but to be made inteſtabiles, uncapable of making their wills, the good acts that they were about.

" The ſecond is, encouragement of popery: 1. By ſuſpenſion of laws againſt them: now it is certain, there can be no ſecurity from papiſts, but in their diſability; their principles are incompatible with any other religion; laws will not reſtrain them, nor oaths; for the pope diſpenſeth with both, and his command acts them againſt the realm in ſpirituals and temporals, in ordine ad ſpiritualia. Henry III. and Henry IV. of France, were no proteſtants, yet were murdered becauſe they tolerated reformation. 2. By allowing them places of truſt and honour in the commonwealth. 3. Their free reſort to London, and to the court; to communicate their counſels and deſigns, diving into the ſecrets of ſtate. 4. That as they have a congregation of cardinals at Rome, for advancing the pope's authority in England; ſo have they a nuntio here, for the execution thereof.

" Then as to innovations of religion introduced: 1. Maintenance of popiſh tenets, in books, ſermons, and diſputations. 2. Practice of popiſh ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, images, crucifixes, bowings, &c. Theſe I may in ſome reſpect compare to the dry bones in Ezekiel, which firſt came together, then ſinews and fleſh came upon them, afterwards the ſkin covered them, and then breath, and life was put into them; ſo firſt the form, then the ſpirit and life of popery was to come amongſt us. 3. Preferment of perſons popiſhly affected. 4. The diſcouragement of proteſtants, by over rigid proſecutions of the ſcrupulous for things indifferent: no vice made ſo great as inconformity; by puniſhing without law, for not reading the book for Sunday recreations; for not removing the communion-table otherwiſe; for not coming to the rails to receive the communion; for preaching on the Lord's day in the afternoon; for catechiſing otherwiſe than as in the ſhort catechiſm in the Common Prayer Book. 5. By incroachment of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; particularly, 1. In fining and impriſoning without law. 2. Challenging their juriſdiction to be appropriated to their order jure divino. 3. Contriving and publiſhing new articles of viſitation, new canons; and the boldneſs of biſhops, and their ſubordinate officers and officials.

" As to the third ſort of grievances, I ſhall obſerve rather the order of time when they were acted, than the conſequence; but when we come to the cure, it will be the beſt to begin with the moſt important.

" There is firſt, tunnage and poundage, and the late new book of rates taken by prerogative, without grant of parliament; from whence theſe inconveniences follow: 1. Mens goods are ſeized, their ſuits ſtopt. 2. Miſemployment of the ſums of money impoſed; for though intended for the guard of the ſeas, they are diſpoſed to other uſes, and a new tax raiſed for the ſame purpoſe. 3. The burden exceſſive, trade hindered, home commodities abaſed, and foreign inhanſed; by which means the ſtock of the kingdom is diminiſhed, eſpecially to the poor planters in America, by the tax upon tobacco.

" There is compoſition for knighthood; which, though it refers to a former cuſtom, yet upon the ſame grounds, the king may renew it by a new fine, immoderate multiplication of diſtreſs and iſſues, and enforce them to compound with the commiſſioners. An inundation of monopolies undertaken by papiſts, and full of miſchief: firſt, by imparing the goodneſs, and enhanſing the price of ſalt, ſoap, beer, coals, &c. Secondly, under colour of which, trade was reſtrained to a few hands. Thirdly, Many perſons thereupon illegally impriſoned.

" But the great and unparalleled grievance is the ſhip-money, being aggravated, not ſupported by the judgment, which is not grounded upon law, cuſtom, precedent, or authority: it being improper for a caſe of neceſſity; and abounding in variety of miſchief: as, firſt, The general extent to all perſons, all times, and the ſubject left remedileſs. Secondly, The arbitrary proportion without limits. Thirdly, Impoſed by writ, and diſpoſed by inſtructions. Improper for the office of a ſheriff in the inland counties, and inconvenient for the inhabitants; without rule or ſuitable means for the levying or managing of it.

" The enlargements of foreſts beyond the bounds of the ſtatutes 27 and 28 Edward I. which perambulations then were the cauſe of that famous Charta de Foreſta: and now reviving theſe old queſtions, new diſtempers may follow, and particular obliquities we may already obſerve, and ſurreptitious proceedings, as in Eſſex; yet that verdict was enforced in other counties, and a judgment upon the matter after three or four hundred years quiet poſſeſſion of the ſubject, who thereupon is forced to compound for great fines.

" The ſelling of nuſance: the king as a farther of the commonwealth, is to take care of the public commodities and advantages of the ſubjects, as rivers, highways, and common-ſewers, by ordinary writs, Ad quod damnum: but now by a courſe extrajudicial, by inforcing compoſitions: ſo then, if really it be a nuſance that is compounded for, it is an hurt to the people; if no nuſance, then it is a grand prejudice to the party.

" The commiſſion for buildings about London, was preſented as a grievance in the time of king James; now much more increaſed, and much more prejudicial.

" The commiſſion for depopulations began ſome few years ſince; by both theſe commiſſions, the ſubject is reſtrained from diſpoſing of his own; demoliſhing their houſes, puniſhing and fining their perſons for that, for which they are ſtill liable by law; for the king cannot licence a nuſance; and although theſe are not nuſances, yet it is of ill-conſequence to be compounded for, and may make a precedent for kings to licence ſuch things as are nuſances indeed.

" Military charges ought not to be laid upon the people by warrant of the king's hand, nor by letters of the council-table, nor by order of the lords lieutenants of counties, nor their deputies. It began to be practiſed as a loan for ſupply of coat and conduct-money in queen Elizabeth's time, with promiſe to be repaid it, as appears by a conſtat warrant in the Exchequer, and certain payments: but now a-days never repaid. The firſt particular brought into a tax was, the muſter-maſter's wages; which being but for a ſmall ſum, was generally digeſted: yet in the laſt parliament, it was deſigned to be remedied. But now there follows preſſing of men againſt their wills, or to find others. 2dly, Proviſions for public magazines for powder, ſpades, and pickaxes. 3dly, Salary of officers, cart-horſes, carts, and ſuch like.

" The extrajudicial declarations of judges without hearing of counſel or argument: a teeming grievance, productive of many others.

" Monopolies countenanced by the council-table, and the clauſe of their patents of monopolies, commanding the juſtices of the peace to aſſiſt them; whereby the great abilities of that honourable board receive a ſtain, by ſuch matters of ſo mean a report in the eſtimation of the law, ſo ill in the apprehenſion of the people.

" The high-court of ſtar-chamber, called in the parliament rolls Magnum Concilium to which the parliaments were wont to refer ſuch matters as they had not time to determine: a court erected againſt oppreſſion, a court of councils, and a court of juſtice, now an inſtrument of erecting and defending monopolies, to ſet a face of public good on things pernicious.

" That great and moſt eminent power of the king in edicts and proclamations, called Leges Temporis, uſed heretofore to encounter with ſudden and unexpected danger, till the great council of the king could be called, hath of late been exerciſed for enjoining and maintaining monopolies. But the laſt and greateſt grievance leads us a ſtep higher, even as high as heaven, as the throne of God, his word and truth. The ambitious and corrupt clergy, preaching down the laws of God, and liberties of the kingdom; pretending divine authority and abſolute power in the king, to do what he will with us; and this preaching is the highway to preferment: as one Manwaring ſentenced in the former parliament for this doctrine, then a doctor, is now become a bishop. The intermission of parliaments contrary to the statute, whereby they are to be called once a year, is the main cause of all these and other mischiefs, to which parliaments give remedy.

"These grievances are as well hurtful to the king as to the subjects, by interrupting their communion; they have need of his general pardon, and to be secured from projectors and informers; to be freed from obsolete laws, and from the subtle devices of such who seek to strain the prerogative to their own private advantage, and the public hurt; and the king hath need of them for counsel, for support. Queen Elizabeth's victorious attempts, were for the most part carried on upon the subjects purses, and not upon her own; though the honor and profit were hers. These discontents at home diminish the king's reputation abroad, and disadvantage his treaties, and weaken his party beyond sea; by encouraging popery; by forcing the subjects to leave the kingdom, to the prejudice of the king's customs and subsidies. As for instance, divers clothiers forced away, who set up their manufacturies abroad to the hurt of the kingdom.

"The king hath received upon the monopoly of wines, thirty thousand pounds per ann. The vintner pays forty shillings per tun, which comes to ninety thousand pounds; the price upon the subject by retail is increased two-pence a quart, which comes to eight pounds a tun; and so forty-five thousand tun brought in yearly, amounts to three hundred and sixty thousand pounds; which is three hundred and thirty thousand pounds lost to the kingdom, above the king's receipt.

"Now the remedies, and removing these grievances, consist of two main branches, in declaring the law where it is doubtful, and in providing for the execution of the law where it is clear. But these I refer to a future time, and for the present advise speedily to desire a conference with the lords touching grievances; and always to humble ourselves for God's assistance."

As Mr. Pym, who spoke this speech, was one of the leading men in the house of commons, he was extremely applauded, and the more, that in giving a summary of all the public grievances, he had not used any disrespectful terms against the king or his ministers. This speech was followed with another by sir Benjamin Rudyard, who to intimate that there was a settled design to introduce popery and arbitrary power into England, expressed himself after this manner:

"They have brought it to pass, that under the name of puritans, all our religion is branded; and under a few hard words against jesuits, all popery is countenanced. Whosoever squares his actions by any rule, either divine or human, he is a puritan; whosoever would be governed by the king's laws, he is a puritan; he that will not do whatsoever other men would have him do, he is a puritan: their great work, their master-piece, now, is to make all those of the religion, to be the suspected party of the kingdom."

These speeches were seconded with so great a number of complaints and petitions concerning grievances both public and private, that the house was divided into above forty committees upon this single article, according to the different nature of the complaints. But before the particular examination of these grievances was begun, the commons thought fit to desire the concurrence of the lords to move the king, he would be pleased to appoint a fast, which met with no opposition either from the lords or the king[x]. Then they appointed a committee to examine what number of papists were in and about London, and how they were armed. As the king, by a message, had acquainted them with his design to publish a proclamation against recusants, the committee was empowered to examine the same after the publication, and see how it was executed.

Two days after, on the 9th of November, the house going upon the grievances, the lord Digby, son of the earl of Bristol, made on that subject a speech, which he concluded with this motion, "That a select committee may be appointed to draw out of all that has been complained of, such a remonstrance as may be a faithful and lively representation to his majesty of the deplorable state of the kingdom[y]." Very probably, this motion had been resolved among the leaders, because they were apprehensive of the king's opposing the redress of grievances, and because in that case it was requisite to shew the people the necessity of this redress, by informing them wherein consisted the grievances of the nation. The lord Digby's motion being approved, the house appointed a committee of twenty-four to prepare the remonstrance. But because the king shewed greater condescension than was expected, the remonstrance was not drawn till above a year after, and upon another occasion.

Sir John Culpeper, one of the members who had spoken upon the grievances, having chiefly insisted on monopolies, it was voted, that all such members as directly or indirectly had any share in, or benefit from any project or monopoly, should be disabled to sit in the house, and that Mr. Speaker should issue out writs to chuse others in their room. There were afterwards four expelled the house upon that account[z].

During the four or five first days, the house of commons was almost wholly employed in receiving petitions and complaints, as well from private persons, as from burroughs and shires. Amongst the private petitions, the most remarkable was those of Bastwick, Burton, Prynn[a], Lilburn, Leighton, Jennings, Smart[b]. These men complained of the exorbitant pains and penalties inflicted on them by the star-chamber and high commission. As I intend not to dwell upon the affairs of private persons, I shall only say, that within the space of about a year, the commons found time to examine all these sentences one after another, and to punish the members of the star-chamber, who had given their votes, by condemning them to pay all the costs and damages of the parties. The reparations to Bastwick, Prynn, and Burton were fixed to above four thousand pounds each[c]. All the other complaints of private persons against the courts of justice, or the star chamber and high commission, or certain bishops and deans, who laboured more than the rest, to introduce innovations in religion, were heard. The commons took a pleasure to mortify in their turn, those who had stretched the prerogative royal in persecuting the puritans, or rather such as did not bear the yoke patiently, who were confounded under that name, with the presbyterians.

If the commons endeavoured to do justice to private persons, who had suffered any injury during the first fifteen years of this reign, it may well be imagined, they neglected not to redress the grievances of the whole nation. This was their principal business during the first year of their session. Though the parliament was composed of several parties, who had not all the same views, they were however, united with respect to the redress of grievances. Even those members who were most devoted to the king, durst not oppose the general sentiment, some because they thought the thing just, others, not to lose their labour, and for fear of rendering themselves too suspected.

Among those who had most contributed to the public mischiefs, the archbishop of Canterbury was considered as one of the chief and most worthy of punishment, as being author of the innovations in the church, promoter of the war with Scotland, persecutor of the presbyterians, and head of the armenians. The earl of Strafford was likewise of this number, because he had so entirely devoted himself to the king, that in his two great offices of president of the court of York, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he had no other view than to stretch the prerogative royal, and increase the king's revenues. His proud and haughty carriage had no less offended the public than his actions, whereby he strove to establish an arbitrary power. He was accused of advising the king to transport his Prynn and Burton landing at the same time, viz. November 28, at Southampton, were received with extraordinary demonstrations of esteem, had their charges bore, and liberal presents given them. This method and ceremony kept them company all their journey, and so many people met them upon their approach to London, that they were carried into the city by above ten thousand persons, with boughs and flowers in their hands. Iriſh army into England, to ſubdue the oppoſers of his will. Though he was highly in the king's favour, he had nevertheleſs made himſelf many enemies at court and in the kingdom, who earneſtly ſought occaſions to ruin him. The lord-keeper Finch was looked upon alſo as a pernicious counſellor, wholly devoted to the king, and ready for any attempt to eſtabliſh a deſpotic government. It was not doubted, but he was the man that had corrupted the judges in the buſineſs of ſhip-money. Sir Francis Windebank, ſecretary of ſtate, was reckoned the patron of the catholics, and it was by his means that the condemned prieſts and jeſuits eſcaped one way or other the ſentence paſſed upon them. In ſhort, the judges of the realm had rendered themſelves extremely odious to the people, as well by the judgment they had given in Mr. Hampden's affair, as by numberleſs other acts of injuſtice on private perſons. Theſe were the principal authors of the grievances, whom the commons intended to bring to exemplary puniſhment.

The earl of Strafford was the firſt on whom the ſtorm fell. The 11th of November, eight days after the opening of the parliament, Mr. Pym having deſired, and obtained his deſire of the commons, that the doors of the houſe might be locked and the outward room cleared of ſtrangers, informed them, that there were ſeveral complaints againſt the earl of Strafford, which afforded good ground to accuſe him of high treaſon. Upon this information, the houſe immediately appointed a committee of ſeven [d], who withdrawing into another room, and conferring together, reported preſently after, that it was their opinion, there was juſt cauſe to impeach the earl of Strafford. Then Mr. Pym was ordered to go to the houſe of lords, and accuſe the earl of high-treaſon, in the name of all the commons. He had orders likewiſe to tell the lords that in due time the commons would produce the articles of accuſation, and in the mean time, deſired the accuſed might be put into ſafe cuſtody. The earl of Strafford was that very day come from the army, and had taken his place in the houſe of lords. Before his departure from the army, he had received notice that there was a deſign to attack him. But whether through pride, or a belief that having done nothing without the king's warrant, he was ſecure, he ſlighted the advice, and would be preſent in the parliament. Indeed, ſome months before, the king's protection was more than ſufficient to ſcreen him from all danger. But the face of affairs was altered, and it is ſtrange a perſon of ſo great a genius, and ſo good ſenſe, could imagine the king was able to protect him in ſuch a juncture [e]. However this be, upon the commons impeachment, the lords committed him to the cuſtody of the black-rod, and ſome days after ſent him to the Tower. As this affair was prolonged till May the next year, I ſhall not ſpeak of it, till I come to the time of this famous trial, and ſhall continue to relate, without interruption, what concerns the redreſs of grievances, and the puniſhment or accuſation of their authors.

Secretary Windebank was attacked next. Several petitions were preſented againſt him to the houſe, whereof he was member complaining, that as ſecretary of ſtate, he had iſſued out warrants under his own hand, for the diſcharge of proſecutions againſt prieſts, and for their releaſe out of priſon. All theſe petitions tended to ſhew, that he loſt no opportunity to countenance the papiſts, and gloried in being reckoned their patron. I do not know whether he profeſſed the Roman catholic religion. Be this as it will, he was ſummoned ſeveral times to come to the houſe, and anſwer what was laid to his charge. But he believed it more proper to avoid the impending ſtorm, and withdraw into France. When he was out of danger, he ſent the earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain, a letter, lamenting his misfortune, and intimating, that if he was guilty, it was only for having ſerved the king faithfully, and obeyed his orders [f].

The convocation, their canons-oath, and the tax they had laid upon the clergy to aid the king in his war with Scotland, were next taken into conſideration by the houſe. This affair was debated with great warmth: ſeveral members made on the occaſion ſpeeches tending to ſhew the king could not, by his authority, turn the convocation into a ſynod. They alleged for reaſon, that the clergy who compoſed it could act but as members of the convocation, becauſe to act as members of a ſynod, they ought to have been elected by the people, and it did not belong to the king to make this election as he pleaſed. That the convocation or ſynod had not power to make canons for the whole nation, without the conſent of the people themſelves, nor conſequently without the intervention of the parliament. That moſt of the canons were unjuſt in themſelves, and tended to increaſe the clergy's power, to the prejudice of the king's authority and the people's liberties. That by theſe canons the convocation aſſumed a power above the parliament. That the oath they had impoſed was ſtrange, doubtful, contrary to the privileges of the parliament and the rights of the people, and obliged men to ſwear as neceſſary, things that were alterable without any danger to religion: for inſtance, ſuppoſing it true that biſhops are jure divino, which the church of England never acknowledged [g], it could not be affirmed that archbiſhops, deans, and archdeacons are of divine or apoſtolical inſtitution; and yet people were made to ſwear never to conſent to the altering of the government of the church by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c. That by this oath, the repreſentatives of the nation would be ſo tied up, that though the parliament ſhould have power to alter the government of the church, they could not even debate upon that ſubject, by reaſon of their oath. Upon theſe and many other reaſons, which I omit, to avoid tediouſneſs, the commons voted unanimouſly, 1. That the clergy of England convened in a convocation or ſynod, or otherwiſe, have no power to make any conſtitutions, canons, or acts whatſoever, in matters of doctrine or diſcipline, or otherwiſe, to bind the clergy or laity of the land without common conſent in parliament. 2. That the canons treated upon by the late convocation, do contain matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of the realm, to the rights of parliament, to the property and liberty of the ſubject, tending to ſedition, and of dangerous conſequence [h].

Immediately after theſe reſolutions, the houſe appointed a committee of thirty-ſix; to examine who were the chief promoters of theſe canons, and how they had been executed: to conſider how far, in particular, the archbiſhop of Canterbury had been concerned in the great deſign of ſubverting the laws of the land and religion; and to draw up a charge againſt him and ſuch others as ſhould appear guilty of the ſame crime. The Scotiſh commiſſioners, who were ſent to London to continue the treaty begun at Rippon, were, as I ſaid, in good underſtanding with the leading members of the commons, and in all appearance had been informed of the deſign to proſecute the archbiſhop: and therefore, to make the blow fall the heavier on this prelate, by joining their complaints with thoſe of the commons, they preſented the next day to the lords a charge againſt him to this effect:

"That he was the cauſe of all the troubles in Scotland, [e] Whitelock ſays, it was conſidered at York, whether the earl ſhould repair to the houſe, or continue in the north with the army. The earl humbly deſired his majeſty to excuſe his going to parliament, alleging, "He ſhould not be able to do him any ſervice there, but rather be a means to hinder his affairs; and beſides, in caſe they ſhould fall upon him, he being at a diſtance, might the better retire from danger, &c." The king, notwithſtanding all he could ſay, inſiſted upon the earl's coming to parliament, and told him, "As he was king of England, he was able to ſecure him from any danger, and the parliament ſhould not touch one heir of his head. So in obedience to the king's commands, the earl came to London, but not as Rapin ſays, the ſame day he was impeached, but a few days before. Whitelock. p. 37. The lord Clarendon ſays, it was believed he came to the houſe that day, to accuſe the lord Say, and ſome others, of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom, Vol. i. p. 139. Nalſon, tom, I. p. 652.

[g] The words of Mr. Nathaniel Fienes's ſpeech are, "Whether biſhops be jure divino, we know is a diſpute among the papiſts, and never did any proteſtant hold it but of late years: but that archbiſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c. ſhould be jure divino, I do not know that ever any Chriſtian held it before, and yet he that takes this oath muſt ſwear it. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 109.——Sir Edward Deering began his ſpeech about the canons to this effect: "The pope (ſay they) has a tripple crown, anſwerable thereto he pretends to a threefold law: the firſt is jus divinum, and this he would have you think to be the coronet next his head, and that which ſecures his power. The ſecond is jus humanum. Conſtantine's donation the gift of indulgent princes, temporal power: this is his middle crown. Out of theſe two the pope frames his third crown himſelf, and ſets it upon the top; that is jus canonicum, the canon law, of more uſe to his popeſhip than both the others.—Jus ſo our prelates, from the pretending divinity of their epiſcopacy, and from the temporal power granted by our princes, would now obtrude a new canon law upon us." He concludes with ſaying, "No canons can bind the laity, where we have no voice of our own, nor choice of the clergy perſons who do found them, nor aſſent in the ſuſception of them after they are framed; quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus tractari debet." Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 104—Mr. Bagſhaw, in his ſpeech, affirmed that the clergy who had held the late ſynod, were fallen into a premunire upon that account. Diurn. Oc. p. 3.

[h] It was voted likewiſe, nemine contradicente, that the ſeveral grants of the benevolence or contribution granted to his moſt excellent majeſty by the clergy in their late convocation, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 112——Some pretend theſe votes were very unjuſt; if ſo, it is ſtrange no member ſhould oppoſe them. The lord Clarendon freely owns that the canons were unwarrantable, even in a more favourable ſeaſon, tom. IV. p. 130.

John

and the author and urger of introducing into Scotland the Book of Canons and the Liturgy, as appeared by fourteen letters which they offered to produce: that the Scotch prelates having ſent to him a book of canons, written upon the one ſide only, with the other ſide blank, he had made ſeveral interlinings, and filled up the blank pages with ſeveral directions; which changes and ſuppliments were taken from the romiſh rituals, that varied from the book of England: that they were contrary to the king's intentions, who in his large declarations had profeſſed that all the variations in the Scotch ſervice from that of England, ſhould be only in ſuch things as the Scotiſh humours would better comply with. But the archbiſhop had no regard to this: on the contrary, the Scotiſh prelates having petitioned the ſuppreſſion of ſome of the Engliſh ceremonies, the croſs in baptiſm, the ring in marriage, and ſome other things, he was ſo far from conſenting, that he had added ſeveral others; that in the order of the adminiſtration of the communion in the book of England, he had made ſeveral alterations, which plainly ſhewed his deſign of introducing popery into Scotland: that he had kindled war between the king and the Scots; and been one of the chief cauſes of breaking the laſt pacification and renewing the war: that he had inſerted into the divine ſervice a prayer againſt their nation, by name of traiterous ſubjects, having caſt of all obedience to their anointed ſovereign, and coming in a rebellious manner to invade England; that ſhame might cover their faces as enemies to God and the king."

I have very much abridged theſe articles, which are very particular; but what is here ſaid ſuffices to ſhew their deſign.

On the morrow, ſir Harbottle Grimſton made in the houſe a ſpeech againſt the archbiſhop, pretending to ſhew, that all thoſe who were concerned in the evils of the ſtate, the earl of Strafford, the biſhops of Cheſter, Oxford[i], Ely, Bath and Wells, had been raiſed by his means, and that there was not a ſingle grievance but what flowed from him. Whereupon the commons impeached, by Mr. Denzil Holles, the archbiſhop of high treaſon, and the lords committed him to the cuſtody of the gentleman uſher; ſome time after he was ſent to the Tower.

Then the commons ſent a meſſage to the lords, to let them know they had received information of a very high nature againſt Matthew Wren biſhop of Ely; and having heard that he intended to make an eſcape out of the kingdom, they deſired them to think of ſome way to prevent it. Whereupon the lords ordered the biſhop to give ten thouſand pounds bail for his forth-coming; to which he conſented.

Of thoſe whom the commons conſidered as the chief authors of the public grievances, there remained only the lord keeper Finch, and the judges. The firſt was declared a traitor by a vote of the houſe of commons, not withſtanding the eloquent ſpeech he was permitted to make at the bar of the houſe in his vindication. But before he was accuſed in form he fled into Holland. However he was impeached afterwards, though abſent. Preſently after his flight, the king made ſir Edward Littleton lord keeper.

In fine, the commons ſent word to the lords, that they had received informations againſt three judges, ſir John Bramſton lord chief juſtice of the king's bench, ſir Humphrey Davenport lord chief baron, and juſtice Crawley[k]; and deſired the houſe that they might put in good ſecurity for their appearance. Whereupon the lords obliged theſe three judges to give each ten thouſand pounds bail. The other judges were alſo accuſed afterwards.

Thus they who were conſidered by the commons as the principal authors of the public grievances, were diſabled not only to continue to adviſe the king, but alſo to eſcape puniſhment, except the lord Finch and ſir Francis Windebank, who ſaved their perſons by leaving their eſtates in England. I ſhall not ſtay to ſpeak of many others of an inferior rank, who were variouſly puniſhed for exerciſing monopolies, or inventing means to raiſe the king money, for introducing or countenancing innovations in religion, or laſtly, for prevaricating in the exerciſe of their offices.

Whilſt the commons were employed in ſecuring thoſe, they intended to puniſh, they alſo prepared what ever was neceſſary to free the nation from all their grievances. The ſame method was uſed to this end, as had been employed againſt the perſons: that is, petitions from all quarters were preſented to the houſe upon grievances. Theſe petitions being read, ſeveral ſpeeches were made in the houſe to ſhow how prejudicial theſe grievances were to the public; and the principles which gave them birth were particularly inſiſted on, as being directly contrary to the conſtitution, and tending to the ſubverſion of the government. Whereupon it was voted, that ſuch a thing was illegal, and ordered that a bill ſhould be prepared to aboliſh it. This was the ſubject of divers acts which were preſented to the king for the royal aſſent, from the 3d of November 1640, to the 10th of Auguſt 1641. The principal were theſe:

An Act for a Triennial Parliament: that is, to ordain that a parliament ſhould be held at leaſt every three years though the king ſhould neglect to call it, in order to prevent the inconveniencies ariſing from a too long intermiſſion of parliaments.

An Act to aboliſh the Star chamber and High commiſſion.

An Act to reduce the Foreſts to the ſame ſtate as under Edward I.

An Act to repeal the Statutes made in the Reign of Edward II. concerning Knighthood.

An Act to permit any Subject to make Salt-peter and Gunpower throughout the kingdom.

An Act to aboliſh Ship-money[l].

The neceſſity of theſe acts was ſo manifeſt, that the king muſt either have conſented to them, or plainly declared he would have governed with an abſolute power. But he was not ſo unwiſe as to oppoſe them in his preſent circumſtances. An illuſtrious hiſtorian makes no ſcruple to ſay, that, "theſe acts will be acknowledged by an incorrupted poſterity, to be everlaſting monuments of the king's fatherly affection to his people; and ſuch an obligation of repoſe and truſt from his majeſty in the hearts of his ſubjects, that no expreſſions of duty and confidence from them could have been more than a ſufficient return on their parts." The king himſelf afterwards would frequently have had theſe conceſſions to be conſidered as acts of pure grace, for which the public ought to have been thankful; but, unhappily for him, neither parliament nor people believed them to be the effect of his juſtice or affection to them, but rather of the neceſſity he was under of giving his aſſent.

Beſides theſe acts, the commons paſſed many general votes upon ſeveral other articles. Indeed theſe votes are not conſidered as laws, neither do the judges proceed by them in their determinations: nevertheleſs, ſuch is their effect, that few perſons are ſo hardy as to act directly contrary to theſe deciſions of the commons, ſince it is in ſome meaſure to oppoſe the ſentiment of the people whom they repreſent. Beſides, an action directly contrary to a vote of the houſe, is liable to be queſtioned when leaſt expected, and draws upon the actor the indignation of the houſe, who had but too many opportunities to make him feel the effects of their reſentment.

The deſign of the commons was not only to ſtop the evil by means of theſe votes, but alſo to terrify all thoſe who had been concerned in the grievances, in order to take from the king all hopes of ſupport in his people. For after the houſe had voted, for inſtance, that ſuch a monopoly was illegal, if any perſon concerned in that monopoly behaved in a manner diſagreeable to the commons, or appeared too much attached to the king, an accuſation againſt him was the certain conſequence of ſuch a behaviour. By that means, the king's moſt devoted friends choſe rather to relinquiſh his intereſt than be liable to a charge, from which they plainly ſaw it was not in the king's power to ſecure them. This had very clearly appeared by the great examples of the earl of Strafford, archbiſhop Laud, lord keeper Finch, and ſecretary Windebank, after whom no private perſon could hope for protection from the king. Thus the commons rendered themſelves ſo formidable at the very beginning of the parliament, that the king was ſuddenly deſerted by all, without having other refuge than to conſent to whatever was propoſed by the parliament. He hoped, however, that when all the grievances were redreſſed, he ſhould be, if not in the ſame ſtate he had been for fifteen years, at leaſt in the natural ſtate of a king of England, according to the laws and the conſtitution of the government. But it will hereafter appear how much he was miſtaken in his conjecture. His former adminiſtration had made too deep impreſſions in the minds of his ſubjects, for the majority ever to believe he would for the future be contented with the power allowed him by the law. This diſtruſt was the immediate cauſe of the war between the king and the parliament. But it is not yet time to deſcend to the particulars.

The commons uſed alſo another expedient to make themſelves feared. As there were many people who, in conformity to the intentions of the court, had been concerned in the monopolies, or countenanced the innovations, or been ſubſervient to introduce and ſupport the occaſion of any grievance, the commons, upon the petitions preſented to them againſt theſe men, ſent for them to London, and examining them by a committee, declared them delinquents; as much as to ſay, that, according to the opinion of the houſe, they were guilty of faults or offences, for which they deſerved to be proſecuted and puniſhed according to law. The word Delinquent was very much in uſe during this parliament: thus a great number of thoſe who had been moſt noted for their adherence to the maxims of the court, or the principles of the archbiſhop, were voted delinquents, and thereby kept in awe by the commons, who, according as they behaved well or ill to them, could proſecute or leave them unmoleſted. But the number of thoſe who were declared delinquents was nothing in compariſon of ſuch as had reaſon to fear the like declaration upon the leaſt petition againſt them. From hence there followed an unanimous approbation of whatever was done by the houſe; ſome conſenting becauſe they thought the things juſt, and others out of fear of chaſtiſement. This is what rendered the redreſs of grievances very eaſy to the commons, and would have made it impracticable for the king to oppoſe it, though he ſhould have had ſuch a thought. The king reaped at leaſt this advantage from his conſent to the redreſs of grievances, that he gave occaſion to many to believe he ſincerely concurred in that work. But his enemies drew from thence a very different conſequence: they ſaid, as the parliament's meaſures were ſo well laid, that it would have been in vain for the king to oppoſe them, he was not to be thanked for a conſent to which neceſſity forced him, ſince, whilſt it was in his power to hinder the redreſs of grievances, he had always refuſed to hearken to the inſtant deſires of his parliaments.

I am now to warn my readers, that we are come to a time wherein they muſt be very much upon the guard with reſpect to the partiality of the hiſtorians, each of whom does his utmoſt to prejudice his readers in favour, either of the king or the parliament. This partiality conſiſts not ſo much in diſguiſing the facts (wherein both parties are agreed) as in the principles they eſtabliſh. Thoſe for the king, exalt as high as poſſible the prerogative-royal; nay, ſome ſtretch it even to a ſort of deſpotic power, as we have ſeen inſtances in the writings and ſermons of Sibthorp, Montague, Manwaring, mentioned in this part of the reign. According to this principle, they think and maintain that the parliament's aim was not to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate, as was pretended, but rather to overturn the conſtitution both of church and ſtate. That therefore the objects were ſo much magnified, by aggravating ſome acts of authority done by the king as tending to ſubvert the government, though they might have been juſtified by the prerogative royal, if any but the commons had been judges. But though they manifeſtly declared themſelves parties againſt the king, they however made themſelves judges, voting ſuch and ſuch actions of the king to be contrary to the laws. Nothing ſhews more plainly, according to theſe writers, the parliament's ſecret deſign to overthrow the government, nor can a ſtronger proof of it be deſired than the experience of what afterwards happened, when the government of the ſtate and church were actually changed.

The favourers of the parliament ſay, that without examining the extent of the prerogative royal, it may at leaſt be affirmed, that it cannot be contrary to the laws: that if the king has his prerogatives, the parliament have their privileges, and the people their liberties, which the prerogative cannot invade without deſtroying the conſtitution of the government, which conſiſts in a happy mixture of the rights of king and people. That before this parliament, the king had manifeſtly ſtretched his prerogative to the prejudice of the nation's rights, which the moſt attached to his intereſts did not dare to deny. That this being the caſe, nothing was more juſt, nothing more neceſſary, than to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate. That it is therefore prepoſteous to have recourſe to a ſecret deſign of ſubverting the church and ſtate, ſince the neceſſity of redreſſing the grievances is undeniably evident: that ſuppoſing it true that the commons uſed ſundry artifices to render themſelves formidable, and the more eaſily accompliſh their deſign, namely, the redreſs of grievances, theſe artifices were not blameable, conſidering how impracticable the former parliaments had found it to execute the ſame deſign.

I am perſuaded, that moſt of the readers for whom I write this hiſtory, ſuch I mean as are not Engliſhmen, would not require of me a particular account of all that paſſed in the houſe of commons, concerning the redreſs of grievances. It would be too tedious a work, which, after all, would inform them of nothing more material than what has hitherto been ſaid: nevertheleſs, for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who are unacquainted with the manner of parliamentary proceedings, I ſhall give here a brief relation of what was done with regard to ſhip-money, the grievances moſt complained of, and by that will be ſeen the method taken with reſpect to the reſt.

During the firſt month of this ſeſſion, ſcarce a day paſſed, but the houſe received petitions from divers counties, concerning grievances, amongſt which, that of ſhip-money was never forgot. At laſt, on the 7th of December, the day appointed to debate upon that affair, the lord Falkland[m], afterwards ſecretary of ſtate, made the following ſpeech to the houſe.

" Mr. Speaker,

" I REJOICE very much to ſee this day; and the want hath not lain in my affection but my lungs, if to all that hath been paſt, I have not been as loud with my voice as any man in the houſe; yet truly my opinion is, we have yet done nothing, if we do no more; I ſhall add what I humbly conceive ought to be added, as ſoon as I have ſaid ſomething with reference to him that ſays it.

" I will firſt deſire the forgiveneſs of the houſe, if ought I ſay ſeem to intrench upon another's profeſſion, and enter upon the work of another robe. Since I have been intruſted by the report of a learned committee, and confirmed by the uncontradicted rule of the houſe; ſince I ſhall ſay nothing of this kind, but in order to ſomething further, and, (which moves me moſt to venture my opinion, and to expect your pardon) ſince I am confident, that hiſtory alone is ſufficient to ſhew this judgment contrary to our laws, and logic alone ſufficient to prove it deſtructive to our property, which every free and noble perſon values more than his profeſſion. I will not profeſs I know myſelf, but all thoſe who know me, know that my natural diſpoſition is to decline from ſeverity, much more from cruelty. That I have no particular provocation from their perſons, and have particular obligations to their calling, againſt whom I am to ſpeak; and though I have not ſo much knowledge in law, yet far more than I have uſe for; ſo I hope it will be believed, that only public intereſt hath extorted this from me, and that which I would not ſay, if I conceived it not ſo true, and ſo neceſſary, that no undigeſted meat can lie heavier upon the ſtomach, than this unſaid would have lain upon my conſcience. Mr. ſpeaker, the conſtitution of the commonwealth hath eſtabliſhed, or rather endeavoured to eſtabliſh to us the ſecurity of our goods, and the ſecurity of thoſe laws which would ſecure us and our goods, by appointing for us judges ſo ſettled, ſo ſworn, that there can be no oppreſſion, but they of neceſſity muſt be acceſſary; ſince if they neither deny, nor delay us juſtice, which neither for the great nor little ſeal they ought to do, the greateſt perſons in this kingdom cannot continue the leaſt violence upon the meaneſt; but this ſecurity, Mr. ſpeaker, hath been almoſt our ruin, for it hath been turned, or rather turned itſelf into a battery againſt us: and thoſe perſons who ſhould have been as dogs to defend the ſheep, have been as wolves to worry them. Theſe judges, Mr. ſpeaker, to inſtance not them only, but their greateſt crime, have delivered an opinion and judgment in an extrajudicial manner, that is, ſuch as came not within their cognizance, they being judges, and neither philoſophers nor politicians; in which, when that which they would have ſo abſolute and evident takes place, the law of the land ceaſes, and that of general reaſon and equity, by which particular laws at firſt were framed, returns to his throne and government, where " ſalus populi" becomes not only ſupreme, but " ſola lex," at which, and to which end, whatſoever ſhould diſpenſe with the king to make uſe of any money, diſpenſes with us, to make uſe of his, and one another's. In this judgment they contradicted both many and learned acts, and declarations of parliament; and thoſe in this very caſe, in this very reign, ſo that for them they needed to have conſulted with no other record, but with their memories.

" 2. They have contradicted apparent evidences, by ſuppoſing mighty and imminent dangers in the moſt ſerene,

[m] There are lords who are not peers, as all the ſons of a duke and marquis, and the eldeſt ſon of an earl, who may be choſen members of parliament, as may alſo Iriſh and Scotch peers. The viſcount Falkland was a Scotch peer, and member for Newport in the Iſle of Wight. Rapin.

This

quiet, and halcion days, that could poſſibly be imagined, a few contemptible pyrates being our moſt formidable enemies, and there being neither prince nor ſtate, with whom we had not either alliance, or amity, or both.

" 3. They contradict the writ itſelf, by ſuppoſing that ſuppoſed danger to be ſo ſudden, that it would not ſtay for a parliament, which required but forty days ſtay; and the writ being in no ſuch haſte, but being content to ſtay forty days ſeven times over.

" Mr. ſpeaker, it ſeemed generally ſtrange, that they ſaw not the law which all men elſe ſaw, but themſelves; yet though this begot the more general wonder, three other particulars begot the more general indignation. The firſt of all the reaſons for this judgment was ſuch, that there needed not any from the adverſe party to help them to convert thoſe few, who before had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of the legality of that moſt illegal writ, there being fewer that approved of the judgment, than there were that judged it legal, for I am confident they did not that themſelves.

" Secondly, when they had allowed to the king the ſole power in neceſſity, the ſole judgment of neceſſity, and by that enabled him to take both from us, what he would, when he would, and how he would, they yet continued to perſuade us, that they had left us our liberties and properties.

" The third and laſt is, and which I confeſs moved moſt, that by the transformation of us from the ſtate of free ſubjects (a good phraſe, Mr. Speaker, under Dr. Heylin's favor) unto that of villains, they diſable us by legal and voluntary ſupplies to expreſs our affections to his majeſty, and by that to cheriſh his to us, that is, by parliaments. Mr. Speaker, the cauſe of all the miſeries we have ſuffered, and the cauſe of all our jealouſies we have had, that we ſhould yet ſuffer, is, that a moſt excellent prince hath been moſt infinitely abuſed by his judges, telling him, that by policy he might do what he pleaſed; with the firſt of theſe we are now to deal, which may be a leading to the reſt. And ſince in providing of theſe laws, upon which theſe men have trampled, our anceſtors have ſhewn their utmoſt care and wiſdom for our undoubted ſecurity, words having done nothing, and yet they have done all that words can do, we muſt now be forced to think of aboliſhing of our grievances, and of taking away this judgment, and theſe judges together, and of regulating their ſucceſſors by their exemplary puniſhment.

" I will not ſpeak much; I will only ſay we have accuſed a great perſon of high-treaſon, for intending to ſubvert our fundamental laws, and to introduce arbitrary government; which we ſuppoſe he meant to do, we are ſure theſe have done it, there being no law more fundamental than that they have already ſubverted, and no government more abſolute than that they have really introduced.

" Mr. ſpeaker, not only the ſevere puniſhment, but the ſudden removal of theſe men, will have a ſudden effect in one very conſiderable conſideration, we only accuſe, and the houſe of lords condemn; in which condemnation they uſually receive advice (though not direction) from the judges; and I leave it to every man to immagine, how prejudicial to us that is, to the commonwealth, and how partial to their fellow malefactors, the advice of ſuch judges is like to be. How undoubtedly for their own ſakes, they will think it may conduce to their power, that every action be judged to be a leſs fault, and every perſon to be leſs faulty, than in juſtice they ought to do: amongſt theſe, Mr. ſpeaker, there is one I muſt not looſe in the croud, whom I doubt not but we ſhall find when we examine the reſt of them, with what hopes they have been tempted, by what fears they have been aſſayed, and by what, and by whoſe importunity they have be purſued, before they conſented to what they did; I doubt not, I ſay, but we ſhall find him to have been a moſt admirable ſolicitor, but a moſt abominable judge; he it is, who not only gave away with his breadth, what our anceſtors had purchaſed for us by ſo large an expence of their time, their care, their treaſure, and their blood; and employed his induſtry, as great as his injuſtice, to perſuade others to join with him in that deed of gift: but ſtrove to root up thoſe liberties which they had cut down, and to make our grievances immortal, and our ſlavery irreparable, leſt any part of our poſterity might want occaſion to curſe him; he declared that power to be ſo inherent to the crown, as that it was not in the power even of parliaments to divide them.

" I have heard, Mr. ſpeaker, and I think here that common fame is ground enough for this houſe to accuſe upon; and then undoubtedly there is enough to be accuſed upon in this houſe; he hath reported this ſo generally, that I expect not that you ſhall bid me name him whom you all know, nor do I look to tell you news, when I tell you it is my lord keeper; but this I think fit to put you in mind of, that his place admits him to his majeſty, and truſts him with his majeſty's conſcience; and how pernicious every moment muſt be, which gives him means to infuſe ſuch unjuſt opinions of this houſe, as are expreſt in a libel, rather than a declaration, of which many believe him to be the principal ſecretary, and the other puts the moſt vaſt and unlimited power of the chancery into his hands, the ſafeſt of which will be dangerous: for my part, I think no man ſecure, that he ſhall think himſelf worth any thing when he riſes, whilſt all our eſtates are in his breaſt, who hath ſacrificed his country to his ambition, whileſt he who hath proſtrated his own conſcience, hath the keeping of the king's, and he who hath undone us already by wholeſale, hath a power left in him by retale.

" Mr. ſpeaker, in the beginning of the parliament he told us, and I am confident every man here believes it before he told it, and never the more for his telling, though a ſorry witneſs is a good teſtimoney againſt himſelf, that his majeſty never required any thing from any of his miniſters but juſtice and integrity. Againſt which, if any of them have tranſgreſſed, upon their heads, and that deſervedly, it all ought to fall; it was fully and truly ſaid, but he hath in this ſaying pronounced his own condemnation; we ſhall be more partial to him than he is to himſelf, if we be ſlow to purſue it.

" It is therefore my juſt and humble motion, that we may chuſe a ſelect committee to draw up his and their charge, and to examine their carriage in this particular, to make uſe of it in the charge, and if he ſhall be found guilty of tampering with judges againſt the public ſecurity, who thought tampering with witneſſes in a private cauſe worthy of ſo great a fine[a], if he ſhould be found to have gone before the reſt to this judgment, and to have gone beyond the reſt in this judgment, that in the puniſhment of it, the juſtice of this houſe may not deny him the due honor both to precede and exceed the reſt."

After this ſpeech, the affair of ſhip money having been debated, it was reſolved upon the queſtion " nemine contradicente."

1. That the charge impoſed upon the ſubjects, for the providing and furniſhing of ſhips, and the aſſeſſments for raiſing of money for that purpoſe, commonly called ſhip-money, are againſt the laws of the realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right.

2. That the extrajudicial opinions of the judges publiſhed in the ſtar chamber, and enrolled in the courts of Weſtminſter in theſe words,——in the whole, and in every part of them, are againſt the laws of the realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right.

3. That the writ following——and the other writs commonly called the ſhip-writs, are againſt the laws of the realm, the right of property, and the liberty of the ſubjects, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right.

After theſe reſolutions, the houſe appointed a committee of ſixteen, at the head of whom was the lord Falkland, to go forthwith to the ſeveral judges, to know in what manner, and by whom they were ſolicited or threatened to give their extrajudicial opinion concerning ſhip-money. It was ordered, that every one of the judges ſhould be examined at the ſame time by two of the committee, and be told what had been voted in the houſe concerning ſhip-money, and that the committee ſhould aſk ſuch queſtions as they ſhould think material, to the execution of this order.

Next day, the houſe ordered that the committee appointed to conſider of the property of the ſubjects in their goods, ſhould take into conſideration ſome way of ſeeing the entering upon record, the king's ſeveral commiſſions for loans and exciſe, and the reſolutions of former parliaments thereon, and the addition that was offered by the lords to the petition of right, with the reſolution of the houſe; and alſo the reſolutions of the queſtions propoſed in the houſe concerning ſhip-money, that they might remain fair to poſterity. It was alſo referred to the ſame committee to make a preparation of the vote paſſed about ſhip-money, to be ſent to the lords; to draw up a charge againſt the lord Finch, and the reſt of the judges that gave their opinion upon that tax; and likewiſe to take into conſideration their extrajudicial opinions and the judgments in the caſe of ſhip-money; to inquire of the ſeveral denials of Habeas Corpus, and prohibitions, their extrajudicial proceedings and opinions concerning eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions, and the court of admiralty; their denial of legal and ordinary proceedings in caſes of juſtice, and the binding of the whole kingdom by any one man's particular caſe. The ſame committee had power to ſend for parties, witneſſes, papers, records, or any thing elſe that might conduce to this buſineſs, and were to preſent the ſtate of the whole matter to the houſe.

On the other hand, the 26th of February 1640-41, the lords ordered to be brought to their houſe the record in the exchequer of the judgment in Mr. Hampden's caſe, and alſo the rolls in the ſtar-chamber and other courts, wherein the extrajudicial opinions of the judges were entered, and cauſed them to be annulled in their preſence. They ordered moreover, that a copy of what they had done ſhould be delivered to the judges to be publiſhed at the aſſizes in every county within their circuits, and that an act of parliament ſhould be prepared concerning this matter.

All this produced at length charges againſt the lord keeper, and each of the judges, with an act to aboliſh ſhip-money, to which the king gave the royal aſſent the 7th of Auguſt 1641.

Much the ſame method was taken with regard to the other grievances, and in the end, there was not one, public or private, but what was redreſſed within the nine firſt months of this ſeſſion.

I intend not to include in theſe grievances, thoſe concerning religion. Beſides that theſe were not generally acknowledged for grievances, this matter requires a more particular explication of what paſſed in the parliament. I ſhall therefore ſhew in the firſt place, the diſpoſition of the parliament, with reſpect to religion, and then relate what paſſed concerning that ſubject.

Since the beginning of the reign of James I. the biſhops had rendered themſelves much more powerful than before. The oppoſition of the preſbyterians, who never ceaſed to exclaim againſt the hierarchy, though they were not in condition to overthrow it, had greatly contributed to the increaſe of the epiſcopal power. Their impetuous zeal cauſed the king to think it proper to humble them, leſt in the end they ſhould occaſion ſome diſturbance in the church, and the biſhops were charged with the care of executing this reſolution. The endeavours to reduce them to obedience, ſerved only to inflame the evil. Inſtead of trying to convince them by arguments, they were treated without moderation, and, if I may venture to ſay it, without charity. It was reſolved at any rate to compel them to conform to the church of England, not only in things conſidered as neceſſary, but alſo in others regarded by moſt people as indifferent. Moreover, divers ceremonies were added to the divine ſervice, which many perſons well affected to the church thought too near allied to popery. William Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury was the principal author of theſe ceremonies, as well before, as after he was archbiſhop. His chief aim was to mortify the puritans. But in proceeding too warmly or rather too rigorouſly, he gave them room to accuſe him that his deſign was to favour popery, on pretence of forcing the puritans to conform to the worſhip of the church of England. No man was ever more wedded to ceremonies, and the more he was reproached with it, the more he urged them as neceſſary. This chiefly gave occaſion to the puritans, and even to ſome church of England men to ſuſpect he had a deſign to introduce the Romiſh Religion; this extreme attachment to ceremonies ſeeming to them as a means whereby he intended to compaſs his ends. As for arminianiſm, all agree that Laud was not only an arminian, but alſo head of that party in England, from the time he was received into favour by king James I. through the duke of Buckingham's means. As the knowledge of what paſſed in the reign of James I. may be of great ſervice to the underſtanding the affairs of religion, which I have undertaken to explain, I ſhall briefly relate what I think moſt neceſſary, though mentioned before in king James's reign.

When the diſputes concerning grace aroſe in Holland, James I. eſpouſed the oppoſite party to Arminius, and uſed even threats to oblige the ſtates of Holland to condemn Vorſtius his ſucceſſor. After that, he ſent biſhops and divines to the ſynod of Dort, to ſtrengthen the contra-remonſtrants. Mean while the arminians in England were forced to lye dormant, becauſe the court was not their friend. Laud, then only a private doctor in the univerſity of Oxford, had yet no credit, though ſhortly after the duke of Buckingham procured him the Biſhopric of St. David's in Wales. At the ſame time king James was vigorouſly puſhing his deſign to ſtretch the prerogative royal, to which he met with great oppoſition, chiefly from the puritans, who concerning grace were directly contrary to the arminians. For this reaſon the king and the duke thought fit to careſs and ſupport the arminians, in order to oppoſe them to the puritans, the king's grand aim being to weaken that party, which was always ready to obſtruct the execution of his deſigns. From that time the arminian party became powerful. The heads were Neil biſhop of Wincheſter, and Laud biſhop of St. David's, who found means to gain the king's confidence, and to have the diſpoſal of the church preferments. They improved this advantage to ſtrengthen their party, by promoting to the benefices ſuch as were moſt averſe to the calviniſts, for ſo theſe began now to be called who embraced Calvin's opinion concerning grace, whether preſbyterians or church of England men. There were therefore three principal cauſes of the animoſity of the court and its friends againſt the preſbyterians.

The firſt was, that they rejected the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy.

The ſecond that they were entirely againſt the king's deſign to ſtretch his prerogative, knowing the more power he had, the more they ſhould be perſecuted.

The third, that they were all calviniſts as to the notions of grace. Though the king had not, perhaps, altered his opinion concerning that point, he deſerted however the calviniſts, becauſe they were in other reſpects, for the moſt part preſbyterians and puritans. From that time the court and their agents counted among the puritans, thoſe who refuſed to conform to the church of England: all the calviniſts, preſbyterians or others: all who oppoſed the king's deſigns with regard to the prerogative: and they were all, under the name of puritans, equally obnoxious to the hatred of the king and his miniſters. So, by this policy, many people who had no inclination for preſbyterianiſm, were made to become puritans. At leaſt, they were forced to join with the puritan party, to hinder the court on pretence of deſtroying puritaniſm, from eſtabliſhing by degrees an arbitrary power, which would have been fatal to the whole nation. For the king pretended, his will could be oppoſed but upon puritanical principles.

The reign of Charles I. was ſtill more violent in this reſpect, than that of James, as has been ſhewn in the firſt part. Laud being made biſhop of London, and afterwards, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and one of the king's prime miniſters, uſed all his induſtry and credit to humble the puritan-party, that is, not only the preſbyterians, but alſo the calviniſts, and ſuch who would not patiently bear the yoke of ſervitude. Matthew Wren biſhop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, the biſhop of Bath and Wells, Coſins prebendary of Durham [b]. being all of the ſame principles, ſeconded him in this deſign. And as if the difference between the church of England and preſbytery, had not been ſufficiently marked, they added to the worſhip ſundry innovations, and repreſented as abſolutely neceſſary, things indifferent, which religion might well have diſpenſed with. Hence pretences were found to perſecute the puritans, by reckoning among that party, all whom the court was pleaſed to call by that name.

The wiſeſt part of the nation had long ſince perceived the king's and the court's policy, and their artifices to pave the way to arbitrary power. But it had not been poſſible to avoid the effects of it, becauſe the king diſſolved the parliaments, the moment they were bent to examine the grievances. Thus the regal power had gained ground by degrees, no one being in a capacity to hinder its progreſs. But as ſoon as the king's affairs had taken a new turn, by the entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcaſtle, and when the king ſaw himſelf under an abſolute neceſſity of calling a parliament, moſt of the members reſolved not to loſe the opportunity of aboliſhing the perſecution, introduced under the ſpecious pretence of ſtopping the progreſs of puritaniſm, but in reality for the better advancement of arbitrary power. Above all, the houſe of commons conſidered the innovations and the rigour wherewith people were made to obſerve them, as ſo many artifices of the court-party, for the more eaſy attainment of their end. It muſt not therefore be thought ſtrange, if moſt of the members being united with regard to the grievances, were ſo likewiſe for the aboliſhing of innovations, and puniſhing the authors, as having ſerved for inſtruments to the king in the execution of deſigns, wherein religion was not ſolely concerned. This is what produced the charges againſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Ely, Bath and Wells, and againſt Coſins, beſides the brand of delinquents given by the commons to a great number of miniſters and others, who had countenanced the innovations.

[b] Coſins was never dean of Durham, as Rapin by miſtake calls him. He was prebendary of Durham, and dean of Peterborough.

It

Moſt of the members, as I ſaid, were united as to this point, becauſe there was not one but what conſidered it as a branch of the deſign to ſubject the realm to the king's will and pleaſure. But among this great number, there were real preſbyterians, who had more extenſive views, and thought, no doubt, of altering the government of the church, on pretence of the ill uſe, the biſhops had made of their power. Theſe, though not very numerous in the parliament, were ſupported by a great party in the kingdom, and particularly by the Scots, whoſe aſſiſtance was then abſolutely neceſſary. But they took care not to diſcover their intentions. They were contented at firſt to join with thoſe who only intended the redreſs of grievances, and to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate. They hoped, as it happened indeed, that the ſtrict examination of the grievances and innovations, would convince moſt of the members of the neceſſity to aboliſh the hierarchy, of which the court had made ſo great uſe in the execution of their deſigns. They propoſed to ſhew on all occaſions, that it was almoſt impoſſible to reſtore the civil government, whilſt the king had in the clergy of the church of England a ſupport capable of raiſing inſuperable obſtacles to the reformation of the government. For this reaſon, on all occaſions, the leaders of the preſbyterians were the moſt forward to ſpeak againſt the grievances. They aggravated chiefly thoſe that concerned the innovations in religion, which they openly aſcribed to the deſign of introducing the Romiſh religion. All this was done with a view to caſt upon the hierarchy, and the biſhops in general, the faults and ill conduct of ſome particular perſons.

The other members who were of the church of England, though very oppoſite to the king, ſaw what was the intention of the preſbyterians. But they were kept in awe by the fear of loſing the aſſiſtance of the Scots, who ſupported this party, and rendered it very conſiderable. Wherefore they durſt not diſpleaſe the preſbyterian party, for fear of cauſing in the parliament a diviſion, which would be fatal to the common cauſe, and conſequently very advantageous to the king. Beſides, the men I am ſpeaking of, did not believe the hierarchy to be abſolutely neceſſary in the church, or that religion could not ſubſiſt without biſhops. Only the rigid epiſcopalians, and the king's party were of this opinion, but they made not a majority. Thoſe therefore who had only in view the reformation of the ſtate, and not that of the church, could not however, without great inconveniences, help having ſome condeſcenſion for the preſbyterians, for the reaſons juſt mentioned. Perhaps they had no other view in their policy, than to gain time, till the civil grievances were redreſſed, without any deſign to go farther. But they had to deal with very able heads, who artfully led them beyond their firſt reſolutions.

On the other hand, the biſhops perfectly knew the intention of the preſbyterians, and that in leſſening the king's power, their deſign was to render him unable to oppoſe the change they were meditating. Wherefore they adhered the more firmly to the king's intereſt, and often, by the number of their voices, ſo managed it, that the upper-houſe voted directly contrary to the reſolutions of the lower. But thereby they procured the preſbyterians a conſiderable advantage. For the commons took occaſion from thence, to repreſent how advantageous it was for the king to have at his devotion ſo great a number of voices among the lords, and conſequently, how impoſſible it would be to ſucceed in the intended reformation, ſo long as the biſhops had votes in the upper-houſe. This led them at length to bring in a bill for the excluſion of all eccleſiaſtics from civil employments, and the biſhops in particular, from a right of ſittings in the houſe of lords.

Thoſe who had only in view to reſtore the civil government, without medling with the hierarchy, (and whom I call the politicians, though I do not know, they were ever ſo termed) were greatly embarraſſed. They plainly ſaw, that ſundry abuſes had crept into the church, and would have readily agreed to their abolition provided nothing more had been required. But it was propoſed to go one ſtep farther, and exclude the biſhops from the upper-houſe, in which they ſaw ſeveral inconveniencies, with regard to the intereſt of the church of England, to which they were attached. Though the preſbyterian party did not entirely diſcover themſelves, and ſeemed to have no other view than to facilitate the redreſs of all abuſes after the excluſion of the biſhops, it was eaſy to perceive, their projects reached farther, and that their aim was to undermine the hierarchy. It is certain, there was no leſs inconvenience in rejecting than conſenting to, the bill. By leaving the biſhops in the upper-houſe, the king would be always ſecure of ſo many votes. As the lords were not then ſo numerous as at preſent, as ſome were abſent or otherwiſe employed, and ſome alſo were Roman catholics, the biſhops and the reſt of the king's party greatly influenced the reſolutions of the upper-houſe, as was daily experienced. Conſequently the work of the reformation of the government could not but meet with great obſtacles. On the other hand, by rejecting the bill propoſed, the preſbyterian party would be diſpleaſed, which was very conſiderable in the kingdom, chiefly by the ſupport of the Scots, of whom there was great occaſion, ſince it was by their means that the parliament was enabled to labour effectually the redreſs of the grievances.

Now began to be debated the famous queſtion, By what title do biſhops ſit in parliament? It was not denied, they had enjoyed this privilege from the beginning of the monarchy; but ſome pretended, they ſat in parliament as barons only, on account of the crown-lands granted them by the Anglo-Saxon kings, for which they did homage to the king like the reſt of the barons. Others maintained, they had a ſeat there as repreſentatives of the clergy, who could not be bound by the laws made in parliament, without giving their conſent to them, according to the conſtant maxim of the kingdom, and the undeniable privilege which all Engliſh ſubjects had ever enjoyed. That the lords gave their conſent to laws for themſelves, and the commons for all the commons of the kingdom, and therefore it was neceſſary, there ſhould be in the parliament repreſentatives of the church and clergy, otherwiſe the maxim would be falſe, that no man can be bound by the laws to which he has not conſented. They added farther, that the parliament had always been thought to conſiſt of three eſtates, of which the clergy had been always conſidered as one, whence they inferred, that to exclude from the parliament one of its three eſtates, would be to ſubvert the conſtitution of the government.

To theſe arguments it was anſwered: Though it ſhould be true, that the clergy were an eſtate of parliament diſtinct from the reſt of the people, which was conteſted, it did not follow, that the biſhops repreſented the whole church: That there were in the parliament two houſes, one of the lords, and the other of the commons; and two houſes in the convocation, the upper of the biſhops, and the lower of the inferior clergy; and therefore, according to this rule, the inferior clergy ſhould likewiſe have repreſentatives in the parliament, that they might be deemed to give their conſent to the laws, which however, was never pretended. Hence it was inferred, the biſhops did not repreſent the clergy, and added, that this ſuppoſed repreſentation was a new thing, unheard of before, and that a few months ſince, the biſhops would have been very angry to be counted only bare repreſentatives: That though it was neceſſary, the clergy ſhould be repreſented in the parliament, it would not follow, that they ought to be repreſented by the biſhops, as all the people of England were not repreſented by the lords. That the abbots had formerly a ſeat in parliament, not as repreſentatives, but as being tenants in chief, and when they were excluded, it was not ſaid, that a breach was made in the conſtitution of the parliament, either by the excluſion of the abbots, or diſſolution of the monaſteries.

Theſe, if I am not miſtaken, are the principal arguments alleged for and againſt the biſhops, with regard to their ſeat in parliament. This queſtion was the more difficult, as it had been never determined by what right the biſhops ſat in parliament. Very probably, from the beginning of the monarchy, till about the end of the reign of Henry III. the parliaments conſiſted only of lords, who were in poſſeſſion of all the lands of the kingdom, for which they did homage to the king. And indeed it appears, the lords, before that time, granted the king the money neceſſary for the ſupport of the governments, without any mention of the commons. It may therefore be ſaid, that the lords ſat in parliament by a double title, namely, for themſelves, and as repreſentatives of the nation. But after the commons were introduced into parliament, and had a ſeparate houſe, the lords loſt the laſt of theſe titles, and ſat only for themſelves, the reſt of the people having other repreſentatives. The biſhops and abbots, who belonged to the body of the lords, had probably their ſeat too by a double title, as poſſeſſors of baronies, and as repreſentatives of the clergy, ſecular and regular. But as in introducing repreſentatives of the commons into the parliament, repreſentatives of the inferior clergy were not alſo introduced, the biſhops and abbots may be ſaid to preſerve their double title to ſit there, as poſſeſſors of baronies, and as repreſentatives of the clergy. The diſſolution of the monaſteries in the the reign of Henry VIII. rendered needleſs the repreſentation of the regulars, who no longer ſubſiſted; but it made no alteration in the biſhops right, who according to this ſuppoſition, repreſented the ſecular clergy, and continued to ſit in parliament, though the abbots were aboliſhed. But after all it muſt be owned, this repreſentation of the ſecular clergy by biſhops, is only a ſuppoſition, which though probable, cannot be ſaid to be ſo evident as not to be oppoſed[c]. But it ſeldom happens, that in diſputes of this nature, juſtice and right are ſolely regarded. Though the reaſons which may be drawn from the thing itſelf are not neglected, yet thoſe are much more ſtrenuouſly urged, which are founded in intereſt and policy.

The heads of the preſbyterians never ceaſed to repreſent to the politicians the impoſſibility of reſtoring the government to its natural ſtate, ſo long as the biſhops ſhould ſit in the houſe of peers; that the king had found means to gain the clergy to his intereſt, by expreſſing a great zeal for the church of England, and an extreme averſion to the preſbyterians; that the clergy, and eſpecially the biſhops, were entirely devoted to the king, in the belief that he was their protector and only ſupport; that therefore they were perſuaded he could not be too powerful, ſince his power would be ſo advantagious to the clergy; that there were convincing proofs of this truth in the conduct of Laud, Wren, and other clergymen, particularly Sibthorpe, Montague, Manwaring, who had uſed their utmoſt endeavours to procure the king an unlimited power; that the clergy in general were ſtill in the ſame diſpoſitions, and could do for the future as much miſchief as formerly, if care was not taken to humble their pride and power, by confining them within the bounds of their calling.

The politicians granted all theſe things, and beſides, were not very well pleaſed with the biſhops and the reſt of the clergy. But they were loth to yield, for fear the alteration propoſed might produce others in church and ſtate, which they did not care to meddle with. Mean while, after long weighing the inconveniences which might flow from their approbation or refuſal, they reſolved at laſt to ſacrifice the biſhops right, rather than run the riſk of ſeeing all their projects fall to the ground, by the obſtacles which the biſhops might raiſe. Whether this reſolution was taken by the leaders at the beginning of the parliament, which I think not unlikely, or whether it was neceſſary to uſe ſome time to prevail with the polititions, thoſe who ſolicited the thing, judged that before it came to be publicly debated, it was convenient to breed prejudices againſt the biſhops in the minds of the people, and to cheriſh thoſe already entertained. The houſe wanted not opportunities to execute this deſign. The bill to take from the biſhops their ſeat in parliament was not voted in the houſe of commons till the 11th of March 1640-1, and paſſed not the houſe of peers till the 27th of May following. But before the moving of this bill, the lower-houſe had taken ſeveral ſteps tending to incenſe the people againſt the biſhops. The great number of petitions againſt the biſhops in general, againſt epiſcopal government, againſt ſome particular prelates and clergymen, againſt innovations, againſt the late convocation, ſerved them for foundation to examine the conduct of the biſhops with all the rigour, their deſign required. Several pretend, all theſe petitions were begged, and I will not affirm the contrary, though I know nothing particular concerning it[d]. There is no clearer evidence of the commons deſign with regard to the biſhops, than their reſolution on the 20th of November, ſeventeen days after the opening of the parliament, namely, that on Sunday the 22d of the ſame month[e] every member ſhould be obliged to receive the communion, and bring with him a ticket of his name and the place for which he ſerved, and that after the communion-day none ſhould ſit in the houſe but thoſe that had firſt received the ſacrament. This reſolution could be with no other view, than to prevent the commons from being eſteemed preſbyterians, and their reſolutions diſparaged on that pretence. Thus in the reign of Henry V. the houſe of commons, intending to give a mortal blow to the clergy, began with paſſing an act for burning heritics, leſt the clergy ſhould pretend that the houſe conſiſted only of ſuch.

To ſhew now all the preparations that were made in the houſe of commons, before they proceeded in the bill I have been ſpeaking of, I ſhall briefly mention the petitions that were preſented, the ſpeeches that were made on this ſubject, and the ſeveral reſolutions that were taken.

On the 10th of November, ſeven days after the opening of the parliament, ſir Edward Deering made a ſpeech in the houſe, to perſuade them to enter upon matters of religion. He took occaſion to preſent a petition from one Wilſon a miniſter, againſt the archbiſhop who had ſuſpended him, and concluded with ſaying, "Our manifold griefs do fill a mighty and vaſt circumference, yet ſo that from every part our lines of ſorrow do lead unto him, and point at him the centre, from whence our miſeries in this church, and many of them in the commonwealth do flow."

The ſame day was read the petition of Peter Smart, priſoner in the King'-bench, complaining of Dr. Coſins's innovations in the church of Durham, and his proſecution of the priſoner in the high commiſſion at York, where he was ſentenced and deprived of his living, and prebend of Durham. Whereupon it was ordered that he ſhould have liberty to go abroad in ſafe cuſtody, to proſecute his petition which was referred to a committee who were to conſider by whoſe motion and means Dr. Coſins was preferred to his late dignity[f]. It was archbiſhop Laud they had a mind to meet with. On the 21ſt, Dr. Coſins was ſent for as a delinquent by the ſerjeant at arms.

The ſame day ſir Edward Deering made a ſpeech, complaining, that there was a ſevere high-commiſſion eſtabliſhed in England, worſe than the popiſh inquiſition; that the archbiſhop of Canterbury affected the title and power of a patriarch, and acted like a ſovereign; that he allowed of the impreſſion of books in favour of popery, of which he named ſeveral, and refuſed the ſame licence for printing orthodox writings. He moved that there might be a committee to inquire into the great number of oppreſſed miniſters under the biſhops tyranny, for ten years laſt paſt, and to examine the licences granted for bad books, and refuſed for good books.

On the 28th the town of Banbury preſented a petition againſt innovations.

On the 30th it was reported from the committee for Mr. Wilſon's petition, that he had been ſqueſtred four years from his living, only for not reading the Book of Sports on the Lord's-day: That after he was abſolved, he was proſecuted for not reading the prayer commanded to be read by the archbiſhop againſt the Scots.

On the firſt of December was read a bill for reformation of abuſes in eccleſiaſtical courts.

Three days after, the houſe received a petition from two of the inhabitants of Cheſter, complaining of their having been inhumanly treated by the high-commiſſion at York, for viſiting Mr. Pryn when he was going to his priſon in Caernarvon-caſtle. Upon this petition the houſe appointed a numerous committee to examine the juriſdiction of the two commiſſions of Canterbury and York, and the abuſes committed in the courts.

On the 9th a committee was appointed to examine the proceedings of the late convocation, as well as the convocation writs, whether they were the ſame with the writs of former times, and the opinions of the judges in that affair, and enquire how and by whom the commiſſion that enabled the clergy to give and take the new oath was withdrawn.

On the 11th, the houſe received a petition ſubſcribed by a great number of the inhabitants of London[g], and ſeveral counties, containing twenty-eight grievances againſt epiſcopal government, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

1. Grievance. The biſhops ſubjecting and enthralling all miniſters under them and their authority, and ſo by degrees exempting them from the temporal power.

[c] It ſeems to be plain, that the clergy never thought themſelves repreſented by the biſhops, ſeeing that after the reſtoration, when the convocation dropped the privilege of taxing themſelves, the inferior clergy had, in lieu of that privilege, a right to vote for members of parliament, and ſo have, ever ſince the year 1665, been repreſented by the commons, like the reſt of the free-holders. However, Mr. Hyde, (afterwards lord Clarendon) and others, made uſe of this argument, of the biſhops being the repreſentatives of the clergy, in their ſpeeches againſt the taking away the biſhops voices in the houſe of peers; which certainly was no argument at all, the prelates, doubtleſs, as well as mitred abbots, ſitting in parliament, on account of their baronies, like the reſt of the nobility.

[d] The lord Clarendon ſays, their way was to prepare a petition very modeſt and dutiful for the form; and for the matter, not very unreaſonable; and to communicate it at ſome public meeting, where care was taken it ſhould be received with approbation; the ſubſcription of very few hands filled the paper itſelf, where the petition was written, and therefore many more ſheets were annexed, for the reception of the number, which gave all the credit, and procured all the countenance to the undertaking. When a multitude of hands was procured, the petition itſelf was cut off, and a new one framed ſuitable to the deſign in hand, and annexed to the long liſt of names which were ſubſcribed to the former. Tom. I. p. 161.

[e] Rapin ſays, on the day appointed for the faſt, but he forgot that the faſt was on the Tueſday before, namely, the 17th, as he had noted in the margin.

[g] Twenty-thouſand, ſays lord Clarendon, tom. I. p. 161.

2. The faint-heartedneſs of miniſters to preach the truth of God, and oppoſe the progreſs of arminianiſm, leſt they ſhould diſpleaſe the prelates.

3. The encouragement of miniſters to diſpiſe the temporal magiſtracy, and to live contentiouſly with their neighbours, knowing that they, being the biſhops creatures, ſhall be ſupported.

4. The reſtraint of many godly and able men from the miniſtry, and thruſting out of many congregations their miniſters, becauſe they could not in conſcience ſubmit unto, and maintain the biſhops needleſs devices.

5. The ſuppreſſing of the buying of impropriations, and placing of able miniſters in them.

6. The great increaſe of ſcandalous men in the miniſtry, who, if they but wear a canonical coat, a ſurplice, a hood, and bow at the name of Jeſus, think they have fully diſcharged their duty.

7. The diſcouragement of many from bringing up their children in learning; the many errors and ſtrange opinions which are in the church; great corruptions in the univerſities; the want of preaching miniſters in many places; the loathing of the miniſtry, and the general defection to all manner of profaneneſs.

8. The ſwarming of laſcivious and unprofitable books, in diſgrace of religion; as namely, Ovid's Fits of Love, The Parliament of Women, &c.

9. The hindering of godly books to be printed; the blotting out or perverting in thoſe which they ſuffer, whatever ſtrikes either at popery or arminianiſm; the adding of what pleaſeth them, and the reſtraint of reprinting books formerly licenſed, without relicenſing.

10. The publiſhing of popiſh, arminian, and other dangerous books and tenets; as namely, "That the church of Rome is a true church, and in the worſt times never erred in fundamentals; that the ſubjects have no propriety in their eſtates; but that the king may take from them what he pleaſeth; that all is the king's, and that he is bound by no law, &c."

11. The growth of popery, and increaſe of papiſts, prieſts and jeſuits; the frequent venting of crucifixes and popiſh pictures both engraved and printed, and the placing of ſuch in bibles.

12. The multitude of monopolies, and impoſitions upon all kinds of commodities, &c. [h]

13. That the church-government in England was upheld the ſame way as in the Romiſh church. Hence it was that the prelates maintained, that the pope is not Anti-chriſt, and forbad praying in the church for the converſion of the queen.

14. The great conformity of veſtures and ceremonies with thoſe of the church of Rome.

15. The ſtanding up at the Gloria Patri, and at the reading of the goſpel; praying towards the eaſt; the bowing at the name of Jeſus; the bowing to the altar; towards the eaſt; croſs in baptiſm: the kneeling at the communion.

16. The turning of the communion-tables alterwiſe; the ſetting images and tapers upon them; the reading of the ſecond ſervice at the altar, which is termed the mercy-ſeat; the forcing people to come up thither to receive the ſacrament.

17. The conſecrating of churches, chapels, fonts, &c. and the re-conſecrating of them upon pretended pollution.

18. The liturgy for the moſt part taken out of the Romiſh breviary, and the book of ordination framed out of the Roman pontficial.

19. The multitude of canons: abuſe of excommunication: denying of appeals; the canons of the laſt ſynod.

20. Plurality of benefices; prohibiting of marriages without licence at certain times, and licenſing of marriages without bans aſking.

21. Profanation of the Lord's-day, the ſuſpending and depriving miniſters for not reading a declaration for tolerating ſports on that day.

22. The preſſing of the ſtrict obſervation of the ſaints-days, and drawing great ſums of money out of mens purſes for giving them leave to work on them.

23. The great increaſe of adulteries, &c. occaſioned by the prelates corrupt adminiſtration of juſtice in ſuch caſes, who taking upon them the puniſhment of it, do turn all into moneys for the filling of their purſes.

24. The general abuſe of excommunication, which was inflicted for trivial matters; and the abſolution whereof could not be obtained without money, &c.

25. The prelates claiming their office and juriſdiction to be Jure Divino; their taking upon them temporal dignities, &c.

26. The forcing people to take commiſſions out of their own courts.

27. The impoſing of oaths upon church-wardens and ſideſmen, which they cannot take without perjury [i]

28. The great abuſe of eccleſiaſtical courts, and the biſhops uſurpations.

This petition ended with ſome conſiderations, the laſt whereof was, that the biſhops having occaſioned the war with Scotland, the war could be terminated only by the ſuppreſſion of epiſcopacy.

The next day, ſeveral miniſters [k] were declared delinquents, for introducing innovations into the church, and a committee was appointed to examine the complaints exhibited againſt the biſhop of Bath and Wells.

On the 15th, the houſe proceeded to take into conſideration the new canons of the late convocation, and voted what has been related. After that, Laud was accuſed, and Wren obliged to give bail.

[1640-1] On the 12th of January 1640-1, petitions were preſented from four ſeveral counties againſt the hierarchy.

On the 16th, a complaint was brought to the lords [l] againſt a conventicle held in the pariſh of St. Saviour's in Southwork, where at leaſt ſixty perſons were ſeized, who upon being aſked why they did not reſort to their pariſh church, according to the law of the 35th of Elizabeth, anſwered, that the law of Elizabeth was not a true law, for that it was made by the biſhops [m]. The lords contented themſelves with ordering, that divine ſervice ſhould be performed as appointed by the acts of parliament; and that the miniſters ſhould forbear to introduce any innovations.

On the 19th, the city of Gloceſter preſented a petition againſt the biſhops.

On the 23d was read a petition of ſeveral miniſters, in behalf of themſelves and many others their brethren, praying a redreſs of certain irregularities in the government of the church. To which was annexed a remonſtrance ſetting forth theſe pretended irregularities, and the great revenues and the little uſe of deans and chapters.

All theſe petitions, which were very graciouſly received by the commons, being plain indications that the houſe had ſome ill deſign againſt the biſhops, his majeſty ſent for both houſes to attend him at the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, where he made the following ſpeech.

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes,

"THE principal cauſe of my coming here at this time, is by reaſon of the ſlow proceedings in parliament, touching which, is a great deal of inconvenience. Therefore I think it very neceſſary to lay before you the ſtate of my affairs as they now ſtand, thereby to haſten (not to interrupt) your proceedings.

"Firſt, I muſt remember you, that there are two armies in the kingdom, in a manner maintained by you, the very naming of which, doth more clearly ſhew the inconvenience thereof, than a better tongue than mine can expreſs. Therefore, in the firſt place. I ſhall recommend unto you, the quick diſpatch of that buſineſs. In the next place, I muſt recommend unto you the ſtate of my navy and forts; the condition of both which is ſo well known unto you, that I need not tell you the particulars, only thus much; they are the walls and defence of this kingdom, which if out of order, all men may eaſily judge what encouragement it will be to our enemies, and what diſheartening to our friends. Laſt of all (and not the leaſt to be conſidered) I muſt lay before you the diſtractions that are at this preſent occaſioned through the connivance of parliament; for there are ſome men that, more maliciouſly than ignorantly, will put no difference between reformation, and alteration of government. Hence it cometh, that divine ſervice is irreverently interrupted, and petitions in an ill way given in, neither diſputed nor denied.

"But I will enter into no more particulars, but ſhew you a way of remedy, by ſhewing you my clear intentions, and ſome rocks that may hinder this good work.

"I ſhall willingly and chearfully concur with you for the reformation of all innovations both in church and commonwealth, and conſequently that all courts of juſtice may be reformed according to law. For my intention is clearly to reduce all things to the beſt and pureſt times, as they were in the time of queen Elizabeth. Moreover, whatſoever part of my revenue ſhall be found illegal, or heavy to my ſubjects, I ſhall be willing to lay it down, truſting in their affections.

"Having thus clearly and ſhortly ſet down my intentions, I will ſhew you ſome rubs, and muſt needs take notice of ſome very ſtrange, (I know not what term to give them) petitions given in the name of divers counties, againſt the preſent eſtabliſhed government, and of the great threatenings againſt the biſhops, that they will make them to be but cyphers, or at leaſt their voices to be taken away. Now I muſt tell you, that I make a great difference between reformation and alteration of government; though I am for the firſt, I cannot give way to the latter.

"If ſome of them have over ſtretched their power, and incroached too much upon the temporality, if it be ſo, I ſhall not be unwilling theſe things ſhould be redreſſed and reformed, as all other abuſes, according to the wiſdom of former times: ſo far I ſhall go with you, nay farther, if upon ſerious debate you ſhall ſhew me, that biſhops have ſome temporal authority, inconvenient to the ſtate, and not ſo neceſſary for the government of the church, and upholding epiſcopal juriſdiction; I ſhall not be unwilling to deſire them to lay it down; but this muſt not be underſtood, that I ſhall any way conſent that their voices in parliament ſhall be taken away; for in all the times of my predeceſſors ſince the conqueſt, and before, they have enjoyed it; I am bound to maintain them in it, as one of the fundamental conſtitutions of this kingdom. There is another rock you are on, not in ſubſtance but in form; yet the form is ſo eſſential, that unleſs it be reformed, it will marr the ſubſtance.

"There is a bill lately put in concerning parliaments. The thing I like well, to have frequent parliaments, but to give power to ſheriffs and conſtables, and I know not whom, to uſe my authority, that I cannot yield unto. But to ſhew you, that I am deſirous to give you content in forms which deſtroy not the ſubſtance, you ſhall have a bill for this purpoſe; ſo that it trench neither againſt my honour, nor againſt the ancient prerogative of the crown, concerning parliaments; to which purpoſe I have commanded my learned council to wait upon you, my lords, with ſuch propoſitions as I hope will give you content, for I ingenuouſly confeſs, that frequent parliaments are the beſt means to keep a right underſtanding between me and my people, which I ſo much deſire.

"To conclude, I have now ſhewn you the ſtate of my affairs, my own clear intentions, and the rocks I wiſh you to eſchew; in all which you may perceive the deſire I have to give you content, as you ſhall find alſo by thoſe miniſters I have, or ſhall have, about me for the effecting of theſe my good intentions, which I doubt not, will bring peace and happineſs to my ſubjects, and contentment to you all.

"Concerning the conference, you ſhall have a direct anſwer, which ſhall give you ſatisfaction."

This ſpeech produced not the effect, the king expected: Firſt, becauſe probably the excluſion of the biſhops was already reſolved, and there was nothing in the king's ſpeech capable of altering that reſolution. Secondly, the great concern expreſſed by the king for the biſhops right, was preciſely the principal cauſe that made their excluſion to be deſired. Thirdly, the king ſeemed to banter the parliament, when he ſaid, "if they would ſhew him that the biſhops have any temporal authority inconvenient to the ſtate, he ſhould not be unwilling to deſire them to lay it down." As if the parliament ought to have expected, from the pure condeſcenſion of the biſhops, the reformation of an authority prejudicial to the ſtate, a maxim directly contrary to the principles, the parliament was then of.

The next day, a complaint was brought to the commons againſt Matthew Wren, for having, whilſt biſhop of Norwich, by oppreſſions, innovations, and requiring certain oaths, compelled above fifty families of that city to withdraw out of England.

On the 1ſt of February, the commons examined part of the London miniſters remonſtrance againſt the biſhops. In the debate upon this ſubject, ſome ſmart repartees paſſed between Mr. Grimſton and Mr. Selden. Mr. Grimſton argued thus, "That biſhops are jure divino, is a queſtion; that archbiſhops are not jure divino, is out of queſtion. Now that biſhops which are queſtioned whether jure divion, or archbiſhops, which out of queſtion are not jure divino, ſhould ſuſpend miniſters that are jure divino, I leave to you to be conſidered." To which Mr. Selden anſwered, "That the convocation is jure divino, is a queſtion; that parliaments are not jure divino, is out of queſtion: That religion is jure divino, there is no queſtion. Now, ſir, That the convocation, which is queſtionable whether jure divino, and parliaments, which out of queſtion are not jure divino, ſhould meddle with religion, which queſtionleſs is jure divino, I leave to your conſideration."

I own theſe two arguments do not ſeem to me of equal force. The firſt ſuppoſes, that for the particular act of ſuſpending a miniſter, there muſt be an authority derived from God a ſuppoſition ſeemingly very natural. The other ſuppoſes, that there is occaſion for the like authority, to meddle with the affairs of religion, a ſuppoſition which to me appears a little too general, and which ſhould be reduced to particular acts, to render this argument like the firſt.

On the 5th, upon the complaint of the inhabitants of Wood-Church in Kent, againſt Mr. Bowen their miniſter, who being alſo a juſtice of peace, had, by colour of that office, done ſeveral things contrary to the laws, the houſe ordered that the lord-keeper ſhould be deſired to leave out the clergy of England and Wales, at the renewing of the commiſſion of the peace.

On the 8th and 9th, the houſe reſummed the debates concerning the biſhops, and many ſpeeches were made for and againſt them [n], but they are too long to be inſerted. I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that though the point in queſtion ſeemed to be only to know, whether the biſhops ought to be excluded from the houſe of peers, yet the arguments againſt them tended much farther, even to the entire abolition of epiſcopacy.

I ſhall alſo remark, that among thoſe who ſpoke for the biſhops, there was not one that denied, the prelates had abuſed their power. But they maintained, that theſe were perſonal faults, which might be puniſhed and prevented for the future, without any neceſſity of attacking epiſcopacy itſelf. The adverſaries of the biſhops intimated on the contrary, that there was no reforming epiſcopacy, but by changing the government of the church. They ſaid, whileſt there were biſhops there would be ſo many tyrants, who would think more of eſtabliſhing their grandeur, than of the people's ſalvation. Unhappily, they had but too many inſtances to confirm their opinion. The lord Falkland, who ſpoke that day againſt the biſhops, ſaid, among other things.

"We ſhall find them to have tythed mint and aniſe, and have left undone the weightier works of the law; to have been leſs eager upon thoſe who damn our church, than upon thoſe, who upon weak conſcience, and perhaps as weak reaſon, (the diſlike of ſome commanded garment, or ſome uncommanded poſture) only abſtained from it. Nay, it hath been more dangerous for men to go to ſome neighbour's pariſh, when they had no ſermon of their own, than to be obſtinate and perpetual recuſants; while maſſes have been ſaid in ſecurity, a conventicle hath been a crime; and which is yet more, the conforming to ceremonies hath been more exacted, than the conforming to chriſtianity; and whilſt men for ſcruples have been undone, for attempts upon ſodomy they have only been admoniſhed."

The oppoſition which the enemies of epiſcopacy then met with in the execution of their deſigns, was ſtrong enough to retard it, but not capable to make them deſiſt. What they had juſt done was properly but an effort, in order to take more effectual meaſures hereafter. They were contented, therefore, with having prevailed with the houſe, that the petition of the inhabitants of London ſhould be taken into conſideration, contrary to the opinion of thoſe who would have it rejected without reading. Beſides what had been ſaid on this occaſion againſt the biſhops, promoted the execution of the project, to take away their votes in the houſe of lords, which moſt of the commons had already reſolved in private. they continued therefore to receive petitions againſt epiſcopacy, and to take ſeveral ſteps tending to inſpire the people with an averſion for the biſhops, and the reſt of the clergy.

The 13th of February, a bill was brought in for aboliſhing ſuperſtition, in the ſuppoſition, that biſhops had introduced into the church ſundry ſuperſtitious practices.

The 1ſt of March the commons appointed a committee to prepare reaſons to be offered to the lords, that all clergymen in England and Wales, ſhould be put out of the commiſſion of the peace.

The 9th, it was moved in the houſe, that a bill be drawn againſt pluraliſts and non-reſidents.

[n] Thoſe that ſpoke in favour of the biſhops, were, the lord Digby, ſir Benjamin Rudyard, the lord Falkland, Mr. Plydell, and Mr. Grimſton; and thoſe that ſpoke againſt them, were, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, Mr. Bagſhaw, &c. See Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 170—187.

T

The ſame day were preſented, from the committee for the miniſters remonſtrance againſt the biſhops, three heads for the debate and conſideration of the houſe. The firſt concerned their ſecular employments, namely, their legiſlative and judicial power in parliament; their judicial power in the ſtar-chamber, and commiſſions for the peace; their employment as privy-counſellors, and temporal officers. The ſecond related to their ſole power in eccleſiaſtical things, as ordination and cenſures. The third concerned the greatneſs of the revenues of deans and chapters, the little uſe of them, and the inconveniencies thence ariſing. The houſe having debated upon the firſt of theſe heads, came to theſe reſolutions:

I. That the legiſlative and judicial power of biſhops in the houſe of peers, is a great hinderance to the diſcharge of their ſpiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwelth, and fit to be taken away by bill, and that a bill be drawn to that purpoſe.

II. That for biſhops, or any other clergymen, to be in the commiſſion of the peace, or to have any judicial power, in the ſtar-chamber, or in any civil court, is a great hinderance to the diſcharge of their ſpiritual function, prejudicial to the common-wealth, and fit to be taken away; and that a bill be brought in to that purpoſe.

The ſame day, the lords ordered to be burnt two books, written by Dr. Pocklington, entitled, Sunday no Sabbath, and Altere Chriſtianum.

The 15th, the commons ſent up to the lords articles againſt Dr. Coſins, who was accuſed of introducing into the church of Durham divers innovations, tending to reſtore popery.

The 21ſt of April, petitions againſt the hierarchy were preſented by Nottinghamſhire and Lancaſhire.

The 26th of the ſame month was read, a ſecond time, a bill, for puniſhing and fining the members of the late convocation. The archbiſhop of Canterbury's fine was of twenty thouſand pounds. There were others of ten thouſand pounds, of five thouſand, three thouſand, two thouſand and the leaſt of a biſhop was of a thouſand. The reſt of the members were rated, each in proportion to his eccleſiaſtical revenues[o].

The ſame day was read a bill, for regulating abuſes in eccleſiaſtical courts.

It was evident, that the commons were projecting ſome great reformation in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and probably, the deans and chapters were firſt to be attacked, becauſe their uſe did not appear ſo manifeſt. For this reaſon, Dr. Hacket deſired leave to ſpeak before the houſe, on the behalf of deans and chapters, which was granted him. But after he had done, Dr. Burgeſs was permitted alſo to anſwer his reaſons. The two univerſities preſented likewiſe petitions to the houſe on the ſame account, but to no manner of purpoſe.

At laſt, the bill againſt the biſhops and clergy exerciſing temporal juriſdiction, paſſed in the houſe of commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their concurrence. But this bill meeting with great oppoſition in the houſe of peers, who put off the debate from day to day, the commons cauſed a new bill to be brought into their houſe, for the taking away of archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c. which was read the firſt time. Whilſt they were debating whether it ſhould be read again or laid aſide, a meſſage came from the lords, ſignifying, that they were ready to concur with them as to the former bill, except only taking away the biſhops votes in parliament. But the commons, without taking any notice of this offer, ordered the new bill to be read a ſecond time.

The 2d of June, at a conference between the two houſes, the lords gave reaſons why they did not judge it unlawful for the biſhops to ſit in parliament, alleging, that for their right to vote there, they conceived by the common and ſtatute-law, and ancient practice, there was no queſtion of it. As for any inconveniences, they did not yet underſtand any ſuch as might induce them to deprive the biſhops and their ſucceſſors of their right. But for removing them from the ſtar-chamber, council-table, or any office in ſecular affairs, they would fully concur with the commons.

Next day, heads for a conference with the lords were reported, containing nine reaſons why biſhops ought not to have votes in parliament[p].

"1 Becauſe it is a great hinderance to their miniſterial function.

"2. Becauſe they do vow and undertake at their ordination, when they enter into holy orders, that they will give themſelves wholly to that vocation.

"3. Becauſe councils and canons in ſeveral ages, do forbid them to meddle in ſecular affairs.

"4. Becauſe the twenty-four biſhops have dependance on the two archbiſhops, and take their oath of canonical obedience unto them.

"5. Becauſe they are but for their lives, and therefore are not fit to have legiſlative power over the honors, inheritances, perſons, and liberties of others.

That the ſeveral biſhops have of late much encroached upon the conſciences and liberties of the ſubjects; and they and their ſucceſſors will be much encouraged ſtill to encroach; and the ſubject will be much diſcouraged from complaining againſt ſuch encroachment, if twenty-ſix of that order be to be judges upon that complaint. The ſame reaſon extends to their legiſlative power, in any bill to paſs for the regulation of that power, upon any emergent inconveniency by it.

"8. Becauſe the whole number of them are intereſted to maintain the juriſdiction of Biſhops; which hath been found ſo grievous to the three kingdoms, that Scotland hath utterly aboliſhed it.

"9. Becauſe the biſhops, being lords of parliament, it ſettleth too great a diſtance between them and the reſt of their brethren in the miniſtry; which occaſioneth pride in them, diſcontent in others, and diſquiet in the church.

"And as to their having votes a long time, the anſwer is, if it be inconvenient, time and uſage are not to be conſidered with law-makers: ſome abbots voted as anciently in parliament as biſhops, yet are taken away."

Among theſe reaſons, the commons only inſinuated the principal in the ſixth article, which however was univerſally known, namely, that the biſhops had been too much devoted to the king, and countenanced arbitrary power.

Mean while the commons ordered a bill to be prepared againſt the late convocation, and another to abolith the high-commiſſion.

The 7th of June, the lords voted for maintaining the biſhops right to ſit in parliament.

The 11th, the affair of the epiſcopacy coming again into debate, laſted from ſeven in the morning, till night[q], and it was reſolved by the commons, that the preamble to the bill ſhould be expreſſed in theſe words:

"Whereas the government of the church of England by archbiſhops and biſhops, the chancellors and commiſſaries, deans, archdeacons, and other eccleſiaſtical officers, hath been found by long experience to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the ſtate and government of this kingdom, &c."

The 15th, the commons voted that all deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, prebendaries, chanters, canons, and petty-canons, and their officers, ſhall be utterly aboliſhed: that all the lands taken from deans and chapters ſhall be employed to the advancement of learning and piety, proviſion being made that his majeſty be no loſer in his rents, firſt-fruits, and other duties; and that a competent maintenance ſhall be made to the ſeveral perſons concerned, if ſuch perſons appear not to be delinquents. Several ſpeeches, too long to be inſerted, were made upon this occaſion.

The 21ſt, the houſe being reſolved into a grand committee to debate the bill for aboliſhing epiſcopacy, ſir Edward Deering propoſed, in a ſpeech, that there ſhould be in every ſhire twelve divines and a preſident, to whom might be given what title they pleaſed, whether that of biſhop or any other: but nothing was reſolved thereupon.

It is eaſy to perceive by what paſſed in the parliament, during the firſt months, with regard to the church, that the commons conſidered this affair as a capital point, though they affected to let it paſs as dependent on the deſign of reforming the civil government. For ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome debate, directly or indirectly, on this ſubject. But as this was not the only affair then in agitation in the parliament, it will be neceſſary to break off the narration, in order to ſpeak of ſome other matters of no leſs importance.

[q] In this long debate, the authority of that very ancient parchment-manuſcript-copy of the Bible in his majeſty's library at St. James's, and ſent to king Charles I. by Cyrillus patriarch of Alexandria, being all written in great capital Greek letters, was vouched and aſſerted by ſir Simonds d'Ewes (a great antiquary) wherein the poſtſcript to the epiſtles to Timothy and Titus are only thus: "The firſt to Timothy, written from Laodicea: the Second to Timothy, written from Laodicea: to Titus, written from Nicopolis." Whence he inferred, that the ſtiling of Timothy the firſt biſhop of Epheſus, and Titus the firſt biſhop of Crete, were the ſpurious additions of ſome eaſtern biſhop or monk, at leaſt five hundred years after Chriſt. In

The king could not but be very much diſpleaſed with the proceedings of the commons, as well in the affair of grievances, as in that of epiſcopacy. The two things he had moſt at heart, ſince the beginning of his reign, were the ſtretching his prerogative, and maintaining the church of England in its full luſtre, and the biſhops in all their authority. Nevertheleſs, upon theſe two points it was that the commons ſeemed to affect to give him daily mortifications, not only by their ſpeeches, but alſo by their votes and the bills they ſent up to the lords.

But beſides grievances and epiſcopacy, there was another article, wherein the commons ſhewed no great complaiſance to the king; and that was the affair of the catholics. Charles followed the king his father's method, that is, he appeared to be entirely attached to the proteſtant religion and church of England; whilſt on the other hand, he protected and countenanced the papiſts. But there was this difference between the father and ſon; king James's religion was always very doubtful, notwithſtanding his outward profeſſion of the proteſtant religion whereas king Charles was never accuſed of being a papiſt, but by men of very warm and paſſionate tempers. However, ſeveral things induced him to favor the catholics, which gave his enemies ſome advantage. 1. The example of the king his father, who, throughout his whole reign, could never be prevailed with to execute the laws againſt them. 2. Though the papiſts would not take the oath of ſupremacy, they refuſed not to ſwear allegiance, and that was ſufficient for him to reckon them good ſubjects. 3. In his project of humbling the parliament, and reducing the commons to the ſole affair of ſupply, the parliament's deſiring the execution of the laws againſt the papiſts, ſufficed to throw him upon a contrary courſe, in order to deprive them by degrees, of the cuſtom of obtaining every thing by importunity. 4. The catholics having no other refuge but the king's protection, it was natural for them firmly to adhere to his perſon and intereſt, and the king thought himſelf obliged to grant them an extraordinary protection, in reward of their fidelity. 5. Nothing was more grating to the puritans, than to ſee the papiſts well received at court; and as the king hated the puritans, he took a pleaſure in mortifying them, by careſſing their enemies. 6. The queen, for whom the king had a very great condeſcention, did not a little contribute to inſpire him with a good opinion, if not of her religion, at leaſt of the profeſſors. 7. Archbiſhop Laud, who was an arminian, took care not to ſtrengthen the calviniſtical-party, by incenſing the king againſt the papiſts. 8. Laſtly, Charles I. was naturally of an inflexible temper, and this quality, added to his maxims of government, made him impatient of whatever tended to curb his will. Theſe are probably, the reaſons that induced the king to countenance the catholics, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign. He carried his regard for them ſo far, that not only the penal laws enacted againſt them were never executed, but the papiſts were alſo conſidered at court as the beſt ſubjects, whereas the puritans were regarded as enemies to the king and ſtate.

The face of affairs being changed by the calling of the parliament, and the king unable to protect the papiſts, they were treated a little roughly. It was ſuppoſed, there was a ſettled deſign to introduce popery, and that ſeveral biſhops and other clergymen were in the plot. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Ely, and of Bath and Wells. Dr. Couſins, ſecretary Windebank, and ſome others, were accuſed of being chiefly concerned in the affair, which was openly ſaid to be managed by the queen and her confidents. Though this charge was perhaps carried too far, with reſpect to the private perſons, it can hardly be denied, that they gave ſome cauſe for it by their proceedings. Their hatred to the preſbyterians, made them not ſcruple to make too near approaches to popery, in order to be at a greater diſtance from preſbyterianiſm. This, if I am not miſtaken, was the true cauſe of all the innovations introduced into the public worſhip, and of the inviolable attachment to the obſervance of certain indifferent or needleſs cuſtoms or ceremonies. The chief aim of the governors of the church was to widen continually the diſtance between preſbyterianiſm and the church of England. But this policy, which was advantageous to the enemies of the puritans, whilſt the king ruled with an abſolute power, turned to their prejudice entirely, becauſe in this parliament they were accuſed of having had more ſecret deſigns; in a word, of having intended to introduce popery, and the puniſhment of the faults committed by ſome hot and paſſionate perſons, was made to fall on the whole church.

In all the proceedings of the parliament againſt the papiſts, the king had properly nothing to ſay. He could not deny that there were laws againſt recuſants, and that theſe laws had not been executed, though he had ſeveral times ſolemnly promiſed. It was no longer a proper ſeaſon to protect them openly, and therefore he publiſhed proclamations, enjoining the execution of the laws, in order to content the parliament. But theſe proclamations were ſo artfully drawn, that they properly granted nothing of what they ſeemed to promiſe: eſpecially, the parliament could never prevail with the king to let the condemned prieſts be executed, whether the king believed theſe ſentences too rigorous, or the queen's ſolicitations had a greater influence upon him than thoſe of the parliament. I ſhall now proceed to the moſt material tranſactions concerning the catholics, during the firſt ſeven or eight months of this ſeſſion.

In the beginning of the parliament, the king having publiſhed a proclamation againſt recuſants, the committee charged with examining it, reported, it was not according to his majeſty's intentions, or the expectation of the houſe, for the following reaſons:

1. In the clauſe wherein the proclamation commands all popiſh recuſants within fifteen days to depart the city, &c. it is added, "Without ſpecial licence had thereunto:" ſo that if by any means they can obtain any licence from his majeſty (which the committee thinks they cannot) or from the lords of the council, biſhop, lieutenant, or deputy lieutenant, then they are not within that clauſe,

2. The order to diſarm all recuſants, is limited to recuſants convict, and being ſo reſtrained, if any be armed and not convicted, a juſtice of the peace cannot diſarm them.

3. Recuſants are commanded to depart to their own dwelling houſes; but as of late days there is great reſort of recuſants to London and Weſtminſter, and places adjacent, there is no urging them from thence by law.

The committee added, that many recuſants had letters of grace to protect their perſons and eſtates.

In the continuation of this report, a few days after, the committee ſaid, that upon the examination of the keepers of two priſons only, Newgate and the Clink, they found ſixty-four prieſts and jeſuits diſcharged in one year, ſome by privy-ſignet, others by warrants from the lords of the council, but moſt of them by warrants from ſecretary Windebank, without any mention of the king's pleaſure[r]. That upon examination of the clerk of the peace for Middleſex, and the clerk of the crown in the king's-bench, it was found, that within the compaſs of ſeven or eight years there had been ſeventy-four letters of grace[s]. Then they deſcended to particular circumſtances concerning the diſcharge of ſeveral perſons condemned for treaſon, all by the order of Windebank: they ſaid moreover, that they had diſcovered ſixty-four letters of grace to ſtay the proſecution againſt papiſts, directed to ſeveral counties and judges. It was added, that indeed the king had power to pardon the condemned: but to command no further proſecution, was contrary to law.

The 30th of November, the commons deſired the general of the army to diſmiſs all popiſh officers[t]; and moved his majeſty, that all commanders and other officers in any town or garriſon that were papiſts, might be removed. The king anſwered, he knew of no papiſt that had the command of any place, but, however, had given orders to be more particularly informed.

The 1ſt of December, the houſe ordered the preparing of a remonſtrance to his majeſty, concerning the pope's pretended nuntio. This was count Roſetti, who exerciſed in England the function of nuntio, under colour that it was neceſſary to the queen for matters of conſcience.

The 5th, the houſe ſent an order to all the juſtices of peace of Weſtminſter, London, and Middleſex, enjoining them to proceed againſt recuſants according to law, notwithſtanding any inhibition or reſtraint.

In January following there was a ſort of diſpute between the king and the commons, on account of John Goodman a jeſuit, who had been condemned to die, but was reprieved by the king. The houſes had ſeveral conferences upon this ſub-

[s] Rapin having made ſome miſtakes in this paragraph, they are corrected from the report at large in Ruſhworth, tom. iv. p. 61. The nature of theſe letters of grace was this, they were directed to archbiſhops, biſhops, judges, and all other the king's officers, to ſtay all proceedings againſt the perſons therein named. Particularly jeƈt, and at laſt agreed to join in a remonſtrance to his majeſty, to move him that the laws might be executed againſt prieſts and jeſuits, and particularly againſt Goodman. The king, who deſired to ſave the jeſuit, alleged that he had been condemned merely for being in orders of a prieſt, and had never been condemned or baniſhed before. But the two houſes repreſented to him, that this prieſt and jeſuit had been a miniſter of the church of England, and had been formerly twice committed and diſcharged. In ſhort the king replied, that if Goodman was put to death, the proteſtants abroad in catholic countries might ſuffer for it; but however would leave it to both houſes to do as they thought fit. Next day, Goodman ſent a petition to the king, which was immediately communicated to the houſe of lords, wherein he ſaid, that he was content to die rather than live the ſubjeƈt of ſo great diſcontent between him and his people. As it does not appear that the parliament inſiſted any more upon this matter, it is likely the king obtained his deſire, and ſaved the jeſuit's life. But this ſort of victory failed not to do him ſome prejudice, in that his enemies took occaſion from thence to repreſent, that there was no depending upon his proclamations or promiſes with reſpeƈt to the papiſts, ſince they were never executed. It is not doubted but the queen ſolicited ſtrongly in Goodman's behalf.

The 11th of February 1640-1, notice was given to the commons, that the papiſts were preparing to execute ſome great deſign[u], and that by the queen's order all Roman catholics faſted every Saturday, for the proſperous ſucceſs of the ſame. Whereupon an order was made that all judges in their circuits ſhould effeƈtually put the laws in execution againſt prieſts and jeſuits[w].

The 17th of May the commons ordered the lord mayor of London, and the juſtices of peace for London, Weſtminſter, and Southwark, to prevent papiſts from reſorting to embaſſadors houſes and the queen's chapels.

The 24th, the members of the houſe had orders to bring in, by ſuch a time, the names of all recuſants convicƈt in each county.

The 2d of June, was read in the houſe of commons a bill for diſarming all the papiſts in the kingdom.

In January laſt, the commons had begun to take into conſideration the contribution raiſed among the Roman catholics, for carrying on the late war againſt the Scots, at the inſtance of the queen, who wrote a circular letter to exhort them to it. Walter Montague and ſir Kenelm Digby (who had writ on the ſame occaſion to ſome of the principal of the popiſh party) were ſent for and examined, and the commons ſeemed reſolved vigorouſly to puſh this affair. But the queen found means to appeaſe them by a meſſage, wherein ſhe ſaid that ſhe was moved to raiſe money in that manner for the king's aſſiſtance, merely out of her tender affeƈtion to him; and if it were illegal, ſhe was ignorant of the law, but promiſed to be more cautious for the future: ſhe ſaid moreover, that underſtanding the having one ſent to her from the pope was diſtaſtful to the kingdom, ſhe was deſirous to give the parliament ſatisfaƈtion, and in convenient time would remove him. This convenient time was not yet come in June following, when the nuntio Roſetti was ſtill with the queen. But at laſt, the commons having ordered him to be brought to the bar of their houſe to be examined, he hid himſelf, and on the morrow departed for Rome. Montague, Winter, and ſir Kenelm Digby withdrew into France.

Father Philips, the queen's confeſſor, was alſo examined by the commons, who afterwards brought an accuſation againſt him to the lords, and againſt the ſuperior of the Capuchins belonging to the queen. Probably this accuſation was only to frighten and oblige them to retire.

Theſe are all the material tranſaƈtions concerning the catholics before the king's journey to Scotland, which will be mentioned hereafter. It is time to return to the Scotch army, which we left at Newcaſtle.

The king had flattered himſelf that the parliament would eſpouſe his cauſe againſt Scotland, and furniſh him with means to drive the Scots out of the kingdom. This was the firſt, or rather the only thing he recommended in his firſt ſpeech to both houſes. But to perceive how vain this hope was it needs only to be conſidered that the leading men of the party againſt the king were the perſons that encouraged the Scots to enter England, and that this party was ſo ſuperior in the parliament, that but few of the king's friends durſt open their mouth to ſupport his intereſt. It was this Scotch invaſion that compelled the king to call a parliament, and enabled the parliament to break all the king's meaſures and oblige him to ſuffer the redreſs of grievances. In a word, it was ſolely by means of the Scots that the parliament had it in their power to reſtore the government to its ancient and natural ſtate: they would therefore have aƈted againſt their own intereſt, and directly contrary to the end they propoſed, if they had ſupplied the king with means to drive the Scots out of the kingdom. Accordingly they took not one ſtep tending to that end. On the contrary, it evidently appeared, that they conſidered the Scots as brethren, who having the ſame intereſt as the Engliſh, were come to aſſiſt them and aƈt in concert with them.

The 9th of November, ſix days after the opening of the parliament, ſir William Widdrington, knight of the ſhire for Northumberland, ſpeaking concerning the matter of a petition, preſented by that county, on account of the oppreſſions they laboured under from the Scotch army, called the Scots invading rebels: the houſe was ſo offended at the expreſſion, that Widdrington eſcaped impriſonment only by recanting, and promiſing to call them rebels no more. Nothing was more capable to ſhew the king how averſe the commons were from aiding him againſt the Scots. But this was not the only mark they gave of their intention: in the firſt place they thought proper to give the Scots the ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds, in reward for their brotherly aſſiſtance to England. In the ſecond place, they found means to oppoſe the negotiation of peace till the 7th of Auguſt 1641, that is till almoſt all the grievances were redreſſed, the triennial bill paſſed, and another, that the parliament ſhould not be diſſolved but by an aƈt for that purpoſe. All this was very remote from the hopes the king had flattered himſelf with, that he ſhould have a ſufficient ſupply to compel the Scots to return home. As the troubles of Scotland were the fountain and origin of all that paſſed in this parliament, I am perſuaded the reader will not take it ill to ſee here a brief account of the negotiation of peace between the king and the Scots, and between Scotland and England. What follows is the ſubſtance of the earl of Briſtol's ſpeech to both houſes, when he was choſen by the lords commiſſioners, to give them an account of what had paſſed hitherto in that affair.

"The commiſſioners employed by his majeſty intend not to look further back into the buſineſs, than the aƈts of their own employments; they intend to give no account of the pacification interrupted nor war renewed; no account how the armies in England, Ireland, and by ſea were deſigned; they purpoſe not to lay fault upon any man, nor to enquire into the cauſe why the Scots (as they pretended from neceſſity) were drawn to enter this kingdom; nor why the king's army when ſervice was to be done, was out of the way; but that thoſe through whoſe hands theſe have paſſed, may hereafter give their own account.

"His majeſty having called his great council at York, made to them two propoſitions: the firſt was, how his army ſhould be relieved and maintained? To this the lords reſolved to engage themſelves, and to ſend deputies to London to negociate a ſupply. The ſecond propoſition was, that after the Scots had paſſed Northumberland, taken Newcaſtle, and poſſeſſed the biſhopric of Dureſm, they ſent a petition to his majeſty which contained in general terms a deſire to have their grievances taken into conſideration. Upon receipt of his majeſty's anſwer, the Scotiſh lords ſent his majeſty a ſecond petition, in which they made their particular demands, and declared, that according to his majeſty's command they would advance no further into England. So his majeſty aſked the lords what anſwer ſhould be made to that petitionary letter? The lords replied, that it was impoſſible for them to give any well-grounded advice, unleſs the true ſtate of his affairs, and the condition of his army were laid before them. Whereupon his majeſty commanded the earl of Traquair to make the narration of the Scotiſh buſineſs, and their late aƈts of parliament, and the [earl of Strafford] lord lieutenant-general to give an account in what condition the army ſtood.

"The Scots army had paſſed Northumberland without reſiſtance. They had diſputed the paſſage of the river Tyne at Newburn, where the Engliſh horſe retired in diſorder. His majeſty's foot army, conſiſting of twelve or fourteen thouſand men, in Newcaſtle, likewiſe retired to York, whereby the town of Newcaſtle, a place of great conſideration, was fallen into the Scots hands, and the biſhopric of Dureſm brought under contribution.

"In this ſtate the gentry of the biſhopric repaired to his majeſty, from whom they were referred to the earl of Strafford, who gave them this anſwer poſitively, that they could look for no help nor protection from the king, and therefore they might uſe the beſt means they could to preſerve their lives and eſtates. Whereby they were forced to conſent to a very heavy contribution, though ſuch without which the Scotiſh army could not ſubſiſt. This contribution was eight hundred and fifty pounds a day for the biſhopric of Durham, Northumberland, and Newcaſtle. Theſe gentlemen much lamented their eſtates, that the Scots ſhould be irritated by being proclaimed traitors.

"The Scots on the other hand repreſented to the king's commiſſioners, that being threatened with an army of thirty or forty thouſand men, another of ten thouſand men out of Ireland, and by proclamation declared traitors and rebels; and having heard of another army providing, of eight or ten thouſand by ſhipping to hinder their trade, at leaſt their commerce with England, that they were drawn together by neceſſity, as they pretended, of defence. They further alleged, that it was a common diſcourſe, of which they had ſeen papers that they ſhould be reduced into a province. which would be but one ſummer's work. Therefore they had drawn their power together, and being aſſembled, and their country poor; taking advantage of the time, while all thoſe armies that ſhould oppoſe them were out of the way, they were forced to enter into England.

"Thus the great council of the lords found that the Scots had increaſed their confines near fourſcore miles in England, and had paſſed the rivers of Tweed and Tyne; and that the river of Tees, the boundary of Yorkſhire, was not to be defended, being fordable in many places by forty horſe a-front. That if the Scots ſhould paſs that river, there was no poſſibility to hinder them from coming to York, without hazarding a battle, which the earl of Strafford declared unto them he would not adviſe, becauſe the king's army conſiſted of troops that were untrained and unuſed to arms.

"This being the caſe, the lords adviſed his majeſty that the Scots and their grievances might be heard. And whereas their complaint had been, that their petitions to his majeſty had been conveyed by conduits of an evil reliſh, that there might be choſen ſuch lords commiſſioners, of whoſe integrity they could not doubt. The king was pleaſed to refer the choice of theſe commiſſioners to the great council: and to them power was given, under the great ſeal of England, to hear whatſoever the Scots could lay before them, and to enter into treaty with them.

"When this was propoſed to the Scots commiſſioners, they repreſented, that the countries where they lay were become poor; that they could not think, as their affairs ſtood, of returning home; that his majeſty had reſtrained them from paſſing further into England; ſo that a treaty in this exigent was worſe than a war, unleſs means might be thought upon how they might ſubſiſt while the treaty was foot, otherwiſe they ſhould be obliged to plunder the country.

"The commiſſioners having diſpatched ſome of their company to acquaint his majeſty with the Scots demands, a commiſſion was given them by the king to treat with the Scots for a maintenance, and the commiſſioners thought, that inſtead of giving them any allowance, they ſhould be left to their proportion of that contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day, already agreed upon by the counties, as leſs diſhonourable than to aſſign them maintenance. Accordingly the preliminaries were agreed upon; the treaty of ceſſation concluded, and the commiſſioners adviſed his majeſty to ratify it, which was accordingly done. The parliament approaching, their lordſhips adviſed his majeſty to transfer the treaty from Rippon to London, to which his majeſty conſented.

"To excuſe the preliminaries agreed on at Rippon, the earl of Briſtol added, that it was indeed hard to pay the Scots a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day, and that there was already ſome doubt that the countries were not able to bear it: but that on the other ſide it was objected by the Scots, that it was impoſſible, if the payment ſhould fail, to keep their promiſe, or to obey his majeſty, but that they ſhould be neceſſitated againſt their will to plunder the country. For which reaſons the earl of Strafford had declared that the counties of Cumberland and Weſtmoreland being under the Scots power, it was reaſonable that in ſubſidium they ſhould contribute ſome help to their neighbours; but he added, that the commiſſioners left at Dureſm had written, that it was impoſſible for them to proceed in the agreement; which if it were broken on their part, the Scots would allege an impoſſibility to conſent to ſtarve; ſo that if ſome means were not found, by which thoſe counties engaged might be relieved, he was afraid all their labour and treaty would come to nothing. Therefore the commiſſioners, and all the lords, engaged themſelves faithfully and truly, to declare all theſe things to the parliament.

"The earl of Briſtol declared further, that it was far from the lord-commiſſioners purpoſe to move any ſupply of money from the houſe of commons, but to lay the cauſe before them. Averring certainly, that if ſome courſe were not taken, the whole kingdom would be put into diſorder. Armies would not ſtarve; retiring was not yet in the thoughts of the Scots; therefore they muſt plunder and deſtroy, or advance into Yorkſhire, and ſo farther into England, to ſeek ſubſiſtence; the prevention whereof did highly import the king and kingdom.

"Laſtly, the earl propoſed to the parliament another thing, no leſs worthy of conſideration, viz. that if the Scots army were provided of a competency, it were very ſtrange there ſhould not an equal care be had for maintaining the king's army. He ſaid the Scots army was ſtrong and powerful, and li ttle other reſiſtance againſt it but the impediments of an army marching in winter; but whether it were fit for a kingdom to be truſted to accidents of froſts, with a people bred in Swedeland [x], and cold countries, be left to their diſcretion. He confeſſed, that the Scots had made great proteſtations, and with great execrations averred that they had no intent to advance forward, but return when they ſhall have received ſatisfaction: yet the commiſſioners did not conceive that the kingdom ſhould rely upon promiſes and proteſtations. Many accidents might happen, when a nation come from a far country to a better, ſhould be told the buſineſs they came about was juſt, and their quarrel good; who finding themſelves in a fat paſture, may pick quarrels with their leaders, if they ſhould go about to prevent them. Upon theſe grounds his lordſhip preſented to the general conſideration, the ſupply of his majeſty's army, that it be not diſbanded; which if it ſhould come to paſs, Yorkſhire, and other parts of England, were left to the Scots diſcretion. His lordſhip ſaid, he durſt not ſay the Scots would not come forward, but that it was in their power if they would; and therefore he recommended this repreſentation to the whole body of the kingdom, to prevent future dangers."

There was no occaſion to uſe many arguments to induce the parliament to allow that the Scotiſh army ſhould be maintained in England. Upon the earl of Briſtol's report, it was reſolved, "that the commons approve of the perſons of the lords that were commiſſioners in the late treaty, to be commiſſioners now to treat with the Scots commiſſioners in this declaration, that no concluſion of theirs ſhould bind the commons, without their conſent in parliament." Though the Scotch army was very expenſive in England, the negociation however laſted till the 7th of Auguſt 1641, when the treaty was at length ſigned. I ſhall inſert here a ſummary of the articles, that it may be ſeen, firſt, wherein conſiſted the differences between the king and the Scots, and the difficulties of the peace; and ſecondly, what the king's grand project came to, of reducing the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England, and perhaps of rendering himſelf abſolute in Scotland, as he was almoſt in England when he formed this enterprize.

Anſwer. " His majeſty doth in the word of a king, promiſe the publiſhing of the ſaid acts, with the acts to be made in the next ſeſſion of the ſame parliament; and that all the ſaid acts have in all time coming the ſtrength of laws, &c.

2d Demand. " That the caſtle of Edinburgh, and other ſtrengths of the kingdom ſhould be furniſhed, and uſed for defence and ſecurity of the kingdom.

Anſwer. " Agreed unto.

3d Demand. " That Scotiſh men within his majeſty's dominions of England and Ireland, may be freed from cenſure for ſubſcribing the covenant, and be no more preſſed with oaths and ſubſcriptions, unwarranted by their laws, and contrary to their national oath and covenant approved by his majeſty.

Anſwer. " Granted with regard to the ſubjects of Scotland, who ſhall be ſojourners only in England or Ireland. But ſuch ſhall be excepted as are ſettled inhabitants in either of the two kingdoms. The Engliſh and Iriſh ſhall have the like privilege in Scotland.

4th Demand. " That whoſever ſhall be found, upon trial and examination, by the eſtates of either of the two parliaments, to have been the authors and cauſers of the late and preſent troubles and combuſtion; whether by labouring to make and foment diviſion betwixt the king and his people, or betwixt the two nations, or any other way, ſhall be liable to the cenſure and ſentence of the ſaid parliaments reſpectively, the Engliſh to the parliament of England. and the Scots to that of Scotland.

Anſwer. " His majeſty believeth he hath none ſuch, as incendiaries, about him; and therefore he can make no other declaration, than that all his courts of juſtice are free and open to all men. His parliament in this kingdom [of England] is now ſitting, and the current parliament of Scotland near approaching the time of their meeting. To either of which, he doth not prohibit any of his ſubjects to preſent their juſt grievances and complaints, of whatſoever nature.

" And whereas it was further demanded, that his majeſty would be pleaſed not to employ any perſon or perſons in office or place, that ſhall be judged incapable by ſentence of parliament, his majeſty agreeth thereto; nor will he make uſe of their ſervice, without the conſent of parliament, nor grant them acceſs to his perſon.

5th Demand. " That their ſhips and goods, and all damage thereof may be reſtored.

Anſwer. " This is condeſcended unto, on condition it be reciprocal. And the Scotiſh commiſſioners having informed, that about fourſcore ſhips of Scotland are yet ſtayed in the Engliſh ports, and are like to ſuffer much further loſs and damage; it is agreed, that warrants ſhall be preſently granted for the delivery of them, and that four thouſand pounds be preſently advanced, for helping the preſent ſetting forth of the ſaid ſhips.

6th Demand. " That for the loſſes which the kingdom of Scotland hath ſuſtained, and for the vaſt charges they have been put unto, reparation be made.

Anſwer. " The parliament of England grants to the Scots for this purpoſe, the ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds.

" And whereas it was deſired by the Scotiſh commiſſioners, that the Engliſh commiſſioners would let them know the ſecurity, manner, and term of payment of the aforeſaid ſum, and of the arrears due for relief of the northern counties; it was agreed by order of parliament, that they ſhould have fourſcore thouſand pounds, with the whole arrears due to the army, before the diſbanding thereof. And for paying the remnant of the ſaid ſum, an act of parliament of public faith ſhall paſs for ſecurity thereof; and that one moiety ſhall be paid at Midſummer 1642, and the other a year after, in 1643.

" And in like manner, whereas it was deſired by the Scotiſh commiſſioners, that they might know to whom they ſhould addreſs themſelves for payment of the forementioned ſums, the parliament hath appointed commiſſioners—and reſolved that the place of payment ſhall be the chamber of London. And laſtly, that a ſafe conduct ſhall be granted for the ſecure tranſporting of the monies to Scotland.

7th Demand. " That all ſuch declarations, proclamations, books, libels, &c. as have been made againſt the ſubjects of Scotland, may be ſuppreſſed and deſtroyed.

Anſwer. " It is agreed, that all ſuch declarations, &c. be reciprocally ſuppreſſed in England, Ireland, and Scotland.

8th Demand Containing ſeveral articles.

" 1. That all tokens and ſhews of hoſtility upon the borders of the two kingdoms may be taken away; and particularly, that not only the garriſons of Berwick and Carliſle may be removed, but that the works may be ſlighted, and the places diſmantled [y].

Anſwer. " His majeſty is deſirous, that all things between the kingdoms of England and Scotland, be reduced into the ſame ſtate they were in before the beginning of the late troubles.

" 2. That there be unity in religion, and uniformity of church-government between the nations.

Anſwer. " His majeſty, with the advice of both houſes of parliament, doth approve of the affection of his ſubjects of Scotland, in their deſire of having a conformity of church-government between the two nations; and as the parliament hath already taken into conſideration the reformation of church-government, ſo they will proceed in due time, as ſhall beſt conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the church, and of both kingdoms.

" 3. That the king's majeſty and the prince come and reſide ſometimes in Scotland.

Anſwer. " His majeſty will repair thither, as he ſhall find the urgency of their affairs require his preſence, and his other conveniencies here permit.

" 4. That the officers of ſtate, counſellors and ſeſſioners within the kingdom of Scotland, be placed by advice of parliament.

Anſwer. " His majeſty promiſes to give ear ſo far to the informations of his parliament, and when the parliament is not ſitting, of his council and college of juſtice, as that he ſhall either make choice of ſuch as they ſhall recommend unto him; or if he thinks another perſon fitter than any of thoſe recommended, he ſhall make the ſame known to the parliament, or in the time between parliament, to the council and ſeſſion, that if there is juſt exception againſt the life and qualifications of the ſaid party, he may timely nominate ſome other, againſt whom there ſhall be no juſt exception. His majeſty declares alſo, that the places in the college of juſtice ſhall be provided unto the judges, Quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint. If this anſwer cannot content the Scotiſh commiſſioners, his majeſty remits the whole anſwer to be conſidered by him, or his commiſſioners, at the parliament, at the next ſitting thereof.

" That his majeſty would be pleaſed to place about his own perſon, in places of greateſt nearneſs and truſt, ſome of his Scotiſh ſubjects.

Anſwer. " His majeſty ſhall continue the ſame care which hitherto he hath done for their ſatisfaction in this particular; and not only ſo, but ſhall alſo recommend the ſame to the prince his ſon.

" 6. That none may have place about his majeſty and the prince, but ſuch as are of the reformed religion.

Anſwer. " His majeſty doth conceive, that his ſubjects of Scotland have no intention by this propoſition (eſpecially by way of demand) to limit, or preſcribe unto him the choice of his ſervants, but rather to ſhew their zeal to religion; wherein his own piety will make him do therein, that which may give juſt ſatisfaction to his people.

" 7. That the copper-coin, which hath paſſed in Scotland this long time, for ſeven times, and above as much as the true value and worth thereof, be newly regulated; and that no copper-money be coined hereafter without conſent of the eſtates convened in parliament.

Anſwer. " His majeſty recommends this matter to the enſuing parliament of Scotland, not only concerning the copper-coin to be coined hereafter, but alſo the copper-money already coined, how the ſame ſhall paſs in payment for the time to come."

After theſe articles, there was added to the treaty, the draught of an act of oblivion, the moſt ample that could be, which was to paſs in all the parliaments of the three kingdoms, but of which the benefit was not to extend to the Scotiſh prelates, the earl of Traquair, ſir Robert Spotiſwood, ſir John Hay, and Mr. Walter Balcanqual.

The lord Lowdon having carried this treaty to Scotland, to communicate it to the parliament of that kingdom, now aſſembled, returned ſome time after with twelve articles, explaining certain paſſages of the treaty, and to which the Engliſh commiſſioners returned anſwers, that were approved. Theſe articles with the anſwers were added to the treaty. In fine, the treaty was confirmed and ratified by an act of parliament inſerted at the end, to this effect:

" Be it therefore enacted by his majeſty, with the aſſent of the lords and the commons in this preſent parliament

[y] This clauſe was uſually inſerted in treties between England and Scotland, that neither of the two nations ſhould take poſſeſſion of Berwick or Carliſle Rapin.

aſſembled, that the ſaid treaty, and all the articles thereof aſſented to, as aforeſaid, be and ſtand for ever ratified and eſtabliſhed, and have the force, vigour, ſtrength, and authority of a law, ſtatute, and act of parliament.

(The ſame thing for Scotland.)

"And his majeſty for himſelf, and his ſucceſſors, doth promiſe in verbo Principis, never to come in the contrair of this ſtatute and ſanction, or any thing therein contained; but to hold the ſame in all points firm and ſtable, and ſhall cauſe it to be truly obſerved by all his majeſty's leiges, according to the tenor and intent thereof, for now and ever. Like as the parliament of both kingdoms give full aſſurance, and do make public faith in the name of both kingdoms reſpectively, for the true and faithful obſervance of this treaty, and whole articles thereof inviolably, hinc inde, in all times to come."

As afterwards the king thought he had reaſon to complain, that the Scots had violated this treaty in two of the principal articles, I imagine the reader will be glad to ſee theſe two articles at large, on which this complaint was grounded. They are contained in the act of oblivion in theſe words:

"It is agreed, that an act be paſſed in the parliament of England, that the kingdoms of England or Ireland ſhall not denounce nor make war upon the kingdom of Scotland, without conſent of the parliament of England: as, on the other part, it ſhall be enacted there, that the kingdom of Scotland ſhall not denounce nor make war againſt the kingdom of England, or Ireland, without conſent of the parliament of Scotland.

"And in caſe any of the ſubjects of any of the kingdoms ſhall riſe in arms, or make war againſt any of the kingdoms and ſubjects thereof, without conſent of the parliament of that kingdom whereof they are ſubjects, or upon which they do depend, that they ſhall be held, reputed, and demeaned as traitors to the ſtates whereof they are ſubjects."

It happened afterwards, that the king and the parliament making war upon each other, the Scots ſent an army to the aſſiſtance of the parliament againſt the king, from whence he inferred, that to make war againſt him, was to make war againſt England. The Scots on the contrary pretended, that very far from making war againſt England, they ſent their troops thither on purpoſe to aſſiſt that kingdom. It is eaſy to perceive, that from the diverſity of the principles, proceeds the diverſity of the conſequences.

To finiſh in a word what relates to Scotland, I ſhall only ſay, that the king went thither in Auguſt 1641, ſtayed there till the 19th of November, aſſiſted in perſon at the parliament and gave the royal aſſent to all the acts preſented to him. To this came the projects he had formed with regard to Scotland from the beginning of his reign [z].

What has hitherto been ſaid of the parliament's behaviour to the king, is ſufficient to ſhew, how ſenſible the king muſt have been of the mortifications he daily received. He had paſſionately deſired to be revenged of the Scots, or at leaſt to drive them out of the kingdom; and he ſaw that the parliament made them a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds, to reward them for their coming. He hated the preſbyterians, and would have been glad to have had it in his power to root out preſbyterianiſm: but he ſaw, that on the contrary, the houſe of commons openly took their part, and laboured to deſtroy epiſcopacy. His two principal miniſters in whom he moſt confided, were in the Tower, and he eaſily perceived the commons intended not to ſtop there, ſince with regard to the earl of Strafford, they were daily ſeeking means to make good their charge. Two other of his miniſters had been forced to fly, and the appearing to be ſtill well affected to him, was ſufficient to render any perſon the object of the perſecution of the commons.

It has already been ſeen after what manner the king governed for fifteen years, and the reader muſt be convinced, that he intended to alter the government, and procure for himſelf and ſucceſſors a power much more extenſive than what was allowed him by the laws, and to which none of his predeceſſors, except Richard II. had ever pretended. I except not even Henry VIII. the moſt abſolute of all the kings of England ſince William the Conqueror. But there was this difference between Henry VIII. and Charles I. Henry did whatever he pleaſed by way of parliament; whereas Charles pretended to rule without parliaments, looking upon them as little neceſſary to the conſtitution of the government. Since the meeting of this parliament, ſcarce a day had paſſed, but the commons attacked the king's project, by declaring illegal, what he had done during fifteen years, or by rigorouſly proſecuting the inſtruments he had uſed to execute his deſigns. It is therefore eaſy to ſee, how much all theſe mortifications muſt have touched the king, and with what impatience he bore the haughty manner in which the parliament acted with him. Nothing was more contrary to his inflexible temper, than to be forced to ſtoop to a houſe of commons, for whom he had before ſhewn the utmoſt contempt. It is therefore no wonder, that in this ſituation, he ſhould think of ſome way to free himſelf from reſtraint. But a ſlight attempt to compaſs this end, ſerved only to throw him into irretrievable ruin.

I mean the project of gaining the army, and cauſing them to declare for the king. The king approved of the project, without perceiving the conſequences, having no miniſter about him that had either the inclination or ability to give him good counſel. I am ſenſible this is a place of dangerous rocks, on which a hiſtorian can very hardly eſcape ſplitting. The plot to gain the army, is by ſome looked upon as a chimera, a mere fiction, to render the king odious. But on the other hand, the parliament conſidered it as a real conſpiracy, and pretended to draw from thence an evident proof, that the king's compliance with reſpect to the redreſs of grievances, was all diſſimulation, in expectation of an opportunity to reſtore himſelf by force to the ſtate he was in before this parliament. This bred in the parliament an invincible diſtruſt of the king, and a reſolution to put it out of his power to break his word, and the means they uſed to execute the reſolution, occaſioned the civil wars, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. It is therefore abſolutely neceſſary to examine this conſpiracy, in order to know, whether it was real or invented; for from hence flow all the enſuing proceedings of the king and parliament, and upon this it is that the judicious and diſintereſted reader may blame the one or the other. But before I proceed to the plot, it will be requiſite to ſay ſomething of the earl of Strafford's affair, with which this has ſome connection.

The earl had been impeached by the commons the 11th of November 1640; but his proceſs could not be ready to be tried till the 22d of March 1640-1. The trial laſted till the 12th of April, and then the commons, who had been always preſent, perceiving, doubtleſs, that the ſentence would not be ſo rigorous as they wiſhed, reſolved to proceed againſt the earl by bill of attainder. They voted therefore, on the 16th and 19th of April, that it was ſufficiently proved, that the earl of Strafford had endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government into the realms of England and Ireland, and that this was high-treaſon. On the 21ſt of the ſame month, the bill of attainder paſſed, with the majority of 224 againſt 59.

[1641] The bill met with ſo great oppoſition in the houſe of peers, that it was very doubtful whether it would paſs, or be thrown out. For which reaſon, on the 24th was preſented to both houſes, a petition, ſubſcribed by above forty [a] thouſand inhabitants of London, ſetting forth the cauſes of their ſuſpicions and fears. And amongſt others, that juſtice was not yet executed upon the earl of Strafford, and that there was reaſon to dread ſome ſecret plot againſt the parliament. The 28th of April, the commons ſent by Mr. Hyde a meſſage to the lords, that they had received information, that the earl of Strafford had a deſign to make an eſcape out of the Tower: That the guard about him was weak, and therefore they deſired he might be a cloſe priſoner, and his guard ſtrengthened, to which the lords conſented. The 1ſt of May the king came to the parliament, and in a ſpeech to both houſes, ſaid to this effect:—"That having been preſent at the trial of the earl of Strafford, he could not in conſcience condemn him of high treaſon, though he thought him guilty of miſdemeanors. Therefore he deſired the lords to find ſome way to bring him out of this great ſtreight."

The commons were much troubled and diſcontented with this ſpeech, and immediately adjourned till May the 3d, on which day great multitudes of people [b] repairing to Weſtminſter, inſulted and threatened the lords, as they were going to their houſe, crying out, Juſtice, Juſtice.

The ſame day Mr. Pym made known to the houſe, "That there were divers informations given of deſperate deſigns both at home and abroad, againſt the parliament, and the peace of the nation; and that the perſons engaged therein were under an oath of ſecrecy: That there was an endeavour to diſaffect the army, not only againſt the parliament's proceedings, but to bring them up againſt the parliament to over-awe them: That there was alſo a deſign upon the Tower: and endeavours uſed for the earl of Strafford to eſcape: That theſe combinations at home, had a correſpondency with practices abroad; and that the French were drawing down their forces amain to the ſea-ſide: and there was a cauſe to fear, their intent was upon Portſmouth: That divers perſons of eminency about the queen were deeply engaged in theſe plots: That it was neceſſary that the ports ſhould be ſtopped; and his majeſty deſired to command, That no perſon attending upon the king, queen, or prince, ſhould depart without leave of his majeſty, with the humble advice of his parliament."

Whereupon the houſe fell into a ſerious debate of this matter, and were generally of opinion, that it was neceſſary to enter into a common reſolution for the ſafety of the kingdom.

When it is conſidered in what juncture this conſpiracy was diſcovered to the houſe, though Mr. Pym was informed of it long before; that it was at a time, when the peers were, in ſome meaſure, to be compelled to paſs the bill of attainder againſt the earl of Strafford, and when the rabble were alſo uſing violence for that purpoſe, there ſeems to be ground to ſuſpect, that it was only an artifice to ſtir up the people, and induce the lords to do as the commons deſired from a fear of the imminent danger the kingdom was threatened with. At leaſt, there is reaſon to believe, this conſpiracy was greatly aggravated. But this is only a conjecture, which ought not to be relied on, till the arguments pro and con are examined. However this be, the commons, after a debate, came to a reſolution of taking the following proteſtation.

"I A. B. do in the preſence of Almighty God, promiſe, vow and proteſt, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, power, and eſtate, the true reformed proteſtant religion, expreſſed in the doctrine of the church of England, againſt all popery and popiſh innovation within this realm, contrary to the ſaid doctrine: and, according to the duty of my allegiance, I will maintain and defend his majeſty's royal perſon, honour and eſtate.

"Alſo the power and privilege of parliaments, the lawful rights and liberties of the ſubjects, and every perſon that ſhall make this proteſtation, in whatſoever he ſhall do in the lawful purſuance of the ſame; and to my power, as far as lawfully I may, I will oppoſe, and by all good ways and means, endeavour to bring condign puniſhment on all ſuch, as ſhall by force, practice, counſels, plots, conſpiracies, or otherwiſe, do any thing to the contrary, in this preſent proteſtation contained: And farther, That I ſhall, in all juſt and honourable ways, endeavour to preſerve the union and peace betwixt the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And neither for hope, fear, or any other reſpects, ſhall relinquiſh this promiſe, vow, and proteſtation."

It muſt be obſerved, this proteſtation was taken on Mr. Pym's bare aſſurance of the diſcovery of a plot, and before there was any proof of it. Hence it may be conjectured, that the thing had been determined among the learned men in the houſe. After that, the commons came to ſeveral reſolutions, to provide for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the town of Portſmouth in particular. They communicated to the lords the informations they had received, the votes they had paſſed, and their proteſtation, deſiring that every peer might be ordered to take it.

It was very difficult for the lords to refuſe the commons deſire. In the firſt place, they had inſpired the nation with ſuch a terror, that no man durſt oppoſe their reſolves for fear of being looked upon as having ill-deſigns, and expoſed to inevitable ruin. Secondly, the people ſtill continued to flock to Weſtminſter, and openly threatened the lords. Thirdly, the multitude preſented the ſame day a petition to the lords, demanding juſtice upon the earl of Strafford, and that their lordſhips would pleaſe to free them from the fears of the conſpiracy. Fourthly, on the morrow, being the fourth of May, the people repairing to Weſtminſter in greater numbers than the day before, ſome incendiaries poſted up againſt a wall in the Old-palace-yard, the names of fifty-ſix members, calling them Straffordians, and betrayers of their country. Laſtly, the ſame day the multitudes preſented to the lords another petition, ſaying, "That they underſtood the Tower was going to receive a garriſon of men, not of the Hamlets (as uſually) but conſiſting of other perſons under the command of a captain, a great confident of the earl of Strafford's, and that this was done to make way for the earl's eſcape."

Upon this petition, the houſe ſent ſix peers to examine ſir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, concerning the truth of the fact. Balfour, anſwered, it was true, he had his majeſty's order to receive one hundred men [c], into the Tower, and captain Billingſly to command them, and to receive only ſuch men as the captain ſhould bring to him; but underſtanding now their lordſhips pleaſure, he would receive no other guard into the Tower but the Hamlet-men.

The lords did farther declare, at a conference with the commons, that they were drawing to a concluſion of the bill of attainder, but were ſo encompaſſed with multitudes of people, that they might be conceived not to be free, and therefore deſired the commons to join with them, to find out ſome way to ſend the people to their homes. Then they debated the proteſtation, paſſed it, and took the ſame. It was taken by four hundred and thirty-three commoners, and one hundred and ſix lords, including the biſhops and judges. The commons having ordered Dr. Burgeſs to acquaint the multitude with the proteſtation taken by both houſes, and that they were deſired to return to their homes, they forthwith departed.

There are therefore two things which manifeſtly appear in this affair. The firſt, that there was a project on foot to favour the earl of Strafford's eſcape, which will be ſeen more clearly hereafter. The ſecond, that the concourſe of the people was privately procured, by ſome of the leading men of the commons, ſince, the day before, the houſe had taken no ſtep towards diſperſing the multitudes, though they were deſired by the lords, and ſince they found means to cauſe the people to retire, as ſoon as they knew the lords had reſolved to take the proteſtation.

But the proteſtation was not the only effect of the conſpiracy. The ſame day, the commons ordered a bill to be prepared for the continuance of this preſent parliament, that it might not be diſſolved without the conſent of both houſes. They ordered likewiſe the proteſtation to be tendered to the whole kingdom.

The ſame day, May the 4th, the houſe was informed, that ſix or eight of the conſpirators were fled, of whom Mr. Henry Jermin, and Mr. Henry Percy, members of the houſe, were two, and that they were gone towards Portſmouth. At the ſame time, information came that the queen was preparing to go to the ſame place. Theſe two ſucceſſive informations cauſing ſtrong ſuſpicions, the houſes diſpatched to Portſmouth one lord and two commoners, to propoſe certain queries to the governor, and take care for the ſecurity of the town and haven. They agreed withal to move the queen to defer her journey to Portſmouth, alleging ſeveral reaſons which were not the true, particularly the ſafety of her majeſty's perſon. They deſired alſo the king to publiſh a proclamation for calling in Jermin, Percy, and other fugitives, which the king promiſed to do. The ſame day, the ſpeaker ſent, by order of the houſe, the following letter to ſir Jacob Aſhly, with a charge to communicate it to the army.

"SIR,

"WE have had cauſe to doubt, that ſome ill-affected perſons have endeavoured to make a miſunderſtanding in the army, of the intentions of the parliament towards them. To take away all miſunderſtanding in that kind; the houſe of commons have commanded me to aſſure you, that they have taken the affairs of the army into their ſerious care: And though, for the preſent, their monies have not come in as they wiſhed, and as was due, by reaſon of the many diſtractions, and other impediments which this houſe could no ways avoid: yet they reſt moſt aſſured, that they ſhall not only have their full pay, but the houſe will take their merits into their farther conſideration, in regard they take notice, that notwithſtanding their want and endeavours of thoſe ill-affected perſons, they have not demeaned themſelves otherwiſe than as men of honour, and well-affected to the common-wealth; which this houſe takes in ſo good part, that we have already found out a way to get money for a good part of their pay, and will take the moſt ſpeedy courſe we poſſibly may for the reſt. So I remain,

"Your very loving friend,

"WILLIAM LENTHALL."

Mean while, the committee, appointed to inquire into the conſpiracy, made their report in the following manner.

[c] Whitelock, ſays, it was two hundred men; and that Balfour confeſſed two thouſand pounds had been offered him, to conſent to the earl's eſcape. He adds, That this deſign was diſcovered by three women, who hearkened at the key-hole of the earl's door, and heard his diſcourſe with captain Billingſly, p. 46.

" That this plot conſiſteth of three heads: The firſt was, the deſign upon the Tower. The ſecond, to engage the army. The third, to bring in foreign forces." For the Tower, it appeared to be thus: Captain Billingſly being examined upon oath, confeſſed, " That he was acquainted with ſir John Suckling: That the ſaid ſir John lately offered him employment in one of the king's ſhips, then at Portſmouth; afterwards employment for Portugal: That this deponent having notice to meet at the privy-lodgings at Whitehall did there receive orders to get an hundred men to ſerve in the Tower, under him. And if he did fail, he ſhould anſwer it with his life. And afterwards meeting with ſir John Suckling, and acquainting him therewith, he told him he would furniſh him with the ſaid number. Sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, being examined, ſaid, that he had command to receive captain Billingſly with an hundred men into the Tower, who ſhould be under his command. That the earl of Strafford at that time expoſtulating with him about his eſcape, told him, he would attempt nothing in that kind without his privity; and that he ſhould have the king's warrant for his indemnity; and that the warrant ſhould be to command him to remove the earl of Strafford from the Tower to ſome other caſtle; and he would then take his opportunity to eſcape; that the lieutenant of the Tower not giving any complying anſwer thereunto, the ſaid earl ſent again to intreat him to come to him, and would have perſuaded him to let him make an eſcape; ſaying, " Without your concurrence it cannot be done; and if you will conſent thereunto, I will make you preſent payment of twenty-two thouſand pounds, beſides you ſhall have a good marriage for your ſon." To which the lieutenant of the Tower replied, " He was ſo far from concurring therein, that he was not to be farther moved in ſuch a thing." Thus much the lieutenant of the Tower delivered upon his oath.

" Colonel Goring, upon his examination in the houſe of commons, did confeſs, that ſir John Suckling was the firſt perſon that ever made any overture unto him, concerning the army's marching towards London: Afterwards being in the queen's lodgings, he met with Mr. H. Percy, which was about the beginning, or middle of Lent laſt, and Mr. Percy told him, there was a conſultation of officers to be had, concerning the good of the army; and deſired him to go along with him to his chamber, where the meeting was to be. There were preſent at the ſame meeting, commiſſary Wilmot, colonel Aſhburnham, captain Pollard, ſir John Berkley, Daniel O'Neal, Mr. Jermin, and himſelf: That Mr. Percy ſaid, there were propoſitions to be made which were of great concernment; and that it was neceſſary there ſhould be an oath of ſecrecy taken before any thing was propounded: That the oath ſhould be to this purpoſe: That we ſhould neither directly nor indirectly diſcover any part of the conſultation, nor ever to think ourſelves diſſolved from that oath, by any other oath which might be impoſed upon us hereafter: Which oath was read out of a paper, when it was tendered unto them; and thereupon they were ſworn, by laying their hands upon the bible; that he and Jermin were ſworn together, for the reſt had taken the oath before."

" Then three propoſitions were made to them, namely:

" As theſe propoſitions are expreſſed in a letter which will be ſeen preſently, they are omitted here for brevity's ſake."

" He farther ſaid, that the whole number there met, were of opinion, that the army ſhould not march towards London till a declaration had been firſt ſent up to the parliament: That he the ſaid Goring anſwered, it was a nice point to interpoſe in the proceeding of the parliament; and did propound ſome difficulties to allay the buſineſs, to divert commiſſary Wilmot, and thoſe other perſons from ſo dangerous a buſineſs: And ſaid, that he did think it was a deſign of folly to undertake it; for they muſt think the Scots would take the advantage upon the army's removal ſouthwards, whoſe correſpondency was ſo great with the city; and for them to begin to ſhew their teeth, and not able to bite, would argue little prudence; that they ſhould either undertake it ſo as to go through with it, or let it alone: That he did aſk them what ammunition they had to accommodate ſo great an army; and whether they could command the ammunition in the Tower: That Wilmot, Pollard, and Aſhburnham, then made anſwer, they had no purpoſe to go to London; for to ſurpriſe the Tower, was to conquer the kingdom: That this, amongſt other paſſages, was part of the diſcourſe at the firſt meeting.

" That ſhortly after there was another meeting of the ſame perſons, and in the ſame place, in Mr. Percy's chamber, where there were propoſitions of another nature, deſperate and impious on the one hand, and fooliſh on the other; and that he endeavoured by argument to divert them, by propounding an impoſſibility to effect the ſame: For how could the army, lodged in ſeveral quarters, unpaid, and at ſuch a diſtance, march on a ſudden to London, and ſurprize what they had in deſign?

" That Mr. Jermin was the perſon that firſt propoſed the marching of the army towards London: That for his part he declared himſelf abſolutely againſt it. That Mr. Jermin replied to him in private, " You do not diſlike the deſign, for you are as ready for any wild, mad undertaking, as any man I know; but you diſlike the temper of thoſe perſons who are engaged in the buſineſs."

" He did farther confeſs, that he propounded that Suckling might be admitted to the conſultation: But Wilmot, Aſhburnham, and Pollard, would not hear of it. And they three did then declare themſelves againſt the army's marching towards London.

" Then he took occaſion to ſay, that he did acquaint ſome members of both houſes, whom he could name, that there were ſome of the army whom they did not think ſo well of were more faithful and ſerviceable to the parliament than they were aware of, which time would produce; and named them: And they did accordingly give teſtimony of his integrity, ſo far as general terms could diſcover the deſign. He confeſſed, that Mr. Jermin did make ſome offers unto him, to relinquiſh the government of Portſmouth upon ſome terms of advance: But he ſaid, he did not conclude any thing, for he would firſt ſee the performance of what was offered; ſo had no farther diſcourſe with him concerning that buſineſs. But he doth believe that Suckling and Jermin did confer together about the deſign. He ſaid, they did deſire his opinion about a general; ſome were for Eſſex, ſome for Holland; but he, with Mr. Jermin, were for Newcaſtle.

" Being again examined upon his oath before the committee of lords and commons, and preſſed more particularly to anſwer queſtions not before propoſed unto him, he did confeſs, that meeting with Mr. Jermin in the queen's withdrawing chamber, her majeſty came and told him, the king would ſpeak with him; and meeting with his majeſty, he told him, he was minded to ſet his army in a good poſture, being adviſed thereto by the earl of Briſtol (as he ſaid) and his majeſty then commanded him to join with Mr. Percy, and ſome others in that buſineſs.

" As for the deſigns from beyond the ſeas, the committee did make report to the houſe, that it was cleared unto them, that Jermin endeavoured to have got the poſſeſſion of Portſmouth; that the king of France had drawn down great forces to the ſea ſide; that the governor of Calice had examined ſome Engliſhmen, whether the earl of Strafford's head was cut off? And this was in point of time, the firſt of May, according to the Engliſh ſtile, and ſir Philip Cartwright, governor of Guernſey, wrote letters alſo, which came in great haſte, that he underſtood the French had a deſign upon that iſland, or ſome part of England. It alſo appeared to the committee, by divers of the letters which were opened coming from beyond ſea, that they expected the earl of Strafford there; and that they hoped the horſe-leeches ſhould be ſtarved for want of blood; and in ſome of thoſe letters there was advice to the cardinal to beſtir himſelf betimes, to interrupt the height of the proceedings here in England. Alſo examinations of ſome prieſts were taken in Lancaſhire, and ſent up to London, which were there taken the third of May, which did teſtify, that the prieſts did ſay the parliament ſhould be ſuddenly diſſolved: For the army was to march up thither with all ſpeed, and they would be ſeconded by forces out of France; and that Montague did write out of France to Mr. Percy, (which was alſo intercepted) that if he did perform what he had undertaken, he would be made a knight of the garter."

Upon theſe depoſitions, the houſe of commons paſſed the following votes againſt Percy, Jermin, and Suckling:

" 1. That in the Months of March and April laſt, they did conſpire to draw the army together, and employ the ſame againſt the parliament, and by force and dread thereof to compel the parliament to agree to certain propoſitions by them contrived, and to hinder and to interrupt the proceedings of the parliament.

" 2. That in purſuance of the ſaid deſign, they did endeavour to perſuade divers members of the houſe of commons, and others, being officers of the ſaid army, that is to ſay, Wilmot, Aſhburnham, Berkley, Pollard, and O'Neal, that they were diſobliged by the parliament; thereby to incenſe them againſt the parliament; and did hold divers conſultations with the ſaid parties, to effect the ſaid wicked deſign; and to that purpoſe did ſet down in writing certain propoſitions, propoſitions, to the effect as followeth, viz. 1. The preſerving of biſhops in their functions and votes. 2. The not diſbanding of the Iriſh army, until the Scots were diſbanded. 3. And the endeavouring to ſettle the king's revenue to the proportion it was formerly.

" 3. That for the more ſecret carriage of this plot, they did adminiſter to the ſaid parties a wicked and unlawful oath, whereby they did ſwear upon the holy evangeliſts, not to reveal any thing that was ſpoken concerning the buſineſs.

" 4. That they did propound and endeavour to perſuade the perſons before named, and other officers of the army, to put the ſaid army into a warlike poſture, to bring them up to London, to make themſelves ſure of the Tower, and ſo by force compel the parliament to conform to their will: and they did endeavour to work a belief in the ſaid army, that the king and parliament would diſagree; and that all the French about the city of London would aſſiſt them: and to the great ſcandal of the king, that the prince and the earl of Newcaſtle were to meet the army at Nottingham, with a thouſand horſe; that Suckling, to compaſs the deſign of gaining the Tower, did contrive that an hundred men, under captain Billingſly, ſhould be deſigned for that purpoſe, when the opportunity was offered, to the end the city of London ſhould not be able to make any reſiſtance, when the ſaid army ſhould come up; and Suckling, by the means and plot aforeſaid, did thereby endeavour that the earl of Strafford, then priſoner in the Tower, might the better compaſs his eſcape."

Beſides the fore-mentioned depoſitions, here is a teſtimony of one of the chief conſpirators, of which the parliament made great uſe. It is Percy's letter, after his flight into France, to his brother the earl of Northumberland.

" WHAT with my own innocency, and the violence I hear is againſt me, I find myſelf much diſtracted. I will not aſk your counſel, becauſe it may bring prejudice upon you; but I will, with all faithfulneſs and truth tell you what my part hath been, that at leaſt it may be declared by you, whatſoever becomes of me.

" When there was fifty thouſand pounds ready, deſigned by the parliament for the Engliſh army, there was, as I take it, a ſudden demand by the Scots at the ſame time of twenty-five thouſand pounds, of which there was fifteen thouſand pounds ready; this they preſſed with ſuch neceſſity, as the parliament, after an order made, did think it fit for them to deduct ten thouſand pounds out of the fifty thouſand pounds formerly granted: upon which the ſoldiers in our houſe were much ſcandalized; amongſt which I was one, and ſitting by Wilmot and Aſhburnham, Wilmot ſtood up, and told them, that if the Scots could thus procure money, he doubted not but the officers of the Engliſh army might eaſily do the like. But the firſt order was reverſed notwithſtanding, and ten thouſand pounds given to the Scots. This was the cauſe of many diſcourſes of diſlike amongſt us, and came to this purpoſe, that they were diſobliged by the parliament, and not by the king: this being ſaid often one to another, we did reſolve, Wilmot, Aſhburnham, Pollard, O'Neal, and myſelf, to make ſome expreſſions of ſerving the king in all things he would command us, that were honorable for him and us, being likewiſe agreeing to the fundamental laws of the kingdom, that ſo far we would live and die with him: this was agreed upon with us, not having any communication with others that I am coupled now withal: and further, by their joint conſent, I was to tell his majeſty thus much from them; but withal, I was to order the matter ſo as the king might apprehend this as a great ſervice done to him at this time, when his affairs were in ſo ill a condition, and they were moſt confident that they would engage the whole army thus far; but further they would undertake nothing, becauſe they would neither infringe the liberties of the ſubjects, nor deſtroy the laws; to which I and every one conſented; and having their ſenſe, I drew the heads up in a paper, which they all approved when I read it; and then we did, by an oath, promiſe one another to be conſtant and ſecret in all this, and did all of us take that oath together: then, I ſaid, Well, ſirs, I muſt now be informed what your particular deſires are, that ſo I may be the better able to ſerve you; which they were pleaſed to do; and ſo I did very faithfully ſerve them therein as far as I could. This is the truth, and and all the truth upon my ſoul, in particular diſcourſes.

" After that we did fall upon the petitioning to the king and parliament for monies, there being ſo great arrears due to us, and ſo much delays made in the procuring of them; but that was never done.

" 1. Concerning the biſhops functions and votes.

" 2. The not diſbanding of the Iriſh army, until the Scots were diſbanded too.

" 3. The endeavouring to ſettle his majeſty's revenue to that proportion it was formerly [d].

" And it was reſolved by us all, if the king ſhould require our aſſiſtance in thoſe things, that as far as we could, we might contribute thereunto, without breaking the laws of the kingdom; and in caſe the king ſhould be denied theſe things being put to them, we would not fly from him: all theſe perſons did act and concur in this as well as I. This being all imparted to the king by me from them, I perceived he had been treated with by others, concerning ſome things of our army; which agreed not with what was propoſed by me, but inclined to a way more ſharp and high, not having limits either of honour or law. I told the king he might be pleaſed to conſider with himſelf, which way it was fit for him to hearken unto; for us, we were reſolved not to depart from our grounds; we ſhould not be diſpleaſed, whoſoever they were, but the particular of the deſigns, or the perſons, we deſired not to know; though it was no hard matter to gueſs at them. In the end, I believe the danger of the one, and the juſtice of the other, made the king tell me, he would leave all thoughts of other propoſitions but ours, as things not practicable: but deſired, notwithſtanding, that Goring and Jermin, who were acquainted with the other proceedings, ſhould be admitted amongſt us. I told him I thought the other gentry would never conſent to it, but I would propoſe it; which I did, and we were all much againſt it: but the king did preſs ſo much, as at the laſt it was conſented unto; and Goring and Jermin came to my chamber; there I was appointed to tell them, after they had ſworn to ſecrecy, what we had propoſed; which I did. But before I go into the debate of the way, I muſt tell you, Jermin and Goring were very earneſt Suckling ſhould be admitted: which we did all decline, and I was deſired by all our men to be reſolute in it, which I was, and gave many reaſons: whereupon Mr. Goring made anſwer, he was engaged with Mr. Suckling his being employed in the army; but for his meeting with us, they were contented to paſs it by: then we took up again the ways which were propoſed; which took great debate, and theirs differed from ours in violence and heat; which we all proteſted againſt, and parted, diſagreeing totally, yet remitted it to be ſpoken of by me and Jermin to the king, which we both did; and the king, conſtant to his former reſolutions, told him, theſe ways were all vain and fooliſh, and he would think of them no more. I omit one thing of Mr. Goring, he deſired to know how the chief commanders were to be diſpoſed of: for if he had not a condition worthy of him, he would not go with us. We made anſwer, that no-body thought of that; we intended, if we were ſent down, to go all in the ſame capacity we were in. He did not like that by any means, and by that did work ſo with Mr. Chudleigh, that there was a letter ſent by ſome of the commanders to make him lieutenant general: and when he had ordered this at London, and Mr. Chudleigh had his inſtructions, then did he go to Portſmouth, pretending to be abſent when this was working: we all deſired my lords of Eſſex and Holland; but they ſaid, if there were a general, they were for Newcaſtle: they were pleaſed to give report, that I ſhould be general of the horſe. But I proteſt, neither to the king, or any elſe, did I ever ſo much as think of it. My lord of Holland was made general, and ſo all things were laid aſide. And this is the truth, and all the truth I know of theſe proceedings: and this I will and do proteſt unto you upon my faith. And Wilmot, Aſhburnham, and O'Neal, have at ſeveral times confeſſed and ſworn, I never ſaid any thing in the buſineſs, which they did not every one agree unto and juſtify. This relation I ſent you, rather to inform you of the truth of the matter, that you may the better know how to do me good; but I ſhould think myſelf very unhappy to be made a betrayer of any body. What concerned the Tower, or any thing elſe, I never meddled withal, nor ever ſpoke with Goring, but that night before them all; and I ſaid nothing but what was conſented unto by every party: I never ſpoke one word with Suckling, Carnarvan, Davenant, or any other creature. Methinks, if my friends and kindred knew the truth and juſtice of the matter, it were no hard matter to ſerve me in ſome meaſure [e]."

[d] The word Formerly is very ambiguous; for it may ſignify either the king's lawful revenues, or thoſe he enjoyed juſt before this parliament. Rapin.

[e] Upon the reading of this letter, commiſſary Wilmot was committed to the Tower, Colonel Aſhburnham to the King's-bench, and captain Pollard to the Gate-houſe. Diurn. Occ. p. 138.

This

This letter ſhews plainly there was really a project gain the army, and engage them to ſerve the king againſt the parliament, and that the king knew and approved the ſame.

The 16th of June, the committee appointed to examine the affair of the plot to ſeduce the army, made a ſecond report to the houſe, and cauſed ſeveral depoſitions to be read.

The firſt was captain Billingſly's, who confeſſed, that ſir John Suckling had invited him to take upon him the command of the hundred men that were to be ſent to guard the Tower.

The ſecond, Mr. Nutt's, whereby it appeared that the earl of Strafford's eſcape was projected.

The third, lieutenant colonel Ballard's, who ſaid, that captain Chudleigh brought down to the army many propoſitions; ſome of which were, that colonel Goring ſhould be lieutenant general, and that the prince and the earl of Newcaſtle would be in Nottinghamſhire with a thouſand horſe, ready to join with the army.

The fourth was Willis's, who declared, that the French were to favor the enterprize; that the clergy would at their own charge ſend two thouſand horſe; and that the prince was to come down to the army.

The houſe was further informed, that the officers who had undertaken to ſerve the king, had communicated to him the draught of a petition, which was to be directed to the king and parliament from the army: that they hoped to get it ſubſcribed by moſt of the officers, and that the king, after reading it, had approved of the ſame, and writ at the bottom of theſe two letters, C. R. in token of his approbation.

Theſe are the grounds whereon was built the reality of the plot, which was extremely injurious to the king, by the diſtruſt it bred in the minds of moſt of the members of parliament, and of the nation in general. But it muſt be added, that king Charles's favourers call it a mere chimera, even to this day. For my part, I cannot help ſaying, that I believe there was ſome truth in it; but I am of opinion, that the heads of the contrary party to the king, greatly aggravated the circumſtances and conſequences, in order to cauſe to paſs the more eaſily the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford, and the act for the continuance of the parliament, to which the king gave the royal aſſent the ſame day, and in this ſame juncture. And what confirms me the more in this opinion, is, the very arguments themſelves alleged by the king's friends to ſhew that it was a fiction to render the king odious: for they cannot help owning there was a project to engage the army to declare for the king. They ſay only, that the end propoſed by the authors of this project, was to hinder the army from being ſeduced to eſpouſe the intereſt of the parliament. But firſt, there appears not the leaſt ſign of the pretended ſole end, either in the depoſitions of the witneſſes, or in Percy's letter, or in the reports of the committee appointed to examine the affair. Secondly, the king, whom the parliament ſo often reproached afterwards with this plot, never uſed that reaſon to excuſe the authors. In the third place, it is not probable, the officers ſhould have any ſuch purpoſe, ſince at that time the army was too much diſpleaſed with the parliament to offer any ground to fear they ſhould be ſeduced to declare againſt the king. The moſt plauſible thing they ſay, is that there never was any expreſs deſign to march the army to London, upon which however the commons chiefly inſiſted. The denial of this circumſtance was what the king ſolely adhered to, as will hereafter appear. He called God to witneſs he never knew of any ſuch deſign. But he never denied poſitively his having been informed of a deſign to engage the army to his ſide. We muſt therefore carefully diſtinguiſh two things in this conſpiracy, namely, the deſign of gaining the army, which clearly appears; and the deſign of marching the army to London. It appears by the depoſitions, that this deſign was propoſed in the aſſembly of officers, but was not approved. So the king could affirm he knew not of it, becauſe indeed it was never reſolved, though he was not ignorant of its having been propoſed.

In Percy's letter there is a circumſtance which may very much conduce to clear the affair. There were, as he ſays, two ſets of people, who formed at the ſame time a deſign to engage the army for the king, without having communicated their thoughts to one another. The firſt were Percy, Wilmot, Aſhburnham, and Pollard. The ſecond, Jermin and Goring, whoſe views reached much further, and who propoſed to march the army to London. For though Goring in his depoſition affirmed, he had done his utmoſt to diſſuade the reſt from this deſign, he is ſaid however to be the firſt mover of it. If Percy's letter is to be credited, the king had at firſt liſtened to Jermin and Goring; but upon Percy's repreſentation, had rejected their project as impracticable, and laid aſide all thoughts of it. The king's friends confound theſe two projects, and all their proofs are directed againſt that of Jermin and Goring, without meddling with Percy's. And becauſe the parliament could not fully prove there was an expreſs reſolution to bring the army to London, they conclude that the conſpiracy in general was only a fiction and impoſture. But though there had never been a ſettled deſign to march the army to London, it may be true however, that endeavours were uſed to gain them, and that the king approved of the deſign. In ſhort, the king's friends do not deny that the draught of the petition was communicated to him, before it was recommended to the officers of the army for their ſubſcription. Of this petition I am ſtill to ſpeak, in order to clear this point fully.

It is ſtrange this petition, which has made ſo much noiſe, ſhould never be produced, either by the parliament in ſupport of their charge, or by the king for his own vindication. It is true, the king afterwards pretended he had recovered a copy, but did not think fit to produce it, though he affirmed it to be very innocent. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect there was ſomething prejudicial to him. The earl of Clarendon has inſerted in his hiſtory a petition, which he aſſures to be word for word the ſame as was ſigned by the king with C. R. But it is evident this cannot be the petition in queſtion, as the reader will perceive.

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty; the lords ſpiritual and temporal; the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes now aſſembled in the high court of parliament, the humble petition of the officers and ſoldiers of the army.

"HUMBLY ſheweth, that although our wants have been very preſſing, and the burthen we are become unto theſe parts (by reaſon of thoſe wants) very grievous unto us; yet ſo have we demeaned ourſelves, that your majeſty's great and weighty affairs in this preſent parliament have hitherto received no interruption, by any complaint, either from us, or againſt us: a temper not uſual in armies; eſpecially in one deſtitute not only of pay, but alſo of martial diſcipline, and many of its principal officers; that we cannot but attribute it to a particular bleſſing of Almighty God, on our moſt hearty affections and zeal to the common good, in the happy ſucceſs of this parliament, to which, as we ſhould have been ready hourly to contribute our deareſt blood, ſo now that it hath pleaſed God to manifeſt his bleſſing ſo evidently therein, we cannot but acknowledge it with thankfulneſs; as likewiſe his great mercy, in that he hath inclined your majeſty's royal heart ſo to co-operate with the wiſdom of parliament as to effect ſo great and happy a reformation upon the former diſtempers of this church and common-wealth; as firſt, in your majeſty's gracious condeſcending to the many important demands of our neighbours of the Scotiſh nation: ſecondly in granting ſo free a courſe of juſtice againſt all delinquents of what quality ſoever: thirdly, in the removal of all thoſe grievances wherewith the ſubjects did conceive either their liberty of perſons, property, or eſtate, or freedom of conſcience, prejudiced: and laſtly, in the greateſt pledge of ſecurity that ever the ſubjects of England received from their ſovereign, the bill of triennial parliament.

"Theſe things ſo graciouſly accorded unto by your majeſty, without bargain or compenſation, as they are more than expectation or hope could extend unto, ſo now they are certainly ſuch, as all loyal hearts ought to acquieſce in with thankfulneſs; which we do with all humility, and do at this time, with as much earneſtneſs as any, pray and wiſh, that the kingdom may be ſettled in peace and quietneſs, and that all men may, at their own homes, enjoy the bleſſed fruits of your wiſdom and juſtice.

"But it may pleaſe your excellent majeſty, and this high court of parliament, to give us leave, with grief and anguiſh of heart, to repreſent unto you, that we hear that there are certain perſons ſtirring and pragmatical, who inſtead of rendering glory to God, thanks to your majeſty, and acknowledgment to the parliament, remain yet as unſatisfied and mutinous as ever; who, whilſt all the reſt of the kingdom are arrived even beyond their wiſhes, are daily forging new and unreaſonable demands; who, whilſt all men of reaſon, loyalty, and moderation, are thinking how they may provide for your majeſty's honour and plenty, in return of ſo many graces to the ſubject, are ſtill attempting new diminutions of your majeſty's juſt regalities, which ever muſt be no leſs dear to all honeſt men, than our own freedoms; in fine, men of ſuch turbulent ſpirits, as are ready to ſacrifice the honour and welfare of the whole kingdom to their private fancies, whom nothing elſe than a ſubverſion of the whole frame of government will ſatisfy: far be it from our thoughts to believe, that the violence and unreaſonableneſs of ſuch kind of perſons can have any influence upon the prudence and juſtice of the parliament. But that which begets the trouble and diſquiet of our loyal hearts at this preſent, is, that we hear thoſe ill-affected perſons are backed in their violence, by the multitude and the power of raiſing tumults; that thouſands flock at their call, and beſet the parliament, and Whitehall itſelf; not only to the prejudice of that freedom which is neceſſary to great councils and judicatories, but poſſibly to ſome perſonal danger of your ſacred majeſty, and the peers.

"The vaſt conſequences of theſe perſons malignity, and of the licentiouſneſs of thoſe multitudes that follow them, conſidered in moſt deep care and zealous affection for the ſafety of your ſacred majeſty, and the parliament; our humble petition is, that in your wiſdom you would be pleaſed to remove ſuch dangers, by puniſhing the ringleaders of theſe tumults, that your majeſty and the parliament may be ſecured from ſuch inſolencies hereafter. For the ſuppreſſing of which, in all humility we offer ourſelves to wait upon you (if you pleaſe) hoping we ſhall appear as conſiderable in the way of defence to our gracious ſovereign, the parliament, our religion, and the eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom, as what number ſoever ſhall audaciouſly preſume to violate them: ſo ſhall we, by the wiſdom of your majeſty and the parliament, not only be vindicated from precedent innovations, but be ſecured from the future, that are threatened, and likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former.

"And we ſhall pray, &c."

Give me leave to make ſome remarks on this petition, in order to ſhew, that it cannot be the ſame that was communicated to the king, and ſubſcribed by him with the letters C. R. in token of his approbation.

In the firſt place, it evidently appears, this was drawn up at London, at the very time when the multitudes repaired to Weſtminſter, which happened not till the 3d and 4th of May, there having been no ſuch concourſe of people before, and this laſting only two days. But it will be ſeen hereafter, that the king himſelf ſaid, that this petition, which he ſigned with C. R. was brought to him from the army, and that after having read it, he approved of it, as being very innocent. If the petition communicated to the king had been prepared in the army, it cannot be this, ſince thoſe that penned it, could not foreſee the riotous aſſemblies at Weſtminſter on the 3d or 4th of May, which however they ſpeak of as then in being. And if it was drawn at London, as it is very likely, it cannot be that which was communicated to the king, ſince he affirmeth, it was brought to him from the army.

It will be ſaid perhaps, that this petition might be prepared at London the 3d or 4th of May, at the time of the concourſe, that it was ſent to the army, and then brought back to London to be communicated to the king. But allowing only a fortnight for thoſe journies from London to York, and from York to London, and for communicating it to the officers diſperſed in different quarters about the country, the petition would have come too late to the king, and have been entirely uſeleſs, ſince the riots were ceaſed, the earl of Strafford dead, and the king had paſſed the bill for the continuance of the parliament. It would have been therefore very prepoſterous for the king to approve of this petition at ſuch a juncture.

Secondly, the earl of Clarendon intimates, this petition was projected and drawn long before the 3d and 4th of May, by the very officers who were afterwards accuſed of the conſpiracy. He ſays, after the king had ſubſcribed it, it was carried down to the army, and ſigned by ſome officers, but was ſuddenly quaſhed, and no more heard of till the diſcovery of the pretended plot, of which more in its place. This is a clear evidence, that the petition the king ſubſcribed with C. R. had been communicated long before the 3d or 4th of May, the day of the diſcovery of the plot. But if this be ſo, how could the authors of the petition ſpeak of the riots on the 3d and 4th of May, as actually in being? The petition ſubſcribed by the king, cannot therefore be the ſame that the lord Clarendon has inſerted in his hiſtory.

In the third place, the officers who intended to gain the army to the king, and who, according to the lord Clarendon, projected likewiſe the petition to the king and parliament which was approved by his majeſty, propoſed as their end, "To preſerve the biſhops votes and functions, to hinder the diſbanding the Iriſh army till that of the Scots was diſbanded too, and to ſettle the king's revenues." But in the petition above there is no mention of any of theſe articles[f].

Laſtly, it will hereafter be ſeen, that the king, to juſtify his ſigning the petition, ſaid nothing more was required in it, than the ſettling of the government upon the ſame foot as under queen Elizabeth. But in the petition given us by the lord Clarendon as ſubſcribed by the king, there is nothing like it, Elizabeth not being named in it[g].

Before I conclude this matter, I muſt not forget what has been ſaid concerning Percy's letter to his brother the earl of Northumberland. It is pretended that Percy, endeavouring to eſcape into France, was known at the ſea-ſide, and wounded by ſome perſons who would have ſtopped him: that getting from them, and flying to the earl of Northumberland's, that lord prevailed with ſome of the leading men of the commons, particularly Mr. Pym, that his brother's eſcape ſhould be connived at, on condition he would write the letter abovementioned, as if it was writ in France. It is eaſy to perceive that hereby the relation in that letter is deſigned to be rendered ſuſpected of falſhood. But I do not find, it is poſitively affirmed, or that any proofs are produced to diſcover the forgery. The whole amounts to a bare aſſertion, that the plot in queſtion was a fiction, a chimera, an impoſture: that the parliament curtailed the depoſitions of the witneſſes, omitting every thing that ſerved to juſtify the king: that the conferences in Percy's chamber, were free converſations between friends, of whom ſome were members of parliament: that the depoſitions of the witneſſes were fitter to demonſtrate there was never any conſpiracy to ſeduce the army, than to prove there was really any ſuch thing. But upon the whole, we muſt take as good proofs the bare aſſertion of thoſe who relate theſe facts, which they have not cleared in the leaſt[h].

As the king was frequently reproached with this conſpiracy afterwards, I thought it neceſſary to give a juſt idea of the thing, that the reader may be the better able to judge of the objections and anſwers I ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention. It is now time to proceed to the lord Strafford's trial.

If it is not ſuppoſed, that Charles I. from the beginning of his reign to the time of this laſt parliament, had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh in England an arbitrary government, it will be almoſt impoſſible to underſtand his hiſtory, and particularly this ſecond part. But, upon this ſuppoſition, which to me appears inconteſtable, all difficulties vaniſh. It is not ſurprizing to ſee the king's council, his miniſters, favourites, the ſtar-chamber, high-commiſſion, judges of the realm, in a word, all perſons in public employment, intent upon one ſingle point, I mean, the ſtretching of the royal authority as far as lay in their power. It is not ſurprizing to ſee the implacable hatred of the houſe of commons to the king's miniſters, and particularly to thoſe who were moſt truſted by his majeſty, and believed the chief authors of the public evils. Among theſe, the earl of Strafford was conſidered as the moſt dangerous, becauſe the moſt able, and becauſe his two high poſts of preſident of the court of York, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, afforded him frequent occaſions to ſerve the king effectually, and aſſiſt him to execute his deſigns. Accordingly he was the firſt the commons attacked, eight days after the opening of the parliament. The impeachment and trial of this lord, containing many remarkable things, ſome whereof are, as I may ſay, above the comprehenſion of foreigners, by reaſon of the great difference between the laws and cuſtoms of England, and thoſe of the other ſtates. It would therefore be too difficult a taſk for me to undertake to give a particular account

[f] Whitelock's account of this matter is thus: the officers put themſelves into a junto of ſworn ſecrecy, drew up ſome heads by way of petition to the king and parliament, "For money for the army. Not to diſband before the Scots. To preſerve biſhops votes and functions. To ſettle the king's revenues." The army being tainted from hence, met, and drew up a letter, or petition, which was ſhewed to the king, and approved and ſigned by him with C. R. and a direction to captain Leg, that none ſhould ſee it but ſir Jacob Aſhley: the main drift was, "That the army might be called up to attend the ſafety of the king's perſon, and parliament's ſecurity, or that both armies might be diſbanded." Memorials, p. 46.

[g] The lord Clarendon ſays, that Goring, who propoſed the marching of the army to London, being diſguſted at having that propoſal rejected and rediculed, did, the ſame, or the next day, whereon he had propoſed it, diſcover all, and more than had paſſed, to the earl of Bedford, and the lords Say and Kimbolton; but as dangerous as the deſign was afterwards alleged to be, it was not however communicated to the parliament till about three months after. of all the circumſtances of this famous trial, which have been collected in a large volume in folio. For this reaſon I ſhall content myſelf with giving a general idea of it, ſuch as I think proper to ſatisfy the reader's curioſity.

There is no doubt, when the commons impeached the earl of Strafford, his ruin was reſolved by the leading men of that houſe. The earl being looked upon as the moſt powerful, and moſt in favour of all the king's miniſters, and as the principal author of the miſeries of the kingdom, this was ſufficient to make it thought requiſite to ſacrifice him to the public. I do not think it neceſſary to ſeek other motives of this reſolution, or to aſcribe it to more ſecret cauſes. Since the parliament undertook to redreſs grievances, and reſtore the government to its ancient ſtate, nothing was more natural than to puniſh ſuch as had helped to unhinge it, and among theſe the earl of Strafford was the principal, and conſequently, the fitteſt to ſerve for example to thoſe, who ſhould in time to come engage in the like enterprize. But beſides this, he had made himſelf many enemies by his imperious behaviour, to which great miniſters, who are ſecure of their maſter's favour, are generally but too liable. Moreover, he had deſerted the people's intereſt, after having ſtrongly ſupported it, whilſt a member of the houſe of commons, and devoted himſelf entirely to the king. This ſufficed to render him odious, and the commons, when they impeached him, knew they could not do any thing more grateful to the people. He was therefore accuſed of high-treaſon, not that in the ſhort time, ſince the opening of the parliament, the commons could have any certainty of his being guilty of that crime, but upon a certain public evidence, and the inward conviction of moſt of the members. After his being ſent to the Tower upon this impeachment, the houſe conſidered of the articles on which they were to ground his accuſation, and when they were brought to the lords, proofs were ſought to ſupport them [i].

Theſe articles, to the number of twenty-eight, tended to prove in general, that the earl of Strafford had endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the ſtate, and eſtabliſh an arbitrary power. So, though each of the pretended crimes, whereof he was accuſed, could not be accounted high-treaſon, the houſe pretended, that all together manifeſtly ſhewed his deſign, and the means he had employed to accompliſh it. The ſubſtance of the twenty-eight articles, is as follows [k]:

" I. That he being preſident of the king's council in the north parts of England, had procured to himſelf a commiſſion, with inſtructions annexed, whereby power was given to him to determine all offences, ſuits, &c. within certain precincts therein ſpecified, and in ſuch manner as the ſaid inſtructions did appoint, according to the proceedings of the ſtar-chamber. By virtue of which commiſſion, he had exerciſed an exorbitant and unlawful juriſdiction over the perſons and eſtates of his majeſty's ſubjects in thoſe parts, to their ruin.

" II. That at the aſſizes held for the county of York, he did publicly declare and publiſh before the people, that ſome of the juſtices were all for law, and nothing would pleaſe them but law; but they ſhould find, 'That the king's little finger ſhould be heavier than the loins of the law.'

" III. That being lord-deputy of Ireland, he did ſay in a public ſpeech, that Ireland was a conquered nation, and that the king might do with them what he pleaſed: and ſpeaking of the charters of former kings of England, made to the city of Dublin, he further then ſaid, that their charters were nothing worth, and did bind the king no farther than he pleaſed.

" IV. That Richard earl of Cork, a peer of Ireland, having ſued out proceſs in courſe of law, for recovery of his poſſeſſions, from which he was put, by colour of an order made by the lord Strafford and the council; he, the ſaid lord Strafford threatened the ſaid earl to impriſon him, unleſs he would ſurceaſe his ſuit, and ſaid, that he would have neither law nor lawyers diſpute or queſtion his orders.

" That the ſaid earl of Cork having conteſted the validity of an order of the council made in Ireland, in the time of king James I. the lord Strafford had ſaid, that he would make the ſaid earl and all Ireland know, that ſo long as he had the government of that kingdom, any act of ſtate there made, or to be made, ſhould be as binding to the ſubjects of that kingdom, as an act of parliament. And that he did ſundry other times, and upon ſundry other occaſions, by his words and ſpeeches, arrogate to himſelf a power above the fundamental laws and eſtabliſhed government of that kingdom, and ſcorned the ſaid laws and eſtabliſhed government.

" V. That he did give, and procure to be given, againſt the lord Mountnorris, (then a peer of Ireland, vice-treaſurer, and receiver-general of that kingdom, and treaſurer at war, and one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and keeper of the privy-ſignet of the ſaid kingdom) a ſentence of death by a council of war, called together by the ſaid earl of Strafford, without any warrant, or authority of law, or offence deſerving any ſuch puniſhment.

" And he the ſaid earl did alſo at Dublin, without any legal or due proceedings, or trial, give, and cauſe to be given, a ſentence of death againſt one other of his majeſty's ſubjects; and cauſed him to be put to death in execution of the ſame ſentence.

" VI. That without any legal proceedings, and upon a paper-petition, he did cauſe the ſaid lord Mountnorris to be diſſeized and put out of his manor of Tymore in the kingdom of Ireland; the ſaid lord Mountnorris having been eighteen years before in quiet poſſeſſion thereof.

" VII. That he did cauſe a caſe commonly called 'The caſe of Tenures upon defective Titles,' to be made and drawn up, without any jury or trial, or other legal proceſs, and without the conſent of parties, and did then procure the judges of the realm of Ireland to deliver their opinion and reſolutions to that caſe, and by colour of ſuch opinion did, without any legal proceeding, cauſe Thomas lord Dillon, and many others, to be put out of the poſſeſſion of divers lands and tenements, whereby many of his majeſty's ſubjects, and their families, were utterly undone.

" VIII. That without any legal proceſs, he had made a decree or order againſt Adam viſcount Loftus, a peer, and lord-chancellor of Ireland, and did cauſe the ſaid viſcount to be impriſoned, on pretence of diſobedience to the ſaid decree or order. That afterwards, without any authority, he required and commanded the ſaid lord viſcount to yield up unto him the great ſeal of the realm of Ireland, which was then in his cuſtody, by his majeſty's command, and impriſoned the ſaid chancellor, for not obeying ſuch his command.

" That he did impriſon George earl of Kildare, thereby to enforce him to ſubmit his title to the manor and lordſhip of Caſtle-leigh in the Queen's County, being of great yearly value, to the ſaid earl of Strafford's will and pleaſure, and kept him a year priſoner for the ſaid cauſe; and refuſed to enlarge him, notwithſtanding his majeſty's letters for his enlargement to the ſaid earl of Strafford directed.

" That upon a petition exhibited to him againſt dame Mary Hibbots, widow; the ſaid earl of Strafford recommended the ſaid petition to the council-table of Ireland, where the moſt part of the council gave their vote and opinion for the ſaid lady; but the ſaid earl finding fault herewith, cauſed an order to be entered againſt the ſaid lady, and threatened her, that if ſhe refuſed to ſubmit thereunto he would impriſon her, and fine her five hundred pounds; that if ſhe continued obſtinate, he would continue her impriſonment, and double her fine every month; by means whereof ſhe was enforced to relinquiſh her eſtate in the lands queſtioned in the the ſaid petition, which ſhortly after were conveyed to ſir Robert Meredith, to the uſe of the ſaid earl of Strafford.

" That the ſaid earl, in like manner, did impriſon divers others of his majeſty's ſubjects, upon the like pretences, &c.

" IX. That the ſaid earl, aſſuming to himſelf a power above and againſt law, took upon him, by a general warrant under his hand, to give power to the lord biſhop of Down and Conor, his chancellor, &c. to attach and arreſt the bodies of all ſuch of the meaner and poorer ſort, who after citation ſhould either refuſe to appear before them, or appearing ſhould omit or deny to perform, or undergo all lawful decrees, ſentences, and orders impoſed, or given out againſt them, and them to commit and keep in the next goal, until they ſhould either perform ſuch ſentences, or put in ſufficient bail, to ſhew ſome reaſon before the council-table, of ſuch their contempt and neglect.

[i] The committee appointed to draw the articles of accuſation againſt him, were, Mr. Whitelock the chairman, the lord Digby, ſir Walter Earl, Mr. Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Stroud, Selden, St. John, Maynard, Palmer, Glyn. Whitelock, p. 39.

[k] Theſe articles filled two hundred ſheets of paper. As ſome of the treaſons charged upon him were of fourteen years ſtanding, the earl deſired three months time to make his anſwer, but was allowed only till the 24th of February. Whitelock, p. 14.—The chief manager during the whole trial was Mr. Pym, of whom Dr. Welwood tells the following ſtory. When the earl, then only ſir Thomas Wentworth, was upon making his peace with the court, he gave Pym ſome obſcure intimation of it. Pym underſtanding his drift, ſtopt him ſhort with this expreſſion, 'You need not uſe all this art to tell me, that you have a mind to leave us: but remember what I tell you, you are going to be undone: and remember, that though you leave us now, I will never leave you while your head is upon your ſhoulders.' Memoirs, p. 45.

" X. That

" X. That he had procured the cuſtoms of the merchandize exported out, and imported into Ireland, to be farmed to his own uſe. And, to advance his own gain and lucre, did cauſe and procure the native commodities of that kingdom, to be rated in the book of rates for the cuſtoms, according to which the cuſtoms were uſually gathered, at far greater value and prices than in truth they were worth; that is to ſay, every hide at twenty ſhillings, which in truth was worth but five ſhillings, every ſtone of wool at thirteen ſhillings and four-pence, though the ſame were really worth but five ſhillings, at the utmoſt nine; by which means the cuſtom, which before was but a twentieth part of the true value of the commodity, was enhanced ſometimes a fifth part, and ſometimes to a fourth, and ſometimes to a third part of the true value.

" XI. That the ſaid earl did reſtrain the exportation of the commodities of the kingdom of Ireland, without his licence; and then raiſed great ſums of money for licences of exportation of thoſe commodities and diſpenſation of the ſaid reſtraints impoſed on them, by which thoſe commodities were raiſed above half in half.

" XII. That under colour to regulate the importation of tobacco into Ireland, he did iſſue a proclamation, prohibiting the importation of tobacco into that kingdom; after which reſtraint, the ſaid earl cauſed divers great quantities of tobacco to be imported to his own uſe: that if any ſhip brought tobacco into any port there, the ſaid earl and his agents uſed to buy the ſame to his own uſe, at their own price; and if the owners refuſed to let him have the ſame at undue values, then they were not permitted to vent the ſame there; by which undue means, the ſaid earl having gotten the whole trade of tobacco into his own hands, he ſold it at great and exceſſive prices.

" That by a proclamation he commanded, that none ſhould put to ſale any tobacco by wholeſale, but what ſhould be made up into rolls, and the ſame ſealed with two ſeals by himſelf appointed, one at each end of the roll: and ſuch as was not ſealed to be ſeized, appointing ſix-pence in the pound for a reward to ſuch perſons as ſhould ſeize the ſame. Which proclamation was rigorouſly put in execution, by ſeizing the goods, fining, impriſoning, whipping, and putting the offenders in the pillory. And though he enhanced the cuſtoms, where it concerned the merchants in general, yet he drew down the impoſt formerly taken on tobacco, from ſix-pence to three-pence the pound, it being for his own profit ſo to do.

" That he raiſed ſeveral other monopolies and unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on ſtarch, iron-pots, glaſſes, tobacco-pipes, &c.

" XIII. That flax being one of the principal and native commodities of Ireland, the ſaid earl having gotten great quantities thereof into his hands, and growing on his own lands, did iſſue out ſeveral proclamations, preſcribing and enjoining the working of flax into yarn and thread, and the ordering of the ſame in ſuch ways wherein the natives of that kingdom were unpractiſed, and unſkilful; and the flax wrought or ordered in other manner than as the ſaid proclamation preſcribed, was ſeized and employed to the uſe of him and his agents, and thereby the ſaid earl did gain, in effect, the ſole ſale of that native commodity.

" XIV. That the ſaid earl, by proclamation, did impoſe upon the owners, maſters, purſers, and boatſwains of every ſhip, a new and unlawful oath, viz. That they, immediately after the arrival of any ſhip within any port or creek in the kingdom of Ireland, ſhould give in a true invoice of the outward bulk of wares and merchandizes firſt laden aboard them, together with the ſeveral marks and number of goods, and their qualities and condition, the names of the ſeveral merchants, proprietors of the ſaid goods, and the place from whence they were freighted, and whither they were bound, &c.

" XV. That by his own authority, without any warrant or colour of law, he did tax and impoſe great ſums of money upon divers towns and places in Ireland; and did cauſe the ſame to be levied upon the inhabitants of thoſe towns by troops of ſoldiers, with force of arms, in a warlike manner; and ſent ſuch numbers of ſoldiers to lie on the lands and houſes of ſuch as would not conform to his orders, until they ſhould render obedience to his ſaid orders; and this he did at ſeveral times, and in divers places, by which means he levied war within the ſaid realm againſt his majeſty and his liege people of that kingdom.

" XVI. That the ſaid earl did make a propoſition, and obtained from his majeſty an allowance thereof, that no complaint of injuſtice or oppreſſion done in Ireland, ſhould be received in England againſt any, unleſs it appeared, that the party made firſt his addreſs to him the ſaid earl. And to prevent the ſubjects of that realm of all means of complaints to his majeſty, and of redreſs againſt him and his agents, he did iſſue a proclamation thereby commanding all the nobility, undertakers and others, who held eſtates and offices in the ſaid kingdom, to make their perſonal reſidence in the ſaid kingdom of Ireland, and not to depart thence without licence of himſelf; which proclamation the ſaid earl had by ſeveral rigorous ways, as by fine, impriſonment, and otherwiſe, put in execution: by means whereof the ſubjects of that realm were reſtrained from ſeeking relief againſt the oppreſſions of the ſaid earl.

" XVII. That ſpeaking of the army in Ireland, he did declare, that his majeſty was ſo well pleaſed with the army of Ireland, and the conſequences thereof, that his majeſty would certainly make the ſame a pattern for all his three kingdoms.

" XVIII. That in order to draw dependency upon himſelf, of the papiſts in both kingdoms of England and Ireland, during the time of his government in Ireland, he reſtored divers frieries and maſs-houſes, (which had been formerly ſuppreſſed by the precedent deputies of that kingdom; two of which houſes are in the city of Dublin, and have been aſſigned to the uſe of the univerſity there) to the pretended owners thereof.

" That in the months of May and June laſt, the ſaid earl did raiſe an army in Ireland, conſiſting of eight thouſand foot, all of which, except one [thouſand] or thereabouts were papiſts; and the ſaid one thouſand were drawn out of the old army there, and in their places there were a thouſand papiſts put into the ſaid old army by the ſaid earl.

" That the more to engage and tie the ſaid new army of papiſts to himſelf, and to encourage them, he did ſo provide, that the ſaid new army of papiſts were duly paid, &c. but the ſaid old army were, for the ſpace of one whole year and upwards, unpaid.

" That being appointed a commiſſioner within eleven ſeveral counties of the northern parts of England, for compounding with recuſants for their forfeitures due to his majeſty; and being alſo receiver of the compoſition money thereby ariſing, he did compound with them at low and under rates, and provided, that they ſhould be diſcharged of all proceedings againſt them in all his majeſty's courts, both temporal and eccleſiaſtical, contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm.

" XIX. That he did of his own authority contrive and frame a new and unuſual oath, by the purport whereof, the party taking the ſaid oath, was to ſwear that he ſhould not proteſt againſt any of his majeſty's royal commands, but ſubmit himſelf in all due obedience thereunto. Which oath he enforced on the ſubjects of the Scotiſh nation, inhabiting in Ireland; and compelled divers of his majeſty's ſaid ſubjects there, to take the ſaid oath againſt their wills; and of ſuch as refuſed to take it, ſome he grievouſly fined and impriſoned, and others he deſtroyed and exiled; namely, he fined Henry Steward and his wife, who refuſed to take the ſaid oath, five thouſand pounds a-piece, and their two daughters and James Gray, three thouſand pounds a-piece, and impriſoned them for not paying the ſaid fines.

" That he did upon that occaſion declare, that the ſaid oath did not only oblige them in point of allegiance to his majeſty, and acknowledgment of his ſupremacy only, but to the ceremonies and government of the church eſtabliſhed, and to be eſtabliſhed by his majeſty's royal authority, and ſaid, that the refuſers to obey he would proſecute to the blood.

" XX. That he was the chief incendiary of the laſt war againſt the Scotiſh nation, by inciting and provoking his majeſty againſt his ſubjects of Scotland; and had declared and adviſed his majeſty, that the demands made by the Scots in their parliament, were a ſufficient cauſe of war againſt them: that he ſaid, that the nation of the Scots were rebels and traytors; and he being then about to come to England, further ſaid, that if it pleaſed his majeſty to ſend him back again, he would root out of the kingdom of Ireland the Scotiſh nation both root and branch: that he had cauſed divers of the ſhips and goods of the Scots to be ſtayed, ſeized, and moleſted, to the intent to ſet on the war between the two nations.

" XXI. That at his arrival into England, finding that his majeſty had compoſed the troubles in the North, and made a pacification with his ſubjects of Scotland, he laboured by all means to procure his majeſty to break that pacification. And having incited his majeſty to an offenſive war againſt his Scotiſh ſubjects, he counſelled his majeſty to call a parliament in England, yet he intended, that if the proceedings of that parliament ſhould not be ſuch as would ſtand with his miſchievous miſchievous deſigns, he would then procure his majeſty to break the ſame; and by ways of force and power, to raiſe monies upon the ſubjects of this kingdom. And for the encouragement of his majeſty to hearken to his advice, he did before his majeſty and privy-council, then ſitting in council, make a large declaration, that he would ſerve his majeſty in any other way, in caſe the parliament ſhould not ſupply him.

" XXII. That before the beginning of the laſt parliament, the ſaid earl of Strafford went into Ireland, and procured the parliament of that kingdom to declare their aſſiſtance in a war againſt the Scots, and gave directions for the raiſing of an army there, conſiſting of eight thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, being for the moſt part papiſts, as aforeſaid. And confederating with one ſir George Ratcliffe, did together with him traiterouſly conſpire to employ the ſaid army, for the ruin and deſtruction of the kingdom of England, and of altering and ſubverting of the fundamental laws, and eſtabliſhed government of that kingdom.

" Shortly after, the ſaid earl returned into England, and to ſundry perſons declared his opinion to be, that his majeſty ſhould firſt try the parliament here, and if that did not ſupply him according to his occaſions, he might uſe then his prerogative as he pleaſed, to levy what he needed; and that he ſhould be acquitted both of God and man, if he took ſome other courſes to ſupply himſelf, though it were againſt the wills of his ſubjects.

" XXIII. That upon the 13th day of April laſt, the parliament of England met, and the commons houſe did enter into debate and conſideration of the grievances of this kingdom; he the ſaid earl of Strafford, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, did procure his majeſty, by ſundry ſpeeches and meſſages, to urge the ſaid commons houſe, to enter into ſome reſolution for his majeſty's ſupply, for maintenance of his war againſt his ſubjects of Scotland, before any courſe taken for the relief of the grievances wherewith this kingdom was then afflicted; whereupon a demand was then made from his majeſty of twelve ſubſidies, for the relief of ſhip-money only. And while the ſaid commons were in debate and conſideration concerning ſome ſupply, before any reſolution by them made, the ſaid earl of Strafford, with the help and aſſiſtance of the ſaid archbiſhop, did procure his majeſty to diſſolve the ſaid parliament; and upon the ſame day, the ſaid earl did endeavour to incenſe his majeſty againſt his ſubjects, who had been members of the ſaid houſe of commons, by telling his majeſty, they had denied to ſupply him; and afterwards upon the ſame day, did adviſe his majeſty to this effect, that having tried the affections of his people, he was looſe and abſolved from all rules of government; and that he was to do every thing that power would admit; and that his majeſty had tried all ways, and was refuſed, and ſhould be acquitted towards God and man; and that he had an army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this kingdom.

" XXIV. That in the ſame month of May, he declared before others of his majeſty's privy-council, that the parliament of England had forſaken the king, and that in denying to ſupply the king, they had given him advantage to ſupply himſelf by other ways; and that he was not to ſuffer himſelf to be maſtered by the frowardneſs and undutifulneſs of the people.

" And having ſo maliciouſly ſlandered the ſaid late houſe of commons, he did, with the help and advice of the ſaid archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the lord Finch, late lord-keeper of the great ſeal of England, cauſe to be printed and publiſhed in his majeſty's name, a falſe and ſcandalous book, full of bitter and malicious invectives, entitled, His majeſty's Declaration of the Cauſes that moved him to diſſolve the laſt Parliament.

" XXV. That not long after, he the ſaid earl of Strafford did adviſe the king to go on vigorouſly in levying the ſhip-money, and did procure the ſheriffs of ſeveral counties to be ſent for, for not levying the ſhip-money, divers of which were threatened by him, to be ſued in the ſtar-chamber.

" And a great loan of one hundred thouſand pounds was demanded of the city of London; and the lord-mayor, and ſheriffs, and aldermen of the ſaid city, were often ſent for by his advice to the council-table, and required to certify the names of ſuch inhabitants of the city as were fit to lend; which they with much humility refuſing to do, he the ſaid earl of Strafford did uſe theſe and the like ſpeeches, viz. That they deſerved to be put to fine and ranſom; and that no good would be done with them, till an example was made of them, and that they were laid by the heels, and ſome of the aldermen hanged up.

" XXVI. That the ſaid earl having brought his majeſty to exceſſive charge, without any juſt cauſe, did counſel and approve the two following dangerous and wicked projects, viz.

" To ſeize upon the bullion, and the money in the mint: and to impaſe his majeſty's coin, with the mixture of braſs.

" And accordingly he procured one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds, which was then in the mint, and belonging to divers merchants, ſtrangers and others, to be ſeized on, and ſtaid to his majeſty's uſe. And when divers merchants of London, owners of the ſaid bullion and money, came to his houſe, to let him underſtand the great miſchief that courſe would produce here and in other parts; he the ſaid earl told them, that the city of London dealt unduti-fully and unthankfully with his majeſty; and that they were more ready to help the rebels than to help his majeſty: and that if any hurt came to them, they might thank themſelves; and that it was the courſe of other princes to make uſe of ſuch monies to ſerve their occaſions.

" And when the officers of his majeſty's mint came to him, and gave him divers reaſons againſt the imbaſing the ſaid money; he told them, that the French king did uſe to ſend commiſſioners of horſe, with commiſſion to ſearch into mens eſtates, and to peruſe their accounts, that ſo they might know what to levy of them by force, which they did accordingly levy; and turning to the lord Cottington then preſent, ſaid, that this was a point worthy of his lordſhip's conſideration.

" XXVII. That he was made lieutenant-general of all his majeſty's forces in the North; and being at York, did, by his own authority, impoſe a tax on his majeſty's ſubjects in the county of York of eight-pence per diem, for maintenance of every ſoldier of the trained-bands of that county; which ſums of money he cauſed to be levied by force. And to compel his majeſty's ſubjects out of fear to pay the ſame, he did declare, that he would commit them that refuſed the payment thereof; and they that refuſed it, were in very little better condition than of high treaſon.

" XXVIII. That being lieutenant-general of his majeſty's army, he did not provide for the defence of the town of Newcaſtle as he ought to have done, but ſuffered the ſame to be loſt, that ſo he might the more incenſe the Engliſh againſt the Scots.

" And for the ſame purpoſe he did write to the lord Conway, the general of the horſe, that he ſhould fight with the Scotiſh army at the paſſage over the Tyne, whatſoever ſhould follow; notwithſtanding that the ſaid lord Conway had formerly by letters informed the ſaid earl, that his majeſty's army, then under his command, was not of force ſufficient to encounter the Scots."

The parliament of Ireland hearing the earl of Strafford was in the Tower, immediately ſent a committee of both houſes to England, to lay before the parliament remonſtrances concerning the grievances endured by the Iriſh, under that lord's adminiſtration. But as theſe remonſtrances contained little but what is mentioned in the twenty-eight articles, I do not think it neceſſary to inſert them.

This proceſs was not ready to be tried till the 22d of March 1640-1, and laſted till the 12th of April. It would be too tedious to give a particular account of the proofs, depoſitions of the evidences, anſwers of the party accuſed upon each article, and replies of the commons. To give a general idea of the thing, it will ſuffice to ſay in two words, that the impeachment running wholly upon the earl of Strafford's pretended intention to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the greateſt part of the crimes he was accuſed of, could be accounted high-treaſon but on ſuppoſition of this ſame intention. And therefore the managers [1] inſiſted upon every one of the articles in order to prove his intention, maintaining, that though each ſingly was not capable of proving it, they were however, when joined together, of the utmoſt evidence. But beſides, that each of theſe articles was not equally well proved, it remained alſo to decide, whether the intention could render a man guilty of treaſon. The counſel for the earl of Strafford maintained, that although by the law, the bare intention of killing the king was high-treaſon, it did not follow that the intention could be conſidered upon the ſame foot, with reſpect to other treaſons, which the law had

[1] They were, George lord Digby, John Hampden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, ſir Walter Earl, Jeoffery Palmer, John Mainard, John Glyn, Thomas Howard earl of Arundel, was lord high-ſteward upon this occaſion. The place of the trial was Weſtminſter-hall; to which a theatre and ſeats were erected for both houſes of parliament, and for the judges. not explained in the ſame manner. On the other hand, the earl of Strafford ſhewed that none of the particular crimes he was charged with could be deemed treaſon, and that a hundred felonies could never make one treaſonable crime. But this diſpute concerned only the nature of the offence, in which the accuſed had a great advantage, eſpecially if it be conſidered that in England, in criminal caſes, the judges are extremely careful not to miſtake, and to attend only to what proves directly the nature of the offence contained in the indictment. If the commons had been ſatisfied with accuſing the earl of Strafford with felony, or miſdemeanours, very probably they would have obtained a ſpeedy ſentence againſt him. But having ſolely impeached him of high-treaſon, it belonged to the peers to condemn or acquit him ſolely upon that ſort of offence. In the reign of Edward VI. the duke of Somerſet was accuſed of high-treaſon and felony. He was acquitted as to the firſt, but condemned for the laſt.

The earl of Strafford defended himſelf with all the ability, preſence of mind, judgment and temper that could be expected from a perſon of his parts[m]. Accordingly the commons eaſily found that the lords would hardly be induced to condemn him. And therefore they thought fit to take another courſe to accompliſh their ends.

The 19th of April it was voted by the commons, that the endeavour of the earl of Strafford to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the realm of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government in both kingdoms, was high-treaſon. Two days after, a bill of attainder was brought in againſt the ſaid earl. The bill was read twice in the morning, and the third time in the afternoon, and paſſed with the majority of 204 againſt 59, after which it was ſent up to the lords.

Among the oppoſers of the bill, the lord Digby diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a very eloquent ſpeech, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew, that to condemn the earl of Strafford in that manner, was real murder[n]. Great exceptions were taken at this ſpeech; and though the houſe ſeemed at firſt not much to regard it, they ordered afterwards that it ſhould be publicly burnt by the hangman.

The bill of attainder produced not the effect the commons deſired. The lords were in no haſte to examine it, or to anſwer the impatience of the commons. They had a mind firſt to conſider the arguments for and againſt the bill. In this interval the peers cauſed ſir William Baltour to be examined concerning the project of letting the earl of Strafford eſcape. Several thouſands of the inhabitants of London preſented to both houſes a petition againſt the earl, ſaying, he was a ſworn enemy of the city. The 29th of April, Mr. St. John, in the name of the commons, made a long ſpeech to the lords, to prove that the bill of attainder was not contrary to law. May the 1ſt, the king came to the parliament, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My lords,

"I HAD not any intention to have ſpoken to you of this buſineſs this day, which is the great buſineſs of the earl of Strafford, becauſe I would do nothing that might ſerve to hinder your occaſions: but now it comes ſo to paſs, that ſeeing of neceſſity I muſt have part in the judgment, I think it moſt neceſſary for me to declare my conſcience therein. I am ſure you all know, that have I been preſent at the hearing of this great caſe, from the one end to the other[o], and I muſt tell you, that I cannot in my conſcience condemn him of high-treaſon: it is not fit for me to argue the buſineſs; I am ſure you will not expect that. 'A poſitive doctrine beſt becometh the mouth of a prince:' yet I muſt tell you three great truths, which I am ſure no body knows ſo well as myſelf. 1. That I never had any intention of bringing over the Iriſh army into England; nor ever was adviſed by any body ſo to do. 2. That there was never any debate before me, neither in public council, nor at private committee, of the diſloyalty of my Engliſh ſubjects, nor ever had I any ſuſpicion of them. 3. I was never counſelled by any to alter the leaſt of any of the laws of England, much leſs to alter all the laws. Nay, I muſt tell you this, I think no body durſt ever be ſo impudent to move me in it; for if they had, I ſhould have put ſuch a mark upon them, and made them ſuch an example, that all poſterity ſhould know my intention by it; for my intention was ever to govern according to law, and not otherwiſe[p].

"I deſire to be rightly underſtood. I told you in my conſcience I cannot condemn him of high treaſon; yet I cannot ſay I can clear him of miſdemeanours: therefore I hope you may find a way to ſatisfy juſtice, and your own fears, and not preſs upon my conſcience. My lords, I hope you know what a tender thing conſcience is: yet I muſt declare unto you, that to ſatisfy my people, I would do great matters: but this of conſcience, no fear, no reſpect whatſoever, ſhall ever make me go againſt it. Certainly I have not ſo ill deſerved of the parliament at this time, that they ſhould preſs me in this tender point; and therefore I cannot expect that you will go about it.

"Nay, I muſt confeſs for matters of miſdemeanours, I am ſo clear in that, that though I will not chalk out the way, yet let me tell you, that I do think my lord Strafford is not fit hereafter to ſerve me, or the common-wealth, in any place of truſt, no, not ſo much as that of a conſtable. Therefore I leave it to you, my lords, to find ſome ſuch way as may bring me out of this great ſtreight, and keep ourſelves and the kingdom from ſuch great inconveniencies; certainly he that thinks him guilty of high-treaſon, in his conſcience may condemn him of miſdemeanours."

This ſpeech produced a quite contrary effect to what the king had expected. Accordingly, the earl of Clarendon intimates that the lord Say adviſed the king to it, in order to draw him into a ſnare, and render the earl of Strafford's ruin more certain[q]. The commons were highly offended with it, ſaying, it was an unprecedented thing, that the king ſhould meddle with bills before they were preſented unto him, and a means to take away the freedom of votes, and immediately adjourned till Monday the 3d of May.

On that day it was that the rabble of London flocked to Weſtminſter: and on the ſame day the houſe of commons drew the proteſtation before-mentioned, and on the morrow, the 4th of May, the lords approved of the ſame, and on the 7th paſſed the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford, there being not above forty-ſix lords in the houſe of the fourſcore who had conſtantly attended the trial[r]. It is pretended, that thoſe who abſented themſelves, were terrified by the threats of the populace.

The king was then in the moſt uneaſy ſituation. He loved the earl of Strafford, and was convinced the earl had done nothing but what was agreeable to his intentions and his maxims of government. He might be guilty with regard to the people on many accounts, but certainly he was not ſo with reſpect to the king, who had always approved of his conduct. Beſides, the king had proteſted in full parliament, that

[m] Dr. Welwood obſerves, that he expreſſed in his defence ſuch nervous and moving flights of eloquence, as came nothing ſhort of the moſt celebrated pieces of antiquity. This appeared from his ſumming up his long anſwer extempore, with this pathetic concluſion: "My lords, I have troubled you longer than I ſhould have done, were it not for the intereſt of theſe dear pledges, a ſaint in heaven has left me."—At this he ſtopped, pointing to his children that ſtood by him, and dropt ſome tears, then went on—"What I forfeit for myſelf is nothing, but that my indiſcretion ſhould extend to my poſterity, wounds me to the very ſoul. You will pardon my infirmity; ſomething I ſhould have added, but am not able, therefore let it paſs. And now, my lords, for myſelf I have been, by the bleſſing of God, taught, that the afflictions of this preſent life, are not to be compared to that eternal weight of glory which ſhall be revealed hereafter. And ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all tranquility of mind, I freely ſubmit myſelf to your judgment, and whether that judgment be life or death, Te Deum Laudamas." p. 46.———Mr. Whitelock obſerves, "That certainly never any man acted ſuch a part, on ſuch a theatre, with more wiſdom, conſtancy and eloquence, with greater reaſon, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and geſtures, than this great and excellent perſon did; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors (ſome few excepted) to remorſe and pity." p. 44.

[n] The lord Digby in his ſpeech has theſe words:—"I am ſtill the ſame in opinions and affections as to the earl of Strafford; I confidently believe him to be the moſt dangerous miniſter, the moſt inſupportable to free ſubjects that can be charactered. I believe his practices in themſelves as high, as tyrannical, as any ſubject ever ventured upon, and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by thoſe rare abilities of his, whereof God has given him the uſe, but the devil the application. In a word, I believe him ſtill that grand apoſtate to the common-wealth, who muſt not expect to be pardoned in this world, till he be diſpatched to the other: and yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand muſt not be to that diſpatch." Thus far a nobleman, who for his zeal to the royal cauſe, became the moſt obnoxious to the parliament. Ruſhworth, tom. iv. p. 226.—The reaſon, it ſeems, of his being againſt the bill of attainder, was, becauſe he believed the earl's adviſing the king to bring over the army from Ireland to reduce this kingdom, did refer to the kingdom of Scotland, and not to England, the thing then under debate, being how to reduce Scotland.

[o] At the trial there was on the ſtage, a chair and cloth of ſtate for the king, on either ſide whereof was a cloſe gallery for the king, queen, and prince to be private. In this place his majeſty remained all the time of the tryal. Whitelock, p. 41.

[p] It is very hard to reconcile this aſſertion of the king's with his government the firſt fifteen years of his reign. Rapin.

[q] When the earl of Strafford was told with joy by his friends, that the king had made a warm ſpeech in his favour to both houſes, he received it as his doom, and told them, 'The king's kindneſs had ruined him, and that he had little elſe to do but to prepare himſelf for death.' Welwood's Mem. p. 46.

[r] The lord Clarendon ſays, of the forty-ſix, eleven only diſſented. Tom. I. p. 201. According to Whitelock, there were but forty-five, of whom twenty-ſix voted the earl guilty of high-treaſon, upon the 15th article, 'For levying money in Ireland by force, in a warlike manner.' And upon the 19th article, 'For impoſing an oath upon the ſubjects in Ireland.' Mem. p. 45.

he neither could nor would do any thing againſt his conſcience, and that he did not believe in his conſcience the earl was guilty. On the other hand, if he conſented to the bill of attainder, after ſuch a declaration, he ſhould ſhew that he was reduced to this extremity by the neceſſity of his affairs, ſo would not be thanked for it, and for the future would have nothing more to deny his parliament. But in caſe he rejected the bill, he plainly perceived the conſequences of his refuſal, and that at leaſt he ſhould be accuſed of denying his people juſtice, contrary to the advice of both houſes of parliament.

It is not unlikely that in this extremity ſome one adviſed the king to diſſolve the parliament: at leaſt, the commons imagined he had no other way to free himſelf from his preſent embarraſſment. And therefore to deprive him of this refuge alſo, the ſame day, the 4th of May, they ordered the bringing in of a bill for the continuance of the parliament, that it might not be diſſolved without the conſent of both houſes; which bill was read thrice in two days [s], and paſſed three days after in the upper-houſe, with the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford. In theſe two or three days the commons, as hath been ſaid, vigorouſly puſhed the affair of the plot, to fill the people with fears, and force the lords to paſs the two bills.

The bill of attainder having paſſed the houſe of lords, the king aſſembled his privy-council, and ſent for his lawyers. He laid before them his ſcruples and reaſons for not conſenting to the bill. But Juxon biſhop of London, was the only perſon that ventured to adviſe the king to reject a bill preſented to him by both houſes. All the reſt endeavoured to perſuade him to ſatisfy his people, and that the life of any one perſon ought not to be put in the ballance with the ſafety of the kingdom. As to his ſcruples, they told him, he might conſult his biſhops, who would give him the propereſt advice. The king not meeting with the ſatisfaction he expected from his council, ſent for ſome biſhops to adviſe with. It is affirmed, that Williams archbiſhop of York, ſaid to him on this occaſion, "That there was a private and a public conſcience; that his public conſcience as a king, might not only diſpenſe with, but oblige him to do that which was againſt his private conſcience as a man." And therefore in plain terms adviſed him, "Even for conſcience ſake to paſs the act [t]." But what contributed moſt to determine him, was a letter from the earl of Strafford, who hearing of the ſtreights the king was in, "Humbly beſought him himſelf to paſs the bill, to remove him out of the way towards a bleſſed agreement, which he doubted not God would for ever eſtabliſh betwixt him and his ſubjects." Adding, "That his conſent would more acquit his majeſty therein to God, than all the world could do beſides. To a willing man there is no injury." At laſt the king no longer able to withſtand the preſſing inſtances of the parliament and his own counſellors, or rather the fear of the calamities he foreſaw would befal both himſelf and poſterity, if he refuſed to conſent to the bill, ſigned a commiſſion to four lords [u] to paſs it in his name [w]. By the ſame commiſſion he impowered theſe lords to give the royal aſſent to the bill for the continuance of the parliament, which was of much greater importance to him than the earl of Strafford's life, but which however it does not appear that he much regarded, ſo full was he of the other. This bill, which was of ſuch conſequence to the king, was brought in the 6th of May, and in five days paſſed both houſes, and received the king's approbation on the 10th, as if it had been but a trifle.

On the 12th of May, the ſecond day after the royal aſſent to the bill of attainder, the earl of Strafford was executed, and ſuffered death with great conſtancy. It was then, and is ſtill at this time a ſubject of diſpute, whether he deſerved to loſe his head or not. Thoſe who are for him, ſay there needs only to examine the articles of accuſation, the evidences produced againſt him, and his anſwers, to be convinced that he was not guilty of high-treaſon. That the conviction of his accuſers themſelves is a further proof, who perceiving they could not expect from the lords a ſentence according to their wiſh, uſed ſo many extraordinary means to compaſs their ends. Firſt, the charge of the judicial accuſation into a bill of attainder. Secondly, the tumultuous concourſe of the people. Thirdly, the diſcovery made to the houſe of commons of the pretended conſpiracy, preciſely at this juncture, though it had been long neglected [x]. In the fourth place, the proteſtation, the ſole deſign whereof was to terrify the people, had incenſed them againſt the king and his party. Laſtly, the violence uſed to the lords, to extort their conſent to the bill, and which obliged many to abſent themſelves, to avoid being expoſed to the fury of the people. It is pretended, all this ſhews that the commons themſelves did not believe him guilty ſince they uſed ſo many artifices to take away his life.

They who are againſt him, ſay, it cannot be denied, that the king had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government, and aſſumed to himſelf a power contrary to law. That he had made choice of ſuch miniſters and counſellors as he thought moſt proper to ſerve him in the execution of his deſign. That from the king's council had proceeded all the oppreſſions ſo long complained of by the people, and conſequently the king's miniſters and counſellors could not be innocent, unleſs theſe oppreſſions, which were as clear as the ſun, were denied. That the earl of Strafford was univerſally known to be the chief of theſe miniſters, and the perſon in whom the king moſt confided, and to hold the firſt place in the ſecret council, called the Junto, conſiſting of four or five perſons only, were all the reſolutions were taken for the oppreſſion of the ſubjects. That he could not be ſuppoſed to be againſt all theſe reſolutions, ſince his arriving to ſo high a degree of favour, was entirely owing to his attachment to the king's will. That it was no leſs evident, that in his three great poſts of privy counſellor, preſident of the North, and lord deputy of Ireland, he had always carried himſelf agreeable to the king's principles and maxims, though he knew theſe principles were contrary to the law. That all his endeavours tended to increaſe the king's revenues, and extend his prerogative by all methods, even the moſt irregular. That England, in obedience to the king's orders, does not excuſe the miniſters in illegal proceedings. That therefore it muſt either be denied, that the king ever did any thing contrary to law, or be confeſſed, that his miniſters, and eſpecially the chief, were not innocent of theſe violations. That the ſtreſs of the commons accuſation did not lie ſo much upon each particular article, as upon all together, to ſhew that the earl of Strafford really intended to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government. That every article was a proof of this intention, and it was a deluſion to repreſent them as being each ſingly a ſeparate charge of ſome particular crime. That this intention, joined to the manner of exerciſing the power given him by the king, was an unpardonable crime, ſince it tended to ſubvert all the laws, and alter the conſtitution. That it was not the ſame with the intention of ſubverting the laws as with the intention of committing any other offence, even treaſon itſelf. That theſe when committed, may be puniſhed by the laws: but if the intention of ſubverting the laws be not puniſhable till put in execution, there is no remedy; aboliſhed laws not being of any uſe. That upon theſe grounds, parliaments had at all times puniſhed ſeveral miniſters for the ſame reaſon. In ſhort, that an example being neceſſary to deter miniſters for the future from devoting themſelves ſo entirely to the king's will to oppreſs the ſubject, there could not be a fitter for that purpoſe than the earl of Strafford, whoſe power had made every one tremble, and who beſides was the object of the public hatred, the whole nation conſidering him as the chief author of their miſeries.

I ſhall add here, to finiſh what relates to the earl of Strafford, that not long after his death, the ſame parliament paſſed an act for reſtoring his children in blood and honour, and for ſettling his eſtate upon his heirs [y], and that the act of attainder was repealed in the reign of Charles II. I do not be-

[s] This bill was brought into the houſe of commons, the next morning after it was propounded, and the ſame day it was perfected, and paſſed the houſe. The firſt motion for this bill was made by a Lancaſhire knight, who offered to procure the king 650,000 l. till the ſubſidies ſhould be raiſed, if he would paſs ſuch a bill. Whitelock, p. 45. The pretended reaſon of making ſuch a law was, that the great ſums of money which the Scots were to have, could not ſuddenly be raiſed; and that being to be borrowed for their preſent riddance, lenders would hardly be found, unleſs they ſaw a certain way to ſecure their monies, which the danger of diſſolving this parliament would hazard. And being again aſſured that it was paſt, he roſe from his chair, lift up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand on his heart, and ſaid, "Put not your truſt in princes, nor in the ſons of men, for in them there is no ſalvation." The lieve that ever an Engliſh ſubject has had ſo many praiſes beſtowed on him as the earl of Strafford. Several, in ſpeaking of him, have not been able to forbear adding always to his name ſome honourable epithet, to ſhew their eſteem for him. In a word, he is repreſented as one of the greateſt men, one of the moſt accompliſhed miniſters England ever produced. I do not pretend by any means to queſtion his natural or acquired abilities. But I own, when I conſider his life and actions, I do not ſee what can ſerve for foundation to ſuch exalted encomiums. In the firſt place, after he was in favour, the king had no quarrel with any foreigh ſtate: ſo, he had no opportunity to diſplay his talents in negotiations and embaſſies. As to war, he was employed but once, in the late war with Scotland, in quality of lieutenant-general, commanding the army in the abſence of the general. On this occaſion he may be ſaid to commit a very great error, in not being ready to oppoſe the Scots paſſage of the Tyne, and in ſuffering them to take Newcaſtle, if perhaps it was not deſignedly done, to engage inevitably the two nations in a war, which certainly can be matter of no great commendation. It muſt therefore be owned, that his talents were confined to the diſcharge of his poſts or employments. As to that I find he was accuſed of having prevaricated, and entirely devouted himſelf to accompliſh the king's deſign of ſetting up an arbitrary government. Suppoſe this were a ſlander, and he had never any ſuch thought, I do not ſee, however, that his innocence can be matter of praiſe to him, any more than to many others who had been in the ſame poſts before him. What then did he perform in the adminiſtration of his offices, to deſerve the character of an accompliſhed miniſter, and the name of a great man, which is generally given him? If it is ſaid, that he made uſe of his great talents to ſerve the king faithfully, and promote his deſigns, which doubtleſs is the ſole foundation of the encomiums beſtowed on him, it is to be feared, many will not allow that he ought to have ſerved the king in that manner, or that he did him any real ſervice, as the event has ſhewn. The great praiſes therefore given to the earl of Strafford, muſt be conſidered only as a ſenſible proof of the principles of his panegyriſts, who perhaps are very ſorry he ſucceeded no better.

The death of the earl of Strafford was a great, though not the only mortification to the king. After the commons had made this trial of their ſtrength, they reſolved to compleat the reformation of the government, which till now was but commenced. The king, on his part, endeavoured, though in vain, to cool the great ardour of the commons, by granting or promiſing places to ſuch as were moſt agreeable to them. He had made ſir Edward Littleton lord-keeper, in the room of the lord Finch, who was forced to fly. For the ſame reaſon, Dr. Juxon biſhop of London, reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, which was to be given to the earl of Bedford. But the earl died whilſt he was earneſtly labouring to procure an agreement between the king and the commons. Oliver St. John, a leading man in the houſe of commons, had been made ſolicitor-general. The lord Cottington was to ſurrender the office of chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of Mr. Pym, and the place of maſter of the wards in favour of the lord Say. The office of ſecretary of ſtate, exerciſed by Windebank, was deſigned for Denzil Hollis. The earl of Eſſex, the lord Kimbolton, and Mr. Hampden, were likewiſe to have places [z]. But the earl of Bedford's death put an end to moſt of theſe projects. The king ceaſed not, however, after the death of the earl of Strafford, to gratify the commons, by making the earl of Eſſex lord chamberlain, having firſt removed the earl of Pembroke; for the earl of Eſſex was a great favourite of the commons. But all this produced not the great alterations expected by the king. The wound was too deep to be cured by ſuch lenities.

The general aim of the parliament was not only to redreſs paſt grievances, but alſo to free the kingdom from the fear of being expoſed hereafter to the like calamities. The king on the contrary, imagined, that by giving or promiſing good places to the leaders of the oppoſite party, he ſhould ſtop their mouths, or render them dumb dogs. But they were too wiſe to fall into the ſnare. They were very ſenſible, theſe places which the king gave or offered to give them, would be always at his diſpoſal, and that when the motive of his giving them ſhould ceaſe, it would be always in his power to turn them out. Beſides, many of them were too conſcientious to ſacrifice the good of their country to their private intereſt. This diſpoſition of the leaders manifeſtly appeared, in that the king's favours were not able to cauſe them to relinquiſh their project, ſo great was their diſtruſt of him. They could not believe that a prince, who had ſo openly diſcovered an intention to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government, had ſuddenly changed his principles and maxims. Nay, what he did in their favour, convinced them of the neceſſity of firmly adhering to their project, plainly perceiving his aim was to divide them.

This project conſiſted, as I ſaid, firſt, in redreſſing all the grievances: Secondly, in taking meaſures to prevent the king from returning to his former courſes. This they laboured with great diligence, after the earl of Strafford's death. Hitherto, they had only prepared matters by votes, expreſſive of their deſign, and by the proteſtation ſubſcribed by both houſes. But they expected to meet in the houſe of peers, with obſtacles ſo much the greater, as the king had there a ſtrong party.

The houſe of peers conſiſted of one hundred and twenty lords, the two archbiſhops, and twenty-four biſhops. Among the firſt, the two princes Charles and James, the duke of Buckingham, and ſeven or eight others, were yet minors; and there were ſome, whoſe age, or infirmities, or affairs, hindered them from being preſent in the parliament. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord Finch, the earl of Strafford, were no longer there at the time I am ſpeaking of; ſo that the biſhops would have made a fifth part of the houſe had it been compleat. But as, according to the lord Clarendon, there were not above fourſcore peers at the earl of Strafford's trial, a third part may be reckoned abſent; and as, on the other hand, there were vacant ſees, the biſhops and popiſh lords may, without a very wrong calculation, be counted about a quarter part of the upper-houſe. As they were all devouted to the king, it is eaſy to perceive, they rendered the king's party very powerful among the lords. Accordingly this was the reaſon which obliged the commons to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to take away their votes in parliament. Moſt of them had now made themſelves odious, by promoting the king's deſigns with all their power, and perſecuting the puritans, and they ſtill continued to obſtruct the deſign of redreſſing the grievances, by the number of their voices in the houſe of peers.

This was the reaſon made uſe of by the leading preſbyterians, who had more ſecret and extenſive deſigns, to induce ſuch members of the church of England as were againſt the king, to ſacrifice the biſhops privilege of ſetting in parliament. They intimated to them, that whilſt the king had ſo many votes in the upper houſe, it would be almoſt impoſſible effectually to labour the redreſs of grievances. That after all, to deprive the biſhops of this privilege, would, inſtead of being detrimental, be rather advantageous to religion, ſince they would thereby be more attached to their ſpiritual functions. That it would be no leſs beneficial to the ſtate, ſince the king would be deprived of a means he had always uſed with ſucceſs, to break the parliament's meaſures.

The oppoſite party to the king in the parliament, conſiſted indeed of puritans, but there were two ſorts, as I obſerved. Some were true preſbyterians. Others were ſtate puritans, that is, perſons whom the court had always conſidered as puritans; not that they were enemies to the church of England, but becauſe their maxims concerning civil government were thought to be founded upon puritan principles. Theſe two ſorts of puritans had been equally oppreſſed the firſt fifteen years of this reign, as well by the court as by the clergy, ſo that the hierarchy was become very odious to the one, and very ſuſpicious to the other. The true preſbyterians earneſtly deſired the utter extirpation of epiſcopacy. The other puritans were extremely incenſed againſt the biſhops and the reſt of the clergy, who had always ſupported and countenanced the king's deſigns. Wherefore they were eaſily perſuaded, that it would be a great ſervice to the ſtate, to clip the wings of the clergy, to the end they might be leſs uſeful to the king. Beſides, though church of England men, they were not of the opinion of thoſe who believed that religion could not ſubſiſt without biſhops, and that epiſcopacy was ſo cloſely united with the monarch, that the one could not be aboliſhed without the deſtruction of the other. So far was the hierarchy from giving them any uneaſineſs, that they would have been very glad to preſerve it, provided the clergy could have been confined to their ſpiritual functions. But they were grieved to ſee the clergy inveſted with a ſecular power, which they abuſed. It muſt be further added that being thus diſpoſed, they ſaw the preſbyterians, who were numerous in the kingdom, and ſupported by the Scots, ſtrenuouſly inſiſt upon taking away the biſhops votes in the houſe of lords. It was dangerous to diſpleaſe them, for a very ſtrong reaſon, though the preſbyterians affected to ſpeak the ſtate only, it was well known, that religion was the principal thing they had in view, and that their tranſactions concerning the civil government, tended only to diſable the king from oppreſſing them, if he remained too powerful. Had the king therefore tried to gain the preſbyterians, by offering them reaſonable terms, they might have accepted them, and relinquiſhed the deſign of reforming the civil government, and then the ſtate-puritans would have been at the king's mercy. Union between the puritans was therefore abſolutely neceſſary. For, it was no leſs dangerous for the preſbyterians, that the king ſhould content the ſtate puritans, in which caſe they would infallibly abandoned the preſbyterians.

Both theſe parties therefore ſtood in great need of each other, and it was their intereſt to ſupport one another, for fear the king ſhould take advantage of their diviſion. But he could never reſolve either to grant any terms to the preſbyterian party, or to ſatisfy the politicians. He thereby formed himſelf ſo ſtrict an union between theſe two parties, that they became one and the ſame. The politicians choſe rather out of condeſcenſion to the Preſbyterians, to ſacrifice the biſhops privilege, than be expoſed to the danger of ſeeing themſelves again ſubject to an arbitrary government.

According to theſe diſpoſitions, and the conſequent reſolutions, the houſe of commons equally laboured the redreſs of grievances, and the execution of the deſign againſt the biſhops. Thus the affairs of church and ſtate went hand in hand, ſo that ſcarce a day paſſed, but the commons gave the king ſome mortification, one while by paſſing bills or votes againſt the king's former proceedings, another while by proſecuting the authors of the grievances or innovations; ſometimes by exclaiming againſt the forementioned conſpiracy, and ſometimes by increaſing the yoke of the papiſts.

All this tended to the end propoſed by the oppoſite party to the king. It was ſuppoſed as a thing publicly known, that there had been a ſettled deſign to introduce popery, and that ſome of the biſhops were concerned in the plot. Thus, by accuſing the papiſts of having ill deſigns, and by rigorouſly proſecuting them, this accuſation was made, in ſome meaſure, to reflect on the biſhops and clergy. It was pretended, that the innovations introduced into the divine ſervice, were a conſequence of this deſign, and for that reaſon, by condemning them, the clergy, who had countenanced them, were rendered odious to the people. The accuſations againſt particular perſons, who had been moſt zealous to ſupport theſe innovations, produced alſo the ſame effect. In ſhort, nothing was omitted that could contribute to ſhew the people the neceſſity of reſtoring the government to its natural ſtate, and convince them, that the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy was more prejudicial than neceſſary to the church and ſtate. With theſe two things the commons were taken up for the ſpace of three months, from the death of the earl of Strafford, to the king's journey to Scotland.

Firſt, with reſpect to the ſtate, in this interval it was, that bills were brought in to aboliſh the ſtar-chamber and court of York, to regulate the council-table, to aboliſh ſhip-money, and prevent vexatious proceedings concerning knighthood, againſt illegal impriſonments, and for aſcertaining the bounds and limits of foreſts. Each judge in particular was accuſed. The tax impoſed by the king on the ſhires, for the wages of the muſter-maſter, was declared contrary to law. The conſpiracy to ſeduce the army was likewiſe examined, and Wilmot, Aſhburnham, and Pollard, were expelled the houſe, and committed to priſon. All the patents for monopolies, of which moſt were ſuppreſſed, were brought before the houſe. It was alſo examined, by what means a certain clauſe had been inſerted in the petition of right, concerning tunnage and poundage, and care was taken to regiſter a declaration on that head, to hinder poſterity from being deceived by that ſurreptious clauſe. I paſs over in ſilence ſeveral votes flowing from all theſe articles, or which concerned particular perſons.

As to religion, beſides what was done with reſpect to the papiſts, and of which I have already ſpoken, the commons declared illegal the oath by which miniſters were bound to maintain the hierarchy in the church. A bill was brought in againſt pluraliſts. The canons made by the late convocation were condemned. A bill was paſſed to aboliſh the high-commiſſion. The ſuppreſſion of deans and chapters was voted. Matthew Wren biſhop of Ely was impeached. The proteſtation was ordered to be ſubſcribed by the whole nation. An accuſation was brought to the lords againſt thirteen biſhops, who had aſſiſted at the convocation.

I have but juſt mentioned theſe articles, becauſe a particular account of each ſeemed to me needleſs. I ſhall only add, that there was ſome difference between the two houſes concerning the proteſtation. The lords would have left every man at liberty to ſign it; but did not think proper to uſe compulſion. The commons, on the contrary, looked upon the proteſtation as a Shiboleth, to diſtinguiſh the Ephraimites[a], and at laſt the lords agreed to what the commons defired.

One of the articles of the proteſtation occaſioning ſome diſputes, the commons explained more fully that article, which was thus worded: "I ſwear to defend the true reformed proteſtant religion, expreſſed in the doctrine of the church of England, againſt all popery and popiſh innovations within this realm, contrary to the ſame doctrine." Some perſons inſiſting upon the firſt part of this clauſe, pretended, that there was no other doctrine of the church of England than what is contained in the thirty-nine articles drawn up in the reign of Elizabeth, of which one is "To preſerve the government of the church by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, &c." Hence they inferred, that thoſe who ſhould take the proteſtation were bound to maintain epiſcopacy. But the commons conſidering the whole clauſe as expreſſed in the proteſtation, declared, "That by theſe words was, and is meant, only the public doctrine profeſſed in the ſaid church, ſo far as it is oppoſite to popery and popiſh innovations; and that the ſaid words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any form of worſhip, diſcipline or government, nor of any rites or ceremonies of the ſaid church of England." This clearly ſhewed what was their intention with regard to the hierarchy.

There was alſo another diſpute between the two houſes concerning the ſtar-chamber. The lords were willing to agree, it ſhould be reformed, but refuſed to conſent to its abolition. Mean while, the commons vigorouſly ſupporting the bill, they had ſent up to the peers, it paſſed at laſt, and the king gave his aſſent the 5th of July.

In this ſame interval, I mean, from the death of the earl of Strafford, to the king's journey to Scotland, there were ſome other tranſactions which it is neceſſary to mention.

The cuſtomers, who had collected the duties impoſed on merchandiſes by the king's ſole authority without conſent of parliament, finding they were like to be attacked, offered of their own accord one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds for an act of oblivion, and their offer was accepted[b].

The lord Digby, ſon of the earl of Briſtol, and member of the houſe of commons, was called by writ to the houſe of lords the 10th of June[c]. In the beginning of this parliament, he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the redreſs of grievances: but his ſpeech againſt the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford, made him forfeit the good will of the commons. Whether he was already gained by the king, or on this occaſion firſt joined his party, his majeſty thought proper to ſcreen him from the reſentment of the commons, by calling him to the houſe of peers. He will hereafter appear the king's chief miniſter and counſellor, great enemy to the commons, as they on their part never forgave his defection.

The Iriſh army ought to have been long ſince diſbanded, as there was no occaſion to keep it on foot, and the commons had frequently deſired it of the king. Nevertheleſs, this army ſubſiſted the laſt, though the commons had taken care for their payment. When they came to be diſbanded, the king acquainted both houſes, that the Spaniard having deſired to take this army into his ſervice, and intimated the ſame by his embaſſador, he had promiſed to ſend him four thouſand men. The lords made no ſcruple to agree to the king's engagement. But the commons, ever full of fears and ſuſpicions, thought not proper, that the king ſhould keep theſe troops in the king of Spain's name, who would make them ſerve in the Low Countries, from whence the king might draw them whenever he pleaſed. Beſides, the French embaſſador had deſired the reſt of the army for his maſter, to which the king had alſo conſented. They thought it was an artifice of the king's, to keep this popiſh army which was devoted to him, and on which he could much better rely than on that of England. Wherefore they prayed the king to call in his word.

[a] The declared, That whoſoever ſhould not take the proteſtation, was unfit to bear office in church or common-wealth; and ordered this vote to be printed, and ſent down to every county, city, and borough. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 357.

[b] This petition was delivered to the houſe by the great farmers of tunnage and poundage, namely, ſir Paul Pindar, ſir Abraham Daws, ſir John Worſtenholm, and ſir John Jacob. The petty cuſtomers had the liberty likewiſe to come in upon compoſition, and then have the benefit of the Act of Oblivion. Nalſon, tom. II. p. 256.

[c] The king called the lord Digby to the houſe of lords, at the time the commons expelled him their houſe. His writ was dated the 9th, and he was voted out of the houſe the 10th. Upon his coming to the houſe of lords, he was added to all the ſtanding committees. Nalſon, tom. II. p. 275.

There

They had on this occaſion ſeveral conferences with the lords, where they alleged ſundry reaſons to ſupport their opinion, without expreſſing the true one: but it was eaſily perceived. The king was much diſpleaſed with the commons oppoſition, whether he thought himſelf bound in honour to keep his promiſe, or really intended to preſerve his army by lending it to the kings of France and Spain, in order to uſe it himſelf in caſe of neceſſity. What gives cauſe to ſuſpect he had formed ſuch a project is, that it does not appear the kings of France and Spain had then any great occaſion for theſe troops. Be this as it will, the king, without regarding the commons oppoſition, ſhewed that his intention was to perform his promiſe, and the affair was not yet ended when the king departed for Scotland. Some time after he ſent a meſſage to the lords dated from Edinburgh, wherein he appeared reſolved to ſtand to his engagement, let what would be the conſequence. But the two houſes found means to render his reſolution ineffectual, by publiſhing an ordinance, declaring that whoever ſhould aſſiſt in tranſporting the Iriſh troops into any foreign country, ſhould be deemed an enemy to the ſtate. This ordinance broke all the king's meaſures, not one owner of ſhips being willing to hazard inevitable ruin for his ſake.

The king, as I ſaid, expected that the parliament would grant him an aid capable of enabling him to drive the Scots out of the kingdom. He quickly found his miſtake, and clearly perceived that the Scots were come into England at the ſolicitation of the Engliſh malecontents, and that theſe malecontents were the very perſons who had moſt credit and authority in the two houſes. He judged therefore, that inſtead of thinking any longer of expelling the Scots by arms, he ſhould rather endeavour to agree with them, in order to diſjoin their intereſt from that of the Engliſh, and induce them to diſband their army, which was always ready to ſupport the parliament. When therefore the commiſſioners of the two kingdoms met at London, to continue the treaty of Ripon, they found no reſiſtance from the king, who by granting the Scots firſt demand, plainly ſhewed he was diſpoſed to refuſe them nothing. This demand was, that the king ſhould cauſe to be publiſhed in his name the acts of the parliament of Scotland, as well thoſe which were already paſſed in the firſt ſeſſion, as thoſe which ſhould be paſſed in the ſecond. So great a condeſcenſion on this article, which had been properly the cauſe of the ſecond war, convinced the commons that the king's aim was ſpeedily to get rid of the Scotiſh army, which to him was an incumbrance, but to them was very neceſſary for the execution of their projects: and therefore as the Scotch commiſſioners had a good underſtanding with the commons, they ſo managed that the negotiation of peace was prolonged to the 7th of Auguſt 1641, though the king, by granting whatever was required, removed all difficulties as far as lay in his power.

At laſt, the negotiation being about to end, and nothing more wanting to conclude the treaty but to agree upon ſome articles of little importance, the king permitted the parliament of Scotland to meet, and promiſed to be there in perſon, to paſs ſuch acts as ſhould be judged requiſite. The commons having knowledge of the kings reſolution, entertained ſome ſuſpicion of this journey, and were apprehenſive that the king's deſign was to put himſelf at the head of his army in the north under colour of going to Scotland. They deſired therefore a conference with the lords, and moved that the armies might be diſbanded before the king's departure, and that both houſes ſhould preſent a petition to the king, to pray him to defer his journey. They ſupported their motion with ſeveral arguments, and amongſt others with this, that it was neceſſary to prevent the ſuſpicions of the people, and the deſigns ſome might have, to make uſe of the army to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom: that beſides, ſeveral bills were ſent up to the lords and not yet paſſed: that others were now under conſideration in the lower houſe, and it was neceſſary the king ſhould give his aſſent to them before his departure [d]. In ſhort, after divers conferences, it was reſolved, with the king's conſent, that he ſhould defer his journey till the 10th of Auguſt, and that two armies ſhould be diſbanded by that time [e]. Nevertheleſs, as the Engliſh army could not be entirely diſbanded before the king's departure, for want of money, the commons deſired a further delay of a fortnight, alleging ſtill the people's jealouſies: but the lords refuſed to concur with them, and the king departed the 10th of Auguſt, as had been agreed [f].

The commons diſtruſt of the king ſtill ſubſiſting, they deſired the concurrence of the peers, that a committee of lords and commoners might be ſent to the parliament of Scotland, to remain there, and inform them from time to time of their proceedings, to which the lords conſented. The perſons named to go commiſſioners into Scotland were the earl of Bedford, the lord Howard of Eſcrick, Nathaniel Fiennes, ſir William Armyne, ſir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden; and a draught of a commiſſion was ſent by an expreſs to the king to ſign. But the king refuſed it, becauſe he ſaw no neceſſity for ſuch a commiſſion: he conſented however, that the committee ſhould come and attend him in Scotland, to ſee the ratification of the treaty. As the committee were properly deſigned only for ſpies upon the king's actions, both houſes thought fit to ſend them into Scotland, on ſome other pretence. But the earl of Bedford did not go on this ſervice.

Some days after, the houſe of commons came to ſeveral reſolutions againſt the monopoly of ſoap, which was declared illegal. Morever they voted, that the ſentence in the ſtar-chamber againſt certain ſoap-boilers of London ſhould be reverſed, and the judges of that court, who had given their votes in the ſentence, ſhould pay the parties coſts and damages. It was ordered alſo, that inquiry ſhould be made what members of the privy-council had given their conſent to the illegal orders made at the council-table, about the ſoap-monopoly.

As the commons had undertaken to redreſs all grievances, that of the city of London concerning the plantation of Londonderry was likewiſe conſidered, whilſt the king was in Scotland. The houſe paſſed ſeveral votes upon that ſubject, and declaring illegal all the proceedings of the ſtar-chamber, reverſed the ſentence againſt the city of London, as unjuſt, and given by incompetent judges. They declared, that when the king ſhould be pleaſed to repay to the city the money he had received, the patent thereupon granted ſhould be cancelled or ſurrendered.

After that, both houſes reſolved to adjourn from the 9th of September to the 20th of October, that the members might go to their homes, from whence they had been abſent ten months. As ſoon as this reſolution was taken, a great number of both houſes retired into the country, to gain a little more time to repoſe themſelves, ſo that there remained but twenty-two lords in the upper, and a hundred and fifteen members in the lower-houſe. Then ſome one, who was doubtleſs preſbyterian, willing to improve ſo favourable an opportunity, moved, that it was neceſſary to make ſome alterations in the Common Prayer Book. This motion occaſioned a very warm debate. Mr. Hyde, afterwards earl of Clarendon, ſtrenuouſly defended the Liturgy, ſo that, contrary to the expectation of the perſon who had raiſed the debate, nothing was reſolved.

But ſome days after, the affair of innovation in the church was debated, and the houſe paſſed ſeveral votes, declaring that certain innovations ought to be aboliſhed. At the ſame time, the lords, ſeeing that in the lower houſe the authenticneſs of the Common Prayer Book was queſtioned, voted that it ſhould be obſerved as before in all the churches, without any omiſſion or alteration. This begot a conference between both houſes, wherein the commons deſired the lords to conſent to the following declaration, and join with them in the publication thereof.

Declaration of September 8, 1641.

"WHEREAS divers innovations in or about the worſhip of God, have been lately practiſed in this kingdom, by enjoining ſome things, and prohibiting others, without warrant of law, to the great grievance and diſcontent of his majeſty's ſubjects. For the ſuppreſſion of ſuch innovations, and for preſervation of the public peace, it is this day ordered by the commons in parliament aſſembled, that the churchwardens of every pariſh church and chapel reſpectively, do forthwith remove the communion-table from the eaſt end of the church, chapel, or chancel, into ſome other convenient

[d] There were four reaſons delivered to Mr Hollis, to move the king to ſtay his journey into Scotland. The third of which is that referred to here by our author, namely, "The diſtempers and jealouſies of the kingdom are ſuch, that they cannot be compoſed by paſſing ſome acts, unleſs his majeſty ſtay the deſired time." Which words do not ſeem to imply ſo much as our author expreſſes. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 361.—Beſides this, the commons moved, that the king might be deſired to appoint a cuſtos regni, becauſe many emergent occaſions might happen in parliament, where uſe muſt be made of the king's authority. place, and that they take away the rails, and level the chancels as heretofore they were before the late innovations.

"That all crucifixes, ſcandalous pictures of any one or more perſons of the Trinity, and all images of the Virgin Mary, ſhall be taken away and aboliſhed; and that all tapers, candleſticks, and baſons, be removed from the communion-table.

"That all corporal bowing at the name Jeſus, towards the eaſt end of the church, chapel, or chancel, or towards the communion-table, be henceforth forborn.

"That the orders aforeſaid be obſerved in all the ſeveral cathedral churches of this kingdom, and all the collegiate churches or chapels in the two univerſities, or any other part of the kingdom; and in the Temple-church, and the chapels of the other inns of court, by the deans of the ſaid cathedral churches, by the vice-chancellor of the ſaid univerſities, and by the heads and governors of the ſeveral colleges and halls aforeſaid, and by the benchers and readers in the ſaid inns of court reſpectively.

"That the Lord's day ſhall be duly obſerved and ſanctified: all dancing, or other ſports, either before or after divine ſervice, be forborn and reſtrained; and that the preaching of God's word be permitted in the afternoon in the ſeveral churches and chapels of this kingdom, and that miniſters and preachers be encouraged thereunto.

"That in caſe theſe orders be not obſerved, complaints thereof ſhall be delivered in parliament before the 30th of October next.

The lords regarded not the deſire of the commons: but on the morrow, September the 9th, the day appointed for the adjournment, they communicated to the commons, in a conference, an order dated January the 16th, 1640-1, enjoining that divine ſervice ſhould be performed without any alteration, as appointed by acts of parliament; and a confirmation of the ſame order, purſuant to a reſolution taken on the preſent 9th of September, deſiring the commons to concur with them in the publiſhing thereof.

The commons abſolutely refuſed to join in the publication of this order, thinking it unſeaſonable at ſuch a juncture to preſs the rigorous obſervance of the laws concerning divine ſervice, when a great part of the people called for a reformation. Beſides, they knew this laſt order, which confirmed that of the 16th of January, was made when there were but twenty lords in the houſe, and by a majority of two voices only, eleven againſt nine. Then they drew up a declaration, inſerting that of the day before, to which the lords had returned no anſwer, with the order of the peers of the 16th of January, and the confirmation of the ſame order of the 9th of September, with the refuſal of the commons to concur with them, and ordered that their declaration ſhould be printed and publiſhed.

I imagine it will not be amiſs to remark concerning this diſſention between the two houſes, firſt, that paſſion reigned on both ſides, ſince the time of making theſe two motions was by no means convenient, there not being above the fifth part of the members preſent in each houſe.

Secondly, That there was a great difference in the two points in queſtion, with reſpect to their importance. One concerned the preſervation of the public worſhip and Book of Common Prayer, appointed by the laws ſince the reformation, but wherein however many people ardently wiſhed great alterations might be made, nay, deſired they might be entirely ſuppreſſed, whilſt the reſt of the nation believed them abſolutely neceſſary. This was a thing of ſuch conſequence that, it ſeems, nothing ought to have been decided for or againſt it but upon mature deliberation, and when both houſes had their uſual number of members. For this reaſon, if the motion for making alterations in the Liturgy had been approved in the lower houſe, doubtleſs the lords would have juſtly oppoſed it, and refuſed their concurrence. But on the other hand, as the commons had taken no reſolution, there does not ſeem to have been any neceſſity for the lords to renew their order of the 16th of January, which remained in force, and wanted not that confirmation; nay, it appeared that this order was renewed only out of ſpleen, becauſe the commons had made a declaration againſt innovations. Had the lords been ſatisfied with refuſing their conſent to the commons declaration of the 8th of September, there would have been nothing to object. But in refuſing to return any anſwer to the commons, and renewing withal their order of the 16th of January, they diſcovered that they acted out of ſpleen and revenge, and it was not doubted but the biſhops were the chief authors of the renewal of the order.

The ſecond point, which concerned the innovations, was not of the ſame importance. The queſtion was only to know whether they were really innovations, and if ſo, whether illegal or dangerous to religion. But this was a thing not to be debated in ſuch a juncture, when both houſes were going to be adjourned, and moſt of the members already retired into the country: ſo the lords might have refuſed their conſent to the votes of the commons, though it had been only on pretence of the thinneſs of both houſes. But in returning no anſwer to the commons, they ſhewed in ſome meaſure that they approved of theſe innovations, which had ſo long been an occaſion of complaints and murmurs in the kingdom.

The ſame day, before the adjournment, the commons appointed a committee of forty-three[e], to take care, during the receſs, of the moſt weighty and urgent affairs. The lords appointed a committee alſo, conſiſting but of ſeven peers, which done, both houſes adjourned to the 20th of October.

During the receſs, the committee, which had followed the king into Scotland, ſent word to the committee of the houſe of commons, that there was a ſort of conſpiracy in Scotland, and that the aim of the parties concerned ſeemed to be to interrupt the proceedings of the parliament of that kingdom, and to deſtroy the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Argyle, and the earl of Lanerick. As the committee received this notice but two days before the meeting of the parliament, they only ordered the lord mayor of London to place convenient guards in ſeveral places of the city, fearing that the conſpirators of Scotland might have correſpondents in England, to diſturb at the ſame time the peace of the kingdom.

The parliament being met the 20th of October, Pym made a report to the houſe of what the committee had done during the receſs. Whereupon the commons deſired a conference with the lords, where they repreſented to them:

"1. That a letter from the committee in Scotland gave ground to think, that when there was a deſign in England to ſeduce the king's army and interrupt the parliament, that there was the like deſign at that time in Scotland.

"2. That the principal party named in that deſign in Scotland, the lord Crawford, is a perſon ſuſpected to be popiſhly affected; and therefore may have correſpondence with the like party in England.

"3. That it has been lately publiſhed in England, that ſome things were to be done in Scotland before it broke out there. Therefore we may ſuſpect ſome correſpondence here.

Upon theſe grounds the commons propounded to the lords, that a ſtrong guard ſhould be kept in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and care taken for the defence of the whole kingdom, and that an expreſs meſſenger be ſent to the committee of both houſes in Scotland, to acquaint them that the parliament of England was ready to give the Scots all neceſſary aſſiſtance againſt thoſe who ſhould diſturb the peace.

The lords approving of theſe propoſals, inſtructions were ſent to the committee agreeable to the commons deſires.

The ſame day, the 20th of October, both houſes deſired the earl of Eſſex, whom the king had made general on the ſouth of the Trent, to place a guard at Weſtminſter, for the ſecurity of the parliament, which was accordingly done. This Scotiſh conſpiracy made a great noiſe at that time: but it was not poſſible to diſcover it fully. See what Burnet ſays of it, in his Memoirs of the duke of Hamilton.

"A gentleman, not known to the marquis of Hamilton, brought him and the earl of Argyle the diſcovery of a plot; which, he ſaid, was laid for their lives and the earl of Lanerick's, which he ſaid he could juſtify by one witneſs, who was invited to the execution of it: he told alſo a long formal ſtory of the perſons to be actors, of the time, place, and manner; and ſaid it was to be executed that very night. This the marquis carried to the king, without naming particulars, which could not be done ſafely by the law of Scotland, ſince he had but one witneſs to prove them by. The king deſired him to examine the thing to the bottom, and bring him what further evidence he could find. In the evening other preſumptions were brought to the marquis, but no clear evidence: however, the matter was got abroad, and in every body's mouth, ſo that all who depended on theſe lords came about them in great numbers: and thoſe on whom the deſign was faſtened, gave out it was a forgery to make them odious, and gathered alſo together. The marquis hearing this did not ſtir out of doors, leſt ſome of their too officious followers ſhould raiſe tumults; and next day, in the evening, he, with the earl of Argyle, and his brother the earl of Lane-rick, and half a dozen ſervants, went out of town to his houſe of Keneel, twelve miles from Edinburgh, and ſent his excuſe to his majeſty, with an account of the reaſons. Upon this many diſcourſes went about, people of all ſides paſſing conſtruction as they were affected: but the parliament took the whole matter into conſideration. Thoſe who had given the information, owned what they had ſaid, and thoſe on whom the plot was fixed did as poſitively deny all; ſo that no clear proof being brought, the parliament could come to no other deciſion, but that the lords had good reaſon to withdraw themſelves; and ſo they were invited to return to their place in parliament [f]."

There is however in the lord Clarendon's hiſtory, a particular which may give ſome light to this affair. The earl of Montroſe told the king, that the marquis of Hamilton was falſe to him, and even offered to rid him of this ſecret enemy; but the king abhorred the expedient. Perhaps the earl of Montroſe thought he ſhould do the king a pleaſure in having the marquis aſſaſſinated, and mentioning it to ſome perſon, the ſecret was divulged. However this be, the commons of England it ſeems, were extremely jealous of the king, or at leaſt they did their utmoſt to inſpire the people with diſtruſt; for their fear was grounded but upon very ſlight preſumptions and a bare poſſibility that this pretended plot againſt three Scotch lords could have any influence in England.

The next day, a complaint was made to the commons againſt ſome perſons for not obeying the declaration of the 9th of September, publiſhed by order of the houſe. As the affair was debated with great warmth, ſir Edward Deering made a ſpeech, which I think proper to inſert, to ſhew that it was not without ground that the commons were accuſed of exceeding their power in publiſhing their declaration, without obtaining the concurrence of the lords.

"Mr. Speaker,

"IT is very true (as is inſtanced unto you) that your late order and declaration of the 8th and 9th of September, are much debated and diſputed abroad; perhaps it may be a good occaſion for us to re-diſpute them here.

"The intent of your order to me ſeems doubtful, and therefore I am bold, for my own inſtruction, to propound two queries.

"1. How far an order of this houſe is binding?

"2. Whether this particular order be continuant, or expired?

"Your orders, (I am out of doubt) are powerful, if they be grounded upon the laws of the land: upon that warrant we may, by an order, enforce any thing that is undoubtedly ſo grounded, and by the ſame rule we may abrogate whatſoever is introduced contrary to the undoubted foundation of our laws. But, ſir, this order is of another nature, another temper, eſpecially in one part of it, of which (in particular) at ſome other time.

"Sir, there want not ſome abroad, men of birth, quality, and fortune, ſuch as know the ſtrength of our votes here as well as ſome of us (I ſpeak my own infirmities), men of the beſt worth, and of good aſſiſtance in us, and no way obnoxious to us: they know they ſent us hither as their truſtees, to make and unmake laws; they know they did not ſend us hither to rule and govern them by arbitrary, revokable, and diſputable orders, eſpecially in religion. No time is fit for that, and this time as unfit as any: I deſire to be inſtructed herein.

"Mr. Speaker, in the ſecond place there is a queſtion, whether this order (whereupon the preſent complaint is grounded) be permanent and binding, or elſe expired, and by ourſelves deſerted? I obſerve, that the order being made the 8th of September, in hope then of concurrence therein by the lords; that failing, you did iſſue forth your laſt reſolution by way of declaration, wherein thus you expreſs yourſelf: 'That it may well be hoped, when both houſes ſhall meet again, that the good propoſitions and preparations in the houſe of commons, for preventing the like grievances, and reforming the diſorders and abuſes in matters of religion, may be brought to perfection: wherefore you do expect that the commons of this realm do in the mean time (what, obey and perform your order made the day before? No ſuch thing, but in the mean time) quietly attend the reformation intended.'

"Theſe are your words, and this my doubt upon them, whether by theſe words you have not ſuperſeded your own order? Sure I am, the words do bear this ſenſe, and good men may think and hope it was your meaning.

"My humble motion therefore is this, I beſeech you to declare, that upon this our reconvention, your order of the 8th of September is out of date; and that the commons of England muſt (as you ſay) 'Quietly attend the reformation intended;' which certainly is intended to be perfected up into acts of parliament. And in the mean time, that they muſt patiently endure the preſent laws, until you can make new, or mend the old."

The 22d of October, the bill for diſabling perſons in holy orders to exerciſe temporal juriſdiction was again debated, and ſeveral ſpeeches made pro and con. At leaſt it was reſolved to proſecute the biſhops who had aſſiſted at the late convocation, and to puſh the bill for excluding the biſhops from their votes in parliament. To that end the houſe deſired a conference with the lords, where Pym and St. John explained the demands of the commons, with the reaſons to ſupport them. Pym ſpoke firſt in this manner:

"My lords,

"THE parliament, the fountain of juſtice, ought to be preſerved pure from corruption and free from partiality, which will add not only luſtre, reputation, and honour, but authority to what is done in parliament: all men's eſtates and liberties are preſerved under the ſafe-cuſtody of parliament; this moveth us to be careful of any thing that may prejudice the parliament in point of freedom and integrity.

"Therefore the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons have commanded me, with my collegue, to repreſent unto your lordſhips two propoſitions, which they hold of very great importance and neceſſity to be put in execution at this time.

"Firſt that thoſe thirteen biſhops which ſtand accuſed before your lordſhips for making the late Book of Canons, and putting them in execution, may be excluded from their votes in parliament.

"Secondly, that all the biſhops may be excluded from having any vote in that act, come from the houſe of commons to your lordſhips, entitled, An Act to take away the Biſhops Votes in parliament, &c.

"That which concerneth the thirteen biſhops falleth to my charge to open, as I am commanded to tell your lordſhips, that it ſtandeth not with honour and with juſtice, that theſe biſhops ſhould have votes, ſtanding thus charged with the breach of truſt, and of the higheſt truſt, againſt the prerogative of the king, againſt the privilege of the parliament, againſt the property of the ſubject, and againſt the peace of the kingdom: theſe are the jewels that are depoſed under the truſt and ſafe-guard of parliament, and all theſe have been broken; and this appeareth by the making of the new canons, voted by your lordſhips to be againſt all theſe truſts.

"That theſe perſons have been parties to the breach of this truſt, that will appear by the journals of the convocation, which are now in the country, and may be ſent for; the entry of the book is, that all the thirteen biſhops were parties, and did confirm and ſubſcribe theſe canons; therefore it is hoped by theſe canons, that thoſe that have aſſumed to themſelves a legiſlative power, whereby they have, as much as in them lies, rooted out the foundation of parliament, that they ſhould have no intereſt in the legiſlative power at all in parliament.

"Next, that thoſe that have deprived the ſubjects of thoſe good laws that are already made for them, that they ſhould have no intereſt or part making future laws for the ſubject; this they conceive ſtandeth with a great deal of equity and juſtice, which is one reaſon to deſire they ſhould be excluded from their votes in parliament.

"Next is the heinouſneſs of their offence. It is very fit they ſhould be innocent men, and faithful men, that ſhould have the exerciſe of ſo great a thing as it is; much leſs then ſhould they be delinquents of ſo high a nature, actors in the ſubverting of the laws of the realm, that they ſhould continue their votes and places in parliament: and that their delinquency may the better appear, you are deſired to read the votes paſſed in the houſe of commons (nullo contradicente), and with which the lords have concurred and agreed.

Then the votes, concerning the making of the ſaid canons, were read by Mr. Goodwin.

[f] Biſhop Guthry ſays, that this was but a pretended plot; and that the deſign of the earls of Argyle, Hamilton, and Lanerick was only to make a public rupture; preſuming that, upon their removal, the parliament ſhould preſently have broken up, which therefore the king took care to prevent it. Memoirs, p. 88.

July

And then Mr. Solicitor St. John proceeded to this effect:

"That he was in the next place to preſent ſome reaſons and precedents concerning the biſhops not having their votes touching the bill, entitled, an act to take away the biſhops votes in parliament, etc.

"1. Becauſe they have no ſuch inherent right and liberty of being there, as the lords temporal and peers of the realm have; for they are not there repreſentative of any body elſe; no, not of the clergy; for if ſo, then the clergy were twice repreſented by them, viz. in the lords houſe, and in the convocation: for their writ of election is to ſend two clerks, ad conſentiendum, etc. Beſides, none are there repreſentative of others, but thoſe that have their ſuffrages from others; and therefore only the clerks in the convocation do repreſent them.

"2. They have not the inherit right of peerage as the lords have, becauſe in ſome things they cannot do that there, which the lords may do in caſe of treaſon and matter of blood: upon trial of any peer they have no liberty of vote: which could not be taken away by any canon, if their right of voting there were inherent.

"If they were repreſentative of the clergy, as a third eſtate and degree, no act of parliament could be good if they did wholly diſaſſent, and yet they have diſaſſented, and the law good and in force, as in the act for eſtabliſhing the Book of Common Prayer in queen Elizabeth's time; they did diſaſſent from the confirming of that law, which could not have been good, if they had been a third eſtate and diſaſſented.

"4. The king may hold his parliament without calling the biſhops at all to it, as hath been adjudged by all the judges of England, 7 Henry VIII. occaſioned by the convocation's citing one Dr. Standiſh, for ſpeaking of words againſt their power and privilege as they conceived: in that caſe all the judges of England, in the preſence of the king, declared, that the king might hold his parliament without calling them at all.

"So 25 Edward I. in reſpect the prelacy would not agree with the reſt of the kingdom in granting a reaſonable and neceſſary aid and ſupply, they were excluded in the parliament at Carliſle: and before that parliament an act paſſed againſt ſeveral oppreſſions of the abbots, priors, and biſhops upon the inferior clergy of the kingdom, by purveyance, and ſetting of high prices, etc. to be collected; and ſix or ſeven acts more, all to this purpoſe, concerning the carriage of the prelates to the inferior clergy; ſo that when themſelves were concerned they were excluded their votes.

"In all theſe records of the matter concerning the clergy the entry is, that the king, habito tractatu, etc. with the earls, the barons, and other the nobles, etc. hath agreed to this act; or, by the aſſent of the earls, barons, and other lay people; which ſhews that the biſhops did not conſent; for if they had, they ſhould have been firſt named before the earls and barons: for the order of naming the degrees of nobility in all ancient records, is prelates, earls, and barons.

"Thus 3 Richard II. there being proviſion the pope ſhould not make preſentation, etc. it is ſaid, that the petition of the commons was aſſented unto by the king and the lords temporal, and was always eſteemed a firm act of parliament, notwithſtanding the biſhops oppoſed the ſame."

This affair was carried no farther at that time, doubtleſs by reaſon of the obſtacles which occurred in the upper houſe where the biſhops gave their voices to decide whether they were to vote or not. But it was reſerved for another time[g].

The grievances being almoſt redreſſed, the parliament ſeemed to have little more to do. But the diſtruſt with regard to the king being very great, the leaders of the oppoſite party to the king believed, the redreſſing of paſt grievances was not ſufficient; they had a mind alſo to prevent the like for the future, by diſabling the king to abuſe his power. It can hardly be denied that this deſign was founded upon reaſons very plauſible, and apt to gain the conſent of thoſe who had only the welfare of their country in view: for if the king, whilſt he was inveſted with all the prerogatives allowed him by the law, had abuſed his power to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government; if he had purſued the execution of this deſign fifteen years together; if he had deſiſted but by a ſuperior force obliging him to call this parliament, how could it be thought that he would change his principles and maxims, if left in poſſeſſion of the ſame power which had ſerved him to execute his project? Now there were ſcarce any of the members of both houſes, I ſay even of thoſe who were moſt attached to the king, but what were convinced that the conſtitution had been greatly endangered of late years. See what the lord Clarendon ſays on this occaſion, in his Hiſtory of the Civil Wars:

"For the better ſupport of theſe extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and inſtruments who muſt be employed in them, and to diſcountenance and ſuppreſs all bold enquiries and oppoſers, the council-table and ſtar-chamber enlarge their juriſdictions to a vaſt extent. The council-table by proclamations, enjoining the people what was not enjoined by the law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited; and the ſtar-chamber cenſuring the breach and diſobedience to thoſe proclamations by very great fines and impriſonment; ſo that any diſreſpect to any acts of ſtate, or to the perſons of ſtateſmen, was in no time more penal; and thoſe foundations of right, by which men valued their ſecurity, to the apprehenſion and underſtanding of wiſe men, never more in danger to be deſtroyed."

If the perſons moſt devouted to the king, as was the earl Clarendon, had ſuch ſentiments, we may eaſily judge what others thought, and whether they had reaſon to believe that the redreſs of paſt grievances was a ſufficient ſecurity for the time to come.

But, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that there were in the parliament, men who were brooding ſecret deſigns againſt the government of the church, and that theſe men thought the diminution of the regal power was abſolutely neceſſary to the execution of their deſigns, knowing the king would ever oppoſe them, as long as he was cloathed with his uſual authority. But it cannot be inferred from their uſing the forementioned reaſons to inflame the parliament's diſtruſt of the king for a private end of their own, that therefore theſe reaſons were bad. On the contrary, we may venture to aſſert it was ſolely by the weight of theſe reaſons that the preſbyterians, whoſe number was inconſiderable in the parliament and kingdom, prevailed at laſt to perſuade the reſt of the parliament of the neceſſity to reſtrain the king's power. If theſe reaſons had not been capable of convincing the leaſt prejudiced minds, they would never have ſucceeded in cauſing the parliament to take the reſolutions that will hereafter appear. For what intereſt could the major part of the members of parliament have, to alter the conſtitution of church and ſtate, if the paſt had not afforded them a juſt occaſion to fear for the future?

From what has been ſaid there reſult two opinions, which have divided and ſtill do divide all England. The firſt aſcribes to the commons in general, and to ſeveral peers, the private end deſigned by the preſbyterians: the followers of this opinion will not allow that moſt of the members propoſed to themſelves a juſter end in all their proceedings againſt the king. Thoſe who embrace the ſecond opinion, refuſe alſo to admit of this diſtinction of ends and principles: they pretend that the oppoſite party to the king always acted upon motives of equity, juſtice, and love of their country. For my part I ſhall make no ſcruple to ſay, that I think both theſe opinions very groundleſs. I can never believe that the greateſt part of the members of this parliament, who, even by the confeſſion of the king's friends, had at firſt no deſire to make any alterations in the conſtitution of the church or ſtate, ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted by a ſmall number of other members, whoſe views and deſigns they were not ſo ignorant of, as to be wholly guided by their directions. Neither can I think that they ran into the project of ſubverting church and ſtate out of lazineſs, ignorance, ſtupidity, or that they fell into all the ſnares the others were pleaſed to lay for them, as the lord Clarendon inſinuates. I rather believe they weighed the reaſons which were to engage them to maintain the civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, with the danger of leaving it in its natural ſtate, and that this danger appeared to them ſo great, that, to prevent it, they reſolved to agree to the alterations intended by the preſbyterians.

On the other hand, I can as hardly believe that they who took ſo much care to cheriſh diſtruſt between the king and the parliament, who were always ready to give an ill turn to all the kings words and actions, who, inſtead of healing, inflamed the wound; that theſe men, I ſay, ſhould have in view only juſtice and the good of their country: eſpecially as they were ſeen to practice all methods to accompliſh their private end, I mean the change of the government of the church, in which the reſt of the parliament had no intereſt;

[g] July 9, it was propoſed by ſome of the commons, that the biſhops lands might be put into the hands of feoffees, nine of the laity and three of the clergy in every dioceſe; and the reſt of the lands belonging to deans, etc. to be employed for the advancement of learning, and the biſhops to have a liberal allowance during life. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 348.

nay,

nay, rather it would have been their intereſt to oppoſe it, had they not dreaded a greater miſchief.

If therefore a man blindly follows either of theſe two opinions, without any limitation, he will never be able to give a juſt notion of this parliament's conduct. It is as difficult to believe, that a whole parliament, or at leaſt the greateſt part of the members, may combine together to ſubvert the government of the church and ſtate, as it is to conceive that all theſe ſame members may have acted only upon diſintereſted motives, and with the ſole view of procuring the welfare of the ſtate in ſuch a juncture. This, however, is the error into which almoſt all the Engliſh hiſtorians have fallen. They have all embraced one or other of the two opinions, the ſpirit of party not ſuffering them fairly to conſider the ſeveral motives, on which the members of this parliament proceeded, and this has begot great obſcurity in all they have ſaid upon the ſubject. The trueſt and moſt probable hypotheſis, in my opinion, is briefly this:

The king had given great occaſions of complaint to his ſubjects, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign. It is no wonder, therefore, that he had made himſelf many enemies, who earneſtly wiſhed to have the government reſtored to its natural ſtate. Among theſe enemies, the preſbyterians, who beſides the common, had their private grievances, were the moſt eager. They deſired not only to diminiſh the king's power, that he might not be able to hurt them, but alſo to ſubvert the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, and eſtabliſh the preſbyterian government, in which they were ſupported by the Scots. The king being obliged to call this parliament againſt his will, there were few members but what were diſpoſed to redreſs paſt grievances, and prevent the like for the future. Even they who were not enemies to the king, were in this diſpoſition, and it may be affirmed, that this was the general ſentiment of the members at the beginning of the parliament. But even, among thoſe who deſired the redreſs of grievances, there were two different ſentiments. Some were for ſtopping at the redreſs of grievances, without proceeding any farther, believing, that would be ſufficient to hinder the king from attempting a ſecond time ſo unſucceſsful an enterprize. This was the king's ſentiment, as well as of many members of both houſes. Others were not only for redreſſing grievances, but alſo for taking proper meaſures to prevent the like miſchiefs for the future. The preſbyterians were of this number; but they had alſo more extenſive views, and more hidden deſigns, namely, to introduce the preſbyterian government into the church. To accompliſh that end, it was neceſſary to deprive the king of a power, which they foreſaw he would not fail to exert, in oppoſition to their deſign; and there was no better way than by cheriſhing the parliament's diſtruſt, to which the members, for the moſt part, were already but too much inclined. They had therefore only to gain a ſufficient number of thoſe, who were willing to ſtop at the redreſs of grievances, and nothing was more proper to obtain their concurrence than to fill them with fears and ſuſpicions. This was the reaſon that ſuch care was taken to aggravate the plot for ſeducing the army, to dwell continually upon the pretended deſign of bringing them to London, to ſpread a report, that a French army was going to land and ſeize Portſmouth with the king's conſent, and I know not how many other rumours, equally improbable. This was the cauſe of ſo many efforts to exclude the biſhops from the upper-houſe, in order to leſſen, as much as poſſible the party of thoſe who were for ſtopping at the redreſs of grievances. This likewiſe was the reaſon, that ſo many mortifications were given the king, to induce him to take ſome meaſures, which ſhould give an advantage againſt him, and be apt to convince the more moderate, that it was dangerous to leave him in poſſeſſion of his whole power. It is not therefore very ſtrange, that many of thoſe who were againſt carrying things to extremities, ſhould in the end be prevailed on, by the fears and ſuſpicions they were continually inſpired with. To confirm themſelves in their ſentiment, they had no other ground than their confidence in the king's word, againſt which there were unanſwerable objections, as for inſtance, the violation of the petition of right.

By theſe direct and indirect means, the preſbyterians at length ſucceeded in gaining a ſufficient number of votes to give them the ſuperiority in the houſe of commons, at leaſt, as to the deſign of diminiſhing the king's power. When this party was grown ſuperior, their oppoſers endeavoured in vain to curb their fury. On the other hand, the king himſelf fell into the ſnares laid for him, and took meaſures, which, as will hereafter appear, made him loſe a great number of thoſe who had hitherto appeared the moſt moderate. The following paſſage of the lord Clarendon's hiſtory, will ſerve to illuſtrate this matter.

"I know not how theſe men have already anſwered it to their own conſciences, who having aſſumed their country's truſt, and it may be, with great earneſtneſs laboured to procure that truſt, by their ſupine lazineſs, negligence, and abſence, were the firſt inlets to thoſe inundations; and ſo contributed to thoſe licences which have overwhelmed us. For by this means a handful of men, much inferior in the beginning, in number and intereſt, came to give laws to the major part; and to ſhew that three diligent perſons are really a greater and more ſignificant number than ten unconcerned, they, by plurality of voices, in the end, converted or reduced the whole body to their opinions. It is true, men of activity and faction in any deſign, have many advantages that a compoſed and ſettled council, though induſtrious enough, uſually have not; and ſome that gallant men cannot give themſelves leave to entertain, even for the prevention of all the miſchief the others intend."

The earl of Clarendon grants, that a handful of men, at firſt much inferior in number and credit, converted in the end the whole houſe to their opinions. But as he was a zealous advocate for the king, he took care not to aſcribe the ſucceſs of this handful of men, to the weight of the reaſons which they alleged to the others to reduce them to their ſentiments. It was requiſite, however, to give ſome reaſon of it, and he found no better, than the lazineſs, negligence, and unconcernedneſs of the king's friends, and the vigilance of the others. I do not know whether this reaſon will be capable to ſatisfy the impartial.

This, as I verily believe, is the true hypotheſis which ought to be eſtabliſhed, in order to give a clear idea of the conduct of this parliament; and I hope this digreſſion will not be unſerviceable for the better underſtanding of the ſequel.

The parliament ſeemed to have nothing more to do, all the grievances being in a manner redreſſed, and the armies diſbanded. But after what has been ſaid, it will not doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that the houſe of commons ſhould order the committee, which at the beginning of the parliament, was charged with preparing a remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, to reſume and finiſh that work. Nothing would have been more needleſs than ſuch a remonſtrance, after the grievances were redreſſed, if it had not been intended on purpoſe to quarrel with the king, and afford a pretence to defer to another time the ſettling his revenues, which was the only thing that remained to be done, and which the king expected. I have already obſerved, there was a party in the parliament, who meant not to ſtop at the redreſs of grievances. It was this party that cauſed the remonſtrance to be reſumed, in expectation the king would be diſpleaſed with it, and take ſome ſtep that ſhould promote the execution of their project.

But whilſt this remonſtrance was preparing, an affair of ſuch conſequence unexpectedly happened, that the commons were obliged for a time to lay aſide all other buſineſs. I mean the Iriſh rebellion, the news whereof came to London the 1ſt of November 1641.

Since the end of queen Elizabeth's reign, when Tir-Owen's rebellion was happily quelled, the Iriſh had lived peaceably under the dominion of James I. and Charles I. Not but that the lords deputies had always an eye over them, conſidering them as men, whoſe fidelity was very ſuſpicious: however, they had at leaſt no occaſion to complain, that they were worſe uſed than in the former reigns. As to their religion, it is eaſy to imagine, they had ſuffered no new troubles under theſe two princes, who thought of nothing leſs, than of perſecuting the catholics. Nevertheleſs, in March or April this year 1641, the Iriſh formed the project of caſting off the Engliſh yoke, of ſeizing upon all the fortified places, and of cutting the throats of all the Engliſh throughout the whole kingdom. The day appointed for executing this bloody deſign, was the 23d of October, on which day, they were to riſe all over the iſland. The deſign was really executed, as projected, and it is ſaid, on that and the following days, above forty thouſand Engliſh proteſtants were maſſacred by the Iriſh. But the project of ſeizing the ſame day upon the caſtle of Dublin, where was a great magazine of proviſions and ſtores, was diſcovered by Owen O'Conally, the night before, and prevented by the diligence of the lords juſtices of Ireland, who governed in the abſence of Robert Sidney, earl of Leiceſter, who had been appointed lord-lieutenant ſome months before, and was yet in England.

This news being communicated to the commons by the lords of the privy-council, filled the houſe with conſternation and terror, and at the ſame time with indignation againſt the rebels. They immediately turned themſelves into a grand committee, and paſſed the following reſolves:

That 50,000l. ſhall be forthwith provided for the ſervice of Ireland.

That a conference be had with the lords to move them, that a ſelect committee of the members of both houſes may be appointed to go to the city of London, and propoſe unto them the loan of that ſum.

That a ſelect committee of both houſes may be named to conſider of the affairs of Ireland, and of the ſending of men and ammunition from hence into that kingdom.

That Owen O'Conally, who diſcovered this great treaſon in Ireland ſhall have 500l. preſently paid him, and 200l. per annum penſion, until proviſion be made for an inheritance of greater value.

That the cuſtody of the Iſle of Wight be taken for the preſent from the lord Weſton, ſuſpected of being a catholic, and ſequeſtered into another hand.

That the perſons of papiſts of quality in the ſeveral counties of this kingdom, where ever they reſide, may be ſecured.

That the lords be deſired to join concerning the diſſolution of the houſe of Capuchins, and the ſpeedy ſending them away, according to the former deſires of this houſe.

That the embaſſadors may be ſent to from both houſes to deliver up ſuch prieſts of the king's ſubjects as are in their houſes.

That a liſt be brought in of the queen's prieſts, and other her ſervants.

That a proclamation be iſſued forth, commanding all ſtrangers that are not of the proteſtant religion, to deliver in tickets of their names, and an account of their ſtay here, within two days after the iſſuing forth of the ſaid proclamation, or elſe to depart the kingdom forthwith, &c.

The lords agreed to the propoſed loan, and named ſome of their members to form a committee of both houſes. Whereupon the commons appointed fifty-two to meet the lords, and to be a ſtanding committee for the affairs of Ireland.

Two days after the commons voted again,

That the houſe holds fit that 20,000l. be forthwith ſupplied for the preſent occaſions of Ireland.

That a convenient number of ſhips ſhall be provided for the guarding of the ſea-coaſt of Ireland.

That ſix thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe ſhall be raiſed with all convenient ſpeed for the preſent expedition into Ireland. And that the lord-lieutenant ſhall preſent to both houſes of parliament, ſuch officers as he ſhall think fit to ſend into Ireland, to command any forces to be tranſported thither.

That the magazines of victuals ſhall be forthwith provided at Weſt-Cheſter, to be ſent over to Dublin, as the occaſions of that kingdom ſhall require.

That the magazines of arms, ammunition, powder, now in Carliſle, ſhall be forthwith ſent over to Knockfergus in Ireland.

That it be referred to the king's council to conſider of ſome fit way, and to preſent it to the houſe, for a publication to be made of rewards to be given to ſuch as ſhall do ſervice in this expedition into Ireland, and for a pardon of ſuch of the rebels as ſhall come in by a time limited, and of a ſum of money to be appointed for a reward of ſuch as ſhall bring in the heads of ſuch principal rebels as ſhall be nominated.

That letters ſhall be forthwith ſent to the juſtices in Ireland, to acquaint them how ſenſible this houſe is of the affairs of Ireland.

That the committee of Iriſh affairs ſhall conſider how, and in what manner this kingdom ſhall make uſe of the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Scotland in the buſineſs of Ireland.

That directions ſhall be given for the drawing of a bill for the preſſing of men, for this particular of Ireland.

Some days after both houſes publiſhed a declaration, to acquaint the public that they had reſolved to aſſiſt the king with all their power to reduce the Iriſh rebels.

The king, who was ſtill in Scotland, had received intelligence of what had paſſed in the north of Ireland [h], but did not know that the Iriſh had miſcarried in their deſign upon the caſtle of Dublin. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the parliament of Scotland, and demanded their aſſiſtance. The parliament replied, "That Ireland being dependent on the crown of England, and his majeſty having already writ to the parliament of England, and ſent to Ireland for farther information, no other courſe could be taken, and the rather as the parliament of England might conceive jealouſies; but that after fuller information, if the Engliſh ſhould think the aſſiſtance of Scotland neceſſary, it ſhould be ready, as ſoon as England."

The rebellion daily increaſed. The Engliſh themſelves of the Pale joined with the Iriſh, having pretended for ſome time to be attached to the intereſt of England. Theſe Engliſh of the Pale were deſcendants of the ancient conquerors of Ireland, who ſettled there in the reign of Henry II. and who at the time of the reformation continued in the Roman catholic religion. It was therefore neceſſary to ſend a ſtrong force into Ireland to reduce the rebels to obedience. And yet, though the letters from the lords juſtices for aſſiſtance were frequent and preſſing, though the rebels continually increaſed in number and ſtrength, though the king moſt earneſtly preſſed both houſes to ſend men, money, and ammunition to Ireland, though the parliament ſhewed an extreme deſire to reduce that kingdom, it is certain that the ſuccours ſent thither, were but ſmall and fitter to continue than end the war. It would doubtleſs be thought ſtrange to ſee ſo much ardour in words, and ſo little deſire to ſhew it in deeds, if the reaſons of this conduct was not known. And therefore it will be requiſite to explain it.

The diſpoſition of the houſe of commons, whilſt the king was in Scotland has been before ſhewn. A reſolution was taken to diveſt him of part of his power. The views of ſome were only to hinder him from abuſing it for the future. Others added to this motive, the deſign of rendering him unable to oppoſe the change they were meditating, with reſpect to the government of the church. The order of the houſe to the committee to prepare the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, was a clear evidence, they had ſome ſecret deſign which would ſhew itſelf in due time. Whilſt meaſures are taking to execute this deſign, the Iriſh riſe in rebellion, at a time when they ſeemed to have the leaſt reaſon, ſince the government had never been more gentle to them than in the preſent reign. They maſſacre in cold blood above forty thouſand Engliſh proteſtants [i], and unfortunately for the king, ſpread a report that they had his authority for what they did. They call themſelves the queen's army, and diſperſe all over the kingdom copies of a ſuppoſed commiſſion, under the great ſeal, which they pretend to have from the king to authorize them to take up arms. It cannot be denied that all this was capable of making impreſſions on the minds of thoſe who were already ill-affected to the king, and believed him capable of any thing to avoid the ſervitude that was preparing for him. Indeed, the ſober and moſt conſiderate did not think it poſſible, or even probable, that the king ſhould be willing to have his proteſtant ſubjects of Ireland maſſacred. But they ſuſpected however, that this rebellion, raiſed at ſuch a juncture, was not wholly owing to the diſcontent of the Iriſh, and that very poſſibly the king had excited it, to find the parliament employment, and divert them from the project they had formed. As to the maſſacre of the proteſtants, they did not believe the king had any hand in it, but imagined it very poſſible, that after raiſing the rebellion, it was not in his power to reſtrain the Iriſh. The king on his part, not knowing what was ſaid againſt him in England, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to clear himſelf from this black imputation, by preſſing the parliament to ſend a ſpeedy aid into Ireland. But theſe ſolicitations had a quite contrary effect, becauſe it was believed that his aim was to leave England unprovided with troops, and to engage the parliament in an Iriſh war, which muſt have been very expenſive. This was the reaſon that the commons proceeded with deliberation, and ſent but inconſiderable ſuccours into Ireland, being apprehenſive, the Iriſh rebellion was a ſnare laid for them by the king, to cauſe them to conſume the Engliſh troops and money.

As ſeveral have ſpoken of this pretended commiſſion from the king to the papiſts of Ireland to authorize them to take up arms, and as ſome have repreſented it as true, others as doubtful, but moſt as an evident forgery, I thought it would not be unacceptable to inſert it. I ſhall add a circular letter ſent with the copy of the pretended commiſſion from the leaders of the rebels, to thoſe of their party.

[h] The lords juſtices ſent him an account of it, by ſir Henry Spotiſwood, who went by ſea directly to Scotland; but, before that, the king received notice of it by a letter from the lord Chicheſter, from Belfaſt, dated October 24. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 407.

[i] Above one hundred and fifty-four thouſand proteſtants, were maſſacred in that kingdom, from the 23d of October 1641, to the 1ſt of March following, according to the computation of the prieſts themſelves that were preſent. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 355, 734. But, according to ſir J. Temple, there were, ſince the rebellion firſt broke out, unto the ceſſation made September 13, 1643, above three hundred thouſand Britiſh and proteſtants cruelly murdered in cold blood, deſtroyed ſome other way, or expelled out of their habitations. Iriſh Rebel. p. 6. See Cox, p. 73.—It ſeems cardinal Richlieu was deeply concerned in this maſſacre. See R. Coke, tom. I. p. 340. and tom. II. p. 5.

"From our camp at the Newry, this 4th of November, 1641.

"Phelim O'Neal, Rory Mac Guire, &c. [k]

"To all catholics of the Roman party, both Engliſh and Iriſh, within the kingdom of Ireland, we wiſh all happineſs, freedom of conſcience, and victory over the Engliſh heretics, who have for a long time tyrannized over our bodies, and uſurped by extortion our eſtates."

"BE it hereby made known unto you all, our friends and countrymen, that the king's moſt excellent majeſty, for many great and urgent cauſes thereunto moving, repoſing truſt and confidence in our fidelity, has ſignified unto us, by his commiſſion under the great ſeal of Scotland, bearing date at Edinburgh the firſt day of this inſtant October 1641, and alſo by letters under his ſign manual, bearing date with the ſaid commiſſion, of divers great and heinous affronts, that the Engliſh proteſtants, eſpecially the parliament there, have publiſhed againſt his royal perſon and prerogative, and alſo againſt our catholic friends, within the kingdom of England; the copy of which commiſſion we have here ſent unto you to be publiſhed with all ſpeed in all parts of this kingdom, that you may be aſſured of our ſufficient warrant and authority herein, viz.

"CHARLES by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To all catholic ſubjects within our kingdom of Ireland, greeting. Know you that we for the ſafe-guard and preſervation of our perſon, have been forced to make our abode and reſidence in our kingdom of Scotland, for a long ſeaſon, occaſioned by reaſon of the obſtinate and diſobedient carriage of our parliament of England againſt us, who have not only preſumed to take upon them the government, and diſpoſing of thoſe princely rights and prerogatives that have juſtly deſcended unto us from our predeceſſors, both kings and queens of the ſaid kingdom, for many hundred years paſt, but alſo have poſſeſſed themſelves of the whole ſtrength of the ſaid kingdom, in appointing governors, commanders, officers, in all parts and places therein, at their own will and pleaſure without our conſent; whereby we are deprived of our ſovereignty, and left naked without defence: and for as much as we are in ourſelves very ſenſible, that theſe ſtorms blow aloft, and are very likely to be carried by the vehemency of the proteſtant party into our kingdom of Ireland, and endanger our royal power and authority there alſo; know ye therefore, that we, repoſing much care and truſt in your duty and obedience, which we have for many years paſt found, do hereby give unto you full power and authority to aſſemble and meet together, with all the ſpeed and diligence that a buſineſs of ſo great a conſequence doth require, and to adviſe and conſult together by a ſufficient and diſcreet number, at all times, days, and places, which you ſhall in your judgment hold moſt convenient and material for the ordering, ſettling, and effecting of this great work, mentioned and directed to you in our letters, and to uſe all politic ways and means poſſible to poſſeſs yourſelves, for our uſe and ſafety, of all the forts, caſtles, and places of ſtrength and defence within the ſaid kingdom, except the places, perſons and eſtates of our loyal and loving ſubjects the Scots: and alſo to arreſt and ſeize the goods, eſtates, and perſons, of all the Engliſh proteſtants within the ſaid kingdom to our uſe; and in your care and ſpeedy performance of this our will and pleaſure, we ſhall perceive your wonted duty and allegiance unto us, which we ſhall acknowledge and reward in due time.

"Witneſs ourſelf at Edinburgh, the 1ſt day of October, in the 17th year of our reign."

Though for many reaſons it be more than probable that the king never granted a commiſſion to the Iriſh to take up arms, it is however certain they boaſted of having ſuch a thing. But it is no leſs certain, that it cannot be the ſame with what has been juſt read, nor can this be the commiſſion publiſhed by the leaders of the Iriſh rebels. My reaſon is, becauſe in this commiſſion, the king is made to ſay things which happened not till ſeveral months after the day of the date, and which thoſe who are ſuppoſed to have publiſhed it the 4th of November could not foreſee. The king is made to ſay on the 1ſt of October 1641, that the parliament had poſſeſſed themſelves of his ſovereignty, and appointed governors, commanders and officers, in all places, which certainly was not done before the month of October 1641. It muſt be therefore that Ruſhworth, who has inſerted this commiſſion in his Collections, had bad memoirs and little judgment, not to ſee in this pretended commiſſion of the 1ſt of October 1641, things which happened not till the next year 1642. However it is true, the Iriſh boaſted of having the king's commiſſion. But it is pretended they forged it themſelves, and faſtened to it an impreſſion of the great ſeal, taken from ſome grant or patent [l].

Be this as it will, the pretenſion of the Iriſh that they had the king's and queen's authority, was of very ill-conſequence to the king. There were but too many who had an ill opinion of his zeal for the proteſtant religion, and thought him capable of being induced by the queen's ſolicitations to reſtore the catholic religion in England. The former parliaments had diſcovered their ſuſpicions, and the king inſtead of undeceiving them, had given them words only, which were followed with no effects. When therefore the news came, that the Iriſh papiſts were in arms and had maſſacred the proteſtants, it was very natural to dread the like plot in England, which could not but be extremely prejudicial to the king. Though the parliament did not ſeem to regard much the calumny ſpread againſt the king, they were however full of diſtruſt, and this diſtruſt made them think it not proper to leave England without troops, money, and amunition, in order to aſſiſt Ireland, leſt England ſhould be unprovided, in caſe the ſame plot was contrived there. Nay, it was the intereſt of the leading men in the parliament to feign a greater diſtruſt than they really had, to ſtrengthen the ſuſpicions and fears of ſuch members as were not fully perſuaded. This ſerved to convince them how neceſſary it was to retrench the king's power, and render him uncapable to execute his deſigns.

But though the party of thoſe who were for leſſening the regal power was numerous in the parliament, they were not yet in condition to proceed as they pleaſed. Matters were to be prepared by degrees, one while by cheriſhing ſuſpicions and fears, another while by engaging the houſe to keep proper ſteps to lead them to their end, which was not known to all the members.

With this view it was, that under colour of thanking the Scots for their promiſed aſſiſtance to ſuppreſs the rebellion in Ireland, and of treating with them about it, they engaged the houſe to ſend to the committee in Scotland new inſtructions very mortifying to the king. The houſe ſaid, in theſe inſtructions.

"That they had juſt cauſe to believe, that the conſpiracies and commotions in Ireland, were but the effect of the counſels of thoſe who continued in credit, authority and employment about his majeſty; therefore they feared that the great aids which ſhould be raiſed for ſubduing the rebellion in Ireland, would be applied to the fomenting of it there, and encouraging ſome ſuch like attempt in England. And therefore the commons beſought his majeſty to change thoſe councils, from which ſuch ill courſes had proceeded, and to employ ſuch miniſters as ſhould be approved of by his parliament, who were his greateſt and moſt faithful council. But if his majeſty did not condeſcend to their ſupplications, they ſhould be forced to reſolve upon ſome way of defending Ireland from the rebels, and of ſecuring themſelves from miſchievous counſels and deſigns; and command thoſe aids and contributions which ſhould be raiſed for the reducing of Ireland to the cuſtody and diſpoſing of ſuch perſons of honour and fidelity, as they had cauſe to confide in."

Theſe inſtructions conclude with the following article:

"You ſhall repreſent to his moſt excellent majeſty this our humble and faithful declaration, that we cannot without much grief remember the great miſeries, burthens, and diſtempers, which have for divers years afflicted all his kingdoms and dominions, and brought them to the laſt point of ruin and deſtruction; all which have iſſued from the cunning, falſe and malicious practices of ſome of thoſe who

II. p. 529.——To theſe reaſons to prove the forgery of this commiſſion, may be added another, which ſeems demonſtrative. The commiſſion is ſuppoſed to be under the great ſeal of Scotland, and yet in the enumeration of the king's titles, England is named before Scotland, which doubtleſs, never was done in any writings, publiſhed by authority in that kingdom. Before the late union in queen Anne's reign, the king's conſtant title in all the Scotch public acts was of Scotland, England, &c. king. This obſervation was communicated by Mr. Arbuckle of Dublin. —Ruſhworth obſerves that the words of the commiſſion are enough to ſhew the villainous practice of the authors, and its bare recital a ſufficient refutation and detection of the unparallelled forgery. have been admitted into very near places of counſel and authority about him, who have been favourers of popery, ſuperſtition and innovation; ſubverters of religion, honour, and juſtice; factors for promoting the deſigns of foreign princes and ſtates, to the great apparent danger of his royal perſon, crown, and dignity, and of all his people; authors of falſe ſcandalous jealouſies betwixt his majeſty and his loyal ſubjects; enemies to the peace, union and confidence betwixt him and his parliament, which is the ſureſt foundation of proſperity and greatneſs to his majeſty, of comfort and hope to them: that by their counſels and endeavours, thoſe great ſums which have been lately drawn from the people, have been either conſumed unprofitably, or in the maintenance of ſuch deſigns as have been miſchievous and deſtructive to the ſtate; and whilſt we have been labouring to ſupport his majeſty, to purge out the corruption, and reſtore the decays both of church and ſtate, others of their faction and party have been contriving by violence and force to ſuppreſs the liberty of parliament[m], and endanger the ſafety of thoſe who have oppoſed ſuch wicked and pernicious courſes."

This was properly a preparative to the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, which was to be brought into the houſe the firſt opportunity, and which was indeed read the 22d of November. It met with ſo ſtrong an oppoſition, that the debates laſted from three in the afternoon till three in the morning[n]. Many thought it needleſs to reproach the king with grievances, to the redreſs whereof he had without ſolicitation given a full conſent, and that beſides the uſeleſſneſs of the remonſtrance, it would ſerve only to open old wounds, to which a cure had been applied, and infallibly make the breach wider between the king and the parliament. But this very reaſon was preciſely that which excited the others to cauſe the remonſtrance to be approved, becauſe they wanted a diſſention between the king and the parliament, in order to obtain the conſent of both houſes to the diminution of the regal power. I do not pretend to determine whether the deſign of diſabling the king to govern for the future as he had done during fifteen years, was in itſelf juſt or neceſſary for the welfare of the kingdom. But it can hardly be denied that the reaſons by which it was ſupported were very plauſible. I will not affirm that they who formed it or preſſed the execution had only in view their country's good; as on the other hand, I do not ſee what ſecurity they could have, who were leaving the king in poſſeſſion of the ſame power he had before enjoyed. However this be, the remonſtrance was as a ſort of criterion which was to ſhew which of the two parties ſhould prevail, and withal to decide, in ſome meaſure the fate of the king's affairs. In ſhort, after a debate of twelve hours, it was carried by a plurality of nine voices only that the remonſtrance ſhould be preſented to his majeſty. The lord Clarendon ſays, "It was carried by the hour of the night, which drove away a greater number of old and infirm oppoſers than would have made thoſe of the negative ſuperior in number." But this reaſon to me appears weak. For it might be alleged to ſhew the remonſtrance would have paſſed by more than nine voices, if ſeveral of thoſe who were for it had not left the houſe. For how could infirmity or fatigue produce a greater effect upon one party than upon the other[o]?

This reſolution was no ſooner taken but Mr. Hampden, who was of the victorious party, moved for the immediate printing of the remonſtrance, not thinking it neceſſary to communicate it to the lords, ſince it ran only in the name of the commons. His deſign was, that it ſhould be diſperſed among the people to excite them againſt the king, which was alſo the intention of his whole party. This motion, which was contrary to cuſtom, ſince the remonſtrance ſhould have been at leaſt preſented to the king, before the publication was deliberated, produced a violent debate in the houſe, every one plainly perceiving the conſequence. But at laſt, the ſame party that prevailed in the firſt, prevailed likewiſe in the ſecond queſtion, and the remonſtrance was ordered to be printed. Some of the oppoſers offered to enter a proteſtation againſt it, but as it was not the cuſtom of the houſe to admit of proteſtations, Mr. Palmer, who firſt cried, "I do proteſt," was ſent to the Tower, but was releaſed within a few days, and took his place again in the houſe.

Three days after, namely, the 25th of November, the king being returned from Scotland[p], paſſed through the city of London, and dined at Guildhall. He was received in his capital with the ſame demonſtrations of joy, reſpect and ſubmiſſion as were given on the like occaſions to his moſt popular predeceſſors; and had all reaſon to be pleaſed with the manner wherein every one ſtrove to do him honour. But the ſatisfaction he received from theſe public demonſtrations of the affection of the Londoners, laſted not long.

As ſoon as the king came to Whitehall, the earl of Eſſex ſurrendered his commiſſion of captain general of the ſouth part of the kingdom into his hands; and the next day, the king diſmiſſed the guards given by the earl to both houſes at their requeſt. The commons appeared diſpleaſed at it, and deſired the lords to concur with them in petitioning the king, that the guards might be continued till they had ſatisfied his majeſty of the reaſons, why a guard was neceſſary. The lords conſented to it, and the earl of Warwick and the lord Digby were ordered to move his majeſty accordingly, but they could not prevail. The king anſwered, he ſaw no reaſon to continue the guard; but however, he would command the earl of Dorſet, to appoint ſome of the train-bands, only for a few days to wait on both houſes, and if in that time he ſhould be ſatisfied there was juſt reaſon, he would continue them. He perceived, that the aim of thoſe who deſired the continuance of the guards, was only to cheriſh the fears and ſuſpicions of the people. Upon this anſwer, the commons preſented a memorial to the king, containing the reaſons why they deſired a guard, adding, they would not have it under the command of any perſon not choſen by themſelves. But as their reaſons were founded upon very improbable ſuppoſitions, they were ineffectual.

The commons inſiſted no farther on this ſubject, but within a few days, ſent a committee, to preſent to the king, then at Hampton-court, the remonſtrance with a petition. This was, as it were, the alarm of the diſcord between the king and the parliament, as his enemies had plainly foreſeen. I think it neceſſary to inſert here what paſſed with reſpect to this remonſtrance, which was attended with ſuch conſequences, the report of the committee ſent to the king, the petition of the houſe, with the remonſtrance itſelf, on which I ſhall make ſome remarks, to enable the reader to judge of what is juſt and true, and what diſguiſed or aggravated.

"Sir Ralph Hopton's report to the houſe of commons, of what paſſed at his preſenting the petition and remonſtrance to the king, Dec. 1. 1641.

"HE ſaid, that the laſt night, in the evening, he, and thoſe that accompanied him, came into Hampton-court, where meeting with ſir Richard Wynn, he went in to his majeſty, and gave him notice of our being there; and within a quarter of an hour, the king ſent a gentleman uſher to call us in, with directions for none to come in but ourſelves; whereupon I did according to your order, and the reſt with me, upon our knees, preſent the petition and remonſtrance, and begun to read it kneeling, but his majeſty would not permit that, but commanded us all to riſe, and ſo I read it.

"The firſt thing that his majeſty ſpoke at the reading thereof, was to that part of the petition, that charges a malignant party to be about his majeſty, with a deſign to change religion; to which his majeſty with a hearty fervency ſaid, 'The devil take him, whoſoever he be, that has a deſign to change religion.' Then I proceeded to read on; and when I came to that part of the remonſtrance, of reſerving the lands of the rebels in Ireland toward the ſuppreſſing them: his majeſty ſpake and ſaid, 'We muſt not diſpoſe of the bear-ſkin, till the bear be dead.'

"After the petition was read, his majeſty ſaid, he deſired to aſk us ſome queſtions: but I anſwered, we had no power to ſpeak to any thing, but wherein we had commiſſion; then ſaid his majeſty, doth the houſe intend to publiſh this declaration? We ſaid, we could not anſwer to it: 'Well then, ſaid his majeſty, I ſuppoſe you do not expect a preſent anſwer to ſo long a petition; but this let me tell you, I have left Scotland well in peace; they are well ſatisfied with me, and I with them; and though I ſtaid longer than I expected,

I think if I had not gone, you had not been ſo ſoon rid of the army: I ſhall give you an anſwer to this buſineſs, with as much ſpeed as the weight thereof will permit.' And ſo was pleaſed to give us his hand to kiſs; and thereupon we took our leave, and afterwards Mr. Comptroller came to us with this meſſage, that the king deſired there ſhould be no publiſhing of this declaration, till we had received his anſwer: we were all that night treated by Mr. Comptroller at ſupper, and entertained with great reſpect, and lodged by the king's harbinger."

"The petition of the houſe of commons, which accompanied the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, when it was preſented to his majeſty at Hampton-Court. Dec. 1. 1641.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"YOUR majeſty's moſt humble and faithful ſubjects, the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, do, with much thankfulneſs and joy, acknowledge, the great mercy and favour of God, in giving your majeſty a ſafe and peaceable return out of Scotland, into your kingdom of England, where the preſſing dangers and diſtempers of the ſtate, have cauſed us with much earneſtneſs to deſire the comfort of your gracious preſence, and likewiſe the unity and juſtice of our royal authority, to give more life and power to the dutiful and loyal counſels and endeavours of your parliament, for the prevention of that imminent ruin and deſtruction wherein your kingdoms of England and Scotland are threatened. The duty which we owe to your majeſty, and our country, cannot but make us very ſenſible and apprehenſive, that the multiplicity, ſharpneſs, and malignity of thoſe evils under which we have now many years ſuffered, are fomented and cheriſhed by a corrupt and ill-affected party, who amongſt other their miſchievous devices for the alteration of religion and government, have ſought by many falſe ſcandals and imputations, cunningly inſinuated and diſperſed among the people, to blemiſh and diſgrace our proceedings in this parliament, and to get themſelves a party and faction amongſt your ſubjects, for the better ſtrengthening themſelves in their wicked courſes, and hindering thoſe proviſions and remedies, which might, by the wiſdom of your majeſty, and counſel of your parliament, be oppoſed againſt them.

"For preventing whereof, and the better information of your majeſty, your peers, and all other your loyal ſubjects, we have been neceſſitated to make a declaration of the ſtate of the kingdom, both before and ſince the aſſembly of this parliament, unto this time, which we do humbly preſent to your majeſty, without the leaſt intention to lay any blemiſh upon your royal perſon, but only to repreſent how your royal authority and truſt have been abuſed, to the great prejudice and danger of your majeſty, and all your good ſubjects. (1.)

Remark (1.) The deſign of this declaration or remonſtrance was not to inform the king, as the commons aſſured him, but ſolely to make their apology, and exaſperate the people againſt him. Firſt, the remonſtrance is not directed to the king, and he is always mentioned in the third perſon. Secondly, the commons voted that the remonſtrance ſhould be printed, before they had received any anſwer from the king, and publiſhed it againſt his will. So what they ſay at the cloſe of this article is all a flouriſh, without one word of truth.

"And becauſe we have reaſon to believe, that thoſe malignant parties, whoſe proceeding evidently appear to be mainly for the advantage and increaſe of popery, are compoſed, ſet up and acted by the ſubtile practice of the jeſuits, and other engineers and factors for Rome; and to the great danger of this kingdom, and moſt grievous affliction of your loyal ſubjects, have ſo far prevailed, as to corrupt divers of your biſhops and others in prime places of the church, (2.) and alſo to bring divers of theſe inſtruments to be of your privy-council, (3.) and other employments of truſt and nearneſs about your majeſty, the prince, and the reſt of your royal children.

Rem. (2.) The commons pointed at Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, Neil[9] biſhop of Wincheſter, Wren biſhop of Ely, Cofins dean of Peterborough.

Rem. (3.) As Windebank ſecretary of ſtate, and ſome others.

"And by this means have had ſuch an operation in your council, and the moſt important affairs and proceedings of your government, that a moſt dangerous diviſion, and chargeable preparation for war betwixt your kingdoms of England and Scotland, the increaſe of jealouſies betwixt your majeſty and your moſt obedient ſubjects, the violent diſtraction and interruption of this parliament, the inſurrection of the papiſts in your kingdom of Ireland, and bloody maſſacre of your people, have been not only endeavoured and attempted, but in a great meaſure compaſſed and effected.

"For preventing the final accompliſhment whereof, your poor ſubjects are enforced to engage their perſons and eſtates, to the maintaining of a very expenceful and dangerous war, notwithſtanding they have already, ſince the beginning of this parliament, undergone the charge of 150,000l. ſterling, or thereabouts, for the neceſſary ſupport and ſupply of your majeſty in theſe preſent and perilous deſigns. And becauſe all our moſt faithful endeavours and engagments will be ineffectual for the peace, ſafety, and preſervation of your majeſty and your people, if ſome preſent real, and effectual courſe be not taken for ſuppreſſing this wicked and malignant party.

"We your majeſty's moſt humble and obedient ſubjects, do with all faithfulneſs and humility beſeech your majeſty, 1. That you would be graciouſly pleaſed to concur with the humble deſires of your people in a parliamentary way, (4.) for the preſerving the peace and ſafety of the kingdom from the malicious deſigns of the popiſh party.

Rem. (4.) That is to ſay, by conſenting to the bills which ſhould be preſented to him.

"For depriving the biſhops of their votes in parliament (5.) and abridging their immoderate power uſurped over the clergy, and other your good ſubjects, which they have perniciouſly abuſed, to the hazard of religion, and great prejudice and oppreſſion of the laws of the kingdom, and juſt liberty of your people.

Rem. (5.) The commons were not ſatisfied with deſiring that the biſhops, whom they ſuppoſed guilty of the deſign to countenance popery, ſhould be puniſhed, but took occaſion from thence to inflict a penalty on the whole bench, by depriving them of the privilege of ſitting in parliament.

"For the taking away ſuch oppreſſions in religion, church government and diſcipline, as have been brought in and fomented by them. For uniting all ſuch your loyal ſubjects together, as join in the ſame fundamental truths againſt the papiſts, by removing ſome oppreſſions and unneceſſary ceremonies, by which divers weak conſciences have been ſcrupled, and ſeem to be divided from the reſt, (6.) and for the due execution of thoſe good laws, which have been made for ſecuring the liberty of your ſubjects.

Rem. (6.) The meaning of which was, in the language of the commons or of their leaders, that he ſhould aboliſh the hierarchy and book of Common-Prayer: but they did not yet dare to ſpeak out, and therefore covered their intention under this expreſſion, "By removing unneceſſary ceremonies."

"2. That your majeſty will likewiſe be pleaſed to remove from your council, all ſuch as perſiſt to favour and promote any of thoſe preſſures and corruptions wherewith your people have been grieved; and that for the future, your majeſty will vouchſafe to employ ſuch perſons in your great and public affairs, and to take ſuch to be in your places of truſt, as your parliament may have cauſe to confide in; that in your princely goodneſs to your people, you will reject and refuſe all mediation and ſolicitation to the contrary, how powerful and near ſoever. (7.)

Rem. (7.) Meaning the queen.

"That you will be pleaſed to forbear to alienate any of the forfeited and eſcheated lands in Ireland, which ſhall accrew to your crown by reaſon of this rebellion; that out of them the crown may be the better ſupported, and ſome ſatisfaction made to your ſubjects of this kingdom, for the great expences they are like to undergo in this war.

"Which humble deſires of ours being graciouſly fulfilled by your majeſty, we will, by the bleſſing and favour of God, moſt chearfully undergo the hazard and expences of this war, and apply ourſelves to ſuch other courſes and counſels, as may ſupport your royal eſtate with honour and plenty at home, with power and reputation abroad, and by our loyal affections, obedience and ſervice, lay a ſure and laſting foundation of the greatneſs and proſperity of your majeſty, and your royal poſterity in future time."

[9] Neil was tranſlated from Wincheſter to York, in 1631, in which honour he died, three days before the long parliament was opened.

A remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, preſented to the king from the houſe of commons, the 1ſt of December, 1641.

" THE commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, having with much earneſtneſs and faithfulneſs of affection and zeal to the public good of this kingdom, and his majeſty's honour and ſervice, for the ſpace of twelve months, wreſtled with great dangers and fears, the preſſing miſeries and calamities, the various diſtempers and diſorders which had not only aſſaulted, but even overwhelmed and extinguiſhed the liberty, peace, and proſperity of this kingdom, the comfort and hopes of all his majeſty's good ſubjects, and exceedingly weakened and undermined the foundation and ſtrength of his own royal throne,

" Do yet find an abounding malignity and oppoſition in thoſe parties and factions who have been the cauſe of thoſe evils, and do ſtill labour to caſt aſperſions upon that which hath been done, and to raiſe many difficulties for the hindrance of that which yet remains undone, and to foment jealouſies betwixt the king and parliament, that ſo they may deprive him and his people of the fruit of his own gracious intentions, and their humble deſires of procuring the public peace, ſafety, and happineſs of this realm: for the preventing of thoſe miſerable effects, which ſuch malicious endeavours may produce, we have thought good to declare: (1.)

Remark (1.) This was all flouriſh, and a pretence uſed by the commons, to have an occaſion to publiſh this remonſtrance, which was reſolved upon at the very beginning of the parliament, before any one thought of blaming their conduct.

" The root and growth of theſe miſchievous deſigns.

" The maturity and ripeneſs to which they have attained before the beginning of the parliament.

" The effectual means which have been uſed for the extirpation of thoſe dangerous evils, and the progreſs which hath therein been made by his majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of the parliament.

" The ways of obſtruction and oppoſition, by which that progreſs hath been interrupted.

" The courſes to be taken for the removing thoſe obſtacles, and for the accompliſhing of our moſt dutiful and faithful intentions and endeavours of reſtoring and eſtabliſhing the ancient honour, greatneſs and ſecurity of this crown and nation.

" The root of all this miſchief we find to be a malignant and pernicious deſign of ſubverting the fundamental laws and principles of government, upon which the religion and juſtice of this kingdom are firmly eſtabliſhed. The actors and promoters hereof have been.

" 1. The jeſuited papiſts, who hate the laws, as they are the obſtacles of that change and ſubverſion of religion, which they ſo much long for.

" 2. The biſhops, and the corrupt part of the clergy, who cheriſh formality and ſuperſtition, as the natural effects, and more probable ſupports of their own eccleſiaſtical tyranny and uſurpation.

" Such counſellors and courtiers, as, for private ends have engaged themſelves to further the intereſts of ſome foreign princes or ſtates, to the prejudice of his majeſty, and the ſtate at home.

" The common principles by which they moulded and governed all their particular counſels and actions, were theſe:

" Firſt, to maintain continual differences and diſcontents betwixt the king and the people, upon queſtions of prerogative and liberty, that ſo they might have the advantage of ſiding with him, and under the notions of men addicted to his ſervice, gain to themſelves and their parties the places of the greateſt truſt and power in the kingdom. (2.)

Rem. (2.) It is certain, this was the way archbiſhop Laud, and the arminian party grew powerful at court.

" A ſecond, to ſuppreſs the purity and power of religion, and ſuch perſons as were beſt affected to it, as being contrary to their own ends, and the greateſt impediment to that change which they thought to introduce.

" A third, to conjoin thoſe parties of the kingdom which were moſt propitious to their own ends, and to divide thoſe who were moſt oppoſite, which conſiſted in many particular obſervations.

" To cheriſh the arminian party in thoſe points wherein they agree with the papiſts, to multiply and enlarge the difference between the common proteſtants, and thoſe whom they call puritans, to introduce and countenance ſuch opinions and ceremonies as are fitteſt for accommodation with popery, to increaſe and maintain ignorance, looſeneſs, and prophaneneſs in the people. That of thoſe three parties, papiſts, arminians, and libertines, they might compoſe a body fit to act ſuch counſels and reſolutions, as were moſt conducible to their own ends.

" A fourth, to diſaffect the king to parliaments by ſlanders and falſe imputations, and by putting him upon other ways of ſupply, which in ſhew and appearance were fuller of advantage than the ordinary courſe of ſubſides, though in truth they brought more loſs than gain both to the king and people, and have cauſed the great diſtractions under which we both ſuffer.

" As in all compounded bodies the operations are qualified according to the predominant element, ſo in this mixt party, the jeſuited counſels being moſt active and prevailing, may eaſily be diſcovered to have had the greateſt ſway in all their determinations, and if they be not prevented, are likely to devour the reſt, or to turn them into their own nature.

" In the beginning of his majeſty's reign, the party begun to revive and flouriſh again, having been ſomewhat dampt by the breach with Spain, in the laſt year of king James, and by his majeſty's marriage with France; the intereſts and counſels of that ſtate being not ſo contrary to the good of religion, and the proſperity of this kingdom, as thoſe of Spain; and the papiſts of England having been ever more addicted to Spain than France; yet they ſtill retain a purpoſe and reſolution to weaken the proteſtant parties in all parts, and even in France, whereby to make way for the change of religion, which they intended at home.

" 1. The firſt effect and evidence of their recovery and ſtrength, was the diſſolution of the parliament at Oxford, after there had been given two ſubſides to his majeſty, and before they received relief in any one grievance, many other more miſerable effects followed.

" 2. The loſs of the Rochel fleet, by the help of our ſhipping, ſet forth and delivered over to the French, in oppoſition to the advice of parliament, (3.) which left that town without defence by ſea, and made way, not only to the loſs of that important place, but likewiſe to the loſs of all the ſtrength and ſecurity of the proteſtant religion in France.

Rem. (3.) It cannot be properly ſaid that the ſeven ſhips lent by Charles I. to the king of France were delivered to the French, in oppoſition to the advice of parliament, ſince the thing was done before the parliament was acquainted with it. It is likewiſe a great aggravation to impute the loſs of the Rochel fleet, and of Rochel itſelf, to the aid of the ſeven Engliſh ſhips, which the mariners of that nation had deſerted.

" 3. The diverting his majeſty's courſe of wars from the Weſt-Indies, which was the moſt facile and hopeful way for this kingdom to prevail againſt the Spaniards, to an expenceful and unſucceſsful attempt upon Calais, which was ſo ordered, as if it had rather been intended to make us weary of a war, than to proſper it. (4.)

Rem. (4.) This accuſation ſeems a little too far fetched, ſince Elizabeth had taken both courſes with ſucceſs.

" 4. The precipitate breach with France, by taking their ſhips to a great value, without making recompence to the Engliſh, whoſe goods were thereupon imbarred, and confiſcated in that kingdom.

" 5. The peace with Spain, without conſent of parliament, contrary to the promiſe of king James to both houſes, whereby the Palatine's cauſe was deſerted and left to chargeable and hopeleſs treaties, which, for the moſt part, were managed by thoſe who might juſtly be ſuſpected to be no friends to that cauſe. (5.)

Rem. (5.) This article contains three accuſations againſt the king, 1. Of making peace with Spain without conſent of parliament: 2. Of neglecting, in this peace, the intereſt of the elector Palatine: 3. Of treating of that prince's affairs by ſuſpected perſons. As to the firſt, it is true, king James had promiſed not to make peace with Spain without the parliament's approbation: but it was a time when the parliament began to ſupply him with money for the war, and engaged to enable him to continue it: but the face of affairs was changed, when Charles I. made peace. As to the ſecond charge of neglecting the cauſe of the elector Palatine, it is properly a cavil; for the king, having no money to continue the war againſt Spain, was not in condition to ſupport the elector's cauſe. All that can be ſaid, is, that he would have had money from the parliament, had he been willing to redreſs the grievances. I am ignorant of the foundation of the third accuſation.

" 6. The charging of the kingdom with billeted ſoldiers in all parts of it, and that concomitant deſign of German horſe, that the land might either ſubmit with fear, or be enforced with rigour to ſuch arbitrary contributions as ſhould be required of them. (6.)

that

Rem. (6.) Theſe two accuſations are unanſwerable. There was but too much reaſon to believe, that this was done on purpoſe to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government.

" 7. The diſſolving of the parliament in the ſecond year of his majeſty's reign, after a declaration of their intent to grant five ſubſidies. (7.)

Rem. (7.) This parliament was diſſolved to ſave the duke of Buckingham.

" 8. The exacting of the like proportion of five ſubſidies after the parliament was diſſolved, by commiſſion of loan; and divers gentlemen and others impriſoned for not yielding to pay that loan, whereby many of them contracted ſuch ſickneſſes as coſt them their lives.

" 9. Great ſums of money required and raiſed by privy-ſeals. (8.)

Rem. (8.) Theſe articles were notoriouſly true. There is no juſtifying them, but by aſſerting, the king had a right to do whatever he did. But this is a great queſtion.

" 10. An unjuſt and pernicious attempt to extort great payments from the ſubject by way of exciſe, and a commiſſion iſſued under the ſeal for that purpoſe.

" 11. The petition of right, which was granted in full parliament, blaſted, with an illegal declaration to make it deſtructive to itſelf, to the power of parliament, to the liberty of the ſubject, and to that purpoſe printed with it; and the petition made of no uſe but to ſhew the bold and preſumptuous injuſtice of ſuch miniſters as durſt break the laws, and ſuppreſs the liberties of the kingdom, after they had been ſo ſolemnly and evidently declared.

" 12. Another parliament diſſolved 4 Car. the privilege of parliament broken, by impriſoning divers members of the houſe, detaining them cloſe priſoners for many months together, without the liberty of uſing books, pen, ink, or paper, denying them all the comforts of life, all means of preſervation of health, not permitting their wives to come to them, even in time of their ſickneſs.

" 13. And for the compleating that cruelty, after many years ſpent in ſuch miſerable durance, depriving them of the neceſſary means to ſpiritual conſolation; not ſuffering them to go abroad to enjoy God's ordinances in God's houſe, or God's miniſters to come to them to miniſter comfort to them in private chambers.

" 14. And to keep them ſtill in this oppreſſed condition, not admitting them to be bailed according to law, yet vexing them with informations in inferior courts; ſentencing and fining ſome of them for matters done in parliament; and extorting the payments of thoſe fines from them, enforcing others to put in ſecurity of good behaviour before they could be releaſed.

" 15. The impriſonment of the reſt, which refuſed to be bound, ſtill continued, which might have been perpetual if neceſſity had not the laſt year brought another parliament to relieve them, of whom one [r] died, by the cruelty and harſhneſs of his impriſonment, which would admit of no relaxation, notwithſtanding the imminent danger of his life did ſufficiently appear by the declaration of his phyſician. And his releaſe, or at leaſt his refreſhment, was ſought by many humble petitions. And his blood ſtill cries for vengeance or repentance, of thoſe miniſters of ſtate who have once obſtructed the courſe both of his majeſty's juſtice and mercy. (9.)

Rem. (9.) The rigour exerciſed upon theſe members of parliament is one of the ſtrongeſt proofs of the deſign to eſtabliſh arbitrary power; and therefore the commons largely inſiſt upon this article.

" 16. Upon the diſſolution of both theſe parliaments, untrue and ſcandalous declarations were publiſhed to aſperſe their proceedings, and ſome of their members, unjuſtly; to make them odious, and colour the violence which was uſed againſt them. (10.) Proclamations ſet out to the ſame purpoſe; and to the great dejecting the hearts of the people forbidding them even to ſpeak of parliaments.

Rem. (10.) If by theſe declarations are meant, thoſe publiſhed to ſignify the cauſes of the diſſolution of theſe parliaments, it may be ſaid that the commons ſwerved from the reſpect due to the king, by terming them untrue and ſcandalous, ſince they were publiſhed in his name.

" 17. After the breach of the parliament in the fourth of his majeſty, injuſtice, oppreſſion, and violence, broke in upon us, without any reſtraint or moderation, and yet the firſt project was the great ſums exacted through the whole kingdom for default of knighthood, which ſeemed to have ſome colour and ſhadow of a law, yet if it be rightly examined by that obſolete law which was pretended for it, it will be found to be againſt all the rules of juſtice, both in reſpect of the perſons charged, the proportion of the fines demanded, and the abſurd and unreaſonable manner of their proceedings.

" 18. Tunnage and poundage hath been received without colour or pretence of law: many other heavy impoſitions continued againſt law; and ſome ſo unreaſonable, that the ſum of the charge exceeds the value of the goods.

" 19. The book of rates lately inhanced to a high portion; and ſuch merchants that would not ſubmit to their illegal and unreaſonable payments, were vexed and oppreſſed above meaſure; and the ordinary courſe of juſtice, the common birthright of the ſubjects of England, wholly obſtructed and taken from them.

" 20. And although it was taken on pretence of guarding the ſeas, yet a new and unheard of tax of ſhip-money was deviſed, and upon the ſame pretence. By both which there were charged upon the ſubject near 700,000l. ſome years; and yet the merchants have been left ſo naked to the violence of the Turkiſh pirates, that many great ſhips of value, and thouſands of his majeſty's ſubjects, have been taken by them, and do ſtill remain in miſerable ſlavery.

" 21. The enlargement of foreſts, contrary to Charta de Foreſta, and the compoſition thereupon.

" 22. The exactions of coat and conduct-money, and divers other military charges. (11.)

Rem. 11. The king being engaged in a war againſt Scotland, ordered that every county ſhould find a certain number of ſoldiers, and cloath and pay them, till they came to the place of the general rendezvous, on condition of being repaid another time. On this pretence it was agreed with the counties, that they ſhould ſupply the king with a certain ſum proportionable to the number of ſoldiers each county was to cloath and pay, for which the king took the whole charge upon himſelf. This was called coat and conduct money, that is to ſay, money for cloathing and conducting the troops. But this money was never reſtored.

" 23. The taking away the arms of the trained-bands of divers counties. (12.)

Rem. (12.) The king intending to make a magazine of arms in the caſtle of Edinburgh, found no ſpeedier way than to take, in ſome counties, the arms of the militia, and ſend them to Scotland. But it was pretended, that at the ſame time his deſign was to diſarm, under that pretence, ſuch perſons as were not well-affected to him. Accordingly this is inſinuated by the remonſtrance, in the following article concerning powder.

" 24. The deſperate deſign of engroſſing all the gunpowder into one hand, keeping it in the Tower of London, and ſetting ſo high a rate upon it, that the poorer ſort were not able to buy it; nor could any have it without licence; thereby to leave the ſeveral parts of the kingdom deſtitute of their neceſſary defence; and by ſelling ſo dear that which was ſold, to make an unlawful advantage of it, to the great charge and detriment of the ſubject.

" 25. The general deſtruction of the king's timber, eſpecially that in the foreſt of Dean, ſold to papiſts, which was the beſt ſtorehouſe of this kingdom for the maintenance of our ſhipping. (13.)

Rem. (13.) Theſe points are perhaps a little aggravated, at leaſt in reſpect to the motives and conſequences.

" 26. The taking away men's right under colour of the king's title to land, between high and low water marks.

" 27. The monopolies of ſoap, ſalt, wine, leather, ſea-coal, and in a manner, of all things of moſt common and neceſſary uſe.

" 28. The reſtraints of the liberties of the ſubjects in their habitation, trades, and other intereſts.

" 29. Their vexation and oppreſſion by purveyors, clerks of the market, and ſaltpetre-men.

" 30. The ſale of pretended nuiſances, buildings in and about London.

" 31. Converſion of arable into paſture, continuance of paſture under the name of depopulation, have driven many millions out of the ſubjects purſes, without any conſiderable profit to his majeſty. (14.)

Rem. (14.) The woollen trade being the great ſource of the riches of England, the ſubjects were enjoined by ſeveral ſtatutes, not to change paſture into arable land, for fear of leſſening the flocks, and conſequently the wool. In king Charles's reign, the offenders againſt theſe ſtatutes were ſtrictly inquired after, not with a view to hinder the abuſes, but to authorize them by a compoſition with the king.

" 32. Large quantities of common and ſeveral grounds have been taken from the ſubjects, by colour of the ſtatute of improvement, and by abuſe of the commiſſion of ſewers, without their conſent, and againſt it. (15.)

Rem. (15.) Commiſſioners of ſewers are ſuch as by authority under the great ſeal, ſee drains and ditches well kept and maintained in marſhy and fenny countries, for the better conveyance of the water into the ſea, and preſerving graſs upon the land for the feeding of flocks and herds. The commons complain that this commiſſion was abuſed.

" 33. And not only private intereſt, but alſo public faith hath been broken, in ſeizing of the money and bullion in the mint, and the whole kingdom like to be robbed at once, in that abominable project of braſs money. (16.)

Rem. (16.) The king took but forty thouſand pounds out of the mint, which ſum was afterwards repaid to the proprietors.

" 34. Great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects, for refuſing thoſe unlawful charges, have been vexed with long and expenſive ſuits; ſome fined and cenſured, others committed to long and hard impriſonments and confinements, to the loſs of health in many, of life in ſome; and others have had their houſes broken up, their goods ſeized; ſome have been reſtrained from their lawful callings.

" 35. Ships have been interrupted in their voyages, ſurprized at ſea in hoſtile manner by projectors, as by a common enemy.

" 36. Merchants prohibited to unlade their goods in ſuch ports as were for their own advantage, and forced to bring them to thoſe places which were much for the advantage of the monopolizers and projectors.

" 37. The court of ſtar-chamber hath abounded in extravagant cenſures, not only for the maintenance and improvement of monopolies and other lawful taxes, but for divers other cauſes, where there hath been no offence, or very ſmall; whereby his majeſty's ſubjects have been oppreſſed by grievous fines, impriſonments, ſtigmatizing, mutilations, whippings, pillories, gags, confinements, baniſhments; after ſo rigid a manner, as hath not only deprived men of the ſociety of their friends, exerciſe of their profeſſions, comfort of books, uſe of paper and ink, but even violated that near union which God hath eſtabliſhed betwixt men and their wives, by forced and conſtrained ſeparation, whereby they have been bereaved of the comfort and converſation one of another for many years together, without hope of relief, if God had not, by his over-ruling providence, given ſome interruption to the prevailing power and council of thoſe who were the authors and promoters of ſuch peremptory and heady courſes. (17.)

Rem. (17.) This whole article relates to the rigorous treatment of Prynn, Baſtwick, and Burton, by the ſtar-chamber.

" 38. Judges have been put out of their places for refuſing to do againſt their oaths and conſciences: others have been ſo awed, that they durſt not do their duties; and the better to hold a rod over them, the clauſe, Quam diu ſe bene geſſerit, was left out of their patents, and a new clauſe, Durante bene placito, inſerted.

" 39. Lawyers have been checked for being faithful to their clients: ſolicitors and attorneys have been threatened and ſome puniſhed for following lawful ſuits. And by this means all the approaches to juſtice were interrupted and foreccluded.

" 40. New oaths have been forced upon the ſubject againſt law.

" 41. New judicatories erected without law. The council-table have by their orders offered to bind the ſubjects in their freeholds, eſtates, ſuits, and actions.

" 42. The pretended court of the earl marſhal was arbitrary and illegal in its being and proceedings.

" 43. The chancery, exchequer-chamber, court of wards, and other Engliſh courts, have been grievous in exceeding their juriſdiction.

" 44. The eſtate of many families weakened, and ſome ruined, by exceſſive fines, exacted from them for compoſitions of wardſhips.

" 45. All leaſes of above one hundred years made to draw on wardſhip, contrary to law.

" 46. Undue proceedings uſed in the finding of offices, to make the jury find for the king.

" 47. The common law courts, ſeeing all men more inclined to ſeek juſtice there, where it may be fitted to their own deſires, are known frequently to forſake the rules of the common law, and ſtraying beyond their bounds, under pretence of equity, to do injuſtice. (18.)

Rem. (18.) The laws of England are divided into common law, and ſtatute-law; the firſt is founded on ancient cuſtom, etc. and the other on acts of parliament: from theſe laws and judges are not allowed to ſwerve, either to the right or left[s]. The court of chancery only may in ſome caſes judge according to equity. Now the king's courts, in taking upon them to judge according to equity, and not according to ſtrict law, had exceeded their juriſdicton in order to favour the court.

" 48. Titles of honour, judicial places, ſerjeantſhips at law, and other offices have been ſold for great ſums of money, whereby the common juſtice of the kingdom hath been much endangered, not only by opening a way of employment, in places of great truſt and advantage to men of weak parts, but alſo by giving occaſion to bribery, extortion, partiality; it ſeldom happening that places ill-gotten are well uſed. (19.)

Rem. (19.) A ſerjeant at law [or of the coif], ſerviens ad legem, is the higheſt degree taken in that profeſſion, as that of doctor is in the civil law. One court is peculiar to them, namely, the court of Common-pleas, though they are not reſtrained from pleading in any other court. Out of theſe are choſen one or more king's ſerjeants, to plead for him in all cauſes, eſpecially in thoſe of treaſon[t].

" 49. Commiſſions have been granted for examining the exceſs of fees: and when great exactions have been diſcovered, compoſitions have been made with delinquents, not only for the time paſt, but likewiſe for immunity, and ſecurity in offending for the time to come, which under colour of remedy, hath but confirmed and increaſed the grievance to the ſubject.

" 50. The uſual courſe of pricking ſheriffs not obſerved, out many times ſheriffs made in an extraordinary way; ſometimes as a puniſhment and charge unto them, (20) ſometimes ſuch were pricked out as would be inſtrument to execute whatſoever they would have to be done.

Rem. (20.) To hinder them from being choſen to ſerve in parliament, as ſir Edward Coke, ſir Robert Philips, and ſir Thomas Wentworth.

" 51. The biſhops and the reſt of the clergy did triumph in the ſuſpenſions, excommunications, deprivations, and degradations of divers painful, learned, and pious miniſters, in the vexation and grievous oppreſſions of great numbers of his majeſty's good ſubjects.

" 52. The high-commiſſion grew to ſuch exceſs of ſharpneſs and ſeverity, as was not much leſs than the Romiſh inquiſition; and yet, in many caſes, by the archbiſhop's power, was made much more heavy, being aſſiſted and ſtrengthened by authority of the council-table.

" 53. The biſhops and their courts were as eager in the country; although their juriſdiction could not reach ſo high in rigour and extremity of puniſhment, yet were they no leſs grievous in reſpect of the generality and multiplicity of vexations, which lighting upon the meaner ſort of tradeſmen and artificers, did impoveriſh many thouſands;

" 54. And ſo afflict and trouble others, that great numbers, to avoid their miſeries, departed out of the kingdom; ſome into New-England, and other parts of America, others into Holland:

" 55. Where they have tranſported their manufactures of cloth; which is not only a loſs by diminiſhing the preſent ſtock of the kingdom, but a great miſchief by impairing and endangering the loſs of that peculiar trade of cloathing, which hath been a plentiful fountain of wealth and honour to this nation.

" 56. Thoſe were fitteſt for eccleſiaſtical preferment, and ſooneſt obtained it, who were moſt officious in promoting ſuperſtition, moſt virulent in railing againſt godlineſs and honeſty. (21.)

Rem. (21.) By theſe are to be underſtood ſuch as were moſt incenſed againſt preſbyterianiſm.

" 57. The moſt public and ſolemn ſermons before his majeſty, were either to advance prerogative above law, and decry the property of the ſubject, or full of ſuch kind of invectives:

" 58. Whereby they might make thoſe odious who fought to maintain the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; and ſuch men were ſure to be weeded out of the commiſſion of the peace, and out of all other employments of power, in the government of the country.

[s] The author in this remark has confounded in the original the common and ſtatute law, making them to be the ſame.

[t] The author has committed likewiſe ſome miſtakes in this remark, which are corrected in the tranſlation.

" 59. Many noble perſons were counſellors in name, but the power and authority remained in a few of ſuch as were moſt addicted to this party: whoſe reſolutions and determinations were brought to the table for countenance and execution, and not for debate and deliberation; and no man could offer to oppoſe them without diſgrace and hazard to himſelf.

" 60. Nay, all thoſe that did not wholly concur, and actively contribute to the furtherance of their deſigns, though otherwiſe perſons of never ſo great honour and abilities, were ſo far from being employed in any place of truſt and power, that they were neglected, diſcountenanced, and upon all occaſions injured and oppreſſed.

" 61. This faction was grown to that height, and entireneſs of power, that now they began to think of finiſhing of their work, which conſiſted of theſe three parts.

" 62. I. The government muſt be ſet free from all reſtraint of laws concerning our perſons and eſtates.

" 63. II. There muſt be a conjunction betwixt papiſts and proteſtants in doctrines, diſcipline, and ceremonies, only it muſt not yet be called popery.

" 64. III. The puritans, under which name they include all thoſe that deſire to preſerve the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and to maintain religion in the power of it, muſt be either rooted out of the kingdom with force, or driven out with fear.

" 65. For the effecting of this, it was thought neceſſary to reduce Scotland to ſuch popiſh ſuperſtitions and innovations, as might make them apt to join with England in that great change which was intended.

" 66. Whereupon new canons and a new liturgy were preſſed upon them; and when they refuſed to admit of them, an army was raiſed to force them to it, towards which the clergy and the papiſts were very forward in their contribution.

" 67. The Scots likewiſe raiſed an army for their defence.

" 68. And when both armies were come together, and ready for a bloody encounter, his majeſty's own gracious diſpoſition, and the council of the Engliſh nobility, and dutiful ſubmiſſion of the Scots, did ſo far prevail againſt the evil council of others, that a pacification was made, and his majeſty returned with peace and much honour to London.

" 69. The unexpected reconciliation was moſt acceptable to all the kingdom except to the malignant party; whereof the archbiſhop and the earl of Strafford being heads, they and their faction began to inveigh againſt the peace, and to aggravate the proceedings of the ſtates, which ſo incenſed his majeſty, that he forthwith prepared again for war.

" 70. And ſuch was their confidence, that having corrupted and diſtempered the whole frame and government of the kingdom, they did now hope to corrupt that which was the only means to reſtore all to a right frame and temper again.

" 71. To which end they perſuaded his majeſty to call a parliament, not to ſeek counſel and advice of them, but to draw countenance and ſupply from them, and to engage the whole kingdom in their quarrel.

" 72. And in the mean time, continued all their unjuſt levies of money, reſolving either to make the parliament pliant to their will, and to eſtabliſh miſchief by a law or elſe to break it, and with more colour to go on by violence, to take what they could not obtain by conſent. The ground alleged for the juſtification of this war was this:

" 73. That the undutiful demands of the parliaments in Scotland was a ſufficient reaſon for his majeſty to take arms againſt them, without hearing the reaſon of thoſe demands, and thereupon a new army was prepared againſt them; their ſhips were ſeized in all parts both of England, Ireland, and at ſea; their petitions rejected, their commiſſioners refuſed audience.

" 74. This whole kingdom moſt miſerably diſtempered with levies of men and money; and impriſonments of thoſe who denied to ſubmit to thoſe levies.

" 75. The earl of Strafford paſſed into Ireland, cauſed the parliament there to declare againſt the Scots, to give four ſubſidies towards that war; and to engage themſelves, their lives and fortunes for the proſecution of it; and gave directions for an army of eight thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, to be levied there, which were for the moſt part papiſts.

" 76. The parliament met upon the 13th of April 1640. The earl of Strafford, and archbiſhop of Canterbury, with their party, ſo prevailed with his majeſty, that the houſe of commons was preſſed to yield a ſupply for maintenance of the war with Scotland, before they had provided any relief for the great and preſſing grievances of the people; which being againſt the fundamental privilege and proceeding of parliament, was yet in humble reſpect to his majeſty ſo far admitted, as that they agreed to take the matter of ſupply into conſideration, and two ſeveral days it was debated.

" 77. Twelve ſubſidies were demanded for the releaſe of ſhip-money alone: a third day was appointed for concluſion, when the heads of that party began to fear, the people might cloſe with the king, in ſatisfying his deſire of money: but that withal, they were like to blaſt their malicious deſigns againſt Scotland, finding them very much indiſpoſed to give any countenance to that war.

" 78. Thereupon they wickedly adviſed the king to break off the parliament, and to return to the ways of confuſion, in which their own evil intentions were moſt like to proſper and ſucceed. (22.)

Rem. (22.) The lord Clarendon, then a member of the houſe of commons, affirms, that the houſe was very well inclined to ſatisfy the king, if he would have had a little patience, and that he repented afterwards his precipitation. This confirms what is ſaid here, that the parliament was diſſolved, for ſome private ends of thoſe who moſt influenced the king's council.

" 79. After the parliament ended, the 5th of May 1640. this party grew ſo bold, as to counſel the king to ſupply himſelf out of his ſubjects eſtates, by his own power, at his own will, without their conſent.

" 80. The very next day, ſome members of both houſes had their ſtudies and cabinets, yea their pockets ſearched: another of them not long after was committed cloſe priſoner, for not delivering ſome petitions which he received by authority of that houſe.

" 81. And if harſher courſes were intended (as was reported) it was very probable, that the ſickneſs of the earl of Strafford, and the tumults riſing in Southwark and about Lambeth, were the cauſes that ſuch violent intentions were not brought to execution.

" 82. A falſe and ſcandalous declaration againſt the houſe of commons was publiſhed in his majeſty's name, which yet wrought little effect with the people, but only to manifeſt the impudence of thoſe who were authors of it.

" 83. A forced loan of money was attempted in the city of London.

" 84. The lord-mayor and aldermen in their ſeveral wards, enjoined to bring in a liſt of the names of ſuch perſons as they judged fit to lend, and of the ſum they ſhould lend, and ſuch aldermen as refuſed ſo to do were committed to priſon.

" 85. The archbiſhop, and the other biſhops and clergy continued the convocation, and by a new commiſſion turned it into a provincial ſynod, in which, by an unheard-of preſumption, they made canons that contain in them many matters, contrary to the king's prerogative; to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of the realm; to the right of parliaments; to the property and liberty of the ſubject; and matters tending to ſedition, and of dangerous conſequence; thereby eſtabliſhing their own uſurpations, juſtifying their altar-worſhip, and thoſe other ſuperſtitious innovations, which they formerly introduced without warrant of law.

" 86. They impoſed a new oath upon divers of his majeſty's ſubjects both eccleſiaſtical and lay, for maintenance of their own tyranny, and laid a great tax upon the clergy for ſupply of his majeſty, and generally they ſhewed themſelves very affectionate to the war with Scotland, which was by ſome of them ſtiled Bellum Epiſcopale, and a prayer compoſed, and enjoined to be read in churches, calling the Scots rebels, to put the two nations in blood, and make them irreconcileable.

" 87. All thoſe pretended canons and conſtitutions were armed with the ſeveral cenſures of ſuſpenſion, excommunication, deprivation, by which they would have thruſt out all the good miniſters, and moſt of the well-affected people of the kingdom, and left an eaſy paſſage to their own deſign of reconciliation with Rome. (23.)

Rem. (23.) The commons go doubtleſs too far, when they impute to the whole convocation of 1640, the deſign of reſtoring popery. This is not at all likely, ſuppoſing it were true, that ſome of the biſhops had formed ſuch a project, which was never well proved [u].

" 88. The popiſh party enjoyed ſuch exemptions from penal laws, as amounted to a toleration, beſides many other encouragements and court-favours.

[u] It is obſervable, that this very convocation cenſured Goodman, biſhop of Gloceſter, for favouring popery.

" 89. They had a ſecretary of ſtate, ſir Francis Windebank, a powerful agent for ſpeeding all their deſires.

" 90. A pope's nuncio reſiding here, to act and govern them according to ſuch influences as he received from Rome, and to intercede for them with the moſt powerful concurrence of the foreign princes of that religion.

" 91. By his authority the papiſts of all ſorts, nobility, gentry, and clergy, were convocated after the manner of a parliament.

" 92. New juriſdictions were erected of Romiſh archbiſhops, taxes levied, another ſtate moulded within this ſtate, independant in government, contrary in intereſt and affection, ſecretly corrupting the ignorant or negligent profeſſors of our religion, and cloſely uniting and combining themſelves againſt ſuch as were found in this poſture, waiting for an opportunity by force to deſtroy, thoſe whom they could not hope to ſeduce.

" 93. For the effecting whereof, they were ſtrengthened with arms and amunition, encouraged by ſuperſtitious prayers, enjoined by the nuncio, to be weekly made for the proſperity of ſome great deſign.

" 94. And ſuch power had they at court, that ſecretly a commiſſion was iſſued out, or intended to be iſſued, to ſome great man of that profeſſion, for the levying of ſoldiers, and to command and employ them according to private inſtructions, which we doubt were framed for the advantage of thoſe who were the contrivers of them.

" 95. His majeſty's treaſure was conſumed, his revenue anticipated.

" 96. His ſervants and officers compelled to lend great ſums of money.

" 97. Multitudes were called to the council-table, who were tired with long attendances there, for refuſing illegal payments.

" 98. The priſons were filled with their commitments: many of the ſheriffs ſummoned into the ſtar-chamber; and ſome impriſoned for not being quick enough in levying the ſhip-money; the people languiſhed under grief and fear; no viſible hope being left but in deſperation.

" 99. The nobility began to be weary of their ſilence and patience, and ſenſible of the duty and truſt which belongs to them; and thereupon ſome of the moſt ancient of them did petition his majeſty at ſuch a time, when evil counſellors were ſo ſtrong, that they had occaſion to expect more hazard to themſelves, than redreſs of thoſe public evils for which they interceded.

" 100. Whilſt the kingdom was in this agitation and diſtemper, the Scots reſtrained in their trades, impoveriſhed by the loſs of many of their ſhips, bereaved of all poſſibility of ſatisfying his majeſty by any naked ſupplications, entered with a powerful army into the kingdom, and without any hoſtile act or ſpoil in the country they paſſed, more than forcing a paſſage over the Tyne at Newburne near Newcaſtle; poſſeſſed themſelves of Newcaſtle; and had a fair opportunity to preſs on farther upon the king's army.

" 101. But duty and reverence to his majeſty, and brotherly love to the Engliſh nation, made them ſtay there, whereby the king had leiſure to entertain better counſels.

" 102. Wherein God ſo bleſſed and directed him, that he ſummoned the great council of peers to meet at York upon the 24th of September, and there declare a parliament, to begin the 3d of November then following.

" 103. The Scots, the firſt day of the great council, preſented an humble petition to his majeſty, whereupon the treaty was appointed at Rippon.

" 104. A preſent ceſſation of arms agreed upon, and the full concluſion of all differences referred to the wiſdom and care of the parliament. (24.)

Rem. (24.) The commons ſuppoſe, that as the Scots had petitioned the king to redreſs their grievances with the advice of the parliament of England; and as on that occaſion the king had called a parliament, this was a tacit conſent of both parties to leave things to the parliament of England. But this is only a ſuppoſition; for there was no agreement to refer matters to the parliament.

" 105. At our firſt meeting all oppoſition ſeemed to vaniſh, the miſchiefs were ſo evident, which thoſe evil counſellors produced, that no man durſt ſtand up to defend them, yet the work itſelf afforded difficulty enough.

" 106. The multiplied evils and corruptions of ſixteen years, ſtrengthened by cuſtom and authority, and the current intereſt of many powerful delinquents, were now to be brought to judgment and reformation.

" 107. The king's houſhold was to be provided for; they had brought him to that want, that he could not ſupply his ordinary and neceſſary expences without the aſſiſtance of his people.

" 108. Two armies were to be paid, which amounted very near to eighty thouſand pounds a month.

" 109. The people were to be tenderly charged, having been formerly exhauſted with many burthenſome projects.

" 110. The difficulties ſeemed to be inſuperable, which by the divine providence we have overcome. The contrarieties incompatible, which yet in a great meaſure we have reconciled.

" 111. Six ſubſidies have been granted, and a bill of poll-money[x], which if it be duly levied, may equal ſix ſubſidies more, in all ſix hundred thouſand pounds.

" 112. Beſides, we have contracted a debt to the Scots of two hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; yet God hath ſo bleſſed the endeavours of this parliament, that the kingdom is a great gainer by all theſe charges.

" 113. The ſhip-money is aboliſhed, which coſt the kingdom above two hundred thouſand pounds a year.

" 114. The coat and conduct-money, and other military charges are taken away, which in many counties amounted to little leſs than the ſhip-money.

" 115. The monopolies are all ſuppreſt, whereof ſome few did prejudice the ſubject above a million yearly.

" 116. The ſoap, an hundred thouſand pounds.

" 117. The wine, three hundred thouſand pounds.

" 118. The leather muſt needs exceed both, and ſalt could be no leſs than that.

" 119. Beſides the inferior monopolies, which if they could be exactly computed, would make up a great ſum.

" 120. That which is more beneficial than all this, is that the root of theſe evils is taken away, which was the arbitrary power pretended to be in his majeſty, of taxing the ſubject, or charging their eſtates without conſent in parliament, which is now declared to be againſt law, by the judgment of both houſes, and likewiſe by an act of parliament.

" 121. Another ſtep of great advantage is this, the living grievances, the evil counſellors and actors of theſe miſchiefs have been ſo quelled.

" 122. By the juſtice done upon the earl of Strafford, the flight of the lord Finch, and ſecretary Windebank.

" 123. The accuſation and impriſonment of the archbiſhop of Canterbury of judge Berkley; and,

" 124. The impeachment of divers other biſhops and judges, that it is like not only to be an eaſe to the preſent times, but a preſervation to the future.

" 125. The diſcontinuance of parliaments is prevented by the bill for a Triennial parliament, and the abrupt diſſolution of this parliament by another bill, by which it is provided, it ſhall not be diſſolved or adjourned without the conſent of both houſes.

" 126. Which two laws well conſidered, may be thought more advantageous than all the former, becauſe they ſecure a full operation of the preſent remedy, and afford a perpetual ſpring of remedies for the future.

" 127. The ſtar-chamber.

" 128. The high-commiſſion:

" 129. The courts of the preſident and council in the north, were ſo many forges of miſery, and oppreſſion, and violence, and are all taken away, whereby men are more ſecured in their perſons, liberties and eſtates, than they could by any law or example, for the regulation of thoſe courts of terror of the judges.

" 130. The immoderate power of the council-table, and the exceſſive abuſe of that power, is ſo ordered and reſtrained, that we may well hope, that no ſuch things as were frequently done by them, to the prejudice of the public liberty, will appear in future times but only in ſtories, to give us and our poſterity more occaſion to praiſe God for his majeſty's goodneſs, and the faithful endeavours of this parliament.

" 131. The canons and power of canon-making are blaſted by the votes of both houſes.

" 132. The exhorbitant power of biſhops and their courts are much abated, by ſome proviſions in the bill againſt the [x] This poll-tax was raiſed for paying the Scotch army. And it was according to the following proportion. A duke paid 100l. a marquis 80l. an earl 60l. viſcounts and barons 40l. knights of the Bath 30l. knights bachelors 20l. eſquires 10l. every gentleman that could ſpend 100l. a year, 5l. and others in proportion. Hiſt. of Taxes, p. 287.

Courts, high commiſſion courts, the authors of the many innovations in doctrine and ceremonies.

" 133. The miniſters that have been ſcandalous in their lives, have been ſo terrified by juſt complaints and accuſations, that we may well hope they will be more modeſt for the time to come; either inwardly convicted by the ſight of their own folly, or outwardly reſtrained by the fear of puniſhment.

,134. The foreſts are by a good law reduced to their right bounds.

" 135. The encroachments and oppreſſions of the Stannery courts[y], the extortions of the clerk of the market;

" 136. And the compulſion of the ſubject, to receive the order of knighthood againſt his will, paying of fines for not receiving it; and the vexatious proceedings there upon for levying of thoſe fines, are by other beneficial laws reformed and prevented.

" 137. Many excellent laws and proviſions are in preparation for removing the inordinate power, vexation and uſurpations of biſhops; for reforming the pride and idleneſs of many of the clergy; for eaſing the people of unneceſſary ceremonies in religion; for cenſuring and removing unworthy and unprofitable miniſters, and for maintaining godly and diligent preachers through the kingdom.

" 138. Other things of main importance for the good of this kingdom are in propoſition, though little could hitherto be done in regard of the many other more preſſing buſineſſes, which yet before the end of this ſeſſion we hope may receive ſome progreſs and perfection.

" 139. The eſtabliſhing and ordering the king's revenue, that ſo the abuſe of officers, and ſuperfluity of expences may be cut off, and the neceſſary diſburſements for his majeſty's honour, the defence and government of the kingdom, may more certainly be provided for.

" 140. The regulating of courts of juſtice, and abridging both the delays and charges of law ſuits.

" 141. The ſettling of ſome good courſes for preventing the exportation of gold and ſilver, and the inequality of exchanges betwixt us and other nations, for the advancing of native commodities, increaſe of our manufacturies, and well ballancing of trade, whereby the ſtock of the kingdom may be increaſed, or at leaſt kept from impairing, as through neglect hereof it hath done for many years paſt:

" 142. Improving the herring-fiſhing upon our own coaſts, which will be of mighty uſe in the employment of the poor, and a plentiful nurſery of mariners, for enabling the kingdom in any great action.

" 143. The oppoſitions, obſtructions, and other difficulties wherewith we have been encountered, and which ſtill lie in our way with ſome ſtrength, and much obſtinacy, are theſe; the malignant party, whom we have formerly deſcribed to be the actors and promoters of all our miſery, that have taken heart again:

" 144. They have been able to prefer ſome of their own factors and agents to degrees of honour, to places of truſt and employment, even during the parliament:

" 145. They have endeavoured to work in his majeſty ill impreſſions and opinions of our proceedings, as if we had altogether done our own work, and not his; and had obtained from him many things very prejudicial to the crown, both in reſpect of prerogative and profit.

" 146. To wipe out this ſlander, we think good only to ſay thus much, that all that we have done is for his majeſty, his greatneſs, honour, and ſupport, when we yield to give twenty-five thouſand pounds a month for the relief of the northern counties; this was given to the king, for he was bound to protect his ſubjects.

" 147. They were his majeſty's evil counſellors, and their ill inſtruments, that were actors in thoſe grievances which brought in the Scots.

" 148. And if his majeſty pleaſe to force thoſe who were the authors of this war, to make ſatisfaction, as he might juſtly and eaſily do, it ſeems very reaſonable, that the people might well be excuſed from taking upon them this burden, being altogether innocent, and free from being any cauſe of it,

" 149. When we undertook the charge of the army, which coſt above 50,000l. a month, was not this given to the king? Was it not his majeſty's army? Were not all the commanders under contract with his majeſty at higher rates, and greater wages than ordinary?

" 150. And have not we taken upon us to diſcharge all the brotherly aſſiſtance of three hundred thouſand pounds, which we gave the Scots? Was it not toward repair of thoſe damages and loſſes which they received from the king's ſhips and from his miniſters?

" 151. Theſe three particulars amount to above eleven hundred thouſand pounds.

" 152. Beſides his majeſty hath received, by impoſitions upon merchandiſe, at leaſt four hundred thouſand pounds.

" 153. So that his majeſty hath had out of the ſubjects purſe, ſince the parliament began, one million and a half: and yet theſe men can be ſo impudent, as to tell his majeſty, that we have done nothing for him.

" 154. As to the ſecond branch of this ſlander, we acknowledge with much thankfulneſs, that his majeſty hath paſſed more good bills to the advantage of his ſubjects than have been in many ages.

" 155. But withal, we cannot forget that thoſe venomous counſels did manifeſt themſelves in ſome endeavours to hinder theſe good acts.

" 156. And for both houſes of parliament we may with truth and modeſty ſay thus much: that we have ever been careful not to deſire any thing that ſhould weaken the crown, either in juſt profit or uſeful power.

" 157. The triennial parliament for the matter of it, doth not extend to ſo much, as by law we ought to have required, there being two ſtatutes ſtill in force for the parliament to be once a year (25.) and for the manner of it, it is in the king's power, that it ſhall never take effect, if he, by a timely ſummons, ſhall prevent any other way of aſſembling. (26.)

Rem. (25.) But theſe ſtatutes, by diſuſe, were grown obſolete, like that of Edward II. on which the king proceeded to compel the people to receive the order of knighthood.

Rem. (26.) The commons might have ſaid, that he was himſelf the cauſe of this act, for not calling a parliament in twelve years.

" 158. In the bill for continuance of this preſent parliament, there ſeems to be ſome reſtraint of the royal power in diſſolving of parliaments, not to take it out of the crown, but to ſuſpend the execution of it for this time and occaſion only; which was ſo neceſſary for the king's own ſecurity, and the public peace, that without it we could not have undertaken any of theſe great charges, but muſt have left both the armies to diſorder and confuſion, and the whole kingdom to blood and rapine. (27.)

Rem. (27.) The commons underſtand here more than they expreſs. Their aim is to ſhew, that without this act, the king would not have failed to diſſolve the parliament; conſequently the peace with Scotland would not have been concluded, and the two armies would have ravaged the kingdom.

" 159. The ſtar-chamber was much more fruitful in oppreſſion than in profit, the great fines being for the moſt part given away, and the reſt ſtalled at long times.

" 160. The fines of the high-commiſſion were in themſelves unjuſt, and ſeldom or never came into the king's purſe. Theſe four bills are particularly and more ſpecially inſtanced.

" 161. In the reſt there will not be found ſo much as a ſhadow of prejudice to the crown.

" 162. They have ſought to diminiſh our reputation with the people, and to bring them out of love with parliaments.

" 163. The aſperſions which they have attempted this way have been ſuch as theſe;

" 164. That we have ſpent much time and done little, eſpecially in thoſe grievances which concern religion.

" 165. That the parliament is a burthen to the kingdom, by the abundance of protections which hinder juſtice and trade (28.) and by many ſubſidies granted, much more heavy than formerly endured.

Rem. (28.) Every member of parliament had a right to grant protections to his ſervants and dependents, ſo that they cannot be proſecuted in any courts. It is certain, this right was abuſed by many members, in granting protections to perſons without any lawful foundation; nay, ſome even ſold them.

" 166. To which there is a ready anſwer, if the time ſpent in this parliament, be conſidered in relation backward to the long growth and deep root of thoſe grievances which we have removed, to the powerful ſupports of thoſe delinquents which we have purſued, to the great neceſſities and other charges of the common-wealth, for which we have provided;

" 167. Or if it be conſidered in relation forward to many advantages, which not only the preſent, but future ages are like to reap by the good laws, and other proceedings in this parliament

parliament; we doubt not but it will be thought by all indifferent judgments, that our time hath been much better employed, than in a far greater proportion of time in many former parliaments put together, and the charges which have been laid upon the ſubjects, and the other inconveniencies which they have borne, will ſeem very light in reſpect of the benefit they have and may receive.

" 168. And for the matter of protection, the parliament is ſo ſenſible of it, that therein they intend to give them whatſoever eaſe may ſtand with honour and juſtice, and are in way of paſſing a bill to give them ſatisfaction.

" 169. They have ſought by many ſubtile practices to cauſe jealouſies and diviſions betwixt us and our brethren of Scotland, by ſlandering their proceedings and intentions toward us, and by ſecret endeavours to inſtigate and incenſe them and us one againſt another.

" 170. They have had ſuch a party of biſhops and popiſh lords in the houſe of peers, as hath cauſed much oppoſition and delay in the proſecution of delinquents, hindered the proceedings of divers good bills paſſed in the commons houſe, concerning the reformation of ſundry great abuſes and corruptions both in church and ſtate.

" 171. They have laboured to ſeduce and corrupt ſome of the commons houſe, to draw them into conſpiracies and combinations againſt the liberty of the parliament.

" 172. And by their inſtruments and agents, they have attempted to diſaffect and diſcontent his majeſty's army; and to engage it for the maintenance of their wicked and traiterous deſigns; the keeping up of biſhops in votes and functions, and by force to compel the parliament to order, limit, and diſpoſe their proceedings in ſuch manner, as might beſt concur with the intentions of this dangerous, and potent faction.

" 173. And when one miſchievous deſign and attempt of theirs, to bring on the army againſt the parliament, and the city of London, hath been diſcovered and prevented;

" 174. They preſently undertook another of the ſame damnable nature, with this addition to it, to endeavour to make the Scotiſh army neutral, whilſt, the Engliſh army, which they had laboured to corrupt and invenom againſt us, by their falſe and ſlanderous ſuggeſtions, ſhould execute their malice, to the ſubverſion of our religion, and the diſſolution of our government.

" 175. Thus they have been continually practiſing to diſturb the peace, and plotting the deſtruction even of all the king's dominions; and have employed their emiſſaries and agents in them all, for the promoting their deviliſh deſigns, which the vigilancy of thoſe who were well affected, hath ſtill diſcovered and defeated, before they were ripe for execution in England and Scotland.

" 176. Only in Ireland, which was farther off, they have had time and opportunity to mould and prepare their work, and had brought it to that perfection, that they had poſſeſſed themſelves of that whole kingdom, totally ſubverted the government of it, rooted out religion, and deſtroyed all the proteſtants, whom the conſcience of their duty to God, their king and country, would not have permitted to join with them, if by God's wonderful providence their main enterprize upon the city and caſtle of Dublin had not been detected and prevented upon the very eve before it ſhould have been executed.

" 177. Notwithſtanding they have, in other parts of that kingdom, broken out into open rebellion, ſuppriſing towns and caſtles, committed murders, and rapes, and other villanies, and ſhaken off all bonds of obedience to his majeſty and the laws of the realm. (29.)

Rem. (29.) The commons, in theſe two laſt articles, conſider the malignant party of England as the principal authors of the Iriſh rebellion, and artfully confound whatever had been done in England for fifteen years, and the maſſacre of Ireland in 1641, under the ſame idea, as proceeding from the ſame ſource, which was never well proved.

" 178. And in general have kindled ſuch a fire, as nothing but God's infinite bleſſing upon the wiſdom and endeavours of this ſtate will be able to quench.

" 179. And certainly had not God, in his great mercy unto this land, diſcovered and confounded their former deſigns, we had been the prologue to this tragedy in Ireland, and had by this been made the lamentable ſpectacle of miſery and confuſion.

" 180. And now what hope have we but in God, when, as the only means of our ſubſiſtence and power of reformation, is under him in the parliament?

" 181. But what can we the commons, without the conjunction of the houſe of lords; and what conjunction can we expect there, when the biſhops and recuſant lords are ſo numerous and prevalent, that they are able to croſs and interrupt our beſt endeavours for reformation, and by that means give advantage to this malignant party to traduce our proceedings?

" 182. They infuſed into the people, that we mean to aboliſh all church-government, and leave every man to his own fancy for the ſervice and worſhip of God, abſolving him of that obedience which he owes under God unto his majeſty; whom we know to be intruſted with the eccleſiaſtical law, as well as with the temporal, to regulate all the members of the church of England, by ſuch rule of order and diſcipline, as are eſtabliſhed by parliament; which is his great council, in all affairs both in church and ſtate. (30.)

Rem. (30.) It is true, the commons declare here, that their intention is not to ſet up an independency in matter of religion. But as to what concerns the government of the church they ſpeak obſcurely, becauſe it was not yet time to declare themſelves more openly. They are contented with aſſerting, that the king ought to take the parliament's advice in the affairs of the church, a maxim they intended to make great uſe of.

" 183. We confeſs our intention is, and our endeavours have been, to reduce within bounds that exorbitant power which the prelates have aſſumed unto themſelves, ſo contrary both to the word of God, and to the laws of the land; to which end we paſſed the bill for the removing them from their temporal power and employments; that ſo the better they might with weakneſs apply themſelves to the diſcharge of their functions; which bill themſelves oppoſe, and were the principal inſtruments of croſſing it.

" 184. And we do here declare, that it is far from our purpoſe or deſire, to let looſe the golden reins of diſcipline and government in the church, to leave private perſons or particular congregations, to take up what form of divine ſervice they pleaſe; for we hold it requiſites, that there ſhould be throughout the whole realm a conformity to that order which the laws enjoin according to the word of God. (13.) And we deſire to unburthen the conſciences of men of needleſs and ſuperſtitious ceremonies, ſuppreſs innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry.

Rem. (31.) Great uſe was afterwards made of this reſtriction, " according to the word of God," to introduce greater alterations than thoſe mentioned in this article.

" 185. And the better to effect the intended reformation, we deſire there may be a general ſynod of the moſt grave, pious, learned, and judicious divines of this iſland; aſſiſted with ſome from foreign parts, profeſſing the ſame religion with us; who may conſider of all things neceſſary for the peace and good government of the church, and repreſent the reſults of their conſultations unto the parliament, to be there allowed of and confirmed, and receive the ſtamp of authority, thereby to find paſſage and obedience throughout the kingdom. (32.)

Rem. (32.) The commons diſcovered here more clearly their intentions, in that, 1. It does not appear that they would admit biſhops into this ſynod. 2. In that they would have it to conſiſt of divines of the iſland, and conſequently of Scots, who were all preſbyterians, and of ſome foreign miniſters who were ſo too.

" 186. They have maliciouſly charged us, that we intend to deſtroy and diſcourage learning; whereas it is our chiefeſt care and deſire to advance it; and to provide a competent maintenance for conſcionable and preaching miniſters throughout the kingdom, which will be a great encouragement to ſcholars, and a certain means whereby the want, meanneſs, and ignorance, to which a great part of the clergy is now ſubject, will be prevented.

" 187. And we intend likewiſe to reform and purge the fountains of learning the two univerſities, that the ſtreams flowing from thence may be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land. (33.)

Rem. (33.) It is certain, at the time this remonſtrance was publiſhed, the reſolution of aboliſhing the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy was already taken, though it was not yet openly declared. Accordingly, the deſign to purge the two univerſities was executed, by turning out the heads and profeſſors of the church of England, and putting in preſbyterians.

" 188. They have ſtrained to blaſt our proceedings in parliament, by wreſting the interpretations of our orders from their genuine intention.

" 189. They tell the people, that our meddling with the power of epiſcopacy, hath cauſed ſectaries and conventicles, when idolatry and popiſh ceremonies introduced into the church by the command of the biſhops, have not only debarred barred the people from thence, but expelled them from the kingdom.

" 190. Thus with Eliab, we are called by this malignant party the troubles of the ſtate, and ſtill, while we endeavour to reform their abuſes, they make us the authors of thoſe miſchiefs we ſtudy to prevent.

" 191. For the perfecting of the work begun, and removing all future impediments, we conceive theſe courſes will be very effectual, ſeeing the religion of the papiſts hath ſuch principles as do certainly tend to the deſtruction and extirpation of all proteſtants, when they ſhall have opportunity to effect it.

" 192. It is neceſſary in the firſt place to keep them in ſuch condition, as that they may not be able to do us any hurt, and for avoiding of ſuch connivance and favour as hath hitherto been ſhewed unto them.

" 193. That his majeſty be pleaſed to grant a ſtanding commiſſion to ſome choice men named in parliament, who may take notice of their increaſe, their counſels and proceedings, and uſe all due means by execution of the laws, to prevent all miſchievous deſigns againſt the peace and ſafety of this kingdom.

" 194. That ſome good courſe be taken to diſcover the counterfeit and falſe conformity of papiſts to the church, by colour whereof, perſons very much diſaffected to the true religion, have been admitted into places of greateſt truſt and authority in the kingdom.

" 195. For the better preſervation of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, that all the illegal grievances and exactions be preſented and puniſhed at the ſeſſions and aſſizes.

" 196. And that judges and juſtices be very careful to give this in charge to the grand juries, and both the ſheriffs and juſtices to be ſworn to the due execution of the petition of right, and other laws.

" 197. That his majeſty be humbly petitioned by both houſes, to employ ſuch counſellors, embaſſadors, and other miniſters in managing his buſineſs at home and abroad, as the parliament may have cauſe to confide in, without which we cannot give his majeſty ſuch ſupplies for ſupport of his own eſtate, nor ſuch aſſiſtance to the proteſtant party beyond the ſea, as is deſired.

" 198. It may often fall out, that the commons may have juſt cauſe to take exceptions at ſome men for being counſellors, and yet not charge thoſe men with crimes, for there be grounds of diffidence which lay not in proof.

" 199. There are others, which though they may be proved yet are not legally criminal.

" 200. To be a known favourer of papiſts, or to have been very forward in defending and countenancing ſome great offenders queſtioned in parliament; or to ſpeak contemptuouſly of either houſes of parliament, or parliamentary proceedings: (34.)

Rem. (34.) It is not unlikely the commons meant here the lord Digby, ſon to the earl of Briſtol.

" 201. Or ſuch as are factors or agents for any foreign prince of another religion; ſuch as are juſtly ſuſpected to get counſellors places, or any other of truſt, concerning public employment for money; for all theſe and divers others, we may have great reaſon to be earneſt with his majeſty, not to put his great affairs into ſuch hands, though we may be unwilling to proceed againſt them in any legal way of charge or impeachment.

" 202. That all counſellors of ſtate may be ſworn to obſerve thoſe laws which concern the ſubject in his liberty, that they may likewiſe take an oath not to receive, or give reward or penſion from any foreign prince, but ſuch as they ſhall within ſome reaſonable time diſcover to the lords of his majeſty's council.

" 203. And although they ſhould wickedly forſwear themſelves, yet it may herein do good to make them known to be falſe and perjured to thoſe who employed them, and thereby bring them into as little credit with them as with us.

" 204. That his majeſty may have cauſe to be in love with good counſel and good men, by ſhewing him, in an humble and dutiful manner, how full of advantage it would be to himſelf, to ſee his own eſtate ſettled in a plentiful condition to ſupport his honour: to ſee his people united in ways of duty to him, and endeavours of the public good; to ſee happineſs, wealth, peace and ſafety derived to his own kingdom, and procured to his allies by the influence of his own power and government."

It is eaſy to perceive, after reading this remonſtrance or declaration, that it was a real manifeſto againſt the king, under the name of the counſellors, miniſters, and malignants. And therefore, before we proceed, it is reaſonable to ſhew the reader the king's anſwer to the petition which accompanied the remonſtrance, and then to the remonſtrance itſelf.

" His majeſty's anſwer to the petition, which accompanied the declaration preſented to him at Hampton-Court, December 1, 1641.

" WE having received from you, ſoon after our return out of Scotland, a long petition, conſiſting of many deſires of great moment, together with a declaration of a very unuſual nature annexed thereunto, we had taken ſome time to conſider of it, as befitted us in a matter of that conſequence, being confident that your own reaſon and regard to us, as well as our expreſs intimation, by our controller, to that purpoſe, would have reſtrained you from the publiſhing of it, till ſuch time as you ſhould have received our anſwer to it; but much againſt our expectation, finding the contrary, that the ſaid declaration is already abroad in print, by directions from your houſe, as appears by the printed copy, we muſt let you know, that we are very ſenſible of the diſreſpect.

" Notwithſtanding it is our intention, that no failing on your part ſhall make us fail in ours, of giving all due ſatisfaction to the deſires of our people in a parliamentary way; and therefore we ſend you this anſwer to your petition, reſerving ourſelf in point of the declaration, which we think unparliamentary, and ſhall take a courſe to do that which we ſhall think fit in prudence and honour.

" To the petition we ſay, That although there are divers things in the preamble of it, which we are ſo far from admitting, that we profeſs we cannot at all underſtand them, as of a 'wicked and malignant party prevalent in the government; of ſome of that party admitted to our privy-council, and to other employments of truſt, and neareſt to us and our children; of endeavours to ſow among the people falſe ſcandals and imputations, to blemiſh and diſgrace the proceedings of the parliament:' All, or any of which, did we know of, we ſhould be as ready to remedy and puniſh, as you to complain of; ſo that the prayers of your petition are grounded upon ſuch premiſes, as we muſt in no wiſe admit; yet notwithſtanding, we are pleaſed to give this anſwer to you. (1.)

Rem. (1.) This ſo general anſwer of the king was not capable of combating the particular facts, whereby the commons pretended to prove, in the remonſtrance, that for ſeveral years paſt, the court or malignant party had endeavoured to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government.

" To the firſt, concerning religion, conſiſting of ſeveral branches, we ſay, that for preſerving the peace and ſafety of this kingdom from the deſigns of the popiſh party, we have, and will ſtill concur with all the juſt deſires of our people in a parliamentary way: (2.) That for the depriving of the biſhops of their votes in parliament, we would have you conſider, that their right is grounded upon the fundamental law of the kingdom, and conſtitution of parliament: This we would have you conſider; but ſince you deſire our concurrence herein in a parliamentary way we will give no further anſwer at this time.

Rem. (2.) It is true, the king had never rejected the petitions preſented to him on this occaſion by the parliament, but had always granted whatever was deſired. But then it is no leſs true, that his promiſes in this reſpect had never been executed. Wherefore the parliament did not complain of want of concurrence, but of want of performance. So the king's anſwer as to his concurrence was not properly to the purpoſe.

" As for the abridging of the inordinate power of the clergy, we conceive that the taking away of the high-commiſſion-court hath well moderated that; but if they continue any uſurpations or exceſſes in their juriſdictions, we therein neither have, nor will, protect them. (3.)

Rem. (3.) It would have been very difficult to agree with the king upon what ſhould be conſidered as uſurpations or exceſſes in the juriſdiction of the clergy. So the king properly bound himſelf to nothing by this general promiſe.

" Unto that clauſe which concerneth corruptions (as you ſtile them) in religion, in church-government, and in diſcipline, and the removing of ſuch neceſſary ceremonies as weak conſciences might check; that for any illegal innovations which may have crept in, we ſhall willingly concur in the removal of them: That if our parliament ſhall adviſe us to call a national ſynod, which may duly examine ſuch ceremonies as give juſt cauſe of offence to any, we ſhall take into conſideration, and apply ourſelf to give due ſatisfaction therein; (4.) but we are very ſorry to hear in ſuch general terms, corruption in religion objected, ſince we are perſuaded in our conſcience, that no church can be found upon the earth that profeſſeth the true religion with more purity of doctrine than the church of England doth, nor where the government and diſcipline are jointly more beautiful, and free from ſuperſtition, than as they are here eſtabliſhed by law; which by the grace of God we will with conſtancy maintain (while we live) in their purity and glory, not only againſt all invaſions of popery, but alſo from the irreverence of thoſe many ſchiſmatics and ſeparatiſts, wherewith of late this kingdom and this city abounds, to the great diſhonour and hazard, both of church and ſtate, for the ſuppreſſion of whom we require your timely aid and active aſſiſtance.

Rem. (4.) Another general anſwer which ſignifies nothing.

"To the ſecond prayer of the petition, concerning the removal and choice of counſellors, we know not any of our council to whom the character ſet forth in the petition can belong? That by thoſe whom we had expoſed to trial, we have already given you ſufficient teſtimony, that there is no man ſo near unto us in place or affection, whom we will not leave to the juſtice of the law, if you ſhall bring a particular charge, and ſufficient proofs againſt him; and of this we do again aſſure you, but in the mean time we wiſh you to forbear ſuch general aſperſions, as may reflect upon all our council, ſince you name none in particular.

"That for the choice of our counſellors and miniſters of ſtate, it were to debar us that natural liberty all freemen have; and as it is the undoubted right of the crown of England, to call ſuch perſons to our ſecret councils, to public employment, and our particular ſervice, as we ſhall think fit; ſo we are, and ever ſhall be very careful, to make election of ſuch perſons in thoſe places of truſt, as ſhall have given good teſtimonies of their abilities and integrity, and againſt whom there can be no juſt cauſe of exception, whereon reaſonably to ground a diffidence; and to choices of this nature, we aſſur you that the mediation of the neareſt unto us hath always concurred. (5.)

Rem. (5.) He means the queen.

"To the third prayer of your petition concerning Ireland, we underſtand your deſire of not alienating the forfeited lands thereof, to proceed from much care and love, and likewiſe that it may be a reſolution very fit for us to take; but whether it be ſeaſonable to declare reſolutions of that nature, before the events of a war be ſeen, that we much doubt of. Howſoever, we cannot but thank you for this care, and your chearful engagement for the ſuppreſſion of that rebellion; upon the ſpeedy effecting whereof, the glory of God in the proteſtant profeſſion, the ſafety of the Britiſh arms, our honour, and that of the nation ſo much depends; all the intereſts of this kingdom being ſo involved in that buſineſs, we cannot but quicken your affections therein, and ſhall deſire you to frame your counſels to give ſuch expedition to the work, as the nature thereof, and the preſſures in point of time require; and whereof you are put in mind by the daily inſolence and increaſe of thoſe rebels.

"For concluſion; you promiſe to apply yourſelves to ſuch courſes as may ſupport our royal eſtate with honour and plenty at home, and with power and reputation abroad, is that which we have ever promiſed ourſelf, both from your loyalties and affections, and alſo for what we have already done, and ſhall daily go adding unto, for the comfort and happineſs of our people."

The anſwer to the remonſtrance did not appear till ſome time after; for as far as I can conjecture, it was not ſent to the commons before January 1641-2. I ſhall however inſert it in this place, as well not to divide this matter, as that the anſwer may be read before the remonſtrance is forgot.

"The king's declaration in anſwer to the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom.

"ALTHOUGH we do not believe that our houſe of commons intended, by their remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, to put us to any apology, either for our paſt or preſent actions; notwithſtanding ſince they have thought it ſo very neceſſary (upon their obſervation of the preſent diſtempers) to publiſh the ſame, for the ſatisfaction of all our loving ſubjects, we have thought it very ſuitable to the duty of our place (with which God hath truſted us) to do our part to ſo good a work, in which we ſhall not think it below our kingly dignity to deſcend to any particular, which may compoſe and ſettle the affections of our meaneſt ſubjects, ſince we are ſo conſcious to ourſelf of ſuch upright intentions and endeavours, and only of ſuch (for which we give God thanks) for the peace and happineſs of our kingdom, in which the proſperity of our ſubjects muſt be included, that we wiſh from our heart, that even our moſt ſecret thoughts were publiſhed to their view and examination: Though we muſt confeſs, we cannot but be very ſorry in this conjuncture of time, (when the unhappineſs of this kingdom is ſo generally underſtood abroad) there ſhould be ſuch a neceſſity of publiſhing ſo many particulars, from which we pray, no inconveniencies may enſue, that were not intended.

"We ſhall in a few words paſs over that part of the narrative, wherein the misfortunes of this kingdom, from our firſt entering to the crown to the beginning of this parliament, are remembered in ſo ſenſible expreſſions. (1.) And that other which acknowledgeth the many good laws paſſed by our grace and favour this parliament, for the ſecurity of our people; of which we ſhall only ſay thus much, that as we have not refuſed to paſs any bill preſented to us by our parliament, for redreſs of thoſe grievances mentioned in the remonſtrance; ſo we have not had a greater motive for the paſſing thoſe laws than our own reſolution (grounded upon our obſervation, and underſtanding the ſtate of our kingdom) to have freed our ſubjects, for the future, from thoſe preſſures which were grievous to them if thoſe laws had not been propounded, (2.) which therefore we ſhall as inviolably maintain, as we look to have our own rights preſerved, not doubting but that all our loving ſubjects will look on thoſe remedies, with that full gratitude and affection, that even the memory of what they have formerly undergone, by the accidents and neceſſities of thoſe times, will not be unpleaſant to them: And poſſibly in a pious ſenſe of God's bleſſing upon this nation (how little ſhare ſoever we ſhall have of the acknowledgment) they will confeſs they have enjoyed a great meaſure of happineſs (even theſe laſt ſixteen years) both in peace and plenty, not only comparatively in reſpect of their neighbours, but even of thoſe times which were juſtly accounted fortunate. The fears and jealouſies which may make ſome impreſſion in the minds of our people, we will ſuppoſe may be of two ſorts; either for religion or liberty and their civil intereſt. The fears for religion may happly be, nor only as ours here eſtabliſhed may be invaded by the Romiſh party, but as it is accompanied with ſome ceremonies, at which ſome tender conſciences really are, or pretended to be ſcandalized; for of any other which have been uſed, without any legal warrant or injunction, and already are, or ſpeedily may be, aboliſhed, we ſhall not ſpeak.

Remark (1.) The king could not more ingenuouſly own what is ſaid in the remonſtrance, concerning the firſt fifteen years of his reign, than by entirely paſſing it over without anſwer.

Rem. (2.) This is alſo a confeſſion that grievances were juſtly complained of. The king ſays, his reſolution was to redreſs them, and it was not poſſible to convict him of the contrary. But after all, he was believed but by few perſons.

"Concerning religion, as there may be any ſuſpicion of favour or inclination to the papiſts, we are willing to declare to all the world, that as we have been from our childhood brought up in, and practiſed the religion now eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, ſo it is well known, we have (not contented ſimply with the principles of our education) given a good proportion of our time and pains, to the examination of the grounds of this religion, as it is different from that of Rome, and are from our ſoul ſo fully ſatisfied and aſſured that it is the moſt pure and agreeable to the ſacred word of God, of any religion now practiſed in the chriſtian world: that as we believe we can maintain the ſame by unanſwerable reaſons, ſo we hope we ſhould readily ſeal to it by the effuſion of our blood, if it pleaſed God to call us to that ſacrifice. And therefore nothing can be ſo acceptable unto us, as any propoſition which may contribute to the advancement of it here, or the propagation of it abroad, being the only means to draw down a bleſſing from God upon ourſelves and this nation. And we have been extremely unfortunate, if this profeſſion of ours be wanting to our people: our conſtant practice in our own perſon, having always been (without oſtentation) as much to the evidence of our care and duty herein, as we could poſſibly tell how to expreſs. (3.)

Rem. (3.) The remonſtrance did not accuſe the king of being a papiſt in his heart, 'But of having countenanced the catholics, by not executing the laws againſt them.' He clears himſelf here from being inclined to the Romiſh religion, and leaves the conſequence to be drawn, that ſince he is perſuaded of the truth of the proteſtant religion, it is not poſſible he ſhould encourage the Roman. But his conduct had ſhewn that this conſequence did not neceſſarily follow, ſince it was notorious, he had countenanced the papiſts, from the beginning of his reign, out of complaiſance to the queen, or from ſome political views.

"For differences among ourſelves, for matters indifferent in their own nature concerning religion, we ſhall, in tenderneſs to any number of our loving ſubjects, very willingly comply comply with the advice of our parliament, that ſome law may be made for the exemption of tender conſciences from puniſhment, or perſecution for ſuch ceremonies, and in ſuch caſes, which by the judgment of moſt men, are held to be matters indifferent, and of ſome to be abſolutely unlawful. Provided that this caſe be attempted and purſued with that modeſty, temper and ſubmiſſion, that in the mean time the peace and quiet of the kingdom be not diſturbed, the decency and comelineſs of God's ſervice diſcountenanced, nor the pious, ſober, and devout actions of thoſe reverend perſons who were the firſt labourers in the bleſſed reformation, or of that time, be ſcandaled and defamed, (4.) for we cannot, without grief of heart, and without ſome tax upon ourſelf, and our miniſters, for the not execution of our laws, look upon the bold licence of ſome men, in printing of pamphlets, in preaching and printing of ſermons, ſo full of bitterneſs and malice againſt the preſent government, againſt the laws eſtabliſhed, ſo full of ſedition againſt ourſelf, and the peace of the kingdom, that we are many times amazed to conſider by what eyes theſe things are ſeen, and by what ears they are heard. And therefore we have good cauſe to command, as we have done, and hereby do, all our judges and miniſters of juſtice, our attorney and ſolicitor-general, and the reſt of our learned council, to proceed with all ſpeed againſt ſuch, and their abettors, who either by writing or words, have ſo boldly and maliciouſly violated the laws, diſturbed the peace of the common-wealth, and as much as in them lies, ſhaken the very foundation upon which that peace and happineſs is founded and conſtituted. And we doubt not but all our loving ſubjects will be very ſenſible, that this buſy, virulent demeanor, is a fit prologue to nothing but confuſion; and if not very ſeaſonably puniſhed and prevented, will not only be a blemiſh to that wholeſome accommodation we intend, but an unſpeakable ſcandal and imputation, even upon the profeſſion and religion of this our kingdom of England.

Rem. (4.) The king was not in the wrong to ſupport the eſtabliſhed worſhip, and to regard as an indulgence whatever ſhould be granted to tender conſciences. But after all, this indulgence was reduced to a very ſmall matter, if we conſider all the limitations contained in this article.

"Concerning the civil liberties and intereſts of our ſubjects, we ſhall need to ſay leſs, having erected ſo many laſting monuments of our princely and fatherly care of our people, in thoſe many excellent laws paſſed by us this parliament, which in truth (with very much content to ourſelf) we conceive to be ſo large and ample, that very many ſober men have very little left to wiſh for.

"We underſtood well the right, and pretences of right, we departed from, in the conſenting to the bills of the triennial parliament, for the continuance of this preſent parliament, and in the preamble to the bill of tunnage and poundage. The matter of which having begot ſo many diſturbances in late parliaments, we were willing to remove, that no intereſt of ours might hereafter break that correſpondence, abundantly contenting ourſelf with an aſſurance (which we ſtill have) that we ſhould be repaired and ſupplied by a juſt proportion of confidence, bounty, and obedience of our people. In the bills for the taking away the high-commiſſion and ſtar-chamber courts, we believe we had given that real ſatisfaction, that all jealouſies and apprehenſions of arbitrary preſſures under the civil or eccleſiaſtical ſtate, would eaſily have been abandoned, eſpecially when they ſaw all poſſible doubts ſecured by the viſitation of a triennial parliament.

"Theſe and others of no mean conſideration, we had rather ſhould be valued in the hearts and affections of our people, than in any mention of our own; not doubting, but as we have taken all theſe occaſions to render their condition moſt comfortable and happy, ſo they will always, in a grateful and dutiful relation, be ready with equal tenderneſs and alacrity to advance our rights and preſerve our honour, upon which their own ſecurity and ſubſiſtance ſo much depends. And we will be ſo careful, that no particular ſhall be preſented unto us, for the completing and eſtabliſhing that ſecurity, to which we will not with the ſame readineſs contribute our beſt aſſiſtance.

"If theſe reſolutions be the effects of our preſent counſels (and we take God to witneſs, that they are ſuch, and that all our loving ſubjects may confidently expect the benefit of them from us) certainly no ill deſign upon the public can accompany ſuch reſolution, neither will there be greater cauſe of ſuſpicion of any perſons preferred by us to degrees of honour and places of truſt and employment ſince this parliament. And we muſt confeſs, that amongſt our misfortunes we reckon it not the leaſt, that having not retained in our ſervice, nor protected any one perſon, againſt whom our parliament hath excepted during the whole ſitting of it, and having in all that time ſcarce vouchſafed to any man an inſtance of our grace and favour but to ſuch who were under ſome eminent character of eſtimation among our people, there ſhould ſo ſoon be any miſunderſtanding or jealouſy of their fidelity and uprightneſs, eſpecially in a time when we take all occaſions to declare, that we conceive ourſelf only capable of being ſerved by honeſt men and in honeſt ways. However, if in truth we have been miſtaken in ſuch our election, the particular ſhall be no ſooner diſcovered to us, either by our own obſervation, or other certain information, than we will leave them to public juſtice, under the marks of our diſpleaſure.

"If notwithſtanding this, any malignant party ſhall take heart, and be willing to ſacrifice the peace and happineſs of their country to their own ſiniſter ends and ambitions, under what pretence of religion and conſcience ſoever; if they ſhall endeavour to leſſen our reputation and intereſt, and to weaken our lawful power and authority with our good ſubjects; if they ſhall go about by diſcountenancing the preſent laws to looſen the bands of government, that all diſorder and confuſion may break in upon us, we doubt not but God in his good time will diſcover them unto us; and the wiſdom and courage of our high court of parliament join with us in their ſuppreſſion and puniſhment.

"Having now ſaid all that we can to expreſs the clearneſs and uprightneſs of our intentions to our people, and done all we can to manifeſt thoſe intentions, we cannot but confidently believe all our good ſubjects will acknowledge our part to be fully performed, both in deeds paſt, and preſent reſolutions, to do whatſoever with juſtice may be required of us, and that their quiet and proſperity depends now wholly upon themſelves, and is in their own power, by yielding all obedience and due reverence to the law, which is the inheritance of every ſubject, and the only ſecurity he can have for his life, liberty, or eſtate, and the which being neglected or diſeſteemed (under what ſpecious ſhows ſoever) a very great meaſure of infelicity, if not an irreparable confuſion, muſt without doubt fall upon them. And we doubt not, it will be the moſt acceptable declaration a king can make to his ſubjects, that for our part we are reſolved not only duly to obſerve the laws ourſelf, but to maintain them againſt what oppoſition ſoever, though with the hazard of our being. (5.)

Rem. (5.) Unhappily for the king, theſe general promiſes, to which he could give what ſenſe he thought proper, produced not the effect upon the commons he expected, or rather they produced the quite contrary, and increaſed their diſtruſt. This the reader will be convinced of, when he comes to ſee what had paſſed, probably, before this declaration was publiſhed.

"And our hope is, that not only the loyalty and good affections of all our loving ſubjects will concur with us in the conſtant preſerving a good underſtanding between us and our people, but at this time, their own and our intereſt, and compaſſion of the lamentable condition of our poor proteſtant ſubjects in Ireland, will invite them to a fair intelligence and unity amongſt themſelves, that ſo we may with one heart intend the relieving and recovering that unhappy kingdom, where thoſe barbarous rebels practiſe ſuch inhuman and unheard-of outrages upon our miſerable people, that no Chriſtian ear can hear without horror, nor ſtory parallel. And as we look upon this as the greateſt affliction that hath pleaſed God to lay upon us, ſo our unhappineſs is increaſed, in that, by the diſtempers at home, ſo early remedies have not been applied to thoſe growing evils, as the expectation and neceſſity there requires, though for our part, as we did upon the firſt notice acquaint our parliament of Scotland (where we then were) with that rebellion, requiring their aid and aſſiſtance, and gave like ſpeedy intimation and recommendation to our parliament here; ſo, ſince our return hither, we have been forward to all things which have been propoſed to us towards that work, and have lately ourſelf offered (by a meſſage to our houſe of peers, and communicated to our houſe of commons) to take upon us the care to raiſe ſpeedily ten thouſand Engliſh volunteers for that ſervice, if the houſe of commons ſhall declare that they will pay them; (6.) which particulars we are (in a manner) neceſſitated to publiſh, ſince we are informed, that the malice of ſome perſons have whiſpered it abroad, that no ſpeedier advancing of the buſineſs hath proceeded from ſome want of alacrity in us to this great work; whereas we acknowledge it a high crime againſt Almighty God, and inexcuſable to our good ſubjects of our three kingdoms, if we did not to the utmoſt employ all our powers and faculties to the ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual aſſiſtance and protection of that diſtreſſed people.

Rem. (6.) It appears by this paſſage, that this anſwer was not publiſhed till after the king's offer of levying ten thouſand men for Ireland, that is to ſay in January 1641-2.

And

" And we ſhall now conjure all our good ſubjects (of what degree ſoever) by all the bonds of love, duty or obedience, that are precious to good men, to join with us for the recovery of the peace of that kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace of this, to remove all their doubts and fears, which may interrupt their affection to us, and all their jealouſies and apprehenſions, which may leſſen their charity to each other, and then (if the ſins of this nation have not prepared an inevitable judgment for us all) God will yet make us a great and glorious king, over a free and happy people."

The bare reading of this declaration ſufficiently ſhews the king had no intention to give a particular anſwer to the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, which contained ſo many different articles untouched by the king's declaration. And perhaps he would never have given any anſwer, if his enemies had not triumphed on his ſilence. He thought proper therefore to publiſh this declaration, that he might ſay he had anſwered the remonſtrance, and not with deſign to anſwer it indeed; and beſides, he publiſhed it not till long after the remonſtrance was received. Mean while, the commons publiſhing this paper againſt his will, made a deep impreſſion on his mind, and convinced him they had ſome grand deſign ſince they had ſo little regard for him.

It was not very ſtrange that the king ſhould be highly diſpleaſed with a remonſtrance, which was properly but a ſeries of reproaches for his paſt conduct, and againſt his government: with a remonſtrance, not directed to himſelf, but to the public, the authors whereof only meant to incenſe the people againſt him, and which was made at a time when it ſeemed to be moſt unneceſſary. Accordingly, the beginning of the breach between the king and the parliament is properly to be dated from this time, though on both ſides ſome meaſures were yet kept.

Next day, the 2d of December, the king coming to the parliament, the ſpeaker preſented to him the bill for tunnage and poundage for ſome months only, wherein the king expreſly owned he had till then levied theſe duties without a legal power. He made, on this occaſion, a fine ſpeech, full of his majeſty's praiſes for his goodneſs and affection to his people: after which the king ſpake in the following manner to both houſes.

" My lords, and gentlemen,

" I THINK it fit, after ſo long abſence, at this firſt occaſion to ſpeak a few words unto you; but it is in no ways in anſwer to Mr. Speaker's learned ſpeech.

" Albeit I have ſtaid longer than I expected to have done when I went away, yet in this I have kept my promiſe with you, that I have made all the haſte back again, that the ſettling of my Scotch affairs could any ways permit: in which I have had ſo good ſucceſs, that I will confidently affirm to you that I have left that nation a moſt peaceable and contented people: ſo that although I have a little miſreckoned in time, yet I was not deceived in my end.

" But if I have deceived your expectation a little in the time of my return, I am aſſured that my expectation is as much and more deceived in the condition wherein I hoped to have found ſome buſineſſes at my return: for that ſince before my going I ſettled the liberties of my ſubjects, and gave the laws a free and orderly courſe, I expected to have found my people reaping the fruits of theſe benefits, by living in quietneſs and ſatisfaction of mind: but inſtead of this, I find them diſturbed with jealouſies, frights, and alarms of dangerous deſigns and plots; in conſequence of which, guards have been ſet to defend both houſes. I ſay not this as in doubt that my ſubjects affections are any way leſſened unto me in this time of my abſence, for I cannot but remember, to my great comfort, the joyful reception I had now at my entry into London; but rather, as I hope, that my preſence will eaſily diſperſe theſe fears: for I bring as perfect and true affections to my people as ever prince, or as good ſubjects can poſſibly deſire. And I am ſo far from repenting me of any act I have done in this ſeſſion for the good of my people, that I proteſt, if it were to do again, I would do it; and will yet grant what elſe can be juſtly deſired, for ſatisfaction in point of liberties, or in maintenance of the true religion that is here eſtabliſhed.

" Now I have but one particular to recommend unto you at this time, it is Ireland; for which, though I doubt not your care, yet methinks the preparations for it go but ſlowly on. The occaſion is the fitter for me now to mention, becauſe of the arrival of two lords from Scotland, who come inſtructed from my council there (who now by act of parliament have full power for that purpoſe) to anſwer that demand which it pleaſed both houſes to make me by way of petition, that met me at Berwick, and which the duke of Richmond ſent back by my command to my Scotiſh council: therefore my deſire is, that both houſes would appoint a ſelect committee to end this buſineſs with theſe noblemen.

" I muſt conclude in telling you, that I ſeek my people's happineſs; for their flouriſhing is my greateſt glory, and their affections my greateſt ſtrength."

It was not without great reaſon that the king reſolved to teſtify an extreme zeal for the public good, ſince the remonſtrance of the commons plainly taught him that endeavours were uſing to make him forfeit the love of the people. It was therefore neceſſary to countermine the deſigns of his enemies, by repeated aſſurances of a great affection for his people, and by intimating he had entirely changed his principles and maxims. But herein he had one great diſadvantage, in that for his future behaviour he could give no other ſecurity than his word, which his enemies pretended to demonſtrate was not to be relied on. They chiefly urged, that though the king had ſolemnly given his aſſent to the petition of right, he had never executed what he promiſed. The conſequence they drew from this non-performance was ſo much the ſtronger, as the king had nothing to oppoſe to it but bare promiſes, which were of no more force than thoſe he had made with regard to that petition.

As the king had earneſtly recommended to the parliament the conſideration of the affairs of Ireland, both houſe immediately appointed a committee to treat with the Scots about ſuccours[z]. The commons in particular paſſionately deſired to negotiate with Scotland. In their preſent belief, that the king was willing to engage them to ſend an army into Ireland, in order to be more at eaſe in England, they could not find a more effectual way to break his meaſures, than to employ Scotiſh troops in the relief of that kingdom. As they had already taken the reſolution, though ſecretly of diveſting the king of great part of his power, they eaſily foreſaw that a breach would infallibly follow, and then they ſhould want the troops the king had a mind to engage them to ſend into Ireland.

After the remonſtrance, every thing manifeſtly tended to a rupture between the king and the parliament, and the commons loſt no opportunities to infuſe ſuſpicions into the people againſt the king. To this end, Daniel O'Neal, who was concerned in the plot to ſeduce the army, was voted guilty of a ſecond attempt, in June or July laſt, to perſuade the chief officers of the army to declare for the king againſt the parliament. This tended to ſhew that the king had not relinquiſhed his project, to make uſe of force to awe the parliament.

On the other hand the rebels of Ireland having, by the lord Coſtelough, preſented to the lords juſtices of that kingdom, a letter in the nature of a remonſtrance, wherein they demanded " The free exerciſe of their religion, and a repeal of all laws to the contrary," the commons made a great noiſe about it. They knew the lord Coſtelough and the lord Taaff were on their way to England, with propoſitions to be offered to the king concerning means for procuring the peace of Ireland. So, fearing, or pretending to fear, the king would grant liberty of conſcience to the Iriſh papiſts, they deſired a conference with the lords: after which it was ſolemnly declared by both houſes, that they would never conſent to any toleration of the popiſh religion in Ireland, or any other his majeſty's dominions. It is eaſy to ſee how much this tended to breed ſuſpicions of the king.

If it is ſuppoſed, as I have inſinuated, that the aim of the commons, or at leaſt of the greateſt part of the houſe, was to put it out of the king's power to govern for the future as he had governed before this parliament, and that to prepare the people for this change it was neceſſary to fill them with fears and ſuſpicions, the motives of all their proceedings, and the king's ſad ſituation will be perfectly underſtood. His ſubjects were prejudiced againſt him, and he had given but too much occaſion. Every ſtep taken by the commons tended to increaſe this prejudice: and the king, to remove it, could allege only the ſincerity of his intentions, of which many people were not convinced. This gave his enemies an advantage, which they did not fail on all occaſions to improve: nay, they deſcended even to the meaneſt trifles, to cheriſh the people's fears; for, upon information that amongſt ſome barrels of ſoap, ſent by a merchant of London to Dor-

[z] That is, with ſome Scotiſh commiſſioners, who were come from Scotland to treat with the parliament about ſuccours for Ireland. The committee appointed by the parliament were, the earls of Bedford and Leiceſter, the lord Howard of Eſcryck, and Nathaniel Fiennes, ſir William Armyne, ſir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden. Nalſon, tom. II. p. 714, 716.

cheſter, there was found a barrel of gunpowder, the houſe appointed a committee [a] to make a ſtrict inquiſition, as into a thing of the greateſt conſequence.

About the ſame time another affair happened, which gave ſome advantage againſt the king. The 8th of December he ſent to acquaint both houſes, that ſeven [b] prieſts having been condemned that week, the French embaſſador had deſired him to change the ſentence of death into that of baniſhment, upon which he deſired to have their advice. Some days after, the commons voted that the ſeven prieſts ſhould be executed, and the lords concurring with this vote, both houſes petitioned the king to order the execution. The king replied, he would baniſh the ſeven prieſts, if both houſes would give their conſent. As they did not think proper to anſwer, the king took occaſion from their ſilence to ſuſpend the execution. Two months after, the king communicated a letter to them, which ſecretary Nicholas had received from Venice, wherein he was told that the pope threatened to ſend an army into Ireland, if the prieſts were executed. Upon this menace, both houſes prayed the king once more to execute the ſeven prieſts. But he thought not proper to grant their deſire: his reaſon was, the fear of repriſals, and that this rigour might be extremely prejudicial to the Engliſh proteſtants in Ireland, who ſhould fall into the hands of the rebels. This reaſon was ſo much the weaker, as it ſerved not only for the preſent caſe, but alſo for all that ſhould offer hereafter, and tended to render the laws of no effect; beſides, the Iriſh having already maſſacred above forty thouſand Engliſh proteſtants without any cauſe, the fear of repriſals from them ſeems to have been a weak motive for pardoning theſe prieſts. Accordingly it was generally thought to be owing to the ſolicitations of the queen. Be this as it will, the prieſts were not executed; for though afterwards the king left it to both houſes to ſave or put them to death, they did not think fit either to pardon or execute. All this was extremely prejudicial to the king, ſince, at the very time that he ſolemnly proteſted he was reſolved to execute the laws, he granted his protection to theſe ſeven prieſts, legally convicted, and had no regard to the inſtances of both houſes.

At this time, I mean in December 1641, two affairs ſucceſſively employed the houſe of commons, namely, the ſuccours for Ireland, and the accuſation preſented to the lords againſt the biſhops. I ſhall only ſpeak of the firſt at preſent.

The king and parliament equally allowed the neceſſity of relieving Ireland, and all the advices from thence were a demonſtration of it. The Iriſh army was at the gates of Dublin, and had cut in pieces a body of troops ſent to Drogheda. So, in all likelihood, the lords juſtices, with their few troops, could not long reſiſt the rebels. The Scotch commiſſioners that were come to London to treat with the parliament, had offered an aid of five thouſand men, who could eaſily be ſent from Scotland into the north of Ireland, to make a diverſion, and the commons had prevailed with them to treat for ten thouſand. The deſign of the commons was to employ only Scotch troops in the reduction of Ireland, that England might not be unprovided. The king did not refuſe the aſſiſtance of Scotland, but would have England ſend into Ireland the like number of Engliſh forces, on pretence, that there was danger of the Scots ſeizing upon Ireland when the Iriſh ſhould be ſubdued. He had found means to gain the peers, ſo that when the motion was made to the lords, for ſending ten thouſand Scots into Ireland, they conſented to it provided the ſame number of Engliſh were alſo ſent thither.

The Scotch commiſſioners complaining by a memorial, that in a fortnight they had no poſitive anſwer to their offers, the commons preſſed the lords to diſpatch the affair, declaring, if they neglected it, the whole blame would fall upon them. They farther declared, that unleſs the bill for preſſing of ſoldiers paſſed, it was impoſſible for England to raiſe troops for that ſervice. Whereupon the lords debated the three following queſtions, which were all reſolved in the negative.

1. Whether this houſe ſhall conſent to ſend ten thouſand Scots into Ireland, before it can be aſcertained that ten thouſand Engliſh will be ſent thither alſo?

2. Whether this houſe ſhall conſent to ſend ten thouſand Scots before the bill for preſſing be paſſed?

3. Whether this houſe ſhall join with the commons, in ſending now ten thouſand Scots into Ireland?

The commons replied to theſe votes in a conference, that for the certainty their lordſhips deſire of ſending ten thouſand Engliſh into Ireland, the commons were not uſed to be capitulated with: That their actions are free, as well without conditions as capitulations, and deſire it may be ſo no more; That they had already given ſufficient certainty by a vote communicated to their lordſhips, and ſee no neceſſity of voting it again: That they deſire their lordſhips would vote the ſending ten thouſand Scots, without any relation to the ten thouſand Engliſh, and that ſpeedily, the preſervation of Ireland depending upon it: That they have the more reaſon to deſire this, as the Engliſh troops cannot go, unleſs the bill for preſſing paſſes. But this was not capable of making the lords depart from their former reſolution.

Mean time, the commons, who had already committed to priſon the lords Coſtelough and Taaff, (ſent to the king with propoſitions about procuring the peace of Ireland) cauſed all their papers to be examined, in their diſtruſt of the king, and no doubt in expectation of finding ſomething which might do him a prejudice [c].

At the ſame time, the king acquainted the lords, that he would engage to raiſe ten thouſand men for Ireland, if the commons would promiſe to pay them [d]. But they were far from accepting this propoſition, knowing the king meant to grant the commiſſions, and would give them to ſuch officers only as ſhould be at his devotion. So the commons choſe rather to hazard the entire loſs of Ireland, than ſend thither ten thouſand Engliſh in ſuch a juncture; and the lords choſe rather to run the riſk of ſeeing all the Engliſh driven out of that kingdom, than of ſeeing the Scots in condition to ſeize it. The king perfectly knew the motive of the commons proceedings, whilſt they were not ignorant, that the lords acted wholly by the king's direction.

Mean time, the aſſiſtance for Ireland being ſtill retarded by theſe quarrels, the commons appointed a committee to examine, from whence came the obſtacles that occurred in this affair. It was really difficult for thoſe who were not acquainted with the ſecret motives of the king and commons, to know where the blame lay, that Ireland was not relieved, ſince they ſeemed equally deſirous that a ſpeedy aid ſhould be ſent thither. The king's friends ſaid, his majeſty's offer to raiſe ten thouſand men, provided the commons would engage to pay them, was a clear evidence, that the obſtructions did not proceed from him. His enemies, on the contrary, affirmed, that the refuſal of the lords, or rather of the king, who directed them, to accept of the aid of ten thouſand Scots, on a frivolous pretence, plainly ſhewed, that the difficulties did not come from the commons, ſince they were very ready to promiſe to pay theſe auxiliaries. For my part, I am of opinion, that both king and commons thought leſs ſeriouſly of aſſiſting Ireland, than of drawing from the Iriſh rebellion private advantages, with regard to their differences. The king wiſhed the parliament would ſend a ſtrong army into Ireland, that they might find it more difficult to raiſe forces in caſe of a breach with him, of which there was but too much appearance. The commons, on their part, had prevailed with the Scots to offer ten thouſand men, in the belief, that if they were accepted, they ſhould be freed from the trouble and danger of ſending an Engliſh army into Ireland, and if they were refuſed, the delay of relief would be imputed to the king.

[1641-2.] However that be, the houſe, upon the report of the committee, found that one great obſtruction of relief to Ireland was, that the Iriſh had not been declared rebels by proclamation. Wherefore, on the 1ſt of January 1641-2, the king publiſhed a proclamation, wherein the Iriſh were expreſly called traitors and rebels. But there were only forty copies printed, which were all ſent to ſecretary Nicholas, according to an order received by the printer, to this effect:

"It is his majeſty's pleaſure, That you forthwith print on very good paper, and ſend unto me, for his majeſty's ſervice, forty copies of the proclamation incloſed, leaving convenient ſpace for his majeſty to ſign above, and to affix the privy ſignet underneath. And his majeſty's expreſs command is. That you print not above the ſaid number of forty copies, and forbear to make any further publication of them till his pleaſure be further ſignified.

For his majeſty's printer [e]. ED. NICHOLAS."

[c] The lord Dillon of Coſtelough was pitched upon by the Iriſh lords to carry over their deſires to his majeſty concerning the means of quenching the flames of the rebellion. Accordingly he embarked, in company with the lord Taaff, and at Ware their papers were ſeized by directions from the parliament, and their perſons committed; but afterwards they found means to eſcape, and waited upon his majeſty. [e] Nalſon has omitted this order to the printer, though the king denied it not. Rapin.

It will hereafter be ſeen, what uſe the commons made of this order, the original whereof they had in their hands, and the king's anſwer.

I have already obſerved, that ſince the king's return from Scotland, there were between him and the commons ſeeds of diviſion, which threatened an approaching rupture. This appeared on all occaſions, and the mutual diſtruſt, continually increaſed; but with this difference, that the commons did not take the leaſt ſtep, but what tended to their end of filling the people with fears and jealouſies; whereas the king having yet formed no project, managed according to the preſent emergencies, without propoſing to himſelf a fixed and certain end, which was a great diſadvantage to him. Shortly after his return from Scotland, upon notice that there was to be a tumultuous concourſe of people at Weſtminſter, he ſent a writ to the ſheriff to ſet a guard near the parliament. The commons took offence at it, and after ſome enquiry to ſhew it was done by the king's order, diſmiſſed the guard.

Two days after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, ſtrictly commanding, that divine ſervice ſhould be performed in all the churches of England and Wales, according to the law and ſtatutes of the realm. This proclamation, which indeed contained nothing contrary to law, was however unſeaſonable, when the commons publicly ſhewed, that in the laws concerning divine ſervice, there were things offenſive to the conſciences of many people. But the king had the misfortune to forget ſometimes the ſituation of his affairs, and remember only his former ſtate, when his proclamations met with a ready compliance. He could eaſily ſee, that this would be at leaſt of no uſe, and conſequently he ſhould not have publiſhed it at ſuch a juncture. But he gave his enemies a much greater advantage againſt him, in another affair which created him no ſmall mortification.

The commons had voted, as I ſaid, that a body of troops ſhould be ſent into Ireland. But as they were extremely jealous of the king, they ſought an expedient to hinder him from being concerned in the raiſing of theſe forces. They were apprehenſive, if theſe levies were made in the uſual manner, that is, by liſting volunteers, theſe troops would be too much at the king's devotion. This expedient was to levy ſoldiers by way of compulſion, called in England, preſſing, and to paſs an act for that purpoſe. A bill was accordingly brought in, and ſent up to the lords. Very likely, there was ſome clauſe in this bill contrary to the prerogative royal, to hinder the king from being concerned in levying theſe troops[f]. The king having notice of it, came to the parliament, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THE laſt time I was in this place, and the laſt thing that I recommended unto you, was the buſineſs of Ireland; whereby I was in good hope, that I ſhould not have needed again to have put you in mind of that buſineſs. But ſtill ſeeing the ſlow proceedings therein, and the daily diſpatches that I have out of Ireland, of the lamentable eſtate of my proteſtant ſubjects there, I cannot but again earneſtly recommend the diſpatch of that expedition unto you, for it is the chief buſineſs that at this time I take to heart, and there cannot almoſt be any buſineſs that I can have more care of.

"I might now take up ſome of your time in expreſſing my deteſtation of rebellions, in general, and of this in particular; but knowing that deeds and not declarations muſt ſuppreſs this great inſolency, I do here in a word offer you whatſoever my power, pain, or induſtry can contribute to this good and neceſſary work, of reducing the Iriſh nation to their true and wonted obedience.

"And that nothing may be omitted on my part, I muſt here take notice of the bill for preſſing of ſoldiers, now depending among you, my lords; concerning which, I here declare, that in caſe it come ſo to me, as it may not infringe or diminiſh my prerogative, I will paſs it. And farther, ſeeing there is a diſpute raiſed, (I being little beholding to him whoſoever at this time began it) concerning the bounds of this ancient and undoubted prerogative; to avoid farther debate at this time, I offer that the bill may paſs with a Salvo Jure both for king and people, leaving ſuch debates to a time that may better bear them. If this be not accepted, the fault is not mine that this bill paſs not, but theirs that refuſe ſo fair an offer.

"To conclude, I conjure you by all that is or can be dear to you or me, that laying aſide all diſputes, you go on chearfully and ſpeedily for the reducing of Ireland."

Though it clearly appeared, that in this ſpeech the king had no intention to violate the privilege of parliament, but only to remove the obſtacles which occurred on account of this bill, both houſes were equally offended. They appointed a joint committee to examine the king's ſpeech, and upon their report, the houſe of lords unanimouſly voted.

1. That the privileges of parliament were broken by his majeſty's taking notice of the bill for preſſing of ſoldiers, being in agitation in both houſes, and not agreed on.

2. That his majeſty in propounding a limitation and proviſional clauſe to be added to the bill, before it was preſented unto him by the conſent of both houſes, was a breach of the privilege of parliament.

3. That his majeſty expreſſing his diſpleaſure againſt ſome perſons, for matters moved in the parliament, during the debate and preparation of that bill, was a breach of the privilege of parliament.

Theſe votes were alſo readily paſſed in the houſe of commons, after which both houſes united in a ſolemn declaration, importing, "That the king ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate in either houſe of parliament, but by their information and agreement: And that his majeſty ought not to propound any condition, proviſion, or limitation to any bill or act, in debate or preparation in either houſe of parliament; or to manifeſt or declare his conſent or diſſent, approbation or diſlike of the ſame, before it be preſented to his majeſty in due courſe of parliament; and that every particular member of either houſe hath free liberty of ſpeech to propound or debate any matter according to the order and courſe of parliament: And that his majeſty ought not to conceive diſpleaſure againſt any man for ſuch opinions and propoſitions as ſhall be delivered in ſuch debate, it belonging to the ſeveral houſes of parliament reſpectively to judge and determine ſuch errors and offences in words or actions, as ſhall be committed by any of their members, in the handling or debating any matters depending: And that his majeſty will be pleaſed to declare the authors of this miſinformation and evil counſel[g]."

Purſuant to this declaration, both houſes preſented to the king a more extenſive petition, which the king within few days anſwered in writing. The ſtrength of his anſwer conſiſted in, that he had no intention to infringe the privilege of parliament, and meant only to haſten the relief of Ireland. Both houſes were ſatisfied with this explication, and the affair was carried no farther. But there ſtill remained upon the king a blemiſh for violating the privilege of parliament, which was then of great conſequence. This ſhews, the king had not then about him any very able counſellors. For if they had perceived the commons intention, ſince the re-aſſembling of the parliament, they would have been careful not to adviſe the king to take ſo many not only unneceſſary ſteps, but ſuch as gave his enemies great advantages. Of this nature was the proclamation concerning divine ſervice. In the ſame rank I place alſo the great zeal he expreſſed for the church of England, which ſerved only to alienate ſtill farther from him all the adherents of the commons, and to ſhew them what they were to expect, if he ſhould be reſtored to his former ſtate. In a word, nothing could be more unſeaſonable than this laſt ſpeech to both houſes, as if the bare threat of not paſſing the bill was ſufficient to awe them, whereas, at leaſt in regard to the commons, it was a very ſtrong argument to cauſe them to inſiſt upon their demand. Beſides, the breach of privilege muſt have been evident, ſince there was not a ſingle member in both houſes, but what thought the king had violated it by his propoſition.

Six or ſeven days after, the king gave a freſh occaſion of complaint by removing ſir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower from his place, with whom he had no reaſon to be pleaſed, on account of his evidence concerning the deſign of promoting the earl of Strafford's eſcape. Every one ſaw, this was the ſole cauſe of Balfour's diſgrace. But perhaps his removal would not have been of ſo ill conſequence to the king, had he not truſted that important place to colonel Lunsford, known to be a man of profligate manners, and fit for any purpoſe. This change made the commons believe,

[f] In the preamble of the bill it was declared, "That the king had, in no caſe, but the invaſion from a foreign power, authority to preſs the free-born ſubject, which could not conſiſt with freedom and liberty of his perſon." Clarendon, tom. I. p. 257.

[g] The lord Clarendon ſays, that when the clauſe in the bill for preſſing, mentioned in the note above, put a ſtop to the bill in the houſe of lords, Mr. St. John, the king's ſolicitor, went privately to his majeſty, and perſuaded him to go to the parliament-houſe, and ſay the very words in his ſpeech relating to the Salvo Jure, as an expedient to remove rubs in the way of the Iriſh affairs. Upon which both houſes reſolving to do nothing till this manifeſt breach ſhould be repaired by paſſing the bill, the king was compelled to paſs it, as they had prepared it. Tom. I. p. 258.

the king designed to secure the Tower, in order to awe the city and parliament. As their jealousy of him was very great, and as besides, it is certain, they sought occasions to persuade the people, the king had ill designs, they failed not to improve the present. The same day that Lunsford was put in possession of the Tower, a great number of Londoners, some of whom were common-council-men, presented a petition to the lower-house, representing, "That the whole state is deeply interested in the safe-custody of the Tower, but more especially the city of London: That colonel Lunsford is a man out-lawed, and most notorious for outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous attempt. For which reason the petitioners, and many more who have intelligence of his having the office of lieutenant bestowed on him, are put in such a height of fear and jealousy, as makes them restless till they have represented the same to the house of commons, humbly desiring them to take this affair into such consideration, as may secure both the city and kingdom."

It cannot be denied, that the king made a very ill choice in bestowing this post on Lunsford, and thereby gave occasion for disadvantageous suspicions. Besides, it seems to be almost inexcusable, to give the command of the Tower to a person of so ill a character, as at a time when his enemies lost no opportunity to inspire the people with jealousies. The most favourable thing that can be said for the king is, that there being but few persons who would be at his devotion, for fear of the indignation of the commons, he thought himself obliged to chuse for lieutenant of the Tower, one less scrupulous, and of a desperate fortune, who would depend on him, and it was not easy to find many such.

The commons having taken into consideration the petition presented to them, desired a conference with the lords, where they represented, "That colonel Lunsford is an unfit person for so great a trust, as the lieutenancy of the Tower. But if his majesty think cause that there should be a lieutenant of the Tower, the same being already under the command of the earl of Newport [h], who is constable thereof by his majesty's appointment, then that sir John Conyers may be recommended to his majesty for that place." The lords answered, they could not concur with the commons in an address to the king to remove colonel Lunsford, because they conceived the same would be an intrenchment upon his majesty's prerogative.

The commons vexed at the refusal of the lords, unanimously voted, "That colonel Lunsford was unfit to be lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person the commons could not confide in." At the same time they made a declaration, shewing the reasons of fear and distrust, as the conspiracy to seduce the army, a former plot of possessing the Tower, the Irish rebellion, and the continual delays and interruptions they received in the house of peers by reason of the great number of bishops and popish lords; and therefore they held themselves bound in conscience to protest, that they were innocent of the blood which was like to be spilt, and the confusion which might overwhelm the state, if Lunsford were continued in his charge. Moreover they hoped, that such of the lords as had the same apprehensions, would likewise take some course to make the same known to his majesty. This declaration being communicated to the lords, it was resolved by the majority of votes, that the debate thereof should be adjourned till next Monday. But two and twenty lords entered their protest against that vote.

The same day the commons sent and desired the earl of Newport, to reside within the Tower as constable, and to take the custody of that place.

Besides the inhabitants of London, whose petitions had occasioned the commons declaration, the apprentices had flocked together in great numbers, and presented a petition to the king, praying him to concur with the commons in rooting out papists, innovators, bishops, as having all combined to subvert the government, and introduce popery.

On the morrow the 26th of December, being Sunday, the lord-mayor, sir Richard Gurney, seeing the apprentices begin to re-assemble, and knowing they intended to go the next day to Whitehall for an answer to their petition, waited upon the king to inform him of it. He represented withal, that great mischief might ensue, if Lunsford was not removed; adding, the people of London were resolved to attempt the Tower, to put him out. Whereupon the king that same evening took the keys from Lunsford, but at the same time discharged the earl of Newport of the constableship of the Tower.

The reason, or perhaps the pretence of the earl's disgrace was, that the king had been told, that at a meeting at Kensington, whilst he was in Scotland, the earl of Newport, upon discourse of some plots in that kingdom, should say, "If there be such a plot, yet there are his wife and children." But the earl hearing such a rumour had reached the queen, waited upon her majesty, and with many protestations assured her, that never any such words were spoken, nor the least thought conceived of any such thing, with which the queen seemed to rest satisfied. Nevertheless, several months after, and the same day sir William Balfour was removed from the lieutenancy of the Tower, the king asked him, whether he had heard any debate at Kensington, "about seizing upon the queen and her children?" The earl strongly denied it; to which the king replied, "That he was sorry for his lordship's memory." This is what the earl of Newport positively affirmed himself in the house of peers.

The lords being convinced, that the king, upon a false rumours, had entertained suspicions of the earl of Newport [i], espoused his cause, and presented a petition to the king, praying him to declare the reporter of those words. The earl of Bath, the 30th of December, reported his majesty's answer as follows:

"It is true, that I have heard rumours of some propositions that should have been made at Kensington, for the seizing of the persons of my wife and children; and in things of so high a nature, it may be fit for any prince to enquire, even where he hath no belief nor persuasion of the thing; so I have asked Newport some questions concerning that business, but far from that way of expressing a belief of the thing, which Newport hath had the boldness and confidence to affirm; which I could easily make appear, but that I think it beneath me, to contest with any particular person. But let this suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do give credit to any such rumour. As for telling the name of him who informed me, I do stick to the answer which I gave to your last petition upon the like particular."

What colour soever the king put upon his behaviour to the earl of Newport, it plainly appeared, that he had quarrelled with that lord, on purpose to remove him from the constableship of the Tower, at the very time he was desired by the commons to reside there. This did not help to cure the commons suspicions.

I have already mentioned the project formed by the leaders and managers of the house of commons against the king, namely, the divesting him of great part of his power. To compass that end, it was necessary to remove the obstacles which incessantly occurred in the house of peers, where the bishops and popish lords were always able, by the number of their voices, to oppose the execution of the project. Hitherto the commons had endeavoured in vain to exclude the bishops from the upper-house, and there was no likelihood that their solicitations would produce any greater effect for the future. They were therefore either to relinquish their project, or take more effectual methods to obtain by force what would never have been obtained by fair means. I am very sensible, some will take it ill that I positively affirm, the tumults I am going to speak of, were the effect of the intrigues of the contrary party to the king, and that several pretend it was all owing to accident, and the discontents of the people. The reader will be able to judge, when he has seen what passed in the latter end of December.

On Monday the 27th of this month, there was a great concourse of people at Westminster, whither they who had presented the petition of the Londoners, the apprentices and an infinite number of others, flocked, on pretence of waiting for the king's and parliament's answer. Among these multitudes, many were heard to cry aloud, "No Bishops! No Bishops!" This corresponded with the petition of the apprentices. The bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, lately nominated to the see of York [k], coming with the earl of Dover to the house of peers, and observing a youth to cry out louder than the rest against bishops, stept to him and seized him, in order to have him committed to prison. But the people rescued the youth, and gathering about the bishop, hemmed him in, that he could not stir, so that he was like to be pressed to death. But at last they let him go, still crying out as loud as they could, "No Bishops!"

[i] Upon the earl of Newport's information, the house of lords thinking it to be a matter of great consequence, and because some members of the commons (as being present at the meeting at Kensington) were concerned, had a conference with them, and desired them to join with them in searching this business to the bottom. Whereupon they agreed to concur in a petition to the king, &c. Rushworth, tom. IV. p. 463.

[k] He was restored to his place in the house of lords, at the beginning of this parliament, November 16, 1640. Nalson, tom. I. p. 529.

The

At the ſame time, three or four officers, who had ſerved in the late army againſt the Scots, walking near Weſtminſter-hall, one of them, captain David Hide, drew his ſword, ſaying, he would cut the throats of thoſe "Round-headed cropp'd eared dogs that bawled againſt the biſhops." But the other officers refuſing to ſecond him, he was apprehended by the citizens, and brought before the houſe of commons and ſent to priſon. There is no other known origin of the name of Roundheads, which from that time was given to the parliamentarians [l].

The ſame day colonel Lunsford, with thirty or forty officers coming through Weſtminſter-hall, and meeting the multitudes drew their ſwords, and wounded ſome twenty apprentices and citizens. The news being carried into the city, great numbers of apprentices and others ran to Weſtminſter with ſwords and ſtaves, which cauſed a dreadful uproar both in London and Weſtminſter. The lord mayor, to prevent any farther diſorders, commanded the city gates to be ſhut, and put the trained-bands in arms, whilſt on the other hand, the king ordered ſome of the militia of Middleſex and Weſtminſter to come by turns and guard his perſon.

The lords ſeeing ſo great a tumult, ordered the gentleman-uſher of the black-rod, to command the people to depart to their homes. But the people anſwered they could not becauſe Lunsford, with other ſwordſmen, lay in wait for them in Weſtminſter-hall, and had already wounded ſeveral. Whereupon the lords appointed a committee to examine, what warrant Lunsford and the other officers had come to Weſtminſter, and likewiſe what notice had been given to any others to come in multitudes about the parliament-houſe. They tried once more to ſend away the people, but not ſucceeding, deſired the commons to join with them in publiſhing a declaration againſt tumults, and in petitioning the king for a guard. The commons anſwered, it was now ſo late, that they had not time to take this requeſt into conſideration. Mean while, upon information that ſome of the people were ſent to priſon, they appointed a committee to examine, by whoſe authority they were impriſoned, with power to releaſe them, if it was thought proper. A clear evidence that this tumult was not diſagreeable to the commons [m].

On the morrow, the 28th, the tumult continued in the ſame manner as the day before, and the commons made no more haſte to appeaſe it. On the contrary, they adjourned the debate of the lords requeſts till next day. At laſt, on the 29th the populace being again aſſembled, they acquainted the lords, that they were ready to join in all lawful ways and means to appeaſe the tumults, but for printing a declaration, it was a matter that would require ſome farther deliberation [n].

It is very evident, that the commons did not deſire theſe tumults ſhould be ſo ſoon ended, eſpecially if what is ſaid of Mr. Pym, one of the leading members, be true. For it is affirmed, he anſwered to one that perſuaded him to endeavour to prevent theſe tumultuous aſſemblies, "God forbid the people ſhould be hindered from obtaining their juſt deſires." Indeed the houſe in general cannot be accuſed of taking any reſolution to encourage theſe tumults. However it is but too probable, not to ſay certain, that they were cauſed by the intrigues and direction of ſome of the leaders of the oppoſite party to the king.

To be ſatisfied of this truth, a man need only conſider, what was the ſituation of affairs at the end of December 1641. The redreſs of grievances was no longer the point; that was now compleated without any oppoſition from the king. He could therefore affirm, that his conſent to the acts paſſed in this parliament, was the effect of his love for his people, with as much reaſon as his enemies could ſay, it was only by compulſion and diſſimulation. It is certain, that after the king's return from Scotland, there were in the parliament many members who wiſhed the reform might be carried no farther, perſuaded as they were, that what was already done ſufficed for the ſafety of the kingdom, and prevention of an arbitrary government for the future. This was the prevailing opinion in the houſe of peers, chiefly becauſe of the biſhops and popiſh lords, who always made the balance incline to the king's ſide, when this capital point was directly or indirectly in queſtion.

It was otherwiſe in the houſe of commons. Moſt of the members, not contenting themſelves with having redreſſed the grievances, were alſo for leſſening the royal authority, and putting it out of the king's power to govern for the future, as he had done before this parliament. Some acted out of pure diſtruſt of the king's ſincerity: others out of fear of being expoſed to his reſentment, if he ſhould ever be in a condition to make them feel the effects of it. Beſides theſe two motives, the preſbyterians had a third, namely, to alter the government of the church, which they plainly ſaw could never be effected, but by diſabling the king to oppoſe it. All theſe members were united in the project of depriving the king of good part of his power. But there was a great difference between them with reſpect to the animoſity againſt the king, and the zeal wherewith they purſued the execution of their deſign. The preſbyterians were the moſt paſſionate; whilſt others, who acted only from motives of diſtruſt and jealouſy, behaved with leſs warmth. They could not, without a ſort of remorſe, contribute to the throwing of the whole kingdom into confuſion, upon the foundation of a bare diſtruſt, or of a fear, to which it was impoſſible to apply any remedy. This had cauſed great debates in the houſe about the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom. Many conſidered it as unneceſſary, and others ſupported it, becauſe they ſaw no ſurer means to beget a rupture between the king and the parliament, without which rupture they looked upon themſelves as undone, for without it, they could not hope to execute their projects. Oliver Cromwell, who as yet made no figure in the houſe, told the lord Falkland, "That if the remonſtrance had been rejected, he would have ſold all he had the next morning, and never ſee England more."

After the remonſtrance was preſented to the king, his enemies loſt no opportunity to cheriſh the fears and jealouſies of the people, in which they had a double view. Firſt, they prepared them for the change they were meditating, by intimating the abſolute neceſſity of diminiſhing the king's power. Secondly, by provoking the king, they hoped to engage him in ſome violent meaſures, proper to confirm the ſuſpicions they were ſtriving to infuſe into the people, in which they ſucceeded but too well, the king being ſo unfortunate, as not to have any able council about him, who might warn him of the ſnares that were laid for him. However, they were ſtill very far from their end, by reaſon of the obſtacles they met with in the houſe of peers, where the biſhops and popiſh lords broke all their meaſures.

Probably, this ſort of conteſt between the two houſes would have laſted much longer, if the tumultuous concourſe of the Londoners about Weſtminſter, had not come very ſeaſonably to frighten the biſhops and popiſh lords, as will be ſeen preſently. When therefore ſuch multitudes were ſeen flocking to Weſtminſter, exclaiming againſt the biſhops and catholic lords, inſulting the peers of the king's party, in a word, acting ſo agreeably to the deſires and intentions of the commons, one can hardly help thinking, they were countenanced and encouraged by ſome of the members of that houſe; and the rather, as there can be no other probable reaſon aſſigned of ſo ſudden a commotion.

As to the juſtice of the project, formed by the commons to diſable the king from doing for the future what he had done for fifteen years, it is a queſtion not eaſily to be decided. The point is to know, whether, at the time I am ſpeaking of, in reſtoring the king to all his rights, there was juſt ground to confide in him, without any fear of his abuſing his power for the future. But there is ſo much to be ſaid on both ſides of the queſtion, that the impartial muſt be at a loſs, and the more, as the thing is to know perfectly what the king's intention was, which no man can diſcover. It is therefore upon bare conjectures that ſome decide, that, after the king's conceſſions in this parliament in favour of his ſubjects, it was reaſonable to rely on his word; and that others affirm, it was imprudent to conſider the king's aſſent to the acts, as a proof of his intention to govern according to law, ſince this aſſent was not altogether voluntary. On this queſtion run all the papers which were afterwards publiſhed, either by the king or the parliament.

The tumults ſtill continuing about the parliament-houſe, and the commons not appearing very urgent to appeaſe them, twelve biſhops met at the archbiſhop of York's, to conſult together upon what was to be done. Here, by the advice of the archbiſhop, they reſolved to go no more to the houſe of peers, but preſent to the king and the lords the following proteſtation [o].

[l] The apprentices it ſeems wore the hair of their head cut round, and the queen obſerving out of a window, Samuel Barnardiſton among them, cried out, "See what a handſome young Roundhead is there:" and the name came from thence, and perhaps was firſt publicly uſed by captain Hide.

[m] Cornelius Burgeſs, a puritan miniſter, uſed to ſay of the rabble, "Theſe are my Bandogs, I can ſet them on, and I can fetch them off again."

[n] This anſwer to the lords was on the 8th. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 465.

[o] This proteſtation was penned in heat and haſte, by William archbiſhop of York, juſt after the treatment he had met with from the apprentices and others, and, without delay, preſented by him to the king, with an humble deſire, that his majeſty would ſend it to the houſe of peers, ſince the biſhops could not do it themſelves, and that he would command, it ſhould be entered into the journal of the houſe. His majeſty juſt caſt his eye upon it, and believing it drawn by mature advice delivered it to the keeper, who unfortunately happened to

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty, and the lords and peers, now aſſembled in parliament; the humble petition and proteſtation of all the biſhops and prelates now called by his majeſty's writs to attend the parliament, and preſent about London and Weſtminſter for that ſervice.

"THAT whereas their petitioners are called up by ſeveral and reſpective writs, and under great penalties, to attend in parliament, and have a clear and indubitate right to vote in bills, and other matters whatſoever, debateable in parliament, by the ancient cuſtoms, laws, and ſtatutes of this realm, and ought to be protected by your majeſty, quietly to attend and proſecute that great ſervice.

"They humbly remonſtrate and proteſt before God, your majeſty, and the noble lords and peers, now aſſembled in parliament, that as they have an indubitate right to ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, ſo are they (if they may be protected from force and violence) moſt ready and willing to perform their duties accordingly. And that they do abominate all actions and opinions tending to popery, and the maintenance thereof; as alſo all propenſion and inclination to any malignant party, or any other ſide or party whatſoever, to the which their own reaſon and conſciences ſhall not move them to adhere.

"But whereas they have been at ſeveral times violently menaced, affronted, and aſſaulted by multitudes of people, in their coming to perform their ſervices in that honourable houſe; and lately chaſed away, and put in danger of their lives, and can find no redreſs or protection, upon ſundry complaints made to both houſes in theſe particulars.

"They likewiſe humbly proteſt before your majeſty, and the noble houſe of peers, that ſaving unto themſelves all their rights and intereſt of ſitting and voting in the houſe at other times, they dare not ſit or vote in the houſe of peers, until your majeſty ſhall farther ſecure them from all affronts, indignities, and dangers in theſe premiſes.

"Laſtly, whereas their fears are not built upon phantaſies and conceits, but upon ſuch grounds and objects, as may well terrify men of good reſolutions, and much conſtancy, they do, in all duty and humility, proteſt before your majeſty, and the peers of that moſt honourable houſe of parliament, againſt all laws, orders, votes, reſolutions, and determinations, as in themſelves null, and of none effect; which in their abſence, ſince the 27th of this inſtant month of December 1641, have already paſſed; as likewiſe againſt all ſuch as ſhall hereafter paſs in that moſt honourable houſe during the time of this their forced and violent abſence from the ſaid moſt honourable houſe; not denying, but if their abſenting themſelves were wilful and voluntary, that moſt honourable houſe might proceed in all theſe premiſes, their abſence, or this their proteſtation notwithſtanding.

"And humbly beſeeching your moſt excellent majeſty to command the clerk of that houſe of peers, to enter this their petition and proteſtation amongſt his records;

"They will ever pray to God to bleſs and preſerve, etc.

It muſt be obſerved, that amongſt theſe twelve biſhops, there were nine of the thirteen accuſed by the commons, on account of the canons of the late convocation.

It is manifeſt this proteſtation tended to diſſolve the parliament without the king's interpoſing: for if, according to the proteſtation, the houſe of peers could do nothing but what in itſelf was null without the concurrence of the biſhops, it was no leſs certain that the houſe of commons could do nothing valid without the concurrence of the peers; whence it followed, that the parliament was become uſeleſs, or ſuſpended, in the intention of the biſhops by this proteſtation. It appears alſo, that the king had the ſame thought, by his haſte to communicate the proteſtation to the lords, probably before his council had examined it. Very likely he imagined the lords would eſpouſe the cauſe of the biſhops, as making, according to his notion, a third eſtate of parliament, and that this affair might occaſion the diſſolution of the parliament. But he found that the houſe of peers, hitherto ſo favourable to him, was no longer in the ſame diſpoſitions, ſince the biſhops and popiſh lords were frightened away by the tumults. The majority of voices not being now for the king, the houſe looked upon this proteſtation with a very different eye from what the king expected: they deſired a conference with the commons, where the lord keeper told them, in the name of all the peers, "That this proteſtation containing matters of dangerous conſequence, extending to the deep intrenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of parliaments, the lords had thought fit to communicate it to the commons, as a thing of great and general concernment."

The commons had no ſooner received the report of this conference, but they immediately reſolved to accuſe the twelve biſhops of high treaſon, for endeavouring to ſubvert the fundamental laws and the very being of parliaments. This reſolution ought not to ſeem ſtrange, after having ſeen how the commons ſtood affected to the biſhops. They took care not to loſe ſo fair an opportunity of freeing themſelves from the obſtacles they continually met with from the biſhops in the upper houſe; and beſides, the lords ſeemed diſpoſed to come into their meaſures. So, that very moment, Mr. Glyn was ſent to the houſe of peers, to accuſe in form the twelve biſhops of high treaſon, and to deſire they might be put into ſafe cuſtody [p]. Whereupon the lords ordered the black-rod to bring the twelve biſhops to the bar of their houſe, which was done by eight o'clock at night, and ten of them were committed to the Tower, Moreton biſhop of Durham, and Wright biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, in regard of their age, remaining with the black-rod.

On the morrow, the 31ſt of December, the commons ſent and deſired the lords to take into conſideration the bill ſent up ſome months ſince, for taking away the biſhops votes; to which the lords anſwered, they would take the ſame into conſideration in convenient time [q].

The ſame day the commons ſent a committee to the king, to repreſent to him, "That the houſe was under great apprehenſions, by reaſon of a malignant party, who were continually forming pernicious deſigns: nay, that ſome of them had embrued their hands in the blood of his ſubjects at the gates of his palace, and in the face and at the doors of the parliament. That therefore they humbly beſought his majeſty, that they might have a guard out of the city, commanded by the earl of Eſſex, of whoſe fidelity there could be no ſuſpicion."

As the populace of London were diſperſed, and the officers ſtill kept about Weſtminſter, the houſe was under ſome apprehenſion of inſults from theſe reformadoes, and particularly Lunsford, who was a deſperate man. So, the king deſiring to have this meſſage in writing, which had been delivered by word of mouth only; and not returning an anſwer the ſame day, the commons ordered that thirty or forty halberts ſhould be brought into the houſe, for their better ſecurity.

Their fear was farther increaſed upon notice that the young gentlemen of the inns of court were aſſembled, and gone to Whitehall, to offer their ſervice to the king, who had received them very graciouſly, and ordered them to be handſomely entertained at tables provided for them.

The king on his part was not without uneaſineſs; he was afraid the tumultuous concourſe of the people would be renewed on New-year's day; and therefore ſent orders to the common-council of London, to take good meaſures for prevention of the like diſorders as had happened on the foregoing days, in which he was punctually obeyed.

The parliament having adjourned from Friday till Monday, to be preſent, commanding him to deliver it to the houſe. Clarendon. tom. I p. 276. Some ſay, that the lord keeper was ordered not to read it, till the king, at the biſhops inſtance, came into the houſe of peers. But that to ingratiate himſelf with the parliament, to whom he was become obnoxious, he communicated the petition to ſome unfriendly members of both houſes. Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. tom. II. p. 818.

[p] The lord Clarendon ſays, the biſhops friends took ſo great offence at this indiſcreet proteſtation, that though they deſired to preſerve their function, they had no compaſſion or regard of their perſons, or what became of them; inſomuch as in the whole debate, there was only one gentleman who ſpoke in their behalf, and ſaid, "He did not believe they were guilty of high treaſon; but that they were ſtark mad, and therefore deſired they might be ſent to Bedlam." Tom. I. p. 279.

[q] Not long before this, the king had filled, in the following manner, ſome ſees that were vacant: Dr. Prideaux was made biſhop of Worceſter, Dr. Winniff of Lincoln, Dr. Brownrigg of Exeter, Dr. Henry King of Chicheſter, and Dr. Weſtfield of Briſtol. The commons were, it ſeems, thereupon much troubled, that, at a time when they reſolved to take away the old, the king ſhould preſume to make new biſhops——About the ſame time Lucius Carey, viſcount Falkland, was made ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of ſir Henry Vane; and ſir John Colepepper, one of the knights of the ſhire for Kent, chancellor of the exchequer; they were alſo ſworn of the privy-council: and Mr. Edward Hyde, afterwards earl of Clarendon, was now admitted into the king's favour. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 239, 269. Warwick, p. 194.

becauſe the morrow was New-years day [r], and the next day Sunday, it was the 3d of January before the king returned an anſwer to the commons meſſage concerning a guard, which was to this effect:

"That it was with great grief of heart that he found the commons, inſtead of reaping the fruits of his grace, and affection to his people, ſhould ſuffer jealouſies, diſtruſts, and fears to be ſo prevalent among them, as to induce them to declare them unto him in ſo high a meaſure as they had done: that he was wholly ignorant of the grounds of their apprehenſions: but if he had any knowledge or belief of the leaſt deſign in any, of violence againſt them, and would purſue them with the ſame ſeverity and deteſtation as he would do the greateſt attempt upon his crown. And he engaged ſolemnly, on the word of a king, that the ſecurity of all and every of them, from violence, was, and ſhould ever be, as much his care as the preſervation of himſelf and his children. And if this general aſſurance ſhould not ſuffice to remove their apprehenſions, he would command ſuch a guard to wait upon them, as he would be reſponſible for to him, who had charged him with the ſafety and protection of his ſubjects."

Before we proceed, it will be neceſſary to ſhew exactly the ſituation of the king's affair, in the beginning of the year 1641-2. There was in the houſe of commons a ſtrong party, who were labouring to deprive the king of good part of his prerogatives, ſome through fear or diſtruſt, others for more hidden deſigns: but theſe laſt took care not to diſcover their intentions; they pretended to act only upon the ſame motives of diſtruſt, which influenced the firſt, in expectation of engaging them by degrees to ſecond them in their projects. For this reaſon, they loſt no opportunity to inflame this diſtruſt of the king, by aggravating whatever could be blamed in his government, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign, and by referring all his actions, ſince the beginning of this parliament, to the ſame principles by which he had governed before. In a word, their aim was to ſhew that the king was ſtill the ſame, and had not altered his maxims: that his condeſcenſion for the parliament had been forced, and full of diſſimulation: that he only waited for a proper ſeaſon to return to his old courſes, and when once he was reſtored to his authority, he would uſe it, to be revenged of thoſe by whom he thought himſelf injured, and to take juſter meaſures to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government.

Indeed, as all theſe things depended upon the king's ſecret intention, they could not be evidently proved; but however, ſuch indications were given, as ſerved to make impreſſion on many people. It was obſerved that the king always talked of his aſſent to the acts of this parliament, as being of pure grace, and not of juſtice: from whence it was eaſy to infer, that he reſerved to himſelf the power of revoking them when he ſhould find occaſion: that there was but too much reaſon to ſuſpect he was concerned in the Iriſh rebellion, conſidering in what juncture of time it broke out, and the rebels declaration that they had the king's and queen's authority for what they did: that it was very probable he ſhewed a regard to the papiſts, to make uſe of them on occaſion: that he could not reſolve to execute the ſeven prieſts legally condemned, though he had been earneſtly deſired by both houſes of parliament: that notwithſtanding his conſtant promiſes to put the laws in execution againſt recuſants, it had never been performed; but, on the contrary, he truſted recuſants with the moſt important poſts: that the conſpiracy to ſeduce the army, plainly diſcovered his deſigns, that very lately he had violated the privileges of parliament in ſo evident a manner, that there was not a ſingle member in both houſes, but what was perſuaded of the reality of this violation: that nevertheleſs, inſtead of ſatisfaction, he had anſwered, "That he himſelf did not believe he had violated the privileges of parliament, nor ever intended it:" that therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary to limit his power, and diſable him to govern for the future according to his pleaſure, as he had done for fifteen years.

Theſe reaſons produced various effects in the minds of people, according to the temper, underſtanding, and principles of thoſe to whom they were addreſſed. To ſome they appeared too uncertain to ground thereon the project of diminiſhing the regal power, and conſequently of altering the conſtitution of the government. Others thought them unanſwerable. But there were many members who wavered between their diſtruſt of the king, and their fear of involving the kingdom in troubles on a doubtful foundation. Theſe however were eaſily perſuaded to join in proceedings, which were repreſented to them as neceſſary precautions, without being told their real deſign; as for inſtance, to conſent to the bill for excluding the biſhops. If the leaders of the preſbyterian party had diſcovered to them, that it was their intention to diminiſh the royal power, in order the more eaſily to eſtabliſh preſbytery upon the ruins of epiſcopacy, they would never have ſucceeded. Nay, they would have grown ſo ſuſpected, that their credit would have been entirely forfeited. For it muſt be obſerved, that the heads of the oppoſite party to the king, though moſtly preſbyterians, had not yet acted as ſuch, but only as zealous aſſertors of the people's rights, and as enemies to tyranny, in which the whole party were perfectly united. When therefore they moved any thing againſt the biſhops, they intimated that it was not in hatred of epiſcopacy, but to leſſen the credit of the biſhops, which they had abuſed in ſupporting arbitrary power, and to hinder them from doing ſo any more. Unfortunately, there were biſhops who had given too much cauſe of complaint, and by their conduct engaged many church of England men themſelves to concur with the others in the deſign of limiting the authority of the whole body.

Before the biſhops and popiſh lords had abſented themſelves from the houſe of peers, the party I have juſt mentioned met with inſuperable obſtacles in that houſe: nay, even after that, thoſe that remained were not equally engaged in this party. There were ſtill many lords, who, though oppoſite to the king, and extremely jealous of him, could not however reſolve to do any thing that ſtruck at the government of the church and ſtate, or at leaſt that tended to alter the conſtitution. So, ever ſince the re-aſſembling of the parliament, the preſbyterians had yet been only ſtruggling, as I may ſay, with the reſt of the oppoſite party to the king, to induce them by degrees to concur in humbling the regal power. They had cauſed to be paſſed the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, ſpread ſuſpicions of the king concerning the rebellion of Ireland, and hindered the ſending of an Engliſh army thither. Their intrigues had bred great diſtruſt concerning the popiſh party countenanced and protected by the king, and produced mortifying addreſſes to the king upon the breach of the privileges of parliament, and the lieutenancy of the Tower; tumultuous aſſemblies of the people at Weſtminſter; the petition for a guard, as if the houſe of commons was in great danger from the king's party: in a word, the biſhops, their principal enemies, were in the Tower. In all this, preſbyterianiſm hardly appeared; and if ſome ſuſpected it to be the chief cauſe of the troubles, at leaſt it was not eaſy to prove it.

Notwithſtanding all theſe advantages, the preſbyterians ſtill ſaw themſelves very far from their end. They had ſufficient credit to cauſe to paſs in the houſe of commons votes agreeable to the general deſign of the whole party; but were themſelves very ſenſible, they durſt not yet venture openly to diſcover their particular end, I mean the deſtruction of the church of England, and the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterianiſm. It was neceſſary before all things to diſable the king to oppoſe it. For that purpoſe the members of both houſes were to be gained, who ſtill wavered between their diſtruſt of the king, and the fear of involving the kingdom in great troubles, if the conſtitution ſhould be attacked. Theſe members were numerous enough to raiſe invincible obſtacles to that project, by joining with the king's party. For it muſt not be imagined that all who oppoſed the king were of the ſame character, and acted upon the ſame principles and motives: they were only united in this ſingle point, namely, that tyranny being equally odious to them, they wiſhed with the ſame ardor to be entirely freed from it.

Things being in this ſituation, the king, by the lord Digby's advice, who was then his chief counſellor, took a ſtep the moſt imprudent, and moſt fatal to his affairs that he could poſſibly take in ſuch a juncture [s]. The 3d of January 1641-2, ſir Edward Herbert attorney-general, coming to the houſe of peers, acquainted them that the king had commanded him to accuſe of high-treaſon the lord Kimbolton [t], and five commoners, namely, Denzil Hollis, ſir Arthur Haſlerig, John [r] In England, where the old ſtyle is uſed, the year begins the 25th of March. This ſtyle is made uſe of in all public acts, deeds, writings, hiſtories, and elſewhere. But however, in the dates, the difference of the two ſtyles is ſet down from the 1ſt of January to the 25th of March, in this manner, 1641-2, that is, the year 1641 according to the old, and the year 1642 according to the new ſtyle; ſo the 1ſt day of January is acknowledged for the firſt day of the year according to the new ſtyle. [s] The king, during his laſt journey into Scotland, had received ſome information of the lord Saville's forged letter of invitation to the Scots, in the name of the lord Kimbolton, &c. (See above, p. 542. note d.) And that was the reaſon of his impeaching the gentlemen here mentioned. Franklyn's Ann. p. 906.—Beſides, he was informed, that they had private meetings, and a correſpondence with the Scots in London, and countenanced the late tumults from the city. Whitelock, p. 52.

[t] Son of the earl of Mancheſter, who was ſtill alive; and this lord who had been called to the houſe of peers by the title of lord Kimbolton, was himſelf afterwards earl of Mancheſter. Rapin.

Sir

Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode. At the ſame time he delivered the general articles of impeachment, given him by the king with his own hand, viz.

1. That they had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, to deprive the king of his royal power, and to place in ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and eſtates of his majeſty's liege people.

2. That they had traiterouſly endeavoured, by many foul aſperſions upon his majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majeſty odious unto them.

3. That they had endeavoured to draw his majeſty's late army to diſobedience to his majeſty's command, and to ſide with them in their traiterous deſigns.

4. That they had traiterouſly invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majeſty's kingdom of England.

5. That they had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the rights and the very being of parliaments.

6. That for the completing of their traiterous deſigns, they had endeavoured, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous deſigns; and to that end had actually raiſed and countenanced tumults againſt the king and parliament.

7. That they had traiterouſly conſpired to levy, and actually had levied war againſt the king.

Then Mr. Attorney ſaid, that he was further charged to deſire on his majeſty's behalf:

1. That a ſelect committee, under a command of ſecrecy, may be appointed to take the examination of ſuch witneſſes as the king will produce in this buſineſs, as formerly hath been done in caſes of like nature, according to the juſtice of this houſe.

2. Liberty to add and alter, if there ſhould be cauſe.

3. That their lordſhips would take care for the ſecuring of the perſons as in juſtice there ſhould be cauſe.

It is very hard to conceive what the king's aim could be in this extraordinary accuſation, and what he could expect from it, conſidering the numberleſs difficulties which preſented themſelves, and which it was hardly poſſible not to foreſee.

In the firſt place, the king demanded juſtice of the lords againſt five members of the houſe of commons, the parliament ſitting, which was a very manifeſt irregularity, ſince the peers were not the proper judges of the members of the lower houſe, whilſt the parliament was aſſembled, without the conſent of that houſe, which the king could not be ignorant of; conſequently they had no power to commit the five members. Why then was it deſired?

Secondly, in this accuſation the king attacked five members of the commons, who were the leading men in that houſe. How, therefore, could he expect, in ſuch junctures, that the commons would deliver up their leaders on pretence of a general accuſation, which deſcended not to any particulars?

Thirdly, the king in accuſing theſe five members, properly accuſed the whole houſe of treaſon, as it was eaſy to perceive by the bare reading of the articles.

Laſtly, how could he expect that the parliament, who had preſented the Scots with three hundred thouſand pounds, as a reward for their brotherly aſſiſtance, would conſider as high treaſon, the inviting them into the kingdom, ſuppoſing he had been able to prove his aſſertion?

All this ſhews, the king had been very ill-adviſed when he undertook this affair at ſuch a juncture. Accordingly there is not a ſingle hiſtorian, even among thoſe that are moſt devoted to him, but what owns at leaſt, it was a moſt imprudent and unſeaſonable ſtep.

After the reading of the articles of accuſation, the lord Kimbolton ſtood up and prayed, that as he had a public charge, he might have a public clearing. But the peers proceeded not ſo haſtily as the king expected. The firſt thing they did, was to appoint a committee to examine the regularity of the accuſation, and to ſearch the records, whether there ever had been any ſuch proceeding before, and whether an accuſation againſt a peer might be brought into their houſe by the attorney-general. As to the accuſation againſt the five commoners, they did not ſo much as take it into conſideration, whether they ſhould receive it, but contented themſelves with acquainting that houſe, that ſome of their members were accuſed of high treaſon by the attorney-general.

At the ſame time the commons were informed, that ſeveral perſons [u] were at Mr. Hollis's and Mr. Pym's, ſealing up their trunks, doors, and papers. The ſame thing was done in the houſes of the three other parties accuſed. Whereupon the commons ordered their ſerjeant to break open the ſeals, and apprehend thoſe that put them on. Moreover they paſſed an order, "that if any perſons whatever ſhould come to the lodgings of any member of the houſe, and there offer to ſeal the doors, trunks, or papers, that then ſuch members ſhould require the aſſiſtance of the conſtable to keep ſuch perſons in ſafe cuſtody, till the houſe ſhould give further order. That if any perſon ſhould offer to arreſt or detain any member, without firſt acquainting the houſe therewith, it was lawful for ſuch member to ſtand upon his guard of defence, and for any perſon to aſſiſt him, according to the proteſtation taken to defend the privileges of parliament."

Preſently after, the commons repreſented to the lords in a conference, that the king had ordered the trunks, chambers, and ſtudies of ſeveral of their members to be ſealed up, and had ſet a guard in a warlike manner at Whitehall. And therefore they deſired, that ſuch a guard might be placed about the parliament alſo as ſhould be approved by both houſes, or elſe to join with them to adjourn to a place of ſafety. During this conference, a ſerjeant at arms came to the houſe of commons from the king, and required the five members, accuſed by his majeſty. The ſerjeant being ordered to withdraw, the commons appointed ſome of their members [w] to wait upon the king and acquaint him, "that this meſſage was a matter of great conſequence, that it concerns the privilege of parliament, and of all the commons of England: that they will take it into conſideration, and attend his majeſty with an anſwer, with as much ſpeed as the greatneſs of the buſineſs will permit: and in the mean time the five members ſhall be ready to anſwer any legal charge made againſt them." Then they diſmiſſed the ſerjeant who had brought the meſſage. At the ſame time they enjoined the five members to give their daily attendance on the houſe.

Mean while, the peers had made an order, to open the doors and trunks of the members of both houſes which were ſealed, and reſolved to join with the commons in a petition to the king, for ſuch a guard as both houſes ſhould approve of. They had ordered moreover, that two of their body, with ſome members of the commons, ſhould go and repreſent to the king, that the privileges of parliament had been violated.

The next morning, January the 4th, the lord Falkland reported the king's anſwer to the meſſage of the commons concerning the breach of privilege. He ſaid, the king aſked him, whether the houſe did expect an anſwer? and before the lord Falkland replied, told him, he would ſend an anſwer to-morrow as ſoon as the houſe was ſet. In the mean time he bid him acquaint the houſe, that the ſerjeant had done nothing but what he had directions from himſelf to do.

Preſently after this report, the commons ſent and deſired a conference with the lords, to acquaint them, that there was a ſcandalous paper publiſhed, containing articles of high-treaſon againſt the lord Kimbolton, &c. and to deſire that they would concur in puniſhing the authors and publiſhers thereof.

Then the gentlemen of the inns of court, who offered themſelves to be a guard to his majeſty, were ſent to and examined, upon a rumour that they were bid to be ready the 4th of January. Thoſe of Lincoln's-Inn anſwered, "That laſt week they went to Whitehall to offer their ſervice to the king, upon hearing that his perſon was in danger. That yeſter-night, they had received a meſſage from his majeſty by ſir William Killigrew and ſir William Flemming, that they ſhould keep within to-morrow, and be ready at an hour's warning if the king ſhould have occaſion to uſe them. That they brought to them likewiſe a paper of articles of accuſation againſt the lord Kimbolton and five members of the houſe of commons. That they had only an intent to defend the kings's perſon, and would do their utmoſt alſo to defend the parliament; being not able to make any diſtinction between the king and his parliament." The gentlemen of the other inns anſwered to the ſame effect [x].

In the afternoon the five accuſed members came into the houſe according as they were enjoined. They were no ſooner in their places, but one captain Langriſh informed the houſe, that the king was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and ſoldiers [y]. As there was room to believe, the king intended to ſeize the five members, they were immediately ordered to depart the houſe. They were hardly gone out when the king appeared, and going up to the chair he ſaid, "By your leave Mr. ſpeaker, I muſt borrow your chair a little." When he was in the chair he looked round to ſee if he could diſcern any of the five members, and then made the following ſpeech to the houſe, his guard waiting at the door.

"Gentlemen,

"I AM ſorry for this occaſion of coming unto you: yeſterday I ſent a ſerjeant at arms upon a very important occaſion, to apprehend ſome that by my command were accuſed of high-treaſon; whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a meſſage. And I muſt declare unto you here, that albeit no king that ever was in England, ſhall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermoſt of his power, than I ſhall be; yet you muſt know that in caſes of treaſon, no perſon hath a privilege. And therefore I am come to know if any of theſe perſons that were accuſed are here: for I muſt tell you, gentlemen, that ſo long as theſe perſons that I have accuſed (for no ſlight crime, but for treaſon) are here, I cannot expect that this houſe will be in the right way that I do heartily wiſh it: therefore I am come to tell you, that I muſt have them whereſoever I find them. Well, ſince I ſee all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you ſhall ſend them unto me, as ſoon as they return hither. But I aſſure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but I ſhall proceed againſt them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other.

"And now ſince I ſee I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occaſion to repeat what I have ſaid formerly, that whatſoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my ſubjects, I do mean to maintain it.

"I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect as ſoon as they come to the houſe, you will ſend them to me; otherwiſe I muſt take my own courſe to find them."

The king was no ſooner gone, but many members cried out aloud, ſo as he might hear them, "privilege! privilege! and forthwith the houſe adjourned till the next day at one o'clock.

The commons aſſembling on the morrow, the 5th of January, at the appointed hour, immediately voted, that the king had violated the privileges of the houſe, and that they could not ſit any longer there without a full vindication of ſo high a breach, and a guard for the ſafety of their perſons. Then it was reſolved to adjourn till the 11th of the ſame month, and a committee of twenty-four was appointed, during the adjournment to ſit at Guildhall, and to conſider of all things concerning the good and ſafety of the city and kingdom, and particularly how their privileges might be vindicated, and their perſons ſecured[z]. The committee for the Iriſh affairs was ordered likewiſe to ſit at the ſame place during the adjournment. That done, a meſſage was ſent to the lords to acquaint them with what had paſſed the day before with their adjournment and committee appointed to ſit at Guildhall.

The ſame day the king, having ordered the lord-mayor to aſſemble the common-council, came to Guildhall. As he paſſed along the ſtreets, he had the mortification to hear people cry, "privileges of parliament! privileges of parliament!" Nay, one Henry Walker an ironmonger and pamphleteer, was ſo inſolent as to throw into his coach a paper, wherein was written, "To your tents, O Iſrael." His majeſty being come to Guildhall, made the following ſpeech to the common-council.

"Gentlemen,

"I AM come to demand ſuch perſons as I have already accuſed of high-treaſon, and do believe are ſhrowded in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offences are treaſon, and miſdemeanors of an high nature. I deſire your loving aſſiſtance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are divers ſuſpicions raiſed, that I am a favourer of the popiſh religion; I do profeſs, in the name of a king, that I did and ever will, and that to the utmoſt of my power, be a proſecutor of all ſuch as ſhall any ways oppoſe the laws and ſtatutes of this kingdom, either papiſt or ſeparatiſts; and not only ſo, but I will maintain and defend that true proteſtant religion which my father did profeſs and I will continue in it during my life."

The king ſeems to have forgot the ſituation of his affairs, and to imagine he was ſtill in the ſame ſtate as before, the war with Scotland. Certainly he could not be ignorant that the city of London was not very well affected to him, nor had reaſon to be ſo. He believed however they would eſpouſe his cauſe againſt the parliament, and deliver up the five members, of which there was not the leaſt probability. On the other hand, he could be ſtill leſs ignorant, that it was chiefly in London that the preſbyterians were numerous and powerful, and yet he affected to ſay, he would maintain and defend the proteſtant religion which the king his father had profeſſed, and proſecute to the utmoſt of his power as well ſeparatiſts as papiſts. I own I cannot ſee the neceſſity or uſe of ſuch a declaration, before the common-council of a city much more inclined to preſbyterianiſm than to the church of England, as it manifeſtly appeared ſhortly after.

Mean while, the committee which ſat at Guildhall, were diligently taking informations of what paſſed the 4th of January, and preparing matters for their report to the houſe againſt their meeting. The committee was informed, that ſir John Byron, who was made lieutenant of the Tower in the room of Lunsford, had ſent to Whitehall one hundred arms and two barrels of powder. Ruſhworth, who relates this particular, affirms that the matter being farther inquired into, was found to be true. But I cannot tell whether we may give entire credit to his teſtimony, though what he ſays is not improbable.

On the 7th the city of London preſented a petition to the king, which plainly ſhewed they were more inclined to the parliament than to him. "They repreſented their great fears and diſtractions, by reaſon of the progreſs of the rebels in Ireland, fomented by the papiſts in England and their adherents: the want of aid to ſuppreſs them, and the intimations received from abroad and at home, of a deſign to extirpate the proteſtants: The putting out perſons of honour and truſt from being conſtable and lieutenant of the Tower: the preparations lately made: the fortifying of Whitehall in an unuſual manner: the endeavours uſed to the inns of court: the calling divers cannoneers into the Tower: the diſcovery of divers fireworks in the hands of a papiſt: the miſunderſtanding betwixt his majeſty and parliament, by reaſon of miſinformation: his majeſty's late going to the houſe of commons, attended with a great multitude of armed men, beſides his ordinary guard, for the apprehending of divers members, contrary to the privileges of parliament."

This petition was very capable to ſhew the king, how much he was miſtaken in his opinion, that the city of London was well diſpoſed in his favour. He returned however a very mild anſwer to each of the articles, to this effect.

"That as for the buſineſs of Ireland, there was nothing on his part unoffered or undone; and he hoped, by the ſpeedy advice and aſſiſtance of his parliament, that great and neceſſary work would be put in a ſure forwardneſs, to which he would contribute all in his power.

"For the Tower; he wondered, that having removed a ſervant of good truſt and reputation from that charge, only to ſatisfy the fears of the city, and put in another of unqueſtionable reputation and known ability, the petitioners ſhould ſtill entertain thoſe fears: and whatever preparations were there made, it was with as great an eye of ſafety and advantage to the city as to his own perſon.

"For the fortifying of Whitehall with men and munition; he doubted not, but the petitioners had obſerved the ſtrange provocation he had received to entertain that guard; and if any citizens were wounded or ill treated, he was confidently aſſured, that it happened by their own evil and corrupt demeanours.

"That he knew no other endeavours to the inns of court than a gracious intention; that he received the tender of their loyal and dutiful affections, with very good approbation and acceptance, and an encouragement given them to continue the ſame upon all occaſions.

"For his going to the houſe of commons; he was verily perſuaded, that if the petitioners knew the clear grounds upon which thoſe perſons ſtood accuſed of high-treaſon, they would believe his going thither was an act of grace and favour don, ſays, it was generally believed, that the king's purpoſe of going to the houſe, was communicated to William Murray of the bed-chamber, by the lord Digby, and that it was diſcovered by the ſaid Murray. Tom. 1. p. 282.—According to Whitelock, it was ſuppoſed, that the papiſts, by the means and influence of the queen, perſuaded the king to this raſh action, p. 52.

to that houſe, and the moſt peaceable way of having that neceſſary ſervice, for the apprehenſion of thoſe perſons, performed; eſpecially, if ſuch orders had been made, which he was not willing to believe, for the reſiſtance of all lawful authority, as were diſcourſed of. And for the proceedings againſt thoſe perſons, he ever intended the ſame ſhould be with all juſtice and favour, according to the laws of the realm. He concluded with theſe words, and this extraordinary way of ſatisfying a petition of ſo unuſual a nature, his majeſty is confidently perſuaded, will be thought the greateſt inſtance can be given of his majeſty's clear intentions to his ſubjects, and of the ſingular eſtimation he hath of the good affections of this city, which he believes in gratitude will never be wanting to his juſt commands and ſervice."

On the morrow, the 8th of January, the king publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all magiſtrates and officers of juſtice, to apprehend the accuſed members and carry them to the Tower.

Whilſt the committee was aſſembled at Guildhall, they took the information of two witneſſes, who depoſed, that they heard captain Hide ſay things, which ſhewed, he had ſome ill deſign againſt the houſe of commons.

Then it was reſolved, that the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex ſhould raiſe the "poſſe comitatus," for their ſafe coming to Weſtminſter, the day the parliament ſhould meet. Whereupon the watermen [a] came and tendered their ſervice, to guard the committee by water to the parliament-houſe, which was accepted of. But the offer of the apprentices to accompany them by land was refuſed.

Mean while, the committee of twenty-four having appointed a ſub committee to examine the affairs in queſtion, they made their report, January the 10th, of what reſolutions had been taken; namely,

That the publiſhing ſeveral articles of high-treaſon againſt the lord Kimb lton, and the five members of the houſe of commons, was a high breach of the privileges of parliament, a ſeditious act, tending to the ſubverſion of the peace of the kingdom.

That the privileges of parliament, ſo violated and broken, could not be fully and ſufficiently vindicated, unleſs his majeſty would be pleaſed to diſcover the names of thoſe perſons who adviſed him to ſeal the chambers and ſtudies of the accuſed members; to ſend a ſerjeant at arms to the houſe of commons to demand them; to iſſue warrants under his own hand to apprehend them; to come in perſon to the houſe; to publiſh the articles of accuſation in the form of a proclamation; to the end ſuch pernicious counſellors might receive condign puniſhment.

The committee of twenty-four reſolving to return on the morrow to the parliament with a numerous guard, the king thought not proper to be expoſed to the danger of receiving ſome affront from the populace; and therefore choſe to withdraw to Hampton-court, and two days after to Windſor.

January the 11th, the commons being aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the committee of twenty-four came thither by water, conducted by great numbers of ſeamen and others, whilſt the trained bands of London marched through the city in arms, to guard them alſo by land.

Then it was that the king found he had taken wrong meaſures, and that his imprudent proceedings could not but grieve him, and ruin his affairs. He repented of what he had done, and wiſhed he could appeaſe the diſorder raiſed by himſelf. To this end, the next day, January the 12th, he ſent the following meſſage to both houſes:

"His majeſty taking notice, that ſome conceive it diſputable, whether his proceedings againſt the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, ſir Arthur Haſlerigg, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Strode, be legal and agreeable to the privileges of parliament; and being very deſirous to give ſatisfaction to all men, in all matters that may ſeem to have relation to privilege, is pleaſed to wave his former proceedings, and all doubts by this means being ſettled, when the minds of men are compoſed, his majeſty will proceed thereupon in an unqueſtionable way; and aſſures his parliament, that upon all occaſions he will be as careful of their privileges, as of his life or his crown."

Had there not been a ſettled deſign againſt the king, this meſſage would have been capable to pacify all, ſince he plainly ſhewed, he repented of what he had done, and in ſome meaſure confeſſed his fault. But he had given his enemies too great an advantage for them to neglect to improve it. I have obſerved, there were many members in both houſes not yet determined to join with thoſe who ſought only to throw all into diſorder and confuſion. Some began to diſcover the deſigns of the preſbyterians: others had ſcruples, which they could not overcome, when they conſidered, that the deſtruction of the kingdom would be endangered by a bare diſtruſt which could not be well grounded. But their doubts were changed into certainty, after what the king had lately done. Before the accuſation of the ſix members, it was doubtful, whether the king intended to be revenged of thoſe who had offended him: but this accuſation rendered that intention very probable. It was doubtful whether his condeſcenſion for the parliament was conſtrained: but this accuſation diſcovered, that he believed himſelf deprived of part of his lawful authority, and conſidered what the parliament had done with reſpect to himſelf, as high-treaſon. For if the depriving him of part of his authority was treaſon, thoſe who had voted for triennial parliaments, and the continuance of this, could not be innocent. If the endeavouring to render the king odious to his people was treaſon, certainly the ſix members were not alone guilty. If the inviting the Scotch army into England was treaſon, how could the houſe of commons clear themſelves, after having rewarded the Scots for their invaſion with a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds? If it was treaſon to endeavour to ſubvert the rights, and the very being of parliaments, both houſes were guilty of this crime, when they aſſumed by an act the power of not being diſſolved or prorogued without their own conſent, ſince this was altering the nature of parliaments. If raiſing tumults was treaſon, the countenancing and encouraging theſe ſame tumults was no leſs ſo, and of this the whole houſe of commons was guilty. In ſhort, the charge againſt theſe particular members for conſpiring to levy, and for actually levying, war againſt the king, neceſſarily aimed at the whole houſe, who had countenanced the tumultuous aſſemblies, ſet themſelves a guard, and provided themſelves with arms.

Theſe things put thoſe upon conſidering, who till then had preſerved ſome good-will for the king, and entertained equitable thoughts of him. They plainly ſaw what judgment the king made of the parliament's actions, though he attacked but ſix members. The ſhallow artifice of throwing upon a few the fault of the whole houſe, had been proper with regard to former parliaments, whilſt the king was maſter: but it was ineffectual with the preſent parliament, and at ſuch a juncture. After the redreſs of paſt grievances, the point was to know, whether the king's word was to be relied on, and he reſtored to his natural ſtate. Many were of this ſentiment, as they could not imagine, that after what had paſſed in this parliament, the king would endeavour to govern for the future as he had done before. They could not reſolve, from a bare motive of fear and diſtruſt, to alter the conſtitution of the government by abridging the king's power. Others maintained, that the king's condeſcenſion was all diſſimulation, and his word not to be relied on. Theſe men, to bring the reſt to their opinion, were forced to uſe various artifices to aggravate and miſinterpret the king's actions, and nevertheleſs were not yet able to compaſs their ends. But by the accuſation of the ſix members, the king himſelf ſupplied them with arguments, which were not eaſy to anſwer. They had no more occaſion to uſe ſigns and conjectures to prove what they advanced, ſince the king gave them himſelf ſuch evident proofs. So it may be ſaid, the king never followed more pernicious advice, than that lately given him. If the lord Digby, as it is ſaid, was his counſellor, it may be affirmed, that he threw him into a precipice, from whence it was not poſſible ever to extricate himſelf.

From that time, the queſtion was not to know, whether it was neceſſary to limit the regal power, but to know within what bounds it ſhould be confined; they who had hitherto been moſt moderate, having entirely loſt their doubts concerning the king's ſincerity. So the party which was moſt oppoſite to him, being grown very ſuperior in both houſes, and meeting with little oppoſition, they who wiſhed to do the king ſervice, thought it ſafeſt, either to abſent themſelves from the parliament, or to keep ſilence, in the expectation of an opportunity to ſerve him effectually, if affairs ſhould take a new turn, and thereby the oppoſite party became ſtill more powerful.

It is therefore evident, that in the preſent diſpoſition of the parliament, the king's laſt meſſage was not a ſufficient means to oblige his enemies to alter their meaſures: eſpecially, as by this meſſage he did not deſiſt from the accuſation, but only from the manner of proceeding, though it was eaſy to perceive, he took this method only to come off with the leſs diſhonour. Accordingly, the commons did not much regard it.

[a] Ruſhworth ſays, it was divers mariners and ſeamen, who brought a petition, ſigned by a thouſand hands; Tom. IV. p. 481.

The 17th of January, they came to the like reſolutions with thoſe taken by the committee in London, and digeſted them into a declaration. They only added the depoſitions of ſome witneſſes concerning the number of armed men, who attended the king when he came to the houſe, and who, according to theſe depoſitions, were above five hundred, concerning the inſolent behaviour of ſome of the officers who accompanied his majeſty; and the words they uſed at the door of the houſe, which ſeemed to denote, that they waited only for a ſignal to fall upon the members[b]. There is no queſtion, all theſe things were highly aggravated: but theſe aggravations were ſubſervient to the end propoſed by the commons. They declared, however, "That they meant not to ſcreen their members, when accuſed of treaſon or miſdemeanour, and proſecuted according to law and the privileges of parliament: on the contrary, they ſhould be always ready to bring them to a ſpeedy and due trial; being ſenſible, that it equally imported them, as well to ſee juſtice done againſt criminals, as to defend the juſt rights and liberties of the ſubjects and parliament of England."

Before this declaration was publiſhed, the king had ſent the following meſſage to both houſe, which ſhewed how deſirous he was of giving them content, and ending this unfortunate affair:

"His majeſty being no leſs tender of the privileges of parliament, and thinking himſelf no leſs concerned that they be not broken, and that they be aſſerted and vindicated whenſoever they are ſo, than the parliament itſelf, hath thought fit to add to his laſt meſſage this profeſſion; that in all his proceedings againſt the lord Kimbolton, and the reſt of the accuſed members, he had never the leaſt intention of violating the leaſt privilege of parliament: and in caſe any doubt of breach of privilege remains, will be willing to clear that, and aſſert thoſe by any reaſonable way that his parliament ſhall adviſe him to; upon confidence of which, he no ways doubts his parliament will forthwith lay by all jealouſies, and apply themſelves to the public and preſſing affairs, and eſpecially to that of Ireland, wherein the good of this kingdom and the true religion (which ſhall ever be his majeſty's firſt care) are ſo highly and ſo nearly concerned. And his majeſty aſſures himſelf, that his care of the privileges will increaſe their tenderneſs of his lawful prerogative, which are ſo neceſſary to the mutual defence of each other; and both which will be the foundation of a perpetual perfect intelligence between his majeſty and parliament, and of the happineſs and proſperity of his people."

This meſſage (for the reaſon before given) was not capable of ſatisfying the commons. On the contrary, the next day they cauſed ſir Edward Herbert, the attorney-general, to be examined at the bar of the houſe of lords. His anſwers being ſent to the commons, they ordered him to be accuſed of ſeveral high crimes and miſdemeanours, that is to ſay, of having violated the privileges of parliament, in exhibiting to the houſe of lords the articles he received from the king's own hand, with an expreſs command to exhibit them.

Two days after, both houſes petitioned his majeſty, that they might be informed what proof there was againſt the ſix members, to the end they might ſpeedily be proceeded againſt in a parliamentary way. The king anſwered, "he thought it unuſual or unfit to diſcover what proof was againſt them, before he was certain of the way he was to proceed, leſt a new miſtake ſhould breed more delays. That it ſhould therefore be reſolved, whether his majeſty was bound in reſpect of privilege, to proceed againſt them by impeachment in parliament: or whether he was at liberty to prefer an indictment at common law, in the uſual way, or have his choice of either."

This anſwer could not but embarraſs the two houſes, ſince the king was willing to follow their directions in the proſecution of the ſix members. Accordingly, they thought not proper to reſolve upon either of the ways propoſed by the king. They contented themſelves with replying in a ſecond petition, "That finding there was ſtill no legal and parliamentary proceedings againſt the accuſed members, they thought it their duty, once more to beſeech his majeſty, to inform the parliament what proof there was againſt them, that they might be called to a legal trial, it being the undoubted right and privilege of parliament, 'that no member can be proceeded againſt without the conſent of parliament."

The king plainly perceiving there would be no end, and that new difficulties would be perpetually ſtarted, endeavoured to terminate the affair at once by the following anſwer.

"That as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuſe them, ſo now his majeſty finds as good cauſe wholly to deſert any proſecution of them. And for a farther teſtimony of his majeſty's real intentions towards all his loving ſubjects (ſome of whom haply may be involved in ſome unknowing and unwilling errors) for the better compoſing and ſettling of all fears and jealouſies of what kind ſoever, his majeſty is ready to grant as free and general a pardon for the full contentment of all his loving ſubjects, as ſhall by the approbation of both houſes of parliament be thought convenient for that purpoſe."

It was not difficult to perceive, the king offered this general pardon only to have it ſaid, that the ſix members were exempted from the rigour of the law by virtue of the pardon. But the parliament not being ſatisfied with the king's offer, addreſſed a third petition to him, deſiring, that according to two acts of the 37th and 38th years of the reign of Edward III.[c], his majeſty would be pleaſed to ſend the perſons, that had made ſuggeſtion or information to him of the crimes of the ſix members, to the parliament, that ſo the rights and privileges of parliament might be vindicated, which of juſtice ought not to be denied.

The king returning no anſwer to this petition, the affair reſted here, except that in April following, the houſe of peers gave ſentence againſt the attorney general, declaring him uncapable of all offices, but that of attorney-general, and committing him to the priſon of the Fleet during the pleaſure of the houſe.

Though this affair ſeemed to be ended, the king was upbraided with it afterwards a thouſand times. But before I finiſh it entirely, I believe it will not be amiſs to make ſome remarks on this ſubject, that I may not be obliged to reſume it hereafter.

Though the commons made a great noiſe about the breach of their privileges, that was not the thing which moſt incenſed them. Their great grievance was, that the king had choſen, to accuſe of high-treaſon, five members of the houſe, who were the chief leaders and directors. So, to accuſe theſe five members was, as I obſerved, to accuſe the whole houſe. Now if the king did believe the houſe guilty of treaſon, for having done what he accuſed but five members of, what aſſurance could there be, that he would religiouſly obſerve his promiſes, which, in his opinion, were extorted from him by traitors? There was reaſon therefore to ſuſpect, that the king had ſome grand deſign, and before the execution, was willing to ſecure thoſe who were moſt capable to obſtruct it, as well by their abilities as by their great credit in the parliament and with the people. This is the impreſſion made by this unſeaſonable accuſation of the members of the parliament. And to this contributed alſo the king's zeal to ſeize the five members, even to his coming in perſon to the houſe of commons to apprehend them, which no king of England had ever done before him. Nay, very likely, had they been in the houſe, and made any reſiſtance, he would have employed armed men, who attended him to the number of about five hundred, to carry them away. This was ſufficient to incenſe againſt him thoſe who had hitherto conſidered as a doubtful point, whether his promiſes were to be relied on. It could not be conceived, that at a time when the moderate members began to unite in his favour, to eſtabliſh a ſolid peace, he ſhould be induced to an action ſo odious, and ſo deſtructive of it, had he not intended to ſubdue the parliament by force. Thus the complaints of both houſes about the breach of their privileges, was properly only a pretence to cover the true reaſon of their fears. As this reaſon was not of ſufficient evidence to convince the people, who could regard it but as a bare ſuſpicion, they inſiſted only upon their privileges, till they ſhould engage the king to declare himſelf more openly. The real aim was therefore to oblige the king to take ſome new ſtep, that might ſhew the people, it was not without cauſe that the king was accuſed of having ill deſigns. This certainly was the motive of the parliament's petition, to be informed of the proofs before the way of proceeding ſhould be reſolved. This was a ſnare laid for the king, to engage him to produce proofs of a crime, whereof the whole parliament was no leſs guilty than the members accuſed, and thereby the people would have been

[b] Whitelock ſays, the king came guarded with the penſioners, and followed by about two hundred of his courtiers and ſoldiers of fortune, moſt of them armed with ſwords and piſtols. p. 50.

[c] By theſe acts it was enacted, that, "If any perſon whatſoever make ſuggeſtion to the king himſelf of any crime committed by another, the ſame perſon ought to be ſent with the ſuggeſtion before the chancellor or keeper of the great ſeal, the treaſurer or the great council, there to find ſurety to purſue his ſuggeſtion; which if he cannot prove, he is to be impriſoned till he hath ſatisfied the party accuſed of his damages and ſlander, and made fine and ranſom to the king." Rapin, by abridging this paragraph too much, had rendered it obſcure.

And

convinced, that he aimed at the parliament itself. But the king avoided the snare, by dropping the prosecution rather than be obliged to produce proofs, which must have been prejudicial to him, after missing his aim. It was not the breach of privilege, but the king's secret intention, that was chiefly in question. By his late proceedings he had given occasion to think, that a rupture between him and the parliament was not very remote, since he had destroyed the confidence, on which alone peace and good understanding could be founded. In this light must the accusation of the six members be viewed, and not as a separate fact relating only to the privileges of parliament.

It is therefore very needless, in my opinion, that some have undertaken to discuss this question, whether the two houses could lawfully refuse sending to prison their members accused of high-treason? However, I shall briefly speak to this point for the reader's information.

It is certain, the privileges of parliament did not extend to crimes of high-treason, and in such cases the commons have no more right than the peers. But it is also an undoubted maxim, that no member can be proceeded against without the consent of his house. When a peer is accused, it belongs to the house of lords to examine, whether the prosecution ought to be consented to, and in case of consent, whether the party accused is to be confined or left free to answer the accusation. The lords are determined to one or other, by the nature or circumstances of the crime. It is the same with respect to the members of the lower-house. In the present case, the commons thought there was no reason to send the members accused to prison, because the accusation was too general. The king pretended, on the contrary, that upon a bare accusation, under colour that it was for high-treason, he had no power to apprehend the accused, without the consent of their house, and to commit them to the Tower. It is easy to perceive, the king carried this principle a little too for, that the privileges of parliament take not place in cases of high-treason, since he extended it to a bare accusation of treason. But a bare accusation cannot deprive the houses of parliament of the right to examine, if there be reason to consent to the prosecution, whether by direct proof, probable signs, or public evidence. Otherwise, the king might have pitched upon not only five, but an hundred members of the lower-house, and sent them to prison, upon the bare accusation of treason, which would render the privileges of parliament entirely useless. Nevertheless the king acted as if his right had been undeniable, though that was at least the point in question. I shall not undertake to illustrate this matter any farther, which as difficulties, the solution whereof depends on the knowledge of the laws and customs of England. I shall only add, that the king did himself a very great injury by this unseasonable step, and that his enemies received by it advantages, which in the end occasioned his ruin.

Whilst the affair of the accused members was in hand, the commons continued to express an extreme distrust of the king. This distrust daily increased, till at last it produced an entire rupture.

January the 12th, the commons sent an order to sir John Byron, lieutenant of the Tower, to come and answer to such questions as should be put to him, concerning the arms and ammunition sent to Whitehall, the day the king came to the house of commons. But he accused himself, for that he had the king's express warrant not to go out of the Tower.

The king had answered the petition of both houses concerning a guard, that he would appoint one or two hundred men out of the trained-bands of the city (such as the lord-mayor should be answerable for to him) under the command of Robert Bertie, earl of Lindsey. But the commons refused the offer, and ordered, that two companies of the trained-bands should every day attend upon the house as a guard, under the command of serjeant major Skippon.

The parliament's distrust of the king was daily inflamed by successive accidents, which the king's enemies knew how to improve. Whilst things were in this state, the parliament received information, that the lord Digby, colonel Lunsford, and other disbanded officers, were at Kingston upon Thames, with about two hundred horse. Whereupon it was ordered by both houses, that the sheriffs, calling to their assistance the trained-bands of the several counties of England and Wales, should suppress all unlawful assemblies gathered together to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. They were afraid, the king intended to secure Portsmouth, and perhaps, their fears were not groundless. However that be, they sent an order to colonel Goring, governor of Portsmouth, requiring him not to deliver up the town, nor receive any forces into it, but by his majesty's authority, signified by both houses of parliament. At the same time the lords sent an express order to the lord Digby, to give his attendance in the house: but he thought fit to withdraw out of the kingdom[d]. There had now been information, that he was the person who advised the king to accuse the six members of parliament: besides, the commons were exasperated against him, on account of his speech against the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford, whilst he was a member of that house; so that the least pretence was sufficient to draw their resentment upon him.

The commons made great noise about the Kingston affair, to persuade the people his majesty intended to secure Portsmouth: nay, they caused several witnesses to be examined; but the affair was carried no farther. They were contented with sending for admiral Pennington, who reported that the lord Digby had shewn him a warrant, under the king's own hand, to convey him safely into France or Holland, and that he durst not disobey the order.

The parliament's fears about Portsmouth made them think of Hull, a very important place in the county of York. The commons, instead of concealing, affected rather to discover their fears. Wherefore they sent a message to the lords, that there was at Hull a magazine of arms for sixteen thousand men, and ammunition proportionable: that the town being weakly garrisoned, and the adjacent country full of papists and disaffected persons, they desired their concurrence in an order, that some of the trained-bands of Yorkshire should be put into Hull, under the command of sir John Hotham, member of the house of commons, with orders not to deliver up the place or magazine without the king's authority signified by both houses. To this the lords readily consenting, young Hotham, son to sir John, was sent immediately to Hull to execute the order, till his father should be ready to take the government of that place.

Nothing shews more clearly the parliament's distrust than this order about Hull, since it could not be upon the supposition of an urgent necessity that they could pretend to place governors in the towns; and it was also this necessity that they desired to insinuate to the people. However, the sequel shewed the parliament had reason to take that precaution[e].

Since the accusation of the six members, scarce a day had passed but the parliament expressed their suspicions of the king so that every thing manifestly tended to a rupture. The better to persuade the people that both houses were apprehensive of some violence from the king, and not safe at Westminster, a bill was passed to enable them to adjourn to any place they pleased.

They ordered likewise the earl of Newport, master of the ordnance, and the lieutenant of the Tower, not to suffer any cannon or ammunition to be carried from thence. And for the better safe-guard of the Tower, the sheriffs of London and Middlesex were ordered to set a sufficient guard both by land and water about it. The same day the commons caused some great saddles to be seized, that were to be sent to Kingston.

Moreover, Mr. Bagshaw of Windsor, member of the house of commons, informed them, that last night, as he was going to Windsor (where the king then was) he saw divers troops of horse, and that there came thither a waggon loaded with ammunition, and another waggon loaded with the same was sent from thence to Portsmouth: adding, there were at Windsor four hundred horse, with about forty officers. Whereupon Skippon was ordered to detach some horsemen towards Windsor for intelligence. But in all appearance there was no great discovery made, since nothing more was said of it.

After that the commons desired the lords to join with them in a petition to the king, for the removal of sir John Byron from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and offered their reasons. But the lords thought fit to decline it.

Mean while, the lords being informed by the earl of Essex, that the king had laid his commands upon him and the earl of Holland, to attend his majesty at Hampton-court, as lord chamberlain and groom of the stole, they would not dispense with their absence, alleging that their attendance in parliament about the high affairs of the realm, was truer ser-

[e] A committee was also appointed to draw up a letter, or other declaration, to be presented to the lords, and by both houses to be published in print, and sent into all parts of the kingdom, advising them with all expedition to be in a readiness, and good posture of defence, upon all occasions, to defend their several counties from invasion by papists, or other ill-affected persons. vice to his majeſty, than any they could do him at court. The king ſoon after removed both theſe lords from their places[f].

During theſe differences between the king and the parliament, Ireland remained unaſſiſted. The commons would not pay ten thouſand men, who ſhould be levied by the king's commiſſions. They pretended theſe troops ſhould be raiſed by way of preſſing, in order to chuſe ſuch for ſoldiers as ſhould be leaſt attached to the king, and that the king ſhould not be concerned in the levies. The bill for preſſing had been ſent up to the lords, who had not yet paſſed it, of which the commons complained. At laſt, the Scotch commiſſioners, ſeeing that the differences between the king and the parliament retarded the concluſion of the treaty for which they were ſent, bethought themſelves of offering their mediation to the king and both houſes, to procure an agreement. But the king was offended at their offer, becauſe they had not firſt communicated their intentions to him in private. The two houſes on the contrary thanked them for this mark of their affection.

Mean while, the committee for the Iriſh affairs finding that kingdom wanted a ſpeedy aſſiſtance, and that the treaty for the ten thouſand Scots was not likely to be concluded ſoon enough, made a propoſal to the Scotch commiſſioners, that the Scots ſhould ſend into Ireland two thouſand five hundred men who were ready, till the treaty for the ten thouſand ſhould be ended; to which the commiſſioners of Scotland agreed. To that purpoſe they propounded certain conditions, which were approved by both houſes. But the king objected to one of the conditions, which was that Carrickfergus, a ſea-port in the north of Ireland, ſhould be delivered to the Scots. He ſaid it was too great a truſt for auxiliary forces. Nevertheleſs, ſeeing the parliament willing to confide in the Scots, he thought he ſhould not refuſe his confidence to his native ſubjects. It muſt be obſerved, that the king and commons expreſſed an equal deſire to aſſiſt Ireland, but each would have it in their own way. The king wiſhed to have an Engliſh army ſent thither, and blamed the commons for not haſtening the levies. The commons, on their ſide, ſuſpected that the king's aim was to leave England unprovided of men, arms, and ammunition, and therefore inſiſted upon the treaty of Scotland for ten thouſand men; and charged the king with being the ſole cauſe of the obſtacles to the concluſion of the treaty: nay, they plainly intimated, that though the king ſeemed to preſs the relief of Ireland, he had no real intention that kingdom ſhould be relieved. Neceſſity however obliged the king and both houſes to accept at length of the two thouſand five hundred Scots, who were ſent into the north of Ireland, where they did good ſervice.

The commons ceaſed not to ſhew openly their diſtruſt of the king. This was abſolutely neceſſary to the execution of the deſigns of thoſe who had then the chief management of the affairs of the houſe. But it does not follow, becauſe it was neceſſary to make known this diſtruſt, that therefore it was not real. The leading men of this party did not believe indeed they had reaſon to truſt the king, and withal it was their intereſt to ſhew the public the grounds of their diſtruſt. This they did in a ſolemn manner, by means of a ſpeech ſpoken by Mr. Pym at a conference with the lords. This ſpeech deſerves to be inſerted at length, becauſe it ſhews by what ſteps the commons endeavoured to compaſs their ends.

" My lords,

" I AM commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, aſſembled for the commons in parliament, to preſent to your lordſhips divers petitions, which they have received from ſeveral parts, concerning the ſtate of the kingdom: whereunto they are chiefly moved by that conſtant affection which they have always expreſſed of maintaining a firm union and good correſpondence with your lordſhips, wherein they have ever found much advantage and contentment; but never held it more important and neceſſary than at this time, wherein the wiſdom and reſolution of parliament have as many great dangers and difficulties to paſs through, as ever heretofore.

" We are united in the public truſt, which is derived from the common-wealth, in the common duty and obligation whereby God doth bind us, to the diſcharge of that truſt; and the commons deſire to impart to your lordſhips whatſoever information or intelligence, whatſoever encouragement or aſſiſtance they have received from thoſe ſeveral counties which they repreſent, that ſo likewiſe we may be united in the ſame intentions and endeavours of improving all to the ſervice of his majeſty, and the common good of the kingdom.

" The petitions which I am directed to communicate to your lordſhips, are four; from London, Middleſex, Eſſex, and Hertfordſhire. We have received many more, but it would take up too much time, and be too great a trouble to peruſe all: and in theſe four you may perceive the effect and ſenſe of all: firſt, I am to deſire your lordſhips to hear them read, and then I ſhall purſue my inſtructions in propounding ſome obſervations out of them."

The petition of the lord mayor and aldermen of London.

" Sheweth,

" THAT the committee of this honourable houſe, upon Saturday the 22d of this inſtant January, ſent a meſſage to the petitioners, for the loan of one hundred thouſand pounds, or of ſo much thereof as could conveniently be forthwith raiſed, for levying of forces to ſuppreſs the rebels in Ireland: to which meſſage ſomething was then anſwered, and a further anſwer in writing promiſed.

" In performance whereof, they humbly preſent the anſwer following, together with the reaſon thereof, deſiring that the ſame (being the beſt that for the preſent they are able to give) may favourably be accepted."

As this anſwer is very long, and contains ſeveral particulars not abſolutely neceſſary, I ſhall content myſelf with inſerting here what is moſt material.

" That how ſenſible ſoever they were of the great miſeries of their brethren in Ireland, and of the imminent danger, not only of the total loſs of that kingdom, but of the ruin of this alſo, if that of Ireland ſhould be loſt; yet they are compelled to declare, That they have no power to raiſe any ſums by way of tax for any foreign uſe; and that they have no means to do it, otherwiſe than by the immediate perſonal conſent of every particular lender, which they cannot hope to obtain, in regard of theſe obſtructions following.

" 1. That immediately before the parliament, and ſince, divers great ſums, for the ſervice of the king and kingdom, have been already lent by the citizens of London, beſides 50,000l. for the ſupply of Ireland in particular; a great part whereof ſome of the lenders were compelled to borrow, and cannot to this day repay.

" 2. That ſuch part of thoſe monies as ſhould have been repaid out of the poll-money and ſubſidies, is not yet done.

" 3. That the ſaid ſum of fifty thouſand pounds, lent for Ireland, was haſtened and ſpeedily paid, upon account of the urgent neceſſities of that kingdom; and yet no conſiderable forces are ſent thither to this day.

" 4. The general with-holding of very great ſums of money from the petitioners, and many others, doth render divers perſons, of good eſtate and credit, hardly able to go on with trade, or to pay their debts, and maintain their charge.

" 5. The refuſing to accept the offers of Scotland, to ſend ten thouſand men into Ireland, diſcourageth moſt men from lending any money, were they never ſo able.

" 6. The not paſſing the bill for preſſing of ſoldiers puts many men into fears, that there may be ſome deſign there to loſe Ireland, and to conſume this kingdom in the loſing of Ireland, than to preſerve either the one or the other; for that it cannot be conceived, that the rebels (being grown ſo powerful) will be ſuppreſſed by volunteers[g].

" 7. The ſlow iſſuing of commiſſions to thoſe, who being in Ireland, or going thither, are willing to enter the field againſt the rebels, diſables them from doing any effectual execution upon the enemy, unleſs in their own defence; and ſo all the monies that have been, or may be ſent thither, are exhauſted to maintain our forces, to do little or nothing worthy of them, rather than employed to chaſtiſe the rebels; by means whereof thoſe rebels are ſo much emboldened, that they boaſt they will extirpate the Britiſh nation there, and then make England the ſeat of war.

" 8. The not diſarming of papiſts here in England, after many diſcoveries of their treacheries and bloody deſigns; the great decays of fortifications, block-houſes, and other ſeaforts; the not managing of them, nor furniſhing them with ordnance and ammunition; the not placing all of them in ſuch hands, in whom the parliament may confide; and the not ſettling this kingdom in a poſture of defence, in times of ſo many fears and jealouſies of foreign invaſions, and inteſtine conſpiracies; the not removing the preſent lieutenant of the Tower, and putting ſuch a perſon into that place as may be well approved of by the parliament, notwithſtanding the earneſt petitions exhibited to the houſe of commons for that purpoſe, which hath produced a forbearance to bring bullion into the Tower, in this time of ſcarcity of monies; all which cannot but overthrow trading more and more, and make monies yet more ſcarce in the city and kingdom.

" 9. The king's ſhips are not fitted and employed, as the preſent condition of this kingdom and Ireland requires, but ſome of them for conveying away of delinquents [h].

" 10. The not queſtioning thoſe many thouſands of unknown perſons, who are ſheltered in Covent-Garden, and thereabouts, which do not employ themſelves in any lawful calling, and, it is very probable, lie in a readineſs to adventure upon ſome deſperate attempt.

" 11. The miſunderſtanding between the king and the parliament; the not vindicating the privileges of parliament; the not ſuppreſſing of protections; the not puniſhing of delinquents; and the not executing of all prieſts and jeſuits legally condemned, while others, contrary to privilege of parliament, have been charged with treaſon.

" 12. By means of the premiſſes, there is ſuch decay of trading, and ſuch ſcarcity of money, as it is likely, in very ſhort time, to caſt innumerable multitudes of poor artificers into ſuch a depth of poverty and extremity, as may enforce them upon ſome dangerous and deſperate attempts.

" Theſe are the evils under which the petitioners do exceedingly labour and languiſh, which they humbly conceive to have ſprung from the employing of ill-affected perſons in places of truſt and honour in the ſtate, and near to the ſacred perſon of his majeſty; and that theſe evils are ſtill continued by means of the votes of biſhops and popiſh lords in the houſe of peers.

The petitioners of the county of Eſſex thanked the commons for their extraordinary care, repreſenting to them withal, that they were ſtill apprehenſive of a " great ſtop of reformation in matters of religion," and of the whole kingdom's being in great danger from the papiſts: nor could they expect any redreſs, unleſs the biſhops and popiſh lords were removed out of the houſe of peers.

The petitioners of the county of Hertford prayed, that the papiſts might be fully diſarmed; the kingdom put into a poſture of defence; the forts and ſtrong places committed to ſuch hands as the parliament might confide in; the privileges of parliament repaired; endeavours uſed to take away the votes of popiſh lords and biſhops; Ireland ſpeedily relieved; delinquents brought to further puniſhment; preſſures and grievances in church and ſtate removed; and whatever ſhall be amiſs reformed.

Theſe petitions being read, Mr. Pym continued his ſpeech in this manner:

" My lords,

" IN theſe four petitions you may hear the voice or rather the cry of all England, and you cannot wonder if the urgency, the extremity, of the condition wherein we are, do produce ſome earneſtneſs and vehemency of expreſſion more than ordinary; the agony, terror, and perplexity in which the kingdom labours is univerſal, all parts are affected with it; and therefore in theſe you may obſerve the groans and miſerable complaints of all. Divers reaſons may be given, why thoſe diſeaſes which are epidemical are more dangerous than others: the cauſe of ſuch diſeaſes is univerſal and ſupernatural, not from an evil conſtitution, or evil diet, or any other accident; and ſuch cauſes work with more vigour and efficacy than thoſe which are particular and inferior. 1. In ſuch diſeaſes there is a communicative quality, whereby the malignity of them is multiplied and enforced. 2. They have a converting, transforming power, that turns other diſeaſes and evil affections of mens bodies into their own nature.

" The common and epidemical diſeaſe wherein this common-wealth lies now gaſping, hath a ſuperior and univerſal cauſe from the evil counſels and deſigns of thoſe who, under his majeſty, bear the greateſt ſway in government. 1. It hath a contagious and infectious quality, whereby it is diffuſed and diſperſed through all parts of the kingdom. 2. It is apt to take in the diſcontents, evil affections, and deſigns of particular perſons, to increaſe and fortify itſelf.

" I ſhall take occaſion, from ſeveral branches of thoſe petitions which your lordſhips have heard, to obſerve:

" 1. The variety of dangers to which this kingdom is now ſubject.

" 2. The manifold diſtempers which are the cauſe of thoſe dangers.

" 3. The multiplicity of thoſe evil influences, which are the cauſes of thoſe diſtempers.

" The firſt danger is from enemies abroad: This may ſeem a cauſeleſs and impertinent obſervation at this time, ſeeing we are at peace with all nations about us: But (my lords) you may be pleaſed to conſider, that the ſafety of the kingdom ought not to depend upon the will and diſpoſition of our neighbours, but upon our own ſtrength and proviſion: Betwixt ſtates there are often ſudden changes from peace to war, according to occaſion and advantage: All the ſtates of Chriſtendom are now armed, and we have no reaſon to believe, but that thoſe of greateſt power have an evil eye upon us in reſpect of our religion: And if their private differences ſhould be compoſed, how dangerouſly, how ſpeedily might thoſe great armies, and other preparations now ready, be applied to ſome enterprize and attempt againſt us? And if there were no other cauſe, this were ſufficient to make us ſtand upon our guard; but there are divers more eſpecial ſymptoms of dangers of this kind. We may perceive, by ſeveral advertiſements from abroad, that they did foreſee our dangers many months before they broke out; they could foretel the time and manner of them, which is a clear evidence, they held intelligence with thoſe which were the contrivers and workers of the preſent troubles. We have many dangerous traitors and fugitives now in other parts, who can diſcover the weakneſs and diſtemper of the kingdom; who hold intelligence with the ill-affected party here, and by all cunning and ſubtle practices endeavour to excite and provoke other princes againſt us. Some of the miniſters of our neighbouring princes may be juſtly ſuſpected to have a more immediate hand and operation in the inſurrection and rebellion of Ireland; many of the commanders, and moſt of the ſoldiers levied for the ſervice of Spain, are now joined with the rebels there; and thoſe Iriſh friers which were employed by the Spaniſh embaſſador, for the making of thoſe levies, are known to have been the chief incendiaries of this rebellion, and are ſtill very active in the proſecution and encouragement of it. The rebels have a ready and ſpeedy ſupply from ſome of our neighbours. Two convoys of munition and arms we are certainly informed of; one from Dunkirk, the other from Nants in Britany; and certainly thoſe that are ſo forward to enable others to hurt us, will not forbear to hurt us themſelves, as ſoon as they ſhall have means and opportunity to do it.

" Another danger is from the papiſts and ill-affected party athome. The papiſts here are actuated by the ſame principles with thoſe in Ireland, many of the moſt active of them have lately been there; which argues an intercourſe and communication of council. They have ſtill ſtore of arms and munition at their diſpoſing, notwithſtanding all our endeavours to diſarm them; they have a free reſort to the city and to the court; they want no opportunity to conſult together; they have the ſame or greater encouragement from above, and from about [i], than ever, in reſpect of the example and ſucceſs of the rebels in Ireland, and the great confuſions and diviſions which, by their cunning and ſubtle practices, are raiſed and fomented among ourſelves at home.

" A third danger is of tumults and inſurrections of the meaner ſort of people, by reaſon of their ill vent of cloth and other manufactures, whereby great multitudes are ſet on work, who live for the moſt part by their daily gettings, and will, in a very ſhort time, be brought to great extremity, if not employed: Nothing is more ſharp and preſſing than neceſſity and want; what they cannot buy they will take, and from them the like neceſſity will quickly be derived to the farmers and huſbandmen; and ſo grow higher, and involve all in an equality of miſery and diſtreſs, if it be not prevented. And at this time ſuch tumults will be dangerous, becauſe the kingdom is full of diſbanded ſoldiers and officers, which will be ready to head and to animate the multitude to commit violence with more ſtrength and advantage; and if they once grow into a body, it will be much more difficult to reduce them into order again, becauſe neceſſity and want, which are the cauſe of this diſturbance, will ſtill increaſe as the effects do increaſe.

[h] They mean the lord Digby. Rapin.

[i] That is to ſay, from the king, queen, and miniſtry. Rapin.

" A fourth danger is from the rebels in Ireland, not only in the reſpect of that kingdom, but in reſpect of this. They have ſeized upon the body of that kingdom already: they abound in men of very able bodies; they increaſe in arms and munition; they have great hopes of ſupplies from abroad, of incouragement here, and are ſure of good entertainment from the popiſh party, ſo that they begin to ſpeak already there of tranſporting themſelves hither, and making this kingdom the ſeat of the war. The diſtemper which hath produced theſe dangers is various and exceeding violent. Whenſoever nature is hindered in her operations and faculties, diſtempers will neceſſarily follow.

" The obſtructions which have brought us into this diſtemper, are very many, ſo that we cannot wonder at the ſtrength and malignity of it. Some of the chiefeſt of theſe obſtructions I ſhall endeavour to remember.

" 1. The obſtructions of reformation in matters of religion: No grievances are ſharper than thoſe that preſs upon the tender conſciences of men; and there was never church or ſtate afflicted with more grievances of this kind than we have been. And though they are, by the wiſdom of this parliament, partly eaſed and diminiſhed, yet many ſtill remain; and as long as the biſhops and the corrupt part of the clergy continue in their power, there will be little hopes of freedom, either from the ſenſe of thoſe which continue, or the fear of thoſe which are removed. And of this obſtruction, (my lords) I muſt clear the commons, we are in no part guilty of it; ſome good bills have paſſed us, and others are in preparation, which might have been paſſed before this, if we had not found ſuch ill ſucceſs in the other. Whatſoever miſchief this obſtruction ſhall produce, we are free from it; we can have no part in the guilt or diſhonour.

" 2. An obſtruction in trade: It is the trade that brings food and nouriſhment to the kingdom: It is that which preſerves and increaſes the ſtock of the whole, and diſtributes a convenient portion of maintenance to every part of it; therefore ſuch an obſtruction as this muſt needs be dangerous; the freedom of trade being ſo neceſſary, the benefit ſo important, as that it gives life, ſtrength, and beauty to the whole body of the common-wealth; but I muſt proteſt, the houſe of commons have given no cauſe to this obſtruction; we have eaſed trade of many burdens and heavy taxes, which are taken off; we have freed it from many hard reſtraints by patents and monopolies: we have been willing to part with our own privileges to give encouragement; we have ſought to put the merchants into ſecurity and confidence in reſpect to the Tower of London, that ſo they might be invited to bring in their bullion to the mint, as heretofore they have done; and we are no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, and public dangers which make men withdraw their ſtocks, and keep their money by them, to be ready for ſuch ſudden exigents, as in theſe great diſtractions we have too much cauſe to expect.

" 3. The obſtructions in the relief of Ireland. It muſt needs be accounted a great ſhame and diſhonour to this kingdom, that our neighbours have ſhewed themſelves more forward to ſupply the rebels, than we have been to relieve our diſtreſſed brethren and fellow ſubjects. But I muſt declare, that we are altogether innocent of any neglect herein. As ſoon as the firſt news of the rebellion came over, we undertook the war, not by way of ſupply and aid, as in former rebellions the ſubjects have uſed to do, but we undertook the whole charge of it, and we ſuffered not twenty-four hours to paſs, before we agreed to a great levy of money and men, to be employed againſt the rebels, even in a larger proportion than the lords juſtices and council there did deſire; and from time to time we have done all for the furtherance thereof, though in the midſt of many diſtractions and diverſions; but the want of commiſſion for levying of men, for iſſuing arms, and divers other impediments, have been the cauſes of that obſtruction; and I wiſh we had not only found impediments to ourſelves, but alſo encouragements to them. Many of the chief commanders, now at the head of the rebels, after we had, with your lordſhips concurrence, ſtopt the ports againſt the Iriſh papiſts, have been ſuffered to paſs by his majeſty's immediate warrant, much to the diſcouragement of the lords juſtices and the council there, and this procured, as we believe, by ſome evil inſtrument too near his regal perſon, without his majeſty's knowledge and intentions.

" 4. The obſtruction in proſecution of delinquents: Many we have already brought unto your lordſhips; divers others we have been diſcouraged to tranſmit; ſuch difficult proceedings have we met withal; ſuch terrors and diſcountenance have been caſt upon ourſelves and our witneſſes, and thoſe who have ſhewed themſelves their friends and patrons, have found it the moſt ready way to preferment[k]; yea his majeſty's own hand hath been obtained, his majeſty's ſhips been employed for the tranſporting of divers of thoſe who have fled from the juſtice of the parliament[l].

" 5. A general obſtruction and interruption of the proceedings of parliament, by thoſe manifold deſigns of violence (which through God's mercy we have eſcaped) by the great and frequent breaches of privilege, by the ſubtle endeavours to raiſe parties in our houſe, and jealouſies betwixt the two houſes.

" 6. The obſtruction in providing for the defence of the kingdom, that we might be enabled to reſiſt a foreign enemy, to ſuppreſs all civil inſurrections; and what a preſſing neceſſity there is of this, the exceeding great decays in the navy, in the forts, in the power of ordering the militia of the kingdom, and means of furniſhing them with munition, are ſufficient evidences, known to none better than to your lordſhips; and what endeavour we have uſed to remove them (but hitherto without the ſucceſs and concurrence which we expect) and where the ſtop hath been, and upon what good grounds, we may claim our own innocency and faithfulneſs in this: we deſire no other witneſſes but yourſelves.

" Laſtly, I come to the evil influences which have cauſed this diſtemper, and I ſhall content myſelf to mention ſome few of thoſe which are moſt apparent and important.

" 1. In the firſt place, I ſhall remember the evil counſels about the king, whereof we have often complained. Diſeaſes of the brain are moſt dangerous; becauſe from thence ſenſe and motion are derived to the whole body. The malignity of evil counſels will quickly be infuſed into all parts of the ſtate. None can doubt but we have exceedingly laboured under moſt dangerous and miſchievous counſels. This evil influence hath been the cauſe of the preparation of war with Scotland, of the procuring a rebellion in Ireland, of corrupting religion, ſuppreſſing the liberty of this kingdom, and of many fearful and horrid attempts, to the ſubverting the very being of parliaments, which was the only hopeful mean of oppoſing and preventing all the reſt: And this doth appear to be a moſt predominant evil of the time; whereat we need not wonder when we conſider how counſellors have been preferred and prepared. And I appeal to your lordſhips own conſciences, whether the giving, and the countenancing of evil counſels, hath not been almoſt the only way to farther advancement.

" 2. The diſcouragement of good counſels. Divers honeſt and approved counſellors have been put from their places; others ſo diſcountenanced, as that the way of favour hath been ſhut againſt them, and that of danger and deſtruction only open to them.

" 3. The great power that an intereſted and factious party hath in the parliament, by the continuance of the votes of the biſhops and popiſh lords in your lordſhips houſe; and the taking in of others both out of the houſe of commons, and otherwiſe, to increaſe their ſtrength.

" 4. The fomenting and cheriſhing of a malignant party throughout the whole kingdom.

" 5. The manifold jealouſies betwixt the king, his parliament, and good ſubjects, whereby his protection and favour hath in a great meaſure been with-held from them; their inclinations and reſolution to ſerve and aſſiſt him, hath been very much hindered and interrupted: we have often ſuffered under the miſinterpretation of good actions, and falſe imputations of evil, which we never intended. So that we may juſtly purge ourſelves from all guilt of being authors of this jealouſy and miſunderſtanding: We have been and are ſtill ready to ſerve his majeſty with our lives and fortunes, with as much chearfulneſs and earneſtneſs of affection, as ever any ſubjects were, and we doubt not but our proceedings will ſo manifeſt this, that we ſhall be as clear in the apprehenſion of the world, as we are in the teſtimony of our own conſciences.

" I am now come to a concluſion, and I have nothing to propound to your lordſhips by way of requeſt or deſire from the houſe of commons. I doubt not but your judgments will tell you what is to be done; your conſciences, your honours, your intereſt will call upon you for the doing of it; the commons will be glad to have your help and concurrence in ſaving of the kingdom; but if they ſhould fail of it, it ſhould not diſcourage them in doing their duty. And whether the kingdom be loſt or ſaved (as through God's bleſſing I hope it will be) they ſhall be ſorry that the ſtory of this preſent parliament, ſhould tell poſterity, that in ſo great a danger and extremity, the houſe of commons ſhould be inforced to save the kingdom alone, and that the house of peers should have no part in the honour of the preservation of it, you having so great an interest in the good success of those endeavours, in respect of your great estates, and high degrees of nobility.

"My lords, consider what the present necessities and dangers of the common-wealth require, what the commons have reason to expect, to what endeavours and counsels the concurrent desires of all the people do invite you: So that applying yourselves to the preservation of the king and kingdom, I may be bold to assure you, in the name of all the commons of England, that you shall be bravely seconded."

I thought proper to insert this whole speech, because the resolution taken by the commons to divest the king of great part of his prerogatives, which they termed saving the kingdom, manifestly appears in it. In the next place, is seen here the plan they were forming, under colour of applying a cure to the epidemical disease, whose dangers, causes and evil influences were methodically described by Mr. Pym. Though he did not explain the manner of curing it, it was easy to infer from his speech, that it was necessary to prevent the dangers, remove the causes, and apply strong antidotes against the evil influences which inflamed the disease.

The first remark I shall make on this speech, is, that it was a preparative to dispose the people to see, without surprise, the violent remedies which were intended to be used to remove a disease that was industriously represented as almost incurable. It would be easy to shew that all the subsequent proceedings of the commons were intimated in this long speech, if I was not apprehensive it would lead me too far.

I shall add another remark, no less important and requisite; and that is, if the projects of the commons had been founded only upon idle notions and chimeras, they would never have met with so many adherents ready and eager to accomplish them. Had the people of England been never oppressed, vain would have been the endeavours to persuade them to think so. Had not the king attempted to establish an arbitrary power, had not his ministers, his counsellors, all persons in public offices, helped to execute this design, how would it have been possible to convince the people of its reality? If the bishops and high-commission had not abused their power, if in order to be farther removed from the presbyterians, they had not introduced ceremonies and innovations, wherein there was but too much affectation of imitating the Romish religion, never could the people have been persuaded that there was a design to introduce popery. Had the king always strictly kept his word, how would it have been practicable to inspire the people with so great a distrust of him? By what band would the members of parliament have been united together in the design of lessening the king's power? How should such a thought have come into their minds? It may therefore be affirmed, that these projects were founded on very real and true facts, but which the presbyterians artfully improved, to the accomplishment of their private ends. Nevertheless it must be owned, that most of these facts were aggravated, misinterpreted, and even inflamed with groundless insinuations.

I shall farther observe, that they who say, these petitions, presented to the house of commons, were all begged, seem to say it very justly, or at least, with great probability. It is difficult to believe, that the people to whom these petitions were ascribed, could have used a language so agreeable to the aim and intentions of the commons, if they had not been drawn up by persons fully informed of their designs. Indeed, in answer to this objection, it is alleged, that these petitions were not formed upon the views of the commons, but that the house framed their resolutions upon these petitions, which informed them of the nation's desires. But we do not find they ever framed their resolutions upon other petitions directly contrary to these, which were also presented to them from time to time, and which agreed not with their principles. On the contrary, we see that for the most part these were rejected or not regarded by the house.

The commons were so pleased with Mr. Pym's speech, that Mr. Speaker was ordered to give him thanks for it, and desire him to print it, that it might be dispersed among the people. But the king took great offence at it, particularly, at what Mr. Pym said concerning passes granted for Ireland, "That since the stop upon the ports against all Irish papists, by both houses, many of the chief commanders, now at the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass by his majesty's immediate warrant." The king said, it was a black calumny, and demanded by a message, that the house should make him a solemn reparation, and disavow what Pym had asserted; but the commons, who were not then disposed to oblige the king, answered, that what Mr. Pym had said was agreeable to the sense of the house. That it was true, since the stop upon the ports by both houses, several persons who were now commanders among the rebels, had passed into Ireland with his majesty's immediate warrant some of whom they named. The king replied, that these passes were obtained whilst he was in Scotland, and before he knew of the order of parliament, and insisted upon the vindication he had already required. The commons answered by a declaration, maintaining what they had advanced, and adding, that his majesty's passes were not only for those they had before named, but also "For such a one[m] and his company, for such a one[n] and four other persons." The king replied, these were only inferences drawn from the passports, which could not serve for foundation to Pym's assertion in his speech. He insisted again upon reparation: but the commons thought proper not to return any answer.

But this dispute between the king and the parliament was of little importance, in comparison of another at the same time, concerning the militia and command of the forts. But for the better understanding this affair, which is one of the principal of the present reign, it is absolutely necessary to know what had already passed about it.

After the king's return from Scotland, it was easy for him to perceive, that the commons intended to deprive him of great part of his authority. The remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, presented to him at a time, when without such a design, it seemed very needless, was as the signal of the war preparing against him. Whatever had been since done, tended to the same end, that is, to discredit the king's government, and to impute to him sundry designs, under the name of his counsellors, of the papists, and of an ill-affected party. It is not very strange, that finding himself in this ill situation, he thought betimes of providing against the attacks to which he was likely to be soon exposed. But who can affirm, that if he had succeeded in putting himself in a condition to resist, he would have remained upon the defensive? However that be, the precautions he would have taken against his enemies, served but to render their accusations more plausible.

In January 1641-2, when the affair of the members accused and the breach of privileges was warmly debating, the king, not knowing how it might end, formed the design of securing Hull. This place was very considerable, as well by its situation, as a large magazine of arms and ammunition[o], which could procure a great advantage to him that should have it in his power, in case of a rupture. To this end, William Cavendish, earl of Newcastle, by the king's order, came to Hull under a counterfeit name[p], to consult with some of the king's friends, and amongst others with captain Legg, how to oblige the mayor to deliver to him the town and magazine, or to obtain it by force, if the mayor would not give his consent. The secret being discovered, the peers ordered the earl of Newcastle to attend the service of the house, which he did, after receiving the king's pleasure, without being asked at his return, where he had been. But some days after, the commons, as I have said, moved that sir John Hotham might be sent to Hull, to which the lords agreed the more readily, as they were not ignorant upon what design the earl of Newcastle had been dispatched thither. The order was therefore given to Hotham by both houses, to command in Hull, without the king's being acquainted with it.

Shortly after, the affair of the militia being now commenced, the king formed once more the design of securing Hull and Portsmouth. To that purpose, colonel Goring, governor of Portsmouth, whom the king had secretly gained, was to receive the queen into Portsmouth, after which, he had orders to go and take the command of Hull. Probably, there was some course taken for the surrender of that place to him. This design was discovered, though it was communicated but to three persons, and the king thought not proper to pursue it, fear of a disappointment.

If to this be added the suspicions entertained by the parliament, that the late assembly at Kingston was in order to ſurpriſe Portſmouth, and the queen's intended journey thither had the ſame motive: that the lieutenancy of the Tower given to Lunsford might be in purſuance of the king's deſign to ſecure at once the three ſtrongeſt places in the kingdom, it will not be ſurpriſing hereafter, to ſee the parliament full of fears and jealouſies. For though the commons had given the king but too much reaſon to take precautions for his defence, theſe very precautions, had they ſucceeded, would have been no leſs prejudicial to the public, than if they had been without a plauſible foundation. So, as the king had reaſon to fear that the parliament intended to deprive him of his authority, the parliament had no leſs cauſe to ſuſpect that the king was privately labouring to ſubdue them. In this diſpoſition, neither the one nor the other took any ſtep which was not ſuſpected to cover ſome ill deſign. Conſequently every thing tended to a rupture. The ſole concern of both parties, was to gain the people to their intereſt. The parliament ſtrenuouſly endeavoured it by rendering the king odious, and cheriſhing the fears and ſuſpicions already infuſed into the people. Their aim was to convince the nation of the neceſſity of extraordinary proceedings, in a caſe ſo uncommon. The king, on his part, carefully repreſented, that the parliament did nothing but violate the laws, and ſubvert the conſtitution of the government, under colour of maintaining them. Thus much it was neceſſary to premiſe, before I entered upon the affair of the militia, that the reader may underſtand the motives of the king's and the parliament's proceedings.

Eight days after young Hotham's departure for Hull, where his father ſir John came within a few weeks, the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, with the following propoſal:

"That they will with all ſpeed fall into a ſerious conſideration of all thoſe particulars, which they ſhould hold neceſſary, as well for the upholding and maintaining of his majeſty's juſt and regal authority, and for the ſettling of his revenue, as for the preſent and future eſtabliſhment of their privileges; the free and quiet enjoying of their eſtates and fortunes; the liberties of their perſons; the ſecurity of the true religion now profeſſed in the church of England, and the ſettling of ceremonies in ſuch a manner, as may take away all juſt offence; which, when they ſhall have digeſted and compoſed one entire body, that ſo his majeſty and themſelves may be able to make the more clear judgment of them, it ſhall then appear by what his majeſty ſhall do, how far he hath been from intending or deſigning any of thoſe things, which the too great fears and jealouſies of ſome perſons ſeem to apprehend, and how ready he will be to exceed the greateſt examples of the moſt indulgent princes in their acts of grace and favour to their people."

It is evident the king had three views in making this propoſition. The firſt, to find the houſes employment, and procure himſelf time to prepare. The ſecond was, to know at once how far the deſigns of his enemies reached, which could not but be advantageous to him and injurious to them, with regard to the people. His third view was, to ſhew his ſubjects how willing he was to conſent to whatever ſhould be capable of procuring a perfect reconciliation between him and his parliament. As to his ſaying, "How ready he ſhould be, &c." it was only a general promiſe, liable to numberleſs reſtrictions and explanations, and which properly bound him to nothing.

The commons fully perceived the ſnare laid for them by the king, but they perplexed him no leſs by their anſwer to his propoſition. They told him in a petition, "That they returned to his majeſty their moſt humble thanks, reſolving to take this meſſage into ſpeedy and ſerious conſideration; and to enable them with ſecurity to diſcharge their duties therein, they deſired the peers to join with them, in humbly beſeeching his ſacred majeſty, to raiſe up unto them a ſure ground of ſafety and confidence, by putting the Tower and other principal forts of the kingdom, and the whole militia thereof, into the hands of ſuch perſons as the parliament might confide in, and as ſhould be recommended unto his majeſty by both houſes of parliament [q]."

By this anſwer, the commons made a preliminary of the moſt important point to be ſettled between the king and the parliament, and which being granted, would have put it in the parliament's power to do whatever they pleaſed. In the ſecond place, they inſinuated to the people, that the parliament's diſtruſt of the king, muſt have been grounded upon ſtrong preſumptions, ſince there was no way to labour a reconciliation, and ſettle the rights of the nation, ſo long as the king ſhould be maſter of the forts and militia.

The king anſwered, concerning the Tower of London, "That having preferred a perſon of a known fortune, and unqueſtionable reputation to that truſt, he did not expect he ſhould be preſſed to remove him, without any particular charge againſt him: that notwithſtanding, if upon due examination any particular charge ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, whereby it might appear, that he was miſtaken in his opinion of Byron, and that he was unfit for the truſt committed to him, he would make no ſcruple of diſcharging him. But otherwiſe, he was obliged in juſtice to himſelf, to preſerve his own work, leſt his favour and good opinion might prove a diſadvantage and misfortune to his ſervants, without any other accuſation.

"For the forts and caſtles of the kingdom; he was reſolved they ſhould always be in ſuch hands (and only ſuch) as the parliament might ſafely confide in: but the nomination of any perſons to thoſe places (being ſo principal and inſeparable a flower of his crown, veſted in him, and derived unto him from his anceſtors, by the fundamental laws of the kingdom) he would reſerve to himſelf: and in beſtowing of them, he ſhould not be induced to expreſs that favour ſo ſoon to any perſon, as to thoſe whoſe good demeanour ſhould be eminent in, or to his parliament; and if he ſhould at any time confer ſuch a truſt upon an undeſerving perſon, he would always be ready to leave him to the wiſdom and juſtice of his parliament.

"As for the militia of the kingdom, which by the law was ſubject to no command but of his majeſty, and of authority lawfully derived from him, when any particular courſe for the ordering the ſame ſhould be conſidered and digeſted by his parliament, and propoſed to him, he would return ſuch an anſwer, as ſhould be agreeable to his honour, and the ſafety of his people, being reſolved only to deny thoſe things, the granting whereof would alter the fundamental laws."

So general an anſwer was not capable of ſatisfying the commons. Nay, it ſeemed to intimate very clearly, that the king would not grant what was intended to be aſked; and yet he removed ſir John Byron from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and gave it to ſir John Conyers, recommended to him by the commons. But this was a favour he readily granted, as it did not prejudice his rights. Nevertheleſs, a few days after the following petition was preſented to him by both houſes.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty, the humble petition of the lords and commons aſſembled in parliament.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"THE preſent evils and calamities wherewith your kingdoms are moſt miſerably entangled, the imminent dangers which threaten your royal perſon, and all your people, have cauſed us, your moſt faithful and obedient ſubjects, the lords and commons in this preſent parliament, with thankfulneſs to entertain, and with all earneſtneſs of affection and endeavours to purſue the gracious propoſition and direction, which not long ſince we have received from your majeſty. And we have thereupon taken into our moſt ſerious conſideration the ways and means of ſecuring the ſafety of your royal perſon, preſerving the honour and authority of your crown, removing all jealouſies betwixt your majeſty and your people, ſuppreſſing the rebellion in Ireland, preventing the fears and dangers of this kingdom, and the miſchievous deſigns of thoſe who are enemies to the peace of it. And that we may, with more comfort and ſecurity accompliſh our duties herein, we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed forthwith to put the Tower of London, and all other forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into the hands of ſuch perſons as ſhall be recommended to your majeſty by both houſes of parliament [r]. Which they aſſure themſelves, will be a hopeful entrance into thoſe courſes, which (through God's bleſſing) ſhall be effectual for the removing of all diffidence and miſapprehenſion betwixt your majeſty and your people, and for eſtabliſhing and enlarging the honour, greatneſs and power of your majeſty and royal poſterity, and for the reſtoring and confirming the peace and happineſs of your loyal ſubjects in all your dominions. And to this our moſt neceſſary petition, we in all humility expect your majeſty's ſpeedy and gracious anſwer, the great diſtractions and diſtempers of the kingdom not admitting any delay."

The parliament always ſuppoſed the kingdom to be in extreme danger, and the papiſts and diſaffected party, or rather the king himſelf, to have ill-deſigns; though, after all, their [q] The petition goes on, "Wherein the peers having refuſed to join with them, they, notwithſtanding, no way diſcouraged, but confiding in his majeſty's goodneſs, humbly beſeech him, that the Tower of London, &c." Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 517. Rapin takes no notice of this diſſent of the lords.

[r] The lieutenancy of the Tower was not yet given to ſir John Conyers. She ſuppoſition was founded only upon conjectures, of which the king had given ſome occaſion, by endeavouring to ſecure Hull, as the houſe had been well informed. The king's anſwer to the petition was as follows:

"His majeſty having well conſidered of this petition, and being deſirous to expreſs how willing he is to apply a remedy, not only to your dangers, but even to your doubts and fears, he therefore returns this anſwer, that when he ſhall know the extent of power, which is intended to be eſtabliſhed in thoſe perſons whom you deſire to be commanders of the militia in the ſeveral counties, and likewiſe to what time it ſhall be limited that no power ſhall be executed by his majeſty alone, without the advice of parliament, then he will declare, that (for the ſecuring you from all dangers or jealouſies, if any) his majeſty will be content to put in all the places, both of forts and militia in the ſeveral counties, ſuch perſons as both the houſes of parliament ſhall either approve or recommend unto him, ſo that you declare before unto his majeſty the names of the perſons whom you approve or recommend, unleſs ſuch perſons ſhall be named, againſt whom he ſhall have juſt and unqueſtionable exception."

The king ſeemed, by this anſwer, to grant entirely the deſire of both houſes, and yet the ſequel ſhewed it was neither his intention nor thought. For the better underſtanding the anſwer, it will be neceſſary to know how the king then ſtood diſpoſed. His deſign was to withdraw to York and levy troops in thoſe parts, in order to ſeize Hull, with the magazine there. So that, very likely, from that time he thought of war, defenſive or offenſive. And therefore he had determined to ſend the queen into Holland, under colour of conducting thither the princeſs Mary her daughter, who had eſpouſed the prince of Orange, and of going to the Spa. But withal, he had put into her hands the crown jewels, which were afterwards uſed in buying arms and ammunition[s]. When the parliament preſented this petition to him, he was going to ſend away the queen, after which he intended to retire to York. It was not therefore his intereſt abſolutely to reject the parliament's requeſt in ſuch a juncture, for fear of raiſing a ſtorm too ſoon, which might have obſtructed the execution of his two deſigns, and eſpecially that relating to Hull. For this reaſon it was that he returned the parliament ſo ſeemingly ſatisfactory an anſwer, but which however was not an abſolute conſent, becauſe of ſome additional reſtrictions, from whence he meant to draw afterwards a pretence to render his engagement ineffectual. Nevertheleſs, the terms of this engagement were ſo well choſen, that though of themſelves, they ſignified not that the king reſerved to himſelf a power to recede from his word, ſuch a ſenſe however might by inference be fixt upon them. So in the king's intention, this anſwer was ſolely deſigned to gain time. A few days after, he gave the lieutenancy of the Tower to ſir John Conyers[t], the better to perſuade both houſes, he intended to ſatisfy them.

The parliament did not doubt, the king was reſolved to put the militia into the hands of ſuch as ſhould be recommended to him. And therefore they ordered the draught of an ordinance for regulating the militia to be prepared, with the names of the commanders in each county on a ſeparate paper, and preſented it to his majeſty, with a petition for his conſent.

The king anſwered, the queen and princeſs being upon their departure for Holland, he had not time to conſider of ſo important an affair, but would ſend an anſwer at his return. He was then upon the road, accompanying the queen to Dover.

Mean while, the parliament believing to have reaſon to ſuſpect, the king only ſought to amuſe them, and fearing he had formed ſome private deſign which he intended to execute before the regulation of the militia, preſented this other petition to him:

"May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, your humble and loyal ſubjects, the lords and commons, have with a great deal of grief received your majeſty's anſwer to their juſt and neceſſary petition, concerning the militia of this kingdom; which your majeſty, by a gracious meſſage formerly ſent unto them, was pleaſed to promiſe ſhould be put into ſuch hands as your parliament ſhould approve of, or recommend unto you: the extent of their power, and the time of their continuance, being likewiſe declared. That being done, and the perſons by both houſes nominated, your majeſty, nevertheleſs, refers your reſolution herein to a longer and a very uncertain time, which (the preſent dangers and diſtractions ſo great and preſſing) is as unſatisfactory and deſtructive as an abſolute denial.

"Therefore we once again beſeech your majeſty, to take our deſire into your royal thoughts, and to give us ſuch an anſwer, as may raiſe in us a confidence that we ſhall not be expoſed to the practices of thoſe, who thirſt after the ruin of this kingdom, and the kindling of that combuſtion in England, which they have in ſo great a meaſure effected in Ireland; from whence (as we are daily informed) they intend and endeavour to invade us, with the aſſiſtance of the papiſts here amongſt us.

"Nothing can prevent theſe evils, nor enable us to ſuppreſs the rebellion in Ireland, and ſecure ourſelves, but the inſtant granting of that humble petition, which we hope your majeſty will not deny to thoſe, who muſt in the diſcharge of their duties both to your majeſty and the commonwealth, repreſent unto your majeſty what they find ſo abſolutely neceſſary for the preſervation of both, which the laws both of God and man enjoin them to ſee put in execution, as ſeveral counties by their daily petitions have deſired of us, and in ſome places begun already to do it of themſelves."

The parliament wiſhed to have the king's conſent to this regulation of the militia. This would have been advantagious to them upon all accounts. But however, in the caſe wherein they ſuppoſed the kingdom to be, they did not mean, that the king's conſent was ſo abſolutely neceſſary that the regulation could not be done and executed, without his approbation. And therefore to ſhew the king, it would be in vain to oppoſe it, they had ſo ordered it, that in ſome places the people had, of their own accord, divided themſelves into companies, choſen officers, in a word, had begun to regulate the militia, without ſtaying for the king's orders. It is not likely, the people would have ventured upon ſuch an undertaking, had they not been ſure of the parliament's approbation.

The king ſeeing himſelf thus preſſed, ſought other evaſions to amuſe the parliament, without openly declaring however that his intention was to deny the deſire of both houſes. His anſwer to the laſt petition was as follows[u]:

"His majeſty having, with his beſt care and underſtanding, peruſed and conſidered, that which was ſent him from both houſes, for the ordering of the militia, preſented unto him to be made an ordinance of parliament, by the giving of his royal aſſent; as he can by no means do it for the reaſons hereafter mentioned, ſo he doth not conceive himſelf obliged, by any promiſe made in his anſwer of the ſecond of this month to the petition of both houſes, to yield the ſame.

"His majeſty finds great cauſe to except againſt the preface or introduction to that order, which confeſſeth a moſt dangerous and deſperate deſign upon the houſe of commons, of late ſuppoſed to be an effect of the bloody counſels of papiſts and other ill-affected perſons, by which many may underſtand (looking upon other printed papers to that purpoſe,) his coming in perſon to the houſe of commons on the 4th of January, which begat ſo unhappy a miſunderſtanding between him and his people; and for that, though he believes it upon the information ſince given, to be an apparent breach of their privilege, and hath offered to repair the ſame for the future, by any act that ſhall be deſired of his majeſty, yet he muſt declare, and require to be believed, that he had no other deſign upon that houſe, or any member of it, than to require (as he did the perſons of thoſe five gentlemen his majeſty had the day before accuſed of high-treaſon; and to declare, that he meant to proceed againſt them legally and ſpeedily, upon which he believes the houſe would have delivered them up; and his majeſty calls the Almighty God to witneſs, that he was ſo far from any intention or thought of force or violence; although that houſe had not delivered them according to his demand, or in any caſe whatſoever, that he gave thoſe his ſervants, and others, that waited on his majeſty, expreſs charge and command, that they ſhould give no offence to any man; nay, if they received any provocation or injury that they ſhould bear it without return; and his majeſty neither ſaw or knew, that any perſon of his train had any other weapons, but his penſioners and guards thoſe with which they uſually attend his majeſty, and the other gentlemen, ſwords. And therefore his majeſty doubts not, but his parliament will be regard-ful of his honour herein, that he ſhall not undergo any imputation, by the raſh or indiſcreet expreſſions of any young men then in his train, or by any deſperate words uttered by others, who might mingle with them without his conſent or approbation.

"For the perſons nominated to be lieutenants of the ſeveral counties of England and Wales, his majeſty is contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the city of London, and ſuch corporations, as by ancient charters have been granted unto them the power of the militia, his majeſty doth not conceive, that it can ſtand with juſtice or policy to alter their government in that particular.

"And his majeſty is willing forthwith to grant every of them, that of London, and thoſe other corporations excepted,) ſuch commiſſions, as he hath done during this parliament, to ſome lord-lieutenants by your advice; but if that power be not thought enough, but that more ſhall be thought fit to be granted to thoſe perſons named, than by the law is in the crown itſelf; his majeſty holds it reaſonable, that the ſame be by law firſt veſted in him, with power to transfer it to thoſe perſons, which he will willingly do; and whatever that power ſhall be, to avoid all future doubts and queſtions, his majeſty deſires, it may be digeſted into an act of parliament rather than an ordinance; ſo that all his loving ſubjects may thereby particularly know, both what they are to ſuffer, and what they are not to ſuffer, for their neglect, that there be not the leaſt latitude for his good ſubjects to ſuffer under any arbitrary power whatever.

"As to the time deſired for the continuance of the powers to be granted, his majeſty giveth his anſwer, that he cannot conſent to diveſt himſelf of the juſt power, which God and the laws of this kingdom have placed in him for the defence of his people, and to put it into the hands of any other for any indefinite time. And ſince the ground of this requeſt from his parliament, was to ſecure their preſent fears and jealouſies, that they might with ſafety apply themſelves to the matter of his meſſage of the 20th of January: his majeſty hopeth, that his grace to them, ſince that time, in yielding to ſo many of their deſires, and in agreeing to the perſons now recommended to him by his parliament, and the power before expreſſed to be placed in them, will wholly diſpel thoſe fears and jealouſies; and aſſureth them, that as his majeſty hath now applied this unuſual remedy to their doubts, ſo (if there ſhall be cauſe) he will continue the ſame, to ſuch time as ſhall be agreeable to the ſame care he now expreſſeth toward them.

"And in this anſwer, his majeſty is ſo far from receding from any thing he promiſed, or intended to grant in his anſwer to the former petition: that his majeſty hath hereby conſented to all was then aſked of him by that petition concerning the militia of the kingdom, (except that of London, and thoſe other corporations) which was to put the ſame into the hands of ſuch perſons as ſhould be recommended unto him by both houſes of parliament: and his majeſty doubts not, but the parliament upon well weighing the particulars of this his anſwer, will find the ſame more ſatisfactory to their ends, and the peace and welfare of all his good ſubjects, than the way propoſed by this intended ordinance, to which, for theſe reaſons, his majeſty cannot conſent.

"And whereas his majeſty obſerves by the petition of both houſes, preſented to him by the earl of Portland, ſir Thomas Heal, and ſir William Savile, that in ſome places ſome perſons begin already to intermeddle of themſelves with the militia, his majeſty expecteth that his parliament ſhould examine the particulars thereof, it being a matter of high concernment and very great conſequence.

"And his majeſty requireth, that if it ſhall appear to his parliament, that any perſons whatſoever have preſumed to command the militia without lawful authority, they may be proceeded againſt according to law."

There were in this anſwer ſeveral things which could not but diſpleaſe the parliament. 1. The exception of London and ſuch other corporations, as by charters had the power of the militia, which was taking away with one hand, what he ſeemed to give with the other, ſince there were very few towns of any note, but what had the like charters. Beſides, it did not appear that either London or any other corporation deſired to be maintained in this privilege. The king ſuppoſed it without conſulting them. 2. The king, in complaining there was no fixed time for the continuance of the powers of the lieutenants, offered none himſelf. So it was a point to be debated which might long amuſe. 3. As to his promiſing to prolong the time, if there ſhould be cauſe, it was properly nothing, ſince it is certain his general promiſes were not relied on, eſpecially when attended with ſuch reſtrictions. 4. The king did not mention the government of the forts, which was however a point of great moment. 5. He abſolutely rejected the ordinance, and in perſuading the parliament to change it into an act, he would have indirectly obliged them to own, they had now power to make it, which was entirely contrary to the pretenſions of both houſes. 6. In ſuppreſſing the ordinance and turning it into an act, the bill muſt have been drawn his own way, otherwiſe, he tacitely reſerved to himſelf the power of rejecting it, a power that hitherto had been indiſputable. It was therefore very eaſy to perceive, that by all theſe reſtrictions the king ſought only to gain time, and put off the parliament with bare words. Accordingly both houſes having taken his anſwer into conſideration, voted that it was not ſatisfactory, and preſented a third petition to him at Theobalds, where he then was.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"YOUR majeſty's moſt loyal and obedient ſubjects, the lords and commons in parliament, do find their juſt apprehenſions of ſorrow and fear, in reſpect of the public dangers and miſeries like to fall upon your majeſty and the kingdom, to be much increaſed, upon the receipt of your unexpected denial of their moſt humble and neceſſary petition, concerning the militia of the kingdom, eſpecially grieving, that wicked and miſchievous counſellors ſhould ſtill have that power with your majeſty, as in this time of imminent and approaching ruin, rather to incline your reſolutions to that which is apt to further the accompliſhment of the deſires of the moſt malignant enemies of God's true religion, and the peace and ſafety of yourſelf and your kingdom, than to the dutiful and faithful counſel of your parliament: wherefore they are enforced in all humility to proteſt, that if your majeſty ſhall perſiſt in that denial, the dangers and diſtempers of the kingdom are ſuch as will endure no longer delay: but unleſs you ſhall be graciouſly pleaſed to aſſure them by theſe meſſengers, that you will ſpeedily apply your royal aſſent to the ſatisfaction of their former deſires, they ſhall be inforced, for the ſafety of your majeſty and your kingdom, to diſpoſe of the militia by the authority of both houſes, in ſuch manner as hath been propounded to your majeſty, and they reſolve to do it accordingly.

"They likewiſe moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to believe, that the dangerous and deſperate deſign upon the houſe of commons, mentioned in their preamble, was not inſerted with any intention to caſt the leaſt aſperſion upon your majeſty, but herein they reflected upon that malignant party, of whoſe bloody and malicious practices they have had ſo often experience, and from which they can never be ſecure, unleſs your majeſty will be pleaſed to put from you thoſe wicked and unfaithful counſellors, who interpoſe their own corrupt and malicious deſigns betwixt your majeſty's goodneſs and wiſdom, and the proſperity and contentment of yourſelf, and of your people: and that for the diſpatch of the great affairs of the kingdom, the ſafety of your perſon, the protection and comfort of your ſubjects, you will be pleaſed to continue your abode near to London, and the parliament, and not to withdraw yourſelf to any the remoter parts: which, if your majeſty ſhould do, muſt needs be a cauſe of great danger and diſtraction [x].

"That your majeſty will likewiſe be graciouſly pleaſed to continue the prince his highneſs in theſe parts at St. James's, or any other of your houſes near London [y], whereby the deſigns which the enemies of the religion and peace of this kingdom may have upon his perſon, and the jealouſies and fears of your people may be prevented. And they beſeech your majeſty to be informed by them, that by the laws of the kingdom, the power of raiſing, ordering, and diſpoſing of the militia, within any city, town or other place, cannot be granted to any corporation by charter or otherwiſe, without the authority and conſent of parliament; and that thoſe parts of the kingdom which have put themſelves in a poſture of defence againſt the common danger, have therein done nothing but according to the declaration and the direction of both houſes, and what is juſtifiable by the laws of the kingdom.

"All which, their moſt humble counſel and deſires, they pray your majeſty to accept, as the effect of that duty and allegiance which they owe unto you, and which will not ſuffer them to admit of any thoughts, intentions, or endeavours, but ſuch as are neceſſary and advantageous for your majeſty's greatneſs and honour, and the ſafety and proſperity of the kingdom according to that truſt and power which the laws have repoſed in them."

Before I relate the king's anſwer, it will not be improper to make ſome remarks on this petition. My deſign being in this ſecond part of the reign of Charles I. to give the readers a true idea of the differences between the king and the parliament, that they may the better perceive the real grounds of the enſuing civil wars, I hope it will not be taken amiſs, that by remarks on the papers of both ſides, I point out ſome things which perhaps would not be generally obſerved.

In the firſt place, the imminent danger, the approaching ruin ſo much talked of by the parliament, was not ſo evident as they pretended. But they always ſuppoſed, there was a popiſh and malignant party, who had formed a deſign to ruin the kingdom and the proteſtant religion, and that the king's evil counſellors adviſed him to whatever could be advantageous to that party. I do not ſay this ſuppoſition was entirely falſe: but it may be ſaid at leaſt to be grounded upon bare conjectures. Beſides, theſe were only generals, under which the parliament concealed the true cauſe of their fears. They were apprehenſive, that the king by ſecret practices, would ſecure the forts and magazines, as it was well known he intended it, and raiſe an army. Nay, it could not be doubted that conſidering his preſent ſtate, he would have done it, had it been in his power. It will be ſeen hereafter that he had thought of it, before the time I am ſpeaking of. But when this petition was preſented to him, he was only ſuſpected to have ſome great deſign in hand. He was therefore to be prevented by diſpoſing of the militia by the authority of both houſes, in order to be ready to oppreſs ſuch as ſhould declare for him, or to hinder them from declaring. But all this was coloured with the pretence of putting the kingdom in a poſture of defence againſt the plots of the malignants. For that reaſon, the pretended deſign of this malignant party was always expreſſed in general terms, without mention of any particulars, and great care was taken to refer to it all the king's actions, and all the events which could have any relation thereto. But it muſt be remembered, as I have often ſaid, that the parliament's intention was to diveſt the king of the greateſt part of his authority, and that the king's deſign was to ſcreen himſelf from the impending misfortunes, and in ſo doing, he would have put himſelf alſo in a ſtate of attacking, had he been ſuffered to do it. This is properly the key to the papers which were publiſhed on both ſides concerning the militia, though the king and the parliament endeavoured to varniſh their reſpective proceedings with pretences capable of dazzling the people.

I ſhall remark in the ſecond place, that the parliament in this petition took no notice of the reaſons alleged by the king in his former anſwer. They were contented with always ſuppoſing the deſign of ſubverting religion and the laws, and with referring to that deſign the removal of the prince of Wales, and the abſence of the king from his parliament, to inſinuate that the king's reſtrictions to his promiſe were intended only to gain time, in order to favour the malignants.

Thirdly, the parliament's fears that the king's abſence concealed ſome hidden deſign were not groundleſs, as I ſaid, and as will hereafter appear.

All this ſhews, that the king and the parliament had but too much cauſe to miſtruſt one another. If the parliament, under colour of imminent danger to the kingdom, thought it incumbent on them to require, that the militia ſhould be put into ſuch hands as they could confide in, the king had no leſs reaſon to endeavour to hinder both houſes from uſurping a power, which was to ſerve to oppreſs him.

The king returned the following anſwer to the parliament's laſt petition:

"I am ſo much amazed at this meſſage, that I know not what to anſwer: you ſpeak of jealouſies and fears: lay your hands to your hearts, and aſk yourſelves, whether I may not likewiſe be diſturbed with fears and jealouſies: and if ſo, I aſſure you this meſſage hath nothing leſſened them.

"For the militia, I thought ſo much of it before I ſent that anſwer, and am ſo much aſſured that the anſwer is agreeable to what in juſtice or reaſon you can aſk, or I in honour grant, that I ſhall not alter it any point.

"For my reſidence near you, I wiſh it might be ſo ſafe and honourable, that I have no cauſe to abſent myſelf from Whitehall: aſk yourſelves whether I have not.

"For my ſon, I ſhall take that care of him, which ſhall juſtify me to God as a father, and to my dominions as a king.

"To conclude, I aſſure you upon my honour, that I have no thought but of peace and juſtice to my people, which I ſhall by all fair means ſeek to preſerve and maintain, relying upon the goodneſs and providence of God for the preſervation of myſelf and rights."

It muſt be obſerved upon this anſwer, that the reaſon alleged by the king to juſtify his abſence from Whitehall, namely, the riotous aſſemblies of the people of London, was plauſible: but it was extremely weak, to prove the neceſſity of his reſiding at York. However he artfully confounded, under one and the ſame reaſon, his removal to York and his abſence from London. We ſhall ſee preſently the true reaſon of his retiring to York.

2. It is very likely, the king wiſhed for peace, provided his prerogatives were untouched. But the parliament thought, in order to a laſting peace, the kings power was to be retrenched.

Upon this anſwer, it was reſolved by the houſe of commons:

"1. That this anſwer of his majeſty is a denial to the deſires of both houſes of parliament concerning the militia.

"2. That thoſe that adviſed his majeſty to give this anſwer, are enemies to the ſtate, and miſchievous projectors againſt the defence of the kingdom.

"3. That this denial is of that dangerous conſequence, that if his majeſty ſhall perſiſt in it, it will hazard the peace and ſafety of all his kingdoms, unleſs ſome ſpeedy remedy be applied by the wiſdom and authority of both houſes of parliament.

"4. That ſuch parts of this kingdom as have put themſelves into a poſture of defence againſt the common danger, have done nothing but what is juſtifiable, and is approved by the houſe.

"5. That if his majeſty ſhall remove into any remote parts from his parliament, it will be a great hazard to the kingdom, and a great prejudice to the proceedings of the parliament.

"6. That this houſe holds it neceſſary, that his majeſty may be deſired, that the prince may come unto St. James's, or to ſome other convenient place near or about London, and there to continue.

"7. That the lords be deſired to join with this houſe in an humble requeſt unto his majeſty, that he will be pleaſed to reſide near his parliament, that both houſes may have a convenience of acceſs unto him upon all occaſions.

"8. That the lords be moved to join with this houſe in ſome fit courſe of examination, to find who were the perſons that gave his majeſty this advice, that they may be removed from his majeſty, and brought to condign puniſhment.

"9. That no charter can be granted by the king, to create a power in any corporation over the militia of that place, without conſent of parliament.

"10. That the lords ſhall be moved to join with this houſe in theſe votes.

"11. That the lords ſhall be deſired to appoint a ſelect committee, that may join with a committee of a proportionable number of this houſe, to conſider and prepare what is fit to be done upon theſe votes, or upon any thing elſe that may ariſe upon this anſwer of his majeſty concerning the militia, and concerning the prince."

The ſame day it was reſolved in the houſe of commons,

"That the kingdom be forthwith put in a poſture of defence, by authority of both houſes, in ſuch a way as is already agreed upon by both houſes of parliament."

In purſuance of this reſolution, both houſes publiſhed the following ordinance for ſettling the militia:

"Whereas there hath been of late a moſt dangerous and deſperate deſign upon the houſe of commons, which we have juſt cauſe to believe to be an effect of the bloody counſels of papiſts and other ill-affected perſons, who have already raiſed a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland, and by reaſon of many diſcoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed not only to ſtir up the like rebellion and inſurrections in this kingdom of England, but alſo to back them with forces from abroad.

"For the ſafety therefore of his majeſty's perſon, the parliament, and kingdom, in this time of imminent danger, it is ordained by the lords and commons now in parliament aſſembled, that Henry earl of Holland ſhall be lieutenant of the county of Berks, Oliver earl of Bullingbroke ſhall be lieutenant of the county of Bedford, &c. And the ſaid lord-lord-lieutenants ſhall ſeverally and reſpectively have power to aſſemble and call together all and ſingular his majeſty's ſubjects within the ſaid ſeveral and reſpective counties and places, as well within liberties as without, that are meet and fit for the wars, and them to train and exerciſe, and put in readineſs, and them, after their abilities and faculties, well and ſufficiently from time to time, to cauſe to be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muſter of them in places fit for that purpoſe. And that they ſhall ſeverally and reſpectively have power, within the ſeveral and reſpective counties and places aforeſaid, to nominate and appoint ſuch perſons of quality as to them ſhall ſeem meet, to be their deputy-lieutenants, to be approved of by both houſes of parliament. And be it further ordained, that ſir John Gayre, ſir Jacob Garret, knights, &c. ſhall have ſuch power and authority within the city of London, as any of the lieutenants before named, are authorized to have by this ordinance, within the ſ'd ſeveral and reſpective counties (the nomination and appointment of deputy-lieutenants only excepted.) And it is further ordained, that ſuch perſons as ſhall not obey in any of the premiſſes, ſhall anſwer their neglect and contempt to the lords and commons in a parliamentary way, and not otherwiſe, nor elſewhere; and that every the powers granted as aforeſaid, ſhall continue, until it be otherwiſe ordered or declared by both houſes of parliament, and no longer."

Theſe forces from abroad, mentioned in the ordinance, were a chimera, framed to amuſe the people and make them believe the king would cauſe the realm to be invaded by foreigners. For though, very probably, the pope and cardinal Richlieu countenanced the Iriſh rebellion, it could not however be affirmed, they had formed a deſign to invade England in favour of the king.

March the 9th, the king being at Newmarket, both houſes preſented the following declaration to him, which ſerved for reply to his anſwer.

Declaration of both houſes preſented to the king at Newmarket, March 9, 1641-2.

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" ALTHOUGH the expreſſions in your majeſty's meſſage of the 2d of this inſtant March, do give juſt cauſe of ſorrow to us, your faithful ſubjects the lords and commons in parliament, yet it is not without ſome mixture of confidence and hope, conſidering they proceeded from the apprehenſion of our actions and intentions, which having no ground of truth or reality, may by your majeſty's juſtice and wiſdom, be removed, when your majeſty ſhall be fully informed, that thoſe fears and jealouſies of ours, which your majeſty thinks to be cauſeleſs and without any juſt ground, do neceſſarily and clearly ariſe from thoſe dangers and diſtempers, into which the miſchievous and evil councils about you have brought this kingdom; and that thoſe other fears and jealouſies, by which your favour, your royal preſence, and confidence have been withdrawn from your parliament, have no foundation or ſubſiſtence in any action, intention, or miſcarriage of ours, but are merely grounded upon the falſhood and malice of thoſe, who, for the ſupporting and fomenting their own wicked deſigns againſt the religion and peace of the kingdom, do ſeek to deprive your majeſty of the ſtrength and affection of your people, them of your grace and protection, and thereby to ſubject both your royal perſon and the whole kingdom to ruin and deſtruction.

" To ſatisfy your majeſty's judgment and conſcience in both theſe points, we deſire to make a clear and free declaration of the cauſes of our fears and jealouſies, which we offer to your majeſty in theſe particulars:

" 1. That the deſign of altering religion in this and in your other kingdoms, hath been potently carried on by thoſe in greateſt authority about you, for divers years together: the queen's agent at Rome, and the pope's agent or nuncio here, are not only evidences of this deſign, but have been great actors in it.

" 2. That the war with Scotland was procured to make way for this intent, and chiefly invited and fomented by the papiſts, and others popiſhly affected, whereof we have many evidences, eſpecially their free and general contribution to it.

" 3. That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and contrived here in England, and that the Engliſh papiſts ſhould have riſen about the ſame time, we have ſeveral teſtimonies and advertiſements from Ireland; and that it is a common ſpeech amongſt the rebels, wherewith concur other evidences and obſervations of the ſuſpicious meetings and conſultations, the tumultuary and ſeditious carriage of thoſe of that religion in divers parts of this kingdom, about the time of the breaking out of the Iriſh rebellion; the depoſition of O'Conelly; the information of Mr. Cole, miniſter; the letter of Triſtram Whitecombe; the depoſition of Thomas Grant, and many others, which we may produce, do all agree in this: the public declarations of the lords, gentlemen, and others, of the Pale, that they would join with the rebels, whom they call the Iriſh army, or any other, to recover unto his majeſty his royal prerogative, wreſted from him by the puritan faction in the houſes of parliament in England, and to maintain the ſame againſt all others, as alſo to maintain epiſcopal juriſdiction, and the lawfulneſs thereof: theſe two being quarrels upon which his majeſty's late army in the north ſhould be incenſed againſt us.

" The great cauſe we have to doubt, that the late deſign, ſtyled the Queen's pious Intention, was for the alteration of religion in this kingdom; for ſucceſs whereof, the pope's nuncio, the count Roſetti, enjoined faſting and praying to be obſerved every week by the Engliſh papiſts, which appeared to us by one of the original letters, directed by him to a prieſt in Lancaſhire.

" The boldneſs of the Iriſh rebels in affirming they do nothing but by authority from the king; that they call themſelves the queen's army; that the prey or booty which they take from the Engliſh, they mark with the queen's mark; that their purpoſe was to come to England, after they had done in Ireland; and ſundry other things of this kind proved by O'Conelly, and divers others, eſpecially in the fore-mentioned letters from Triſtram Whitecombe, the mayor of Kingſale, to his brother Benjamin Whitecombe, wherein there is this paſſage, " That many other ſtrange ſpeeches they utter about religion and our court of England, which he dares not commit to paper.

" The manifold attempts to provoke your majeſty's late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raiſe a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom: that thoſe who have been actors in thoſe buſineſſes, have had their dependance, their countenance, and encouragement from the court; witneſs the treaſon whereof Mr. Jermin and others ſtand accuſed, who was tranſported beyond ſea by warrant under your majeſty's hand, after your majeſty had given aſſurance to your parliament, that your majeſty had laid a ſtrict command upon all your ſervants, that none of them ſhould depart from court: and that dangerous petition delivered to captain Legg by your majeſty's own hand, accompanied with a direction ſigned with C. R.

" The falſe and ſcandalous accuſation againſt the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons, tendered to the parliament by your majeſty's own command, endeavoured to be juſtified in the city by your own preſence and perſuaſion, and to be put in execution upon their perſons by your majeſty's demand of them in the houſe of commons, in ſo terrible and violent a manner as far exceeded all former breaches of privileges of parliament acted by your majeſty or any of your predeceſſors; and whatſoever your intentions were, divers bloody and deſperate perſons, which attended your majeſty, diſcovered their affections and reſolutions to have maſſacred and deſtroyed the members of that houſe, if the abſence of thoſe perſons accuſed, had not, by God's providence, ſtopped the giving of that word which they expected, for the ſetting them upon that barbarous and bloody act; the lifting of ſo many officers and ſoldiers, and others, putting them into pay, and under command of colonels; feaſting and careſſing them in an unuſual manner at Whitehall, thereby maintaining them in the violent aſſaults and other injuries which they offered to divers of your ſubjects, coming that way in a lawful and peaceable manner; the carrying them out of town, after which they were told by the lord Digby, that the king removed on purpoſe that they might not be trampled in the dirt; and keeping them ſo long in pay, endeavouring to engage the gentlemen of the inns of court in the ſame courſe; the plotting and deſigning of a perpetual guard about your majeſty; the labouring to infuſe into your majeſty's ſubjects an evil opinion of the parliament through the whole kingdom, and other ſymptoms of a diſpoſition of raiſing arms, and dividing your people by a civil war; in which combuſtion Ireland muſt needs be loſt, and this kingdom miſerably waſted and conſumed, if not wholly ruined and deſtroyed.

" That after a vote had paſſed the houſe of commons, declaring that the lord Digby had appeared in a warlike manner at Kingſton upon Thames, to the terror and fright of your majeſty's good ſubjects, and diſturbance of the public peace of the kingdom; and that therefore the lords ſhould be moved to require his attendance, he ſhould nevertheleſs be of that credit with your majeſty, as to be ſent away by your your own warrant to sir John Pennington, to land him beyond the sea, from whence he vented his own traiterous conceptions, that your majesty should declare yourself, and retire to a place of strength in this kingdom, as if your majesty could not be safe among your people; and withal took that transcendent boldness to write to the queen, offering to entertain correspondence with her majesty by cyphers, intimating some service which he might do in those parts, for which he desired your majesty's instructions, whereby in probability he intended the procuring the same foreign force to strengthen your majesty in that condition, into which he would have brought you; which false and malicious council and advice, we have great cause to doubt, made too deep and an impression in your majesty, considering the course you are pleased to take of absenting yourself from your parliament, and carrying the prince with you, which seems to express a purpose in your majesty to keep yourself in a readiness for the acting of it.

"The manifold advertisements which we have had from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, that they still expect, that your majesty has some great design in hand, for the altering of religion, the breaking the neck of your parliament, that you will yet find means to compass that design; that the pope's nuncio hath solicited the kings of France and Spain to lend your majesty four thousand men a piece, to help to maintain your royalty against the parliament; and this foreign force, as it is the most pernicious and malignant design of all the rest, so we hope it is, and shall always be farthest from your majesty's thoughts, because no man can believe, you will give up your people and kingdom to be spoiled by strangers, if you did not likewise intend to change both your own profession in religion, and the public profession of the kingdom, that so you might still be more assured of those foreign states of the popish religion, for your future support and defence.

"These are some of the grounds of our fears and jealousies, which make us so earnestly to implore your royal authority and protection for our defence and security, in all the ways of humility and submission, which being denied by your majesty, seduced by evil counsel, we do with sorrow, for the great and unavoidable misery and danger which thereby is like to fall upon your own person, and your kingdoms, apply ourselves to the use of that power for the security and defence of both, which by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom resides in us; yet still resolving to keep ourselves within the bounds of faithfulness and allegiance to your sacred person and your crown: so as to the second sort of jealousies and fears of us expressed by your majesty, we shall give a shorter, but as true and as faithful an answer.

"Whereas your majesty is pleased to say, that for your residence near the parliament, you wish it may be so safe and honourable, that you had no cause to absent yourself from Whitehall: this we take as the greatest breach of privilege of parliament that can be offered, as the heaviest misery to yourself, and imputation upon us, that can be imagined, and the most mischievous effects of evil counsels: it roots up the strongest foundation of the safety and honour which your crown affords; it seems as much as may be to cast on the parliament such a charge as is inconsistent with the nature of that great council, being the body whereof your majesty is the head; it strikes at the very being both of king and parliament, depriving your majesty, in your own apprehensions, of their fidelity, and them of your protection, which are the mutual bands and supports of government and subjection.

"We have, according to your majesty's desire, laid our hands upon our hearts; we have asked ourselves in the strictest examination of our consciences; we have searched our affections, our thoughts; considered our actions, and we find none that can give your majesty any just occasion to absent yourself from Whitehall and the parliament; but that you may with more honour and safety continue there than in any other place.

"Your majesty lays a general tax upon us; if you will be graciously pleased to let us know the particulars, we shall give a clear and satisfactory answer; but what hope can we have of ever giving your majesty satisfaction, when those particulars which you have been made to believe were true, yet being produced, and made known to us, appeared to be false, and your majesty notwithstanding, will neither punish, nor produce the authors, but go on to contract new jealousies and fears upon general and uncertain grounds, affording us no means or possibility of particular answer, to the clearing of ourselves? For proof whereof, we beseech your majesty to consider these instances:

"The speeches alleged to be spoken in a meeting of divers members of both houses at Kensington, concerning a purpose of restraining the queen and prince, which after it was denied and disavowed, yet your majesty refused to name the authors, though humbly desired by both houses.

"The report of articles framed against the queen's majesty, given out by some of near relation to the court; but when it was publicly and constantly disclaimed, the credit seemed to be withdrawn from it; but the authors being kept safe, will always be ready for exploits of the same kind, wherewith your majesty and the queen will be often troubled, if this course be taken to cherish and secure them in such wicked and malicious slanders.

"The heavy charge and accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, who refused no trial or examination which might stand with the privilege of parliament; yet no authors, no witnesses, produced, against whom they may have reparation, for the great injury and infamy cast upon them; notwithstanding three several petitions of both houses, and the authority of two acts of parliament, vouched in the last of those petitions.

"We beseech your majesty to consider in what state you are, how easy and fair a way you have to happiness, honour, greatness, plenty, and security; if you will join with the parliament, and your faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom: This is all we expect from you, and for this we shall return to you our lives, fortunes, and uttermost endeavours to support your majesty, your just sovereignty and power over us; but it is not words that can secure us in these our humble desires: We cannot but too well, and sorrowfully, remember, what gracious messages we had from you this summer, when, with your privity, the bringing up the army was in agitation; we cannot but with the like affections recall to our minds, how, not two days before you gave directions for the above-mentioned accusation, and your own coming to the commons house, that house received from your majesty a gracious message, that you would always have a care of their privileges, as of your own prerogative, of the safety of their persons as of your own children. That which we expect, which will give us assurance that you have no thought but of peace and justice to your people, must be some real effect of your goodness to them, in granting those things, which the present necessity of the kingdom doth enforce us to desire: And in the first place, that your majesty will be graciously pleased to put from you those wicked and mischievous counsellors, which have caused all these dangers and distractions, and to continue your own residence, and the prince's, near London, and the parliament, which we hope will be a happy beginning of contentment and confidence betwixt your majesty and your people, and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to your majesty, and of security and prosperity to them.

"The lords and commons have commanded us to present unto your majesty this farther addition, to their former declaration.

"That your majesty's return and continuance near the parliament, is a matter in their apprehension of so great necessity and importance, toward the preservation of your royal person and your kingdoms, that they cannot think they have discharged their duties, in the single expression of their desire, unless they add some farther reasons to back it with.

"1. Your majesty's absence will cause men to believe, that it is out of design to discourage the undertakers, and hinder the other provisions for raising money for defence of Ireland.

"2. It will very much hearten the rebels there, and disaffected persons in this kingdom, as being an evidence and effect of the jealousies and divisions betwixt your majesty and your people.

"3. That it will much weaken and withdraw the affection of the subjects from your majesty, without which a prince is deprived of his chiefest strength and lustre, and left naked to the greatest dangers and miseries, that can be imagined.

"4. That it will invite and encourage the enemies of our religion, and the states in foreign parts, to the attempting and acting their evil designs and intentions towards us.

"5. That it causeth a great interruption in the proceedings of parliament.

"These considerations threaten so great dangers to your majesty's person, and to all your dominions, that, as your majesty's great council, they hold it necessary to represent to you this their faithful advice, that so whatsoever followeth, they may be excused before God and man."

It is needless to make any particular remarks on this declaration. The following answers and replies will best explain the nature of the quarrel between the king and the parliament and the arguments of both.

It muſt only be obſerved in general, that according to the cuſtom of contending parties, each inſiſted largely upon the points that were favourable, and lightly touched upon ſuch as were diſadvantageous, or even paſſed them over entirely in their anſwers and replies.

Thus much is certain, that in the preſent ſituation of affairs, the king and the parliament had but too much cauſe to miſtruſt one another, and that each laboured to procure ſuch advantages, as might enable them to attack or defend. As for the declarations, meſſages, anſwers, replies, theſe were only for the people, it being the intereſt of each to gain and amuſe them. But herein the parliament had a great advantage, by reaſon of the people's prejudice againſt the king, to which he oppoſed only general promiſes, whereof he could give no aſſurance. This was very advantageous to the parliament, who pretended, that in order to truſt in ſuch promiſes, it was neceſſary the king ſhould begin with diveſting himſelf of what enabled him to break them. Hence may be ſeen, how perplexed this affair was.

When the committees of both houſes preſented to the king the foregoing declaration, and after it was read in his preſence, he returned this extempore general anſwer.

" I AM confident that you expect not I ſhould give you a ſpeedy anſwer to this ſtrange and unexpected declaration, and I am ſorry (in the diſtraction of this kingdom) you ſhould think this way of addreſs to be more convenient, than that propoſed by my meſſage, of the 20th of January laſt, to both houſes.

" As concerning the grounds of your fears and jealouſies, I will take time to anſwer particularly, and doubt not but I ſhall do it to the ſatisfaction of all the world. God, in his good time, will, I hope, diſcover the ſecrets and bottoms of all plots and treaſons; and then I ſhall ſtand right in the eyes of my people; in the mean time I muſt tell you, that I rather expected a vindication for the imputation laid on me in Mr. Pym's ſpeech, than that any more general rumours and diſcourſes ſhould get credit with you.

" For my fears and doubts, I did not think they ſhould have been thought ſo groundleſs or trivial, while ſo many ſeditious pamphlets and ſermons are looked upon, and ſo great tumults are remembered, unpuniſhed, uninquired into: I ſtill confeſs my fears, and call God to witneſs that they are greater for the true proteſtant profeſſion [z], my people and laws, than for my own rights or ſafety; though I muſt tell you, I conceive that none of theſe are free from danger.

" What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to paſs any bill for the eaſe and ſecurity of my ſubjects? I do not aſk you, what you have done for me.

" Have any of my people been tranſported with fears and apprehenſions? I have offered as free and general pardon, as yourſelves can deviſe. All this conſidered, there is a judgment from heaven upon this nation, if theſe diſtractions continue.

" God ſo deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright, for the maintenance of the true proteſtant profeſſion, and for the obſervation and preſervation of the laws of this land; and I hope God will bleſs and aſſiſt thoſe laws for my preſervation.

" As for the additional declaration, you are to expect an anſwer to it, when you ſhall receive the anſwer to the declaration itſelf."

On the morrow, the king gave the general anſwer to the committee in writing, which he had delivered by word of mouth the day before.

After that, the earl of Pembroke, one of the committee, aſking him, whether he would grant the milita, as was deſired by the parliament, for a time? " No, anſwered the king, by God, not for an hour [a]." This anſwer did him great injury. His principal concern was to ſatisfy the people, that his word might be relied upon, and yet he ſhewed, he had no intention to keep his promiſe to the parliament, to grant the militia, when he ſhould know for how long a term, ſince he refuſed to grant it even for an hour.

If the parliament had hitherto placed but little confidence in the king's promiſes, this did not help to increaſe it. On the other hand, the harſh and diſreſpectful treatment of the king by both houſes, in their declaration, very much incenſed him, and rendered a rupture unavoidable. For my part, I verily believe, that the hard things ſaid by the parliament to the king in the declaration, were inſerted by the direction of ſome of the leaders of the party, on purpoſe to widen the breach, and make a reconciliation impracticable. For, it is to be preſumed, if the king had then granted the militia for two or three months, both houſes would have ſcarce known what uſe to have made of it. They would have had no pretence to employ it againſt him, ſince he would have clearly ſhewed, it was not his fault that their fears were not removed. But it is certain, he had to deal with abler heads than himſelf and his council. Beſides, he was then full of his deſign to ſeize Hull, which hindered him, doubtleſs, from ſeriouſly attending to what was moſt for his advantage.

March the 15th, the king being at Huntington, ſent a meſſage to both houſes to inform them, that he intended to reſide at York for ſometime. He recommended to them at the ſame time the affairs of Ireland. As to the militia he told them, " That as he had always been ſo tender of the privileges of parliament, that he had been ready and forward to retract any act of his own, which he had been informed had trenched upon their privileges; ſo he expected an equal tenderneſs in them, of his known and unqueſtionable privileges; amongſt which, he was aſſured it is a fundamental one, 'That his ſubjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order or injunction, to which his majeſty hath not given his conſent:" That therefore, he expected and required obedience from all his ſubjects, to the laws eſtabliſhed, being reſolved to keep the laws himſelf, and to require obedience to them from all his ſubjects."

The next day, the commons paſſed the following votes, which were approved by the lords.

" That the houſe ſhould inſiſt upon their former votes concerning the militia.

" That the king's abſence, ſo far remote from his parliament, was not only an obſtruction, but might be a deſtruction to the affairs of Ireland.

" That when the parliament [b], which is the ſupreme court of judicature in the kingdom, ſhall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only queſtioned and controverted, but contradicted: and a command that it ſhould not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament. (1.)

Remark (1.) The commons uſe here the equivocal word [parliament] in an improper ſenſe. It is true, the parliament, which conſiſts of the king and the two houſes, has a right to declare what is law; to make new and repeal old laws, becauſe the authority of both houſes, with the royal aſſent, is deemed the authority of the whole kingdom. But the two houſes alone had never enjoyed this right. Nay, in ſtrictneſs, the two houſes cannot be called the parliament, becauſe the parliament is a body, compoſed of three members, and not two only, namely, king, lords, and commons.

" That a committee ſhall be appointed by the houſe to join with a committee of lords to enquire where this meſſage was framed.

" That thoſe perſons that did adviſe his majeſty to abſent himſelf from the parliament are enemies to the peace of this kingdom, and juſtly ſuſpected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland, as are alſo thoſe that adviſed his majeſty to this meſſage."

It was at the ſame time unanimouſly reſolved upon the queſtion by the lords in parliament.

" That the ordinance of the lords and commons in parliament for the ſafety and defence of the kingdom of England and dominions of Wales, is not any way againſt the oath of allegiance.

" That the ſeveral commiſſions granted under the great ſeal to the lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, are illegal and void.

" That whoſoever ſhall execute any power over the militia of this kingdom and dominion of Wales, by colour of any commiſſion of lieutenancy, without conſent of both houſes of parliament, ſhall be accounted a diſturber of the peace of this kingdom.

" Moreover, both houſes voted with one common conſent, That the kingdom hath been of late, and ſtill is, in ſo evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a popiſh party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable neceſſity of putting his majeſty's ſubjects into a poſture of defence, for the ſafe-guard both of his majeſty and his people.

"That the lords and commons fully apprehending this danger, and being ſenſible of their own duty, to provide a ſuitable prevention, have in ſeveral petitions addreſſed themſelves to his majeſty for the ordering and diſpoſing of the militia of the kingdom, in ſuch a way, as was agreed upon by the wiſdom of both houſes to be moſt effectual and proper for the preſent exigents of the kingdom; yet could not obtain it, but his majeſty did ſeveral times refuſe to give his royal aſſent thereunto.

"That in this caſe of extreme danger, and of his majeſty's refuſal, the ordinance agreed on by both houſes for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

"That ſuch perſons as ſhall be nominated deputy-lieutenants, and approved of by both houſes, ſhall receive the commands of both houſes to take upon them to execute their offices [c].

Theſe reſolutions were taken with great precipitation, for the two houſes had not yet received the king's anſwer to their declaration of the 9th of March. But as by his laſt meſſage the king had ſufficiently ſhewn, he intended not to depart from his right concerning the militia, they thought it needleſs to wait for a more particular notification. Some time after, the king ſent them this anſwer in form of a declaration.

"The king's declaration to both houſes of parliament, in anſwer to that preſented to him at Newmarket, March 9, 1641-2 [d].

"THOUGH the declaration lately preſented to us at Newmarket from both our houſes of parliament, be of ſo ſtrange a nature, in reſpect of what we expected, (after ſo many acts of grace and favour to our people) and ſome expreſſions in it ſo different from the uſual language to princes, that we might well take a very long time to conſider it: Yet the clearneſs and uprightneſs of our conſcience to God, and love to our ſubjects, hath ſupplied us with a ſpeedy anſwer, and our unalterable affection to our people, prevailed with us to ſuppreſs that paſſion, which might well enough become us upon ſuch an invitation.

"We have conſidered our anſwer of the 1ſt of this month at Theobalds, which is urged to have given juſt cauſe of ſorrow to our ſubjects. Whoſoever looks over that meſſage, (which was in effect to tell us, that if we would not join with them in an act we conceived prejudicial and dangerous to us and the whole kingdom, they would make a law without us, and impoſe it upon our people) will not think that ſudden anſwer can be excepted to.

"We have little encouragement to replies of this nature, when we are told of how little value our words are like to be with you; though they come accompanied with all the actions of love and juſtice, (where there is room for actions to accompany them) yet we cannot but diſavow the having any ſuch evil council and counſellors to our knowledge, as are mentioned; and if any ſuch be diſcovered, we will leave them to the cenſure and judgment of our parliament: In the mean time we could wiſh, that our own immediate actions which we avow, and our honour, might not be ſo roughly cenſured and wounded, under that common ſtile of evil counſellors.

"For our faithful and zealous affection for the true proteſtant profeſſion, and our reſolution to concur with our parliament in any poſſible courſe for the propagation of it, and the ſuppreſſion of popery, we can ſay no more than we have already expreſſed in our declaration to all our loving ſubjects, publiſhed in Ireland by the advice of our privy-council, in which we endeavoured to make as lively a confeſſion of ourſelf in this point, as we were able, being moſt aſſured, that the conſtant practice of our life hath been anſwerable thereunto; and therefore we did rather expect a teſtimony and acknowledgement of ſuch our zeal and piety, than thoſe expreſſions we met with in this declaration of any deſign of altering religion in this kingdom; and we do (out of the innocence of our ſoul) wiſh, that the judgments of heaven may be manifeſted upon thoſe who have, or had any ſuch deſign. (1.)

Remark (1.) This article of the king's anſwer ſeems very weak. For the parliament having ſet forth, in their declaration, the reaſons why they believed there was a ſettled deſign to alter religion in England, and that the king encouraged the authors, his majeſty only anſwers in generals.

"As for the Scotch troubles, we had well thought, that thoſe unhappy differences had been wrapped up in perpetual ſilence by the act of oblivion, which being ſolemnly paſſed in the parliaments of both kingdoms, ſtops our mouth from any other reply, than to ſhew our great diſlike for reviving the memory thereof. (2.)

Rem. (2.) It is very viſible, the king avoids entering into particulars upon this head, though being attacked by the parliament, he might have vindicated himſelf without infringing the peace between the two kingdoms, or the act of oblivion.

"If the rebellion in Ireland (ſo odious to all chriſtians) ſeems to have been framed and maintained in England, or to have any countenance from hence, we conjure both our houſes of parliament, and all our loving ſubjects whatſoever, to uſe all poſſible means to diſcover and find ſuch out, that we may join in the moſt exemplary vengeance upon them that can be imagined; but we muſt think ourſelves highly and cauſeleſly injured in our reputation, if any declaration, action or expreſſion of the Iriſh rebels, any letters from count Roſetti to the papiſts for faſting and praying, or from Triſtram Whitecombe, of ſtrange ſpeeches uttered in Ireland, ſhall beget any jealouſy or miſapprehenſion in our ſubjects of our juſtice, piety and affection, it being evident to all underſtandings, that thoſe miſchievous and wicked rebels are not ſo capable of great advantage, as by having their falſe diſcourſes ſo far believed, as to raiſe fears and jealouſies to the diſtraction of this kingdom, the only way to their ſecurity: and we cannot expreſs a deeper ſenſe of the ſuffering of our poor proteſtant ſubjects in that kingdom, than we have done in our often meſſages to both houſes, by which we have offered, and are ſtill ready to venture our royal perſon for their redemption; well knowing, that as we are (in our own intereſt) more concerned in them, ſo we are to make a ſtrict account to almighty God, for any neglect of our duty, or their preſervation. (3.

Rem. (3.) The king continues here to clear himſelf from the ſuſpicions conceived of him with regard to Ireland, by generals and his own teſtimony. But theſe proofs taken from his word, and his other outward demonſtrations, were not ſufficient to ſatisfy every one. The parliament did not accuſe him of being wanting in expreſſions of zeal for the reducing of Ireland, but of really neglecting it.

"For the manifold attempts to provoke our late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raiſe the faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom; if it be ſaid, as relating to us, we cannot without great indignation ſuffer ourſelves to be reproached, to have intended the leaſt force or threatening to our parliament, as the being privy to the bringing up of the army would imply; whereas we call God to witneſs, we never had any ſuch thought, or knew of any ſuch reſolution concerning our late army. (4.)

Rem. (4.) We have ſeen in the account of that conſpiracy what were the ſeveral projects of the conſpirators, and that indeed they came to no reſolution, particularly as to the bringing up the army to London. The king certainly knew all the circumſtances of the plot, but as there was nothing reſolved, he artfully confines himſelf here to the denying that he was privy to any reſolution, which is very true, for there was no reſolution taken. But however, he knew of the deſign in general to gain the army, of which he ſays not a word.

"For the petition ſhewed to us by captain Legg, we well remember the ſame, and the occaſion of that conference; captain Legg being lately come out of the North, and repairing to us at Whitehall; we aſked him of the ſtate of our army, and (after ſome relation made of it) he told us, that the commanders and officers of the army had a mind to petition the parliament, as others of our people had done, and ſhewed us the copy of a petition, which we read, and finding it to be very humble, deſiring the parliament might receive no interruption in the reformation of the church and ſtate, to the model of queen Elizabeth's days; we told him, we ſaw no harm in it; whereupon he replied, that he believed all the officers in the army would like it, only he thought ſir Jacob Aſhly would be unwilling to ſign it, out of fear that it might diſpleaſe us. We then read the petition over again, and then obſerving that neither in matter or form, we conceived it could poſſibly give juſt cauſe of offence, we delivered livered it to him again, bidding him give it to sir Jacob Ashly, for whose satisfaction we had written C. R. upon it, to testify our approbation: and we wish that the petition might be seen and published, and then we believe it will appear no dangerous one, nor a just ground for the least jealousies or misapprehension. (5.)

Rem. (5.) If we compare what the king says here of the contents of this petition, with that inserted by the lord Clarendon in his history, we shall find the lord Clarendon's petition cannot be the same as that signed, by the king with C. R. The king's word must be taken, to believe that this petition had nothing in it prejudicial to the parliament. For hitherto it has never appeared.

"For Mr. Jermin, it is well known that he was gone from Whitehall, before we received the desires of both houses for the restraint of our servants, neither returned he thither, or passed over by any warrant granted by us after that time. (6.)

Rem. (6.) It is certain, Jermin went beyond sea by the king's warrant. It may be, the king had granted the warrant before he received the parliament's petition: but the parliament pretended the warrant was antedated.

"For the breach of privilege in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, we thought we had given so ample satisfaction in our several messages to that purpose, that it should be no more pressed against us; being confident, if the breach of privilege had been greater than ever before offered, our acknowledgement and retraction hath been greater than ever king hath given; besides the not examining how many of our privileges have been invaded in defence and vindication of the other; and therefore we hoped our true and earnest protestation in our answer to your order concerning the militia, would so far have satisfied you of our intentions then that you would no more have entertained any imagination of any other design than we there expressed. (7.)

Rem. (7.) The king was much mistaken in imagining that bare protestations were capable of satisfying the parliament of the sincerity of his intentions. Nay, the very declaration he was answering, might have convinced him of the contrary, since it was there said in plain terms, his word was not to be relied on.

"But why the listing of so many officers, and entertaining them at Whitehall, should be mis-construed, we much marvel, when it is notoriously known, the tumults of Westminster were so great, and their demeanours so scandalous and seditious, that we had good cause to suppose our own person and those of our wife and children, to be in apparent danger, and therefore we had great reason to appoint a guard about us, and to accept the dutiful tender of the services of any of our loving subjects, which was all we did to the gentlemen of the inns of court.

"For the lord Digby, we assure you on the word of a king, that he had not our warrant to pass the seas, and had left our court before we ever heard of the vote of the house of commons, or had any cause to imagine, that his absence would have been excepted against.

"What your advertisements are from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, or what the pope's nuncio solicits the kings of France or Spain to do, or from what persons such informations come to you, or how the credit and reputation of such persons have been sifted and examined, we know not; but are confident no sober, honest man in our kingdoms can believe, that we are so desperate, or so senseless to entertain such designs, as would not only bury this our kingdom in sudden distraction and ruin, but our own name and posterity in perpetual scorn and infamy; and therefore we could have wished, that in matters of so high and tender a nature (wherewith the minds of our good subjects must needs be startled) all the expressions were so plain and easy, that nothing might stick with them with reflection upon us, since you thought fit to publish it all.

"And having now dealt thus plainly and freely with you by way of answer to the particular grounds of your fears, we hope (upon a due consideration, and weighing both together) you will not find the grounds to be of that moment to beget, or longer to continue a misunderstanding betwixt us, or force you to apply yourselves to the use of any other power than what the law hath given you, the which we always intend shall be the measure of our own power. and expect it shall be the rule of our subjects obedience.

"Concerning our fears and jealousies; as we had no intention of accusing you, so are we sure no words spoken by us (on the sudden) at Theobalds, will bear that interpretation. We said, for our residence near you, we wish it might be so safe and honourable, that we had no cause to absent ourself from Whitehall; and how this can be a breach of privilege of parliament, we cannot understand. We explained our meaning in our answer at Newmarket, at the presentation of this declaration, concerning the printed seditious pamphlets and sermons, and the great tumults at Westminster; and we must appeal to you and all the world, whether we might not justly suppose ourself in danger of either: and if we were now at Whitehall, what security have we that the like shall not be again, especially if any delinquents of that nature have been apprehended by the ministers of justice, and been rescued by the people, and so as yet escape unpunished? If you have not been informed of the seditious words used in, and the circumstances of those tumults, and will appoint some way for the examination of them, we will require some of our learned council to attend with such evidence as may satisfy you; and till that be done, or some other course be taken for our security, you cannot (with reason) wonder that we intend not to be, where we most desired to be.

"And can there yet want evidence of our hearty and importunate desire to join with our parliament and all our faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom? Have we given you no other earnest but words, to secure you of these desires? The very remonstrance, of the house of commons (published in November last) of the state of the kingdom, allows us a more real testimony of our good affections than words: that remonstrance valued our acts of grace and justice (8.) at so high a rate, that it declared the kingdom to be then a gainer, though it charged itself by bills of subsidies, and poll-money, with the levy of six hundred thousand pounds, besides the contracting of a debt to our Scotch subjects of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds. (9.)

Rem. (8.) Hitherto the king had spoken of his assent to the acts of this parliament, but as acts of grace. He began in this paper to add, of justice.

Rem. (9.) It is true the nation had been great gainers by these acts of grace and justice. But the king could not represent as a convincing proof of his love for his people, his consent that the illegal taxes of his own imposing should be abolished, and the monopolies authorised by himself suppressed. Especially as it was not entirely in his power to refuse his assent,

"Are the bills for the triennial parliament, relinquishing our title of imposing upon merchandize, and power of pressing soldiers, for the taking away the star-chamber, and high-commission-courts, for the regulating the council-table, but words? Are the bills for the forest, the stannery-courts, the clerk of the market, and the taking away the votes of the bishops out of the lords house, but words? Lastly, what greater earnest of our trust and reliance on our parliament could or can we give, than the passing of a bill for the continuance of this present parliament? The length of which we hope will never alter the nature of parliaments, and the constitution of this kingdom, or invite our subjects so much to abuse our confidence, as to esteem any thing fit for this parliament to do, which were not, if it were in our power to dissolve it to-morrow. And after all these, and many other acts of grace on our part (that we might be sure of a perfect reconciliation betwixt us and all our subjects) we have offered and are still ready to grant, a free and general pardon, as ample as yourselves shall think fit. Now if these be not real expressions of the affection of our soul, for the public good of our kingdom, we must confess, that we want skill to manifest them. (10.)

Rem. (10.) A sort of sophistry runs quite through this article, consisting in the supposition that the king had consented to all these acts, out of love and affection for his people, which few persons believed. Besides, all these acts having been made only to suppress the abuses introduced by the king himself, there was no occasion, it seems, to talk so much of them.

"To conclude (although we think our answer already full to that point) concerning our return to London; we are willing to declare, that we look upon it as a matter of so great weight, as with reference to the affairs of this kingdom, and our own inclinations and desires, that if all we can say or do can raise a mutual confidence (the only way, with God's blessing, to make us all happy) and by your encouragement the laws of the land, and the government of the city of London, may recover some life for our security, we will overtake your desires, and be as soon with you as you can wish; and in the mean time we will be sure that neither the business of Ireland, or any other advantage for this kingdom, shall suffer through our default, or by our absence we being being ſo far from repenting the acts our juſtice and grace, which we have already performed to our people, that we ſhall with the ſame alacrity be ſtill ready to add ſuch new ones, as may beſt advance the peace, honour, and proſperity of this nation."

Before the parliament received this anſwer, they ſent another petition to the king in reply to his ſudden anſwer to the declaration delivered at Newmarket. Though theſe anſwers and replies be long and full of repetitions, yet I think it neceſſary to inſert them at large, that the reader may be able to paſs an impartial judgment upon this quarrel. For in affairs of this nature, and eſpecially in this which has given birth to two parties ſtill ſubſiſting in England, there is great danger of being miſled, if the honeſty and prejudices of the hiſtorians, who are all of one or other party, be relied on. It will be better therefore to leave the reader at liberty to judge upon the parties own papers. Here follows the parliament's petition.

" May it pleaſe your majeſty, [1642] " YOUR majeſty's loyal ſubjects, the lords and commons in parliament, cannot conceive, that the declaration which your majeſty received from us at Newmarket, was ſuch as did deſerve that cenſure, your majeſty was pleaſed to lay upon us in that ſpeech, which your majeſty made to our committees there, and ſent in writing to both houſes; our addreſs therein being accompanied with plainneſs, humility, and faithfulneſs, we thought more proper for the removing the diſtraction of the kingdom, than if we had then proceeded according to your majeſty's meſſage of the 20th of January, by which your majeſty was pleaſed to deſire, that we would declare, what we intended to do for your majeſty, and what we expected to be done for ourſelves; in both which we have been very much hindred by your majeſty's denial to ſecure us, and the whole kingdom, by diſpoſing the militia, as we had divers times moſt humbly petitioned; and yet we have not been altogether negligent of either, having lately made good proceedings, in preparing a book of rates to be paſſed in a bill of tunnage and poundage; and likewiſe the moſt material heads of thoſe humble deſires, which we intend to make to your majeſty, for the good and contentment of your majeſty, and your people; but none of theſe could be perfected before the kingdom be put into ſafety, by ſettling the militia: and until your majeſty ſhall be pleaſed to concur with your parliament in theſe neceſſary things, we hold it impoſſible for you to give the world, or your people, ſuch ſatisfaction concerning the fears and jealouſies which we have expreſſed, as we hope your majeſty hath already received, touching that exception, which you were pleaſed to make to Mr. Pym's ſpeech.

" As for your majeſty's fears and doubts, the ground whereof is from ſeditious pamphlets and ſermons, we ſhall be as careful to endeavour the removal, as ſoon as we ſhall underſtand what pamphlets and ſermons are by your majeſty intended, as we have been to prevent all dangerous tumults. And if any extraordinary concourſe of people out of the city of Weſtminſter, had the face and ſhew of tumult and danger in your majeſty's apprehenſion, it will appear to be cauſed by your majeſty's denial of ſuch a guard to your parliament, as they might have cauſe to confide in; and by taking into Whitehall ſuch a guard for yourſelf, as gave juſt cauſe of jealouſy to the parliament, and of terror and offence to your people; we ſeek nothing but your majeſty's honour, and the peace and proſperity of your kingdoms; and we are heartily ſorry we have ſuch plentiful matter of an anſwer to that queſtion, Whether you had violated our laws?

" We beſeech your majeſty to remember, that the government of this kingdom, as it was in a great part managed by your miniſters, before the beginning of this parliament, conſiſted of many continued and multiplied acts of violation of the laws; the wounds whereof were ſcarcely healed, when the extremity of all thoſe violations was far exceeded, by the late ſtrange and unheard-of breach of our laws, in the accuſation of the lord Kimbolton, and five members of the commons houſe, and in the proceedings thereupon, for which we have received no full ſatisfaction.

" To your majeſty's next queſtion, whether you had denied any bill, for the eaſe and ſecurity of your ſubjects, we wiſh we could ſtop in the midſt of our anſwer; that with much thankfulneſs we acknowledge, that your majeſty hath paſſed many good bills, full of contentment and advantage to your people; but truth and neceſſity inforceth us to add this, that even in or about the time of paſſing thoſe bills, ſome deſign or other hath been on foot; which if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived us of the fruit of thoſe bills, but have reduced us to a worſe condition of confuſion, than that wherein the parliament found us.

" And if your majeſty had aſked us the third queſtion, intimated in that ſpeech, What we had done for yourſelf? Our anſwer would have been much more eaſy, That we had paid two armies, wherewith the kingdom was burthened laſt year; and have undergone the charge of the war in Ireland, at this time, when through many other exceſſive charges and preſſures, your ſubjects have been exhauſted, and the ſtock of the kingdom very much diminiſhed; which great miſchiefs, and the charges thereupon enſuing, have been occaſioned by the evil counſels ſo powerful with your majeſty, which have, and will, coſt this kingdom more than two millions, all which, in juſtice, ought to have been borne by your majeſty.

" As for that free and general pardon your majeſty has been pleaſed to offer, it can be no ſecurity to our fears and jealouſies, for which your majeſty ſeems to propound it becauſe they ariſe not from any guilt of our own actions, but from the evil deſigns and attempts of others.

" To this our humble anſwer to that ſpeech, we deſire to add an information, which we lately received from the deputy-governor of the merchant-adventurers at Rotterdam in Holland, that an unknown perſon, appertaining to the lord Digby, did lately ſolicit one James Henely, a mariner, to go to Elſenore, and to take charge of a ſhip in the fleet of the king of Denmark, there prepared, which he ſhould conduct to Hull; in which fleet likewiſe, he ſaid, a great army was to be tranſported: and although we are not apt to give credit to informations of this nature; yet we cannot altogether think it fit to be neglected; but that it may juſtly add ſomewhat to the weight of our fears and jealouſies, conſidering with what circumſtances it is accompanied, with the lord Digby's preceding expreſſions in his letter to her majeſty and ſir Lewis Dives, and your majeſty's ſucceeding courſe of withdrawing yourſelf northwards from your parliament, in a manner very ſuitable and correſpondent to that evil council, which we doubt will make much deeper impreſſion in the generality of your people; and therefore, we moſt humbly adviſe and beſeech your majeſty, for the procuring and ſettling the confidence of your parliament, and all your ſubjects, and for the other important reaſons concerning the recovery of Ireland, and ſecuring this kingdom, which have been formerly preſented to your majeſty; you will be graciouſly pleaſed (with all convenient ſpeed) to return to theſe parts, and to cloſe with the counſel and deſire of your parliament, where you ſhall find their dutiful affections and endeavours ready to attend your majeſty with ſuch entertainment, as ſhall not only give your majeſty juſt cauſe of ſecurity in their faithfulneſs, but other manifold evidences of their earneſt intentions and endeavours to advance your majeſty's ſervice, honour, and contentment, and to eſtabliſh it upon the ſure foundation of the peace and proſperity of all your kingdoms."

This petition was preſented to the king at York, the 26th of March. He had now ſent his anſwer to the declaration of both houſes, and therefore mentions it in his anſwer to this laſt petition.

" The king's anſwer [e].

" IF you would have had the patience to have expected our anſwer to your laſt declaration, (which conſidering the nature of it, hath not been long in coming) we believe you would have ſaved yourſelves the labour of ſaying much of this meſſage; and we could wiſh, that our privileges in all parts were ſo ſtated, that this way of correſpondence might be preſerved with that freedom which hath been uſed of old; for we muſt tell you, that if you may aſk any thing of us by meſſage or petition, and in what language (how unuſual ſoever) you think fit, and we muſt neither deny the thing you aſk, nor give a reaſon why we cannot grant it, without being taxed with breaking your privileges, or being counſelled by thoſe who are enemies of the peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Iriſh rebellion (for we have ſeen your printed votes, upon our meſſage from Huntingdon) you will reduce all our anſwers hereafter into a very little room: in plain Engliſh, it is to take away the freedom of our vote, which were we but a ſubject were high injuſtice; but being your king, we leave all the world to judge what it is. (1.)

Remark (1.) The parliament ſuppoſed an imminent danger, which obliged them to act in an unuſual manner, and the king ſuppoſed the government to be in its uſual and natural ſtate. This miſunderſtanding continually returns in the papers of both ſides.

" Is this the way to compoſe all miſunderſtandings? We thought we ſhewed you one by our meſſage of the 20th of January; if you have a better, or a readier we ſhall willingly hearken to it, for hitherto you have ſhewed us none: but why the refuſal to conſent to your order, (which you call a denial of the militia) ſhould be an interruption to it, we cannot underſtand; for the militia, (which we always thought neceſſary to be ſettled) we never denied the thing, (as we told you in our anſwer of the 28th of January, to the petition of the houſe of commons) for we accepted the perſons, (except for corporations) we only denied the way: you aſk it by way of ordinance, and with ſuch a preface, as we can neither with juſtice to our honour or innocence conſent to: you exclude us from any power in the diſpoſition, or execution of it, together with you, and for a time utterly unlimited. We tell you, we would have the thing done; allow the perſons (with that exception) deſire a bill, (the only good way of impoſing on our ſubjects) we are extremely unſatisfied what an ordinance is; but well ſatisfied, that without our conſent it is nothing, not binding; and it is evident, by the long time ſpent in this argument, the neceſſity and danger was not ſo imminent, but a bill might have well been prepared; which, if it ſhall yet be done with that due regard to us, and care of our people, in the limitation of the power, and other circumſtances, we ſhall recede from nothing we formerly expreſſed in that anſwer to your order; otherwiſe, we muſt declare to all the world, that we are not ſatisfied with, or ſhall ever allow our ſubjects, to be bound by your printed votes of the fifteenth or ſixteenth of this month, or that under pretence of declaring what the law of the land is, you ſhall without us make a new law, which is plainly the caſe of the militia; and what is this, but to introduce an arbitrary way of government? (2.)

Rem. (2.) It is no wonder the king and the parliament could not agree upon any one thing, ſince they reaſoned upon different principles. The king ſuppoſed, that the ordering of the militia, deſired by both houſes, ought to be done after the uſual manner; whereas the parliament pretended, that the danger the kingdom was in, and of which the king was the cauſe, gave them a right to demand an extraordinary regulation, wherein the king ſhould not be concerned. On the other hand, it is manifeſt, the reſtrictions propoſed by the king in this article, left him at liberty to diſpute eternally, and to refuſe the bill which ſhould be preſented to him, unleſs it was wholly ineffectual for the deſigns of the parliament.

" Concerning Pym's ſpeech, you will have found, by what the lord Compton, and Mr. Bainton brought from us, in anſwer to that meſſage they brought to us, that as yet we reſt nothing ſatisfied in that particular.

" As for the ſeditious pamphlets and ſermons, we are both ſorry and aſhamed in ſo great variety, and in which our rights, honour, and authority, are ſo inſolently ſlighted and vilified, and in which the dignity and freedom of parliament is ſo much invaded and violated, it ſhould be aſked of us to name any, the mentioning of the 'proteſtation proteſted, the apprentices proteſtation, to your tents, O Iſrael!' or any other, would be too great an excuſe for the reſt: if you think them not worth your inquiry we have done: But we think it moſt ſtrange to be told, that our denial of a guard, (which we yet never denied, but granted in another manner, and under a command at that time moſt accuſtomed in the kingdom) or the denial of any thing elſe, (which is in our power legally to deny) which in our underſtanding (of which God hath ſurely given us ſome uſe) is not fit to be granted, ſhould be any excuſe for ſo dangerous a concourſe of people; which, not only in our apprehenſion, but (we believe) in the interpretation of the law itſelf, hath been always held moſt tumultuous and ſeditious. And we moſt wonder what, and from whence come the inſtructions and informations that thoſe people have, who can ſo eaſily think themſelves obliged by the proteſtation, to aſſemble in ſuch a manner, for the defence of privileges, which cannot be ſo clearly known to any of them, and ſo negligently paſs over the conſideration, and defence of our rights, ſo beneficial and neceſſary for themſelves, and ſcarce unknown to any of them, which by their oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, (and even by the ſame proteſtation) they are at leaſt equally obliged to defend. And what interruptions ſuch kind of aſſemblies may be to the freedom of future parliaments, (if not ſeaſonably diſcountenanced and ſuppreſſed) we muſt adviſe you to conſider, as likewiſe whether both our powers may not by ſuch means be uſurped, by hands not truſted by the conſtitution of this kingdom. For our guard, we refer you to our anſwer to that declaration.

" By that queſtion of violating your laws; by which we endeavoured to expreſs our care and reſolution to obſerve them; we did expect you would have been invited to have looked back ſo many years, for which you have had ſo ample reparation: neither looked we to be reproached with the actions of our miniſters (then againſt the laws) whilſt we expreſs ſo great a zeal for the preſent defence of them, it being our reſolution, upon obſervation of the miſchief which then grew by arbitrary power, (though made plauſible to us by the ſuggeſtions of neceſſity and imminent danger; and take you heed you fall not into the ſame error upon the ſame ſuggeſtions) hereafter to keep the rule ourſelf, and to our power require the ſame from all others: (3.) but above all, we muſt be moſt ſenſible of what you caſt upon us, for requital of thoſe good bills you cannot deny. We have denied any ſuch deſign, and as God Almighty muſt judge in that point between us, who knows our upright intentions at the paſſing thoſe laws: ſo in the mean time, we defy the devil to prove, that there was any deſign (with our knowledge or privity) in or about the time of paſſing thoſe bills, that, had it taken effect, could have deprived our ſubjects of the fruit of them: and therefore we demand full reparation in this point, that we may be cleared in the ſight of all the world, and chiefly in the eyes of our loving ſubjects, from ſo notorious and falſe an imputation as this is.

Rem. (3.) Thoſe that undertake to vindicate king Charles's government, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign, do more than ever he pretended to do himſelf, as appears by this clauſe of his anſwer.

" We are far from denying what you have done; for we acknowledge the charge our people have ſuſtained in keeping the two armies, and in relieving Ireland, of the which we are ſo ſenſible, that in regard of thoſe great burdens our people have undergone, we have, and do patiently ſuffer thoſe extreme perſonal wants, as our predeceſſors have been ſeldom put to, rather than we would preſs upon them; which we hope (in time) will be conſidered on your parts. (4.)

Rem. (4.) The king gloried in having ſuffered patiently, ſince this parliament, perſonal wants which it had not been in his power to help.

" In our offer of a general pardon, our intent was to compoſe and ſecure the general condition of our ſubjects, conceiving, that in theſe times of great diſtractions, the good laws of the land have not been enough obſerved: but it is a ſtrange world, when princes proffered favours are accounted reproaches: yet if you like not this our offer, we have done.

" Concerning any diſcourſes of foreign forces, though we have given you a full anſwer in ours to your laſt declaration yet we muſt tell you, we have neither ſo ill an opinion of our own merit, or the affections of our good ſubjects, as to think ourſelf in need of any foreign force to preſerve us from oppreſſion, (and we ſhall not need for any other purpoſe) but are confident (through God's providence) not to want the good wiſhes and aſſiſtance of the whole kingdom, being reſolved to build upon that ſure foundation, the law of the land. We take it very ill, that any general diſcourſes between an unknown perſon and a mariner, or inferences upon letters, ſhould be able to prevail in matters ſo improbable in themſelves, and ſcandalous to us; for which we cannot but likewiſe aſk reparation, not only for the vindicating of our own honour, but alſo thereby to ſettle the minds of our ſubjects, whoſe fears and jealouſies would ſoon vaniſh, were they not fed and maintained by ſuch falſe and malicious rumours as theſe.

" For our return to our parliament, we have given you a full anſwer in ours to your declaration and you ought to look on us as not gone, but driven (we ſay not by you, yet) from you. And if it be not ſo eaſy for you to make our reſidence in London ſo ſafe as we could deſire, we are, and will be contented, that our parliament be adjourned to ſuch a place, where we may be fitly and ſafely with you. For although we are not pleaſed to be at this diſtance, yet ye are not to expect our preſence, until ye ſhall both ſecure us, concerning our juſt apprehenſions of tumultuary inſolencies; and likewiſe give us ſatisfaction for thoſe inſupportable and inſolent ſcandals that are raiſed upon us. (5.)

Rem. (5.) The king took care not to return to London, at a time when he was going to try to ſecure Hull. The terms he required for his return were ſo undeterminate, that they would have afforded room for a long diſpute.

" To conclude, as we have, or ſhall not refuſe any way agreeable to juſtice or honour, which ſhall be offered to us for

for the begetting a right underſtanding between us; ſo we are reſolved, that no ſtraints or neceſſities (to which we may be driven) ſhall ever compel us to do that, which the reaſon and underſtanding that God hath given us, and our honour and intereſt, with which God hath truſted us for the good of our poſterity and kingdom, ſhall render unpleaſant and grievous unto us.

"And we aſſure you that (how meanly ſoever you are pleaſe to value the diſcharge of our public duty) we are ſo conſcious to ourſelf of having done our part ſince this parliament, that in whatſoever condition we now ſtand, we are confident of the continued protection of Almighty God, and the conſtant gratitude, obedience and affection of our people, and we ſhall truſt God with all."

All theſe papers were not capable of obliging the king or the parliament to alter their meaſures. The parliament was reſolved to diveſt the king of the command of the militia, and the king was as fully determined not to give up that point.

After this anſwer, both houſes ſent a meſſage to the king, directing the lord-keeper to incloſe it in a letter to the ſecretary attending his majeſty at York, to inform him that the lord admiral's indiſpoſition diſabling him to command the fleet in perſon, they had recommended to his lordſhip the earl of Warwick to ſupply his place. But underſtanding ſince that his majeſty had appointed for that employment ſir John Pennington, they beſought him not to prefer him to the earl of Warwick.

The king was very angry at this meſſage, which was not by way of petition or declaration, and ſent the lord-keeper word, that his reſolution was not to alter the perſon whom he had appointed. But he was not maſter: for, by the connivance of Algernon Piercy earl of Northumberland, who was lord-admiral, Robert Rich earl of Warwick, was acknowledged commander of the fleet, againſt the king's will.

About the ſame time a paper was diſperſed, wherein the author examined, "How laws are to be underſtood, and obedience yielded? A queſtion neceſſary for the preſent ſtate of things touching the militia. His majeſty (ſays he) is intruſted by law with the militia: but it is for the good and preſervation of the people, and not againſt them. So that when there is a well-grounded ſuſpicion that the king intends to employ the militia againſt the people, he is not to be obeyed, for it is not likely that the intent of the law is to inveſt the king with a power to be uſed againſt his ſubjects." This is the ſum of the author's reaſoning, which was properly that of both houſes. The king having peruſed this paper, ſent a meſſage to the lords to require them to find out the author of ſo pernicious a doctrine, and puniſh him according to his deſerts. But he objected nothing in particular againſt the author's principles and arguments.

Whilſt the affair of the militia was in agitation, the king came to the gates of Hull with ſome troops: but ſir John Hotham denied him admittance, as will be ſeen preſently. It is eaſy to judge, this proceeding of the king ſerved not to remove the parliament's fears and ſuſpicions, and the rather as having paſſed a bill for ſettling the militia, as the king deſired, this bill had been rejected. The affair of Hull happening ſhortly after, the parliament thought there was no more ceremony to be uſed, imagining the king ſought only to amuſe them, and make them loſe time. Mean while the king, five or ſix days after his diſappointment at Hull, ſent a meſſage to the parliament, dated April the 28th, containing his reaſons for not conſenting to the militia bill, which had been preſented to him. The meſſage was expreſſed in the following manner:

"WE have with great deliberation and patience weighed and conſidered (it concerning as much to weigh the conſequences of every law before we paſs it) your bill lately ſent to us, for the ſettling of the militia; and though it hath not been uſual to give any reaſons for our refuſal to paſs any bill (it being abſolutely in our power to paſs or not paſs, any act ſent unto us by you, if we conceive it prejudicial to ourſelf, or inconvenient for our ſubjects, for whom we are truſted, and muſt one day give an account; yet in this buſineſs of the militia, which being miſunderſtood amongſt our good ſubjects, hath been uſed as an argument, as if we were not vigilent enough for the public ſafety: and leſt we ſhould be thought leſs conſtant in our reſolutions, and this bill to be the ſame we ſent unto you; we have thought fit to give you and all the world particular ſatisfaction, why we muſt not, ought not, cannot paſs this bill, being the firſt public bill, to our remembrance, we have refuſed this parliament; and therefore we muſt complain, that having expreſſed ourſelf ſo clearly and particularly to you in this point, you ſhould preſs any thing upon us, which you could not but foreſee that we muſt refuſe, except we departed from thoſe reſolutions, grounded upon ſo much reaſon, which we had ſo earneſtly before acquainted you with, and againſt which you have not given one argument to ſatisfy our judgment.

"We are pleaſed that you have declined the unwarrantable courſe of your ordinance, (to the which we are confident our good ſubjects would never have yielded conſent) and choſen this only right way of impoſing on our people, which we would have allowed, but for the reaſons hereafter mentioned.

"We refuſed to conſent to your ordinance, as for other things, ſo, for that the power was put into the perſons nominated therein by direction of both houſes of parliament, excluding us from any power in the diſpoſition or execution, of it together with you. We then adviſed you for many reaſons, that a bill ſhould be prepared, and after, in our anſwer of the 26th of March laſt, to the petition of both houſes, we told you, if ſuch a bill ſhould be prepared with that due regard to us, and care of our people in the limitation of the power, and other circumſtances, we ſhould recede from nothing we formerly expreſſed. (1.)

Remark (1.) Whether the king was in the right or in the wrong concerning the affair of the militia, it is certain his deſign at firſt was only to amuſe the parliament, and this is what he ſtrives to conceal in this article.

"What paſſed (enough to have diſcouraged us from being farther ſolicitous in that argument) after our full and gracious anſwers, we are content to forget. When we reſolved of our journey into Ireland (ſo that by reaſon of our abſence there might be no want of ſettling that power) beſides complying with your fears, we ſent, together with a meſſage of that our purpoſe, a bill for the ſettling that power for a year, hoping in that time to return to you; and being ſure that in much leſs time you might do the buſineſs for which you ſeemed at firſt to deſire this, which was, that you might ſecurely conſider our meſſage of the 20th of January laſt. By that bill we conſented to thoſe names which were propoſed in your ordinance, and in the limitation of the power, provided that ourſelf ſhould not be able to execute any thing but by your advice; and when we ſhould be out of the kingdom, the ſole execution to be in you; with many other things of ſo arbitrary and uncircumſcribed a power, that we ſhould not have conſented to, but with reference to the abſence of our own perſon out of the kingdom, and thought it the more ſufferable, in reſpect the time was but for a year. Whether this be the bill you have now ſent to us to paſs, let all the world judge. (2.)

Rem. (2.) The lord Clarendon freely owns, that the king's offer to go into Ireland, was all a ſtratagem. Since therefore the king had no deſign to go thither, it follows, that the bill he had ſent to both houſes, and which he pretended he ſhould not have conſented to, but with reference to his abſence, was no more than an amuſement. We ſee here, that the general limitation he had annexed to his firſt engagement, were not without deſign. He knew how to particularize them in the bill he ſent to the parliament, and was very ſenſible it would not be received with all theſe reſtrictions. Thus his aim in this clauſe was only to colour the pretence he had uſed in his firſt promiſe concerning the militia.

"You have by this bill now tendered to us (without taking notice of us) put the power of the whole kingdom, the life and liberties of the ſubjects of all degrees and qualities, into the hands of particular men for two years. Can you imagine we will truſt ſuch an abſolute power in the hands of particular perſons, which we refuſed to commit to both houſes of parliament? Nay, is not the power itſelf too abſolute, too unlimitted to be committed to any private hands? Hath not ſir John Hotham's high inſolence ſhewed us, what we may expect from an exorbitant legal power, when he, by a power not warranted by law, dares venture upon a treaſonable diſobedience? (3.) But we would willingly know (and indeed ſuch an account in ordinary civility we might have expected) why we are by this act abſolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of this militia. Sure your fears and jealouſies are not of ſuch a nature, as are capable of no other remedy, than by leaving us no power in a point of the greateſt importance, in which God and the law hath truſted us ſolely, and which we are contented to ſhare with you by our bill, by putting it, and a greater, into the hands of particular ſubjects? What would all chriſtian princes think of us, after we had paſſed ſuch a bill? How would they they value our ſovereignty? And yet ſure our reputation with foreign princes, is ſome ground of your ſecurity: nay, we are confident, by that time you have thoroughly conſidered the poſſible conſequence of the bill upon yourſelves, and the reſt of our good ſubjects, you and they will give us thanks for not conſenting to it, finding their condition (had it paſſed) not to have been ſo pleaſing unto them. We hope this animadverſion will be no breach of your privileges in this throng of buſineſs and diſtemper of affections; it is poſſible that ſecond thoughts may preſent ſomething to your conſideration, which eſcaped you before.

Rem. (3.) It was but five or ſix days ſince ſir John Hotham denied him entrance into Hull[f].

"We paſſed this parliament, at your entreaty, a bill concerning the captives of Algier, and waved many objections of our own to the contrary, upon information, that the buſineſs had been many months conſidered by you. Whether it prove ſuitable to your intentions, or whether you have not by ſome private order ſuſpended that act of parliament, upon view of the miſtakings, you beſt know; as likewiſe, what other great alterations you have made in other bills paſſed this ſeſſion. We cannot paſs over the putting their names out of this bill, whom before you recommended to us in your ordinance, it ſeems, not thinking fit to truſt thoſe who would obey no guide but the law of the land (we imagine you would not wiſh we ſhould in our eſtimation of others follow that your rule;) and the leaving out by ſpecial proviſion the preſent lord-mayor of London, as a perſon in your diſfavour: whereas we muſt tell you, his demeanour hath been ſuch, that the city and the whole kingdom is beholding to him for his example. (4.)

Rem. (4.) It was ſir Richard Gurney that was then lord-mayor of London, and entirely devouted to the king.

"To conclude, we do not find ourſelf poſſeſſed with ſuch an acceſs of power, that it is fit to transfer, or conſent it ſhould be in other perſons (as directed by the bill;) and therefore we ſhall rely upon that royal right and juriſdiction which God and the law hath given us, for the ſuppreſſing of rebellion, and reſiſting foreign invaſion, which hath preſerved this kingdom in the time of all our anceſtors, and which, we doubt not, but we ſhall be able to execute; and, not more for our own honour and right, than for the liberty and ſafety of our people, we cannot conſent to paſs this bill."

The declaration of the lords and commons concerning his majeſty's laſt meſſage about the militia.

"THE lords and commons holding it neceſſary for the peace and ſafety of this kingdom, to ſettle the militia thereof, did, for that purpoſe, prepare an ordinance of parliament and with all humility did preſent the ſame to his majeſty for his royal aſſent; who, notwithſtanding the faithful advice of his parliament, and the ſeveral reaſons, offered by them of the neceſſity thereof, for the ſecuring of his majeſty's perſon, and the peace and ſafety of his people, did refuſe to give his conſent; and thereupon they were neceſſitated, in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in them, as the repreſentative body of the kingdom, to make an ordinance by authority of both houſes, to ſettle the militia warranted thereunto by the the fundamental laws of the land: (1.)

Remark (1.) This fundamental law was no other than the law of nature, which allows every man to provide for his own defence when he ſees himſelf expoſed to danger, and ſuch was the caſe of the parliament ſuppoſed themſelves in. For otherwiſe, there was no poſitive law which gave this power to the two houſes of parliament.

"His majeſty taking notice thereof, did by ſeveral meſſages invite them to ſettle the ſame by act of parliament; affirming, in his majeſty's meſſage ſent in anſwer to the petition of both houſes preſented to his majeſty at York, March 26, that he always thought it neceſſary the ſame ſhould be ſettled, and that he never denied the thing, only denied the way; and for the matter of it, took exceptions only to the preface, as a thing not ſtanding with his honour to conſent to, and that himſelf was excluded in the execution, and for a time unlimited: whereupon the lords and commons, being deſirous to give his majeſty all ſatisfaction that might be, even to the leaſt tittle of form and circumſtance; and when his majeſty was pleaſed to offer them a bill ready drawn, did, for no other cauſe, than to manifeſt their hearty affection to comply with his majeſty's deſires, and obtain his conſent, entertain the ſame; in the mean time no way declining their ordinance, and to expreſs their earneſt zeal to correſpond with his majeſty's deſire, (in all things that might conſiſt with the peace and ſafety of the kingdom, and the truſt repoſed in them) did paſs that bill, and therein omitted the preamble inſerted before the ordinance, limited the time to leſs than two years, and confined the authority of the lieutenants to theſe three particulars, namely, rebellion, inſurrection, and foreign invaſion, and returned the ſame to his majeſty for his royal aſſent: but all theſe expreſſions of affection and loyalty, all thoſe deſires and earneſt endeavours to comply with his majeſty, hath (to their grief and ſorrow) produced no better effect than an abſolute denial, even of that which his majeſty by his former meſſages, as we conceive, had promiſed; the advice of evil and wicked councils receiving ſtill more credit with him than that of his great council of parliament, in a matter of ſo high importance, that the ſafety of his kingdom, and the peace of his people depends upon it. (2.)

Rem. (2.) If the king, on his part, ſuppoſed the government to be in its natural ſtate, and that conſequently he ought to enjoy all his prerogatives, the parliament made here a ſuppoſition which was not liable to fewer objections. That is, in the preſent juncture, the king ought to conſider them as his great council, and be guided by their actions.

"But now what muſt be the exceptions to this bill? Not any, ſure, that were to the ordinance; for a care was taken to give ſatisfaction in all theſe particulars. Then the exception was, becauſe that the diſpoſing and execution thereof was referred to both houſes of parliament, and his majeſty excluded; and now that by the bill the power and execution is aſcertained, and reduced to particulars, and the law of the realm made the rule thereof, his majeſty will not truſt the perſons. The power is too great, too unlimited to truſt them with. (3.)

Rem. (3.) The parliament pretends to ſhew here that they had regarded the king's complaints, and yet the king had refuſed to paſs the bill. They own that one of his majeſty's complaints againſt the ordinance was, his being wholly excluded from having any thing to do in ſettling the militia. To ſhew therefore that the king had reaſon to be ſatisfied with the bill, it ſhould have been ſaid, "And now that by the bill he is joined in the execution with the two houſes." But inſtead of this, they ſay, "And now that the execution is aſcertained and the law of the realm made the rule." It is eaſy to ſee that this makes not a juſt oppoſition to the king's complaint.

"But what is that power? Is it any other, but in expreſs terms to ſuppreſs rebellion, inſurrection, and foreign invaſion? And who are thoſe perſons? Are they not ſuch as were nominated by the great council of the kingdom, and aſſented to by his majeſty? And is it too great a power to truſt thoſe perſons with the ſuppreſſion of rebellion, inſurrection, and foreign invaſion? Surely the moſt wicked of them that adviſed his majeſty to this anſwer, cannot ſuggeſt, but that it is neceſſary for the ſafety of his majeſty's royal perſon, and the peace of the kingdom, ſuch a power ſhould be put in ſome hands, and there is no pretence of exception to the perſons: his majeſty, for the ſpace of above fifteen years together, thought not a power far exceeding this to be too great to intruſt particular perſons with, to whoſe will the lives and liberties of his people by martial laws were made ſubject; for ſuch was the power given to lord-lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants in every county of this kingdom, and that without the conſent of his people, or authority of law: but now in caſe of extreme neceſſity, upon advice of both houſes of parliament, for no longer ſpace than two years, a leſſer power, and that for the ſafety of the king and people, is thought too great to truſt particular perſons with, though named by both houſes of parliament, and approved of by his majeſty himſelf. And ſurely, if there be a neceſſity to ſettle the militia (which his majeſty was pleaſed to confeſs) the perſons cannot be truſted with leſs power than this, to have it at all effectual: and the precedents of former ages, when there happened a neceſſity to raiſe ſuch a power, never ſtraitened that power to a narrow compaſs; witneſs the commiſſions of array in ſeveral kings reigns, and often iſſued out by the conſent and authority of parliament. The lords and commons therefore, intruſted with the ſafety of the kingdom, and peace of the people (which they call God to witneſs is their only aim) finding themſelves denied theſe their ſo neceſſary and juſt demands, and that they can never be diſcharged before God and man, if they ſhould ſuffer the ſafety of the kingdom, and peace of the people, to be expoſed to the malice of the malignant party at home, or the fury of enemies from abroad; and knowing no other way to encounter the imminent and approaching danger, but by putting the people into a fit poſture of defence, do reſolve to put their ſaid ordinance in preſent execution, and do require all perſons in authority, by virtue of the ſaid ordinance, forthwith to put the ſame in execution, and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom, in ſuch caſes, as they tender the upholding of the true proteſtant religion, the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon, and his royal poſterity, the peace of the kingdom, and the being of this common-wealth."

His majeſty's anſwer to the parliaments declaration [g].

"WE very well underſtand how much it is below the high and royal dignity (wherein God hath placed us) to take notice, much more to trouble ourſelf, with anſwering thoſe many ſcandalous, ſeditious pamphlets, and printed papers, which are ſcattered with ſuch great licence throughout the kingdom (notwithſtanding our earneſt deſire, ſo often in vain preſſed for a reformation) though we find it evident, that the minds of many of our weak ſubjects have been, and ſtill are, poiſoned by thoſe means, and that ſo general a terror hath poſſeſſed the minds and hearts of all men, that while the preſſes ſwarm (and every day produceth new tracts againſt the eſtabliſhed government of the church and ſtate) moſt men want the courage, or the conſcience, to write, or the opportunity and encouragement to publiſh ſuch compoſed, ſober animadverſions, as might either preſerve the minds of our good ſubjects from ſuch infection, or reſtore and recover them when they are ſo infected; but we are contented to let ourſelf fall to any office, that may undeceive our people, and to take more pains this way by our own pen, than ever king had done, when we find any thing that ſeems to carry the authority or reputation of either or both houſes of parliament, and will not have the ſame refuted, or diſputed, by common and vulgar pens, till we are thoroughly informed, whether thoſe acts have in truth that countenance and warrant they pretend; which regard of ours, we doubt not but in time will recover that due reverence (the abſence whereof we have too much reaſon to complain of) to our perſon, and our meſſages, which in all ages hath been paid (and no doubt is due) to the crown of England.

"We have therefore taken notice of a printed paper, intituled, 'A declaration of both houſes of Parliament, in anſwer to our laſt meſſage concerning the militia,' publiſhed by command; the which we are unwilling to believe (both for the matter of it, the expreſſions in it, and the manner of publiſhing it) can reſult from the conſent of both houſes; neither do we know, by what lawful command ſuch uncomely, irreverent mention of us, can be publiſhed to the world. And though declarations of this kind have of late (with too much boldneſs) broken in upon us, and the whole kingdom, when one, or both houſes, have thought fit to communicate their counſels and reſolutions to the people; yet we are unwilling to believe, that ſuch a declaration as this, ſhould be publiſhed in anſwer to our meſſage, without vouchſafing at leaſt to ſend it to us as their anſwer. Their buſineſs, for which they are met by our writ and authority, being to counſel us for the good of our people, not to write againſt us to our people, and no conſent of ours for their long continuing together, enabling them to do any thing, but what they were firſt ſummoned by our writ to do: at leaſt we will believe, though miſunderſtanding and jealouſy (the juſtice of God will overtake the fomenters of that jealouſy, and the promoters and contrivers of that miſunderſtanding) might produce (to ſay no worſe) thoſe very untoward expreſſions, that if thoſe houſes had contrived that declaration, as an anſwer to our meſſage, they would have vouchſafed ſome anſwer to the queſtion propoſed in ours; which we profeſſed did, and muſt evidently, prevail over our underſtanding; and in their wiſdom and gravity, they would have been ſure to have ſtated the matters of fact, as (at leaſt to ordinary underſtandings) might be unqueſtionable; neither of which is done by that declaration.

"We deſire to know, why we were by that act abſolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of the militia; and we muſt appeal to all the world, whether ſuch an attempt be not a greater and juſter ground for fear and jealouſy in us, than any one that is avowed for thoſe deſtructive fears and jealouſies which are ſo publicly owned, almoſt to the ruin of the kingdom. But we have been told, 'That we muſt not be jealous of our great council of both houſes of parliament;' we are not, no more than they are of us, their king; and as hitherto they have not avowed any jealouſy of, or diſaffection to, our perſon; imputed all to our evil counſellors, to a malignant party, that are not of their minds; ſo we do (and we do it from our ſoul) profeſs no jealouſy of our parliament, but ſome turbulent, ſeditious and ambitious natures, which (being not ſo clearly diſcerned) may have an influence, even upon the actions of both houſes. And if this declaration hath paſſed by ſuch conſent (which we are not willing to believe) it is not impoſſible, but that the apprehenſion of ſuch tumults, which have driven us from the city of London, for the ſafety of our perſon, may make ſuch an impreſſion in other men (not able to remove from the danger) to make their conſent, or not to own a diſſent in matters not agreeable to their conſcience or underſtanding.

"We mentioned, in that our anſwer, our diſlike of the putting their names out of the bill, whom before they recommended to us, in their pretended ordinance; and the leaving out, by ſpecial proviſion, the preſent lord-mayor of London; to all which, the declaration affords no anſwer to that our meſſage, and therefore we cannot ſuppoſe it was intended for an anſwer to that our meſſage; which, whoſoever looks upon, will find to be in no degree anſwered by that declaration.

"But it informs all our ſubjects, after the mention with what humility the ordinance was prepared, and preſented to us (a matter very evident in the petitions and meſſages concerning it,) and our refuſal to give our conſent, notwithſtanding the ſeveral reaſons offered of the neceſſity thereof, for the ſecuring of our perſon, and the peace and ſafety of our people, (whether any ſuch reaſons were given, the weight of them, and whether they were not clearly and candidly anſwered by us, the world will eaſily judge;) and that they were at laſt neceſſitated to make an ordinance by authority of both houſes to ſettle the militia, warranted thereunto by the fundamental laws of the land; but if that declaration had indeed intended to have anſwered us, it would have told our good ſubjects what thoſe fundamental laws of the land are, and where to be found; and would at leaſt have mentioned one ordinance, from the firſt beginning of parliaments to this preſent parliament, which endeavoured to impoſe any thing upon the ſubjects without the king's conſent; for of ſuch, all the enquiry we can make could never produce us one inſtance. (1.)

Remark (1.) The king and the parliament equally abuſed the term, Fundamental Law. The parliament gave the name of Fundamental Law to the truſt placed in them by the people, which obliged the two houſes to take care of the public ſafety, when the kingdom was in danger, which was not properly a law. The king, on his ſide, would own none for fundamental, but poſitive, expreſs, and particular laws upon the caſe in queſtion, and required ſuch to be produced. It is eaſy for unbiaſſed perſons to ſolve this difficulty. If it is ſuppoſed with the parliament, that the king intended to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government, it is certain the parliament had a right to oppoſe it, by virtue of the truſt put in them by the people, and as the repreſentative body of the nation; and in ſuch caſe it might be ſaid, they were ſupported by a fundamental law, or ſomething equivalent. But if it is ſuppoſed with the king, that the government was in its ordinary and natural ſtate, and there was no reaſon to ſuſpect him, it is certain the parliament had no right to meddle with the militia, without the king's conſent. The whole conſiſts therefore in the truth or falſhood of theſe two ſuppoſitions.

"And if there be ſuch a ſecret of the law, which hath lain hid from the beginning of the world to this time, and now is diſcovered, to take away the juſt legal power of the king, we wiſh there be not ſome other ſecret (to be diſcovered when they pleaſe) for the ruin and deſtruction of the liberty of the ſubject: for, no doubt, if the votes of both houſes have any ſuch authority to make a new law, it hath the ſame authority to repeal the old; and then what will become of the long eſtabliſhed rights and liberties of the king and ſubject, and particularly of Magna Charta, will be eaſily diſcerned by the moſt ordinary underſtanding. (2.)

Rem. (2.) Never were the liberties of the people in more danger of being deſtroyed than in the reign of Charles I. notwithſtanding Magna Charta and the laws of the land. So, whatever the king ſaid againſt the parliament, was no leſs ſtrong againſt himſelf: beſides his reaſoning could ſubſiſt but in virtue of the ſuppoſition mentioned in the foregoing article, which was very far from being proved.

"It is true we did (out of the tenderneſs of the conſtitution of the kingdom, and care of the law which we are bound to defend, and being moſt aſſured of the unjuſtifiableneſs of the pretended ordinance) invite and deſire both our houſes of parliament to ſettle whatſoever ſhould be fit of that nature by act of parliament; but were we therefore obliged to paſs whatſoever ſhould be brought to us of that kind? We did ſay in our anſwer to the petition of both houſes, preſented to us at York the 26th of March laſt, (and we have ſaid the ſame in other meſſages before) that we always thought it neceſſary the buſineſs of the militia ſhould be ſettled, and that we never denied the thing, only denied the way; and we ſay the ſame ſtill, ſince the many diſputes and votes upon lord-lieutenants, and their commiſſions (which were begun by us or our father) had ſo diſcountenanced that authority, which for many years together was happily looked upon with reverence and obedience by the people. We did, and do think it very neceſſary, that ſome wholeſome law be provided for that buſineſs; but we declared, in our anſwer to the pretended ordinance, we expected that that neceſſary power ſhould firſt be inveſted in us, before we conſented to transfer it to other men: (3) neither could it ever be imagined, that we could conſent, that a greater power ſhould be in the hands of a ſubject than we were thought worthy to be truſted with ourſelf. And if it ſhall not be thought fit to make a new act or declaration in this point, we doubt not but we ſhall be able to grant ſuch commiſſions, which ſhall very legally enable thoſe we truſt, to do all offices for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, if any diſturbance ſhall happen.

Rem. (3.) There was no occaſion to inveſt the king with power to ſuppreſs rebellions and inſurrections, and repel invaſions, in order to his transferring that power to others, ſince he was of courſe inveſted with it. But the king endeavours to colour his denial by repreſenting that power as exorbitant.

"But that declaration ſaith, we were pleaſed to offer them a bill ready drawn; and that they (to expreſs their earneſt zeal to correſpond with our deſire) did paſs that bill; yet all that expreſſion of affection and loyalty, all that earneſt deſire of theirs to comply with us, produced no better effect than an abſolute denial, even of what by our former meſſages (as that declaration conceives) we had promiſed, and ſo proceeds (under the pretence of mentioning evil and wicked councils) to cenſure and reproach us, in a dialect that we are confident our good ſubjects will read with much indignation on our behalf. But ſure, if that declaration had paſſed the examination of both houſes of parliament, they would never have affirmed that the bill we refuſed to paſs was the ſame we ſent to them, or have thought that our meſſage, wherein the difference and contrariety between the two bills is ſo particularly ſet down, would be anſwered with the bare averring them to be one and the ſame bill: no more would they have declared (when our exceptions to the ordinance and the bill are ſo notoriouſly known to all our people) that care being taken to give ſatisfaction in all the particulars we had excepted againſt in the ordinance, we had found new exceptions to the bill: and yet this very declaration confeſſes, that our exception to the ordinance was, that in the diſpoſing and execution thereof we were excluded; and was not this an expreſs reaſon in our anſwer for refuſal of the bill, which this declaration will needs confute? But the power was no other than to ſuppreſs rebellion, inſurrection, and foreign invaſion: and the perſons truſted no other than ſuch as were nominated by the great council of the kingdom, and aſſented to by us; and that declaration aſks if that be too great a power to truſt theſe perſons with? Indeed, while ſo great liberty is uſed in voting and declaring men to be enemies to the common-wealth (an Engliſh phraſe we ſcarcely underſtand), and in cenſuring men for their ſervice and attendance upon our perſon, and in our lawful command, great heed muſt be taken into what hands we commit ſuch a power to ſuppreſs inſurrection and rebellion; and if inſurrection and rebellion have found other definitions than what the law hath given them, we muſt be ſure that no lawful power ſhall juſtifiy thoſe definitions; and if there be learning found out to make ſir John Hotham's taking of arms againſt us, and keeping our town and fort from us, no treaſon and rebellion we know not whether a new diſcovery may not find it rebellion in us to defend ourſelves from ſuch arms, and ſo endeavour to recover what is ſo taken from us; (4.) and therefore it concerns us (till the known law of the land be allowed to be judge between us) to take heed into what hands we commit ſuch power.

Rem. (4.) The king always reaſoned upon the ſuppoſition that the government was in its natural ſtate, and that there was no cauſe to ſuſpect him; a ſuppoſition which was not granted.

"Beſides, can it be thought, that becauſe we are willing to truſt certain perſons, that we are obliged to truſt them in whatſoever they are willing to be truſted? We ſay, no private hands are fit for ſuch a truſt; neither have we departed from any thing (in the leaſt degree) we offered, or promiſed before; though we might with as much reaſon have withdrawn our truſt from ſome perſons we before had excepted, as they did from others whom they recommended. For the power which we are charged to have committed to particular perſons, for the ſpace of fifteen years, by our commiſſions of lieutenancy, it is notoriouſly known that it was not a power created by us, but continued very many years, and in the moſt happy times this kingdom hath enjoyed, even thoſe of our renowned predeceſſors queen Elizabeth and our father of happy memory; (5.) and whatever authority was granted by thoſe commiſſions, which were kept in the old forms, the ſame was determined at our pleaſure: and we know not that they produced any of thoſe calamities which might give our good ſubjects cauſe to be ſo weary of them, as to run the hazard of ſo much miſchief, as that bill we refuſed might poſſibly have produced.

Rem. (5.) The example of king James I. is no good evidence. I very much queſtion that in times of peace, queen Elizabeth ever made her ſubjects liable to be tried by martial law.

"For the precedents of former ages in the commiſſions of array, we doubt not but when any ſuch are iſſued out, that the king's conſent was always obtained, and the commiſſions determinable at his pleaſure, and then what the extent of power was, will be nothing applicable to this caſe of the ordinance.

"But whether that declaration hath refuted our reaſons for our refuſal to paſs the bill, or no, it hath reſolved and required all perſons in authority, thereby to put the ordinance in preſent execution, and all others to obey it according to the fundamental laws of the land. But we, whom God hath truſted to maintain and defend thoſe fundamental laws (which we hope, he will bleſs to ſecure us), do declare, that there is no legal power in either or both houſes, upon any pretence whatſoever, without our conſent, to command any part of the militia of this kingdom; nor hath the like ever been commanded by either or both houſes, ſince the firſt foundation of the laws of the land; and that the execution of, or the obedience to, that pretended ordinance, is againſt the fundamental laws of the land, againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and the right of parliaments, and a high crime in any that ſhall henceforth execute the ſame. And we do therefore charge and command all our loving ſubjects, of what degree or quality ſoever, upon their allegiance, and as they tender the peace of this kingdom, from henceforth, not to muſter, levy, array, ſummon, or warn any of our train-bands to riſe, muſter, or march, by virture or under colour of that pretended ordinance. And to this declaration and command of ours, we expect and require full ſubmiſſion and obedience from all our loving ſubjects, upon their allegiance, as they will anſwer the contrary at their perils; and as they tender the upholding of the true proteſtant religion, the ſafety of our perſon, and our royal poſterity, the peace and being of this kingdom."

Having given moſt of the papers, publiſhed on both ſides, concerning the militia, I ſhall endeavour, for the reader's better information, to illuſtrate a little more fully, the ground of the quarrel between the king and the parliament, which could be done very briefly in my ſhort remarks on ſeveral paſſages of theſe papers.

The parliament did not deny, that in the ordinary courſe of the government, the right of ſettling the militia, and appointing thoſe who were to command it under him, was ſolely in the king[h]. But they affirmed, that in the preſent extraordinary caſe, it was incumbent on them to take care the kingdom periſhed not by the king's fault. The caſe they ſuppoſed was this: the king, for the ſpace of fifteen years, had endeavoured to eſtabliſh an abſolute government, and had actually eſtabliſhed it on divers occaſions: he had pretended that he might govern without parliaments, and accordingly had called none for twelve years together; during which interval he had violated ſundry laws, and ruled after an arbitrary manner. Being forced by the neceſſity of his affairs to call this preſent parliament, he had ſeemed to acknowledge the injuſtice of his former conduct, by giving his conſent to the good acts made for the redreſs of paſt, and the prevention of future grievances. But at the very time that he expreſſed ſo great condeſcenſion for his ſubjects, and an outward repentance for his faults, he ceaſed not to deviſe means to become abſolute as before. The parliament inferred from this

[h] The commons were divided in their opinions about this point; ſome affirming, "That the power of the militia was ſolely in the king, and ought to be left to him, and that the parliament never did, nor ought to meddle with the ſame." And others, "That the king had not this power in him, but that it was ſolely in the parliament, and that if the king refuſed to order the ſame according to the advice of the parliament, that then they by the law might do it without him. Whitelock, p. 55.

conduct, that the king's condeſcenſion was only apparent; that at the firſt opportunity he would revoke the acts he had conſented to, and which he affected to term always acts of grace, though they were really acts of juſtice: conſequently it was neceſſary to put it out of his power to recede from what he had done, if he ſhould deſire it. The only way to hinder ſuch a deſign, was to put the militia of the kingdom into ſafe hands, who ſhould not depend upon the king, and prevent him from having any power over the militia, for fear this power, either in him alone, or jointly with the two houſes, might enable him to break all the meaſures which ſhould be taken to hinder the execution of his deſigns.

It is manifeſt, the parliament was in the right or the wrong, according as their ſuppoſition was true or falſe. Let it be granted for a moment, that their ſuppoſition was well grounded, and that the king had really a deſign to render himſelf abſolute; ought the parliament, out of pure reſpect to the ancient laws leave the king a power which enabled him to alter the conſtitution of the government, and ſubvert once more theſe very laws, wherein the ſafety of the people entirely conſiſted? Is it not evident, that in ſuch a caſe it was neceſſary to violate theſe laws, in order to eſtabliſh them more firmly? When therefore the king objected to the parliament the laws which gave the kings of England certain prerogatives, he manifeſtly ſuppoſed the government to be in its natural ſtate; but the parliament ſuppoſed the contrary: conſequently, the king's arguments could not make any impreſſion, becauſe they were not applicable to the caſe ſuppoſed by the parliament. Unfortunately, the king was forced to uſe againſt the parliament the very reaſons alleged formerly by the parliament and people againſt him, when he uſurped an abſolute power. He complained that the parliament founded their right upon a pretended neceſſity which was never proved; and himſelf had formerly made uſe of a neceſſity ſtill more imaginary, to impoſe arbitrary taxes without the conſent of parliament, contrary to the laws of the land.

But if on the other hand, we ſuppoſe the parliament's ſuſpicions to be chimerical, and that the king never gave any room for them, at leaſt ſince the beginning of this parliament, and that his intention to govern according to law was ſincere, it is certain his arguments from the laws, cuſtoms, royal prerogatives, were invincible, becauſe in that caſe there would not have been any the leaſt juſt pretence to diveſt him of his rights. The whole queſtion therefore was reduced to this ſingle point, whether the king was ſincere, and his word to be relied on? But, unhappily for him, a fifteen years experience had convinced moſt of his ſubjects, that he would have eſtabliſhed an arbitrary government; the motives of his condeſcenſion in the acts paſſed this parliament, were dubious, and his proteſtations with regard to the future, uncertain. Thus the parliament had a great advantage over him, becauſe they had for warrant of their ſuſpicions, the paſt, which was but too certain; whereas the king could only offer the future, which had not the ſame certainty.

It was time for the declarations, anſwers, and replies concerning the militia, to end, ſince there was nothing new to be ſaid to the ſubject: beſides, the parliament's ordinance was now executing in all places where the people were willing to obey it. At laſt, May the 27th, the king publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding to execute the ordinance of the parliament, on pain to offenders of being declared diſturbers of the public peace [i]. The parliament, on their part, publiſhed a declaration, forbidding all perſons to obey the king's proclamation, as being contrary to the laws. As this might appear very ſtrange, both houſes grounded their prohibition upon reaſons, of which I ſhall only relate the ſubſtance, becauſe, flowing from the principles above-mentioned, it is eaſy to conceive them. They ſaid therefore:

"That the queſtion is not, whether it belong to the king or no, to reſtrain the levying of the militia; but if the king ſhall refuſe to diſcharge that duty and truſt, whether there be not a power in the two houſes to provide for the ſafety of the parliament, and peace of the kingdom? That though the law affirms that power to be in the king, it does not exclude thoſe in whom the law hath placed a power for that purpoſe, as in the courts of juſtice, yet can it not be reſtrained by his majeſty's command, by his great ſeal, or otherwiſe; much leſs can the power of parliament be concluded by his majeſty's command.

"That though the king is the fountain of juſtice and protection, yet the acts of juſtice and protection are not exerciſed in his own perſon, but by his courts and his miniſters; who muſt do their duty therein, though the king, in his own perſon, ſhould forbid them; and therefore, if judgment ſhould be given by them againſt the king's will, and perſonal command, yet are they the king's judgments. Thus alſo, the high court of parliament declares the king's pleaſure in thoſe things that are requiſite thereunto; and what they do herein hath the ſtamp of royal authority, although his majeſty do in his own perſon oppoſe or interrupt the ſame: for the king's ſupreme and royal pleaſure is exerciſed and declared in this high court of law and council, after a more eminent and obligatory manner, than it can be by any perſonal act or reſolution of his own.

"That by the conſtitution and policy of this kingdom, the king by his proclamation cannot declare the law, contrary to the judgment and reſolution of any of the inferior courts of juſtice, much leſs againſt the high court of parliament; for if it were admitted, that the king by his proclamation may declare a law, thereby his proclamations will in effect become laws, which would turn to the ſubverting of the law of the land, and the rights and liberties of the ſubjects."

Theſe are the principal arguments alleged by the parliament, to ſhew, that the king's proclamation was contrary to the laws. But there was a very manifeſt defect in this reaſoning. They repreſented the two houſes as alone compoſing the parliament, whereas it is certain, the parliament is compoſed of the king and both houſes, joined together and making but one body. What the parliament ſaid is therefore ſtrictly true, if the word parliament be underſtood in the ſenſe I have mentioned, as a body conſiſting of the king and the two houſes. For, the king cannot, by his ſole will, ſubvert what has been ordained by the parliament, becauſe himſelf making a part, and the nobleſt part of the parliament, he would contradict himſelf in forbiding a thing he had already ordained. But if by the parliament be meant the two houſes alone, without the king, it cannot be ſaid that their declarations are the king's, or that they are more ſolemn and obligatory than the king's private will. For if they were, the conſtitution of the government would be entirely overthrown. This is ſo true, that by retorting the argument alleged by both houſes againſt the king, it might be demonſtrated by the ſame reaſon, that they have a power to make laws without the concurrence of the king, which would be full as true, as their ſaying, that the king's proclamations would be ſo many laws. It is therefore certain, that by the arguments they alleged againſt the king's proclamation, they furniſhed invincible reaſons againſt their own ordinance. Nevertheleſs, upon this ſophiſtry it was that they grounded all the authority they aſſumed to themſelves afterwards. They did themſelves therefore great injury, by relying on ſuch weak arguments. Their right ſolely conſiſted in the ſuppoſition, that the king would have altered the conſtitution of the government, which they had a lawful power to oppoſe by extraordinary methods, ſince the laws of the land, inſtead of affording them effectual remedies, countenanced rather the king's deſigns. The king on his part, founded his right upon the contrary ſuppoſition, namely, that there was no danger from him; but that the parliament had undertaken to ſubvert the conſtitution of church and ſtate. Such was then the melancholy ſituation of England.

I have related without interruption the affair of the militia, which laſted however ſeveral months, that I might not be obliged to break the thread of the narration; this affair being of the utmoſt importance, ſince it was the moſt immediate cauſe of the civil wars which quickly enſued: but it was not the only affair during that time. Wherefore, it will be neceſſary to go back to the time when I began to ſpeak of the militia, to ſee other affairs, no leſs material, and whereof ſome contributed no leſs to the rupture.

The king having paſſed in February the two acts, ſo earneſtly deſired by the commons, namely, for the excluſion of the biſhops [k], and for preſſing of ſoldiers, ſent the following meſſage to both houſes:

"That his having paſſed theſe two bills, being of ſo great importance, and ſo earneſtly deſired by both houſes, will ſerve to aſſure his parliament, that he deſires nothing more than the ſatisfaction of his kingdom; yet, that he may farther manifeſt to both houſes how impatient he is, till he find out a full remedy to compoſe the preſent diſtempers, he is pleaſed to ſignify:

[i] The king grounded this proclamation on a ſtatute made in the 7th of Edward I. whereby it was enacted, "That to the king it belongeth, by his royal ſeigniory, ſtraightly to defend wearing of armour, and all other force, againſt the peace, at all times, when it ſhall pleaſe him, and to puniſh them which ſhall do contrary." See Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 550.

[k] Theſe bills were paſſed by commiſſion. The king ſigned the commiſſion for paſſing the firſt, at Canterbury, as he was in his way to Dover, where he accompanied the queen. Manley, p. 35.

They

" That he will by proclamation require, that all ſtatutes made concerning recuſants, be with all care, diligence, and ſeverity, put in execution.

" That his majeſty is reſolved, that the ſeven condemned prieſts ſhall be immediately baniſhed, if his parliament ſhall conſent thereunto: And he will give preſent order, that a proclamation iſſue to require all Romiſh prieſts within twenty days to depart the kingdom; and if any ſhall be apprehended after that time, his majeſty aſſures both houſes, on the word of a king, that he will grant no pardon to any ſuch, without conſent of his parliament.

" And becauſe great and different troubles are obſerved to ariſe, concerning the government and liturgy of the church, his majeſty declares, That he will refer that whole conſideration to his parliament: But deſires not to be preſſed to any ſingle act on his part, till the whole be ſo digeſted and ſettled by both houſes, that his majeſty may clearly ſee what is fit to be left, as well as what is fit to be taken away.

" For Ireland, he will not refuſe to venture his own perſon in that war, if his parliament ſhall think it convenient, for the reduction of that kingdom.

" That he will moſt readily concur in any reſolution their wiſdoms ſhall find out, which may conduce to promote the trade of the kingdom."

The two houſes contented themſelves with thanking his majeſty for paſſing the two bills, without returning any anſwer upon the other points.

The queen being miſinformed that there was a deſign to accuſe her of high treaſon, the parliament had notice of it, and ſent the earl of Newport and the lord Seymour, to vindicate themſelves from this aſperſion. The queen anſwered, it was true there was ſuch a report, but that ſhe gave little credit to it.

Some letters of the lord Digby, directed to the queen, to ſir Lewis Dives his brother-in-law, and to ſecretary Nicholas [l] being intercepted, the parliament cauſed them to be opened. It was found, that the lord Digby, who was then at Middleburg in Zealand, adviſed the king to betake himſelf to a place of ſafety, and deſired the queen to ſend him a cypher, that he might hold a correſpondence with her. There were alſo in the letters ſome ſharp expreſſions againſt the parliament. The two houſes ſent copies of theſe letters to their majeſties, aſſuring them, that they were far from reflecting any thing upon the queen, only they beſought her not to correſpond with the lord Digby. Some days after, it was reſolved by the commons, that the lord Digby ſhould be accuſed of high-treaſon.

February the 24th, a meſſage was ſent from both houſes to his majeſty, to acquaint him with the reaſons why they deſired, that the prince of Wales ſhould reſide at Hampton-court. The chief was, that the prince's removal might be a cauſe to promote jealouſies and fears in the minds of his ſubjects. For the parliament loſt no opportunity to let the people ſee, there was occaſion to be alarmed. The king intimated to them by his anſwer, that he did not think himſelf accountable for his conduct, with regard to the prince his ſon; and concluded with ſaying, " He could not imagine from what grounds theſe fears and jealouſies proceeded; but if any information had been given to that purpoſe, he deſired the ſame might be examined to the bottom; and then hoped their fears would be hereafter continued only with reference to his rights and honour."

About the ſame time, propoſals were made to the parliament, for the ſpeedy raiſing of money for the reduction of Ireland. Theſe propoſals were, that to ſuch perſons as ſhould be willing to advance money for that ſervice, ſhould be allotted, according to a certain proportion, the rebels lands that ſhould be forfeited, which was approved of by both houſes, and an act paſſed accordingly, to which the king gave the royal aſſent [m].

The queen departed for Holland about the end of February.

March the 16th, the king being at Stanford in his way to York, iſſued out a proclamation, for ſtrictly executing the laws againſt papiſts. This proclamation was very needleſs, and ſerved only to ſhew, that hitherto theſe laws had been ill executed. But the king had a mind thereby to repel the imputation of his protecting and countenancing the catholics, ſo much inſiſted upon by his enemies among the people, as if this protection was a proof of his deſign to introduce popery [n].

The king, as I ſaid, intended to ſecure Hull, with the magazine there; but his intention was yet a ſecret, and means were deviſing to put it in practice. To this end, very probably, he ſent a meſſage to the parliament, to acquaint them, that he had firmly reſolved to go into Ireland, and head the Engliſh troops. That therefore he intended to raiſe by his commiſſions, in the counties near Weſt-Cheſter, a guard for his own perſon (when he ſhould come into Ireland) conſiſting of two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, to be armed from his magazine of Hull, the charge of paying whereof he deſired them to take upon them. It was eaſy to foreſee, that this propoſition would not be accepted, in the preſent juncture; for it was at the very time that the affair of the militia was moſt warmly debating. But the king hoped to reap ſome advantage, either from approbation, or the denial. If the parliament conſented to it, the king found he ſhould be able to employ this pretended guard of two thouſand two hundred men, to render himſelf maſter of Hull. At leaſt, one can hardly help thinking he had ſuch an intention, conſidering what paſſed very ſhortly after. If his propoſition was rejected, he flattered himſelf, at leaſt, that he ſhould thereby convince the people of his ſincere deſire to reduce Ireland, and diſpel the rumours that were ſpread on that head, which would afford him opportunity to throw all the blame on the parliament. Accordingly this was the only uſe he afterwards made of this offer, which was but a ſtratagem, as the earl of Clarendon owns in his hiſtory. But whether both houſes conſidered this propoſition of the king, as a ſnare, or as a real and ſincere offer, they thought not fit to conſent to it. Indeed, as things then ſtood, it was by no means proper to ſet the king at the head of an army in Ireland, and ſtill leſs, that he ſhould raiſe in England a guard of two thouſand two hundred men, when they were labouring with all their power to take from him the command of the militia, upon the foundation of the jealouſies conceived of him. For though hitherto they had been contented to accuſe only his counſellors, and a malignant party, of contriving plots againſt the ſtate, this was however but an artifice to accuſe him himſelf. So as they neither could nor would approve of the king's propoſition, they preſented a petition to him, ſetting forth:

" That having duly conſidered his majeſty's meſſage concerning his purpoſe of going into Ireland to proſecute the war, which he was pleaſed to propound to them, not as a matter wherein he deſired the advice of the parliament, but as already firmly reſolved on, and forthwith to be put in execution, by granting out commiſſions for the levying of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, for a guard for his perſon; they could not but wonder, that a buſineſs of ſo great importance, and wherein they had a ſpecial intereſt, by thoſe great ſums which they had diſburſed, and for which they ſtood engaged, ſhould be concluded and undertaken without their advice. And therefore they held it their duty to declare, That his going into Ireland would very much endanger the ſafety of his royal perſon and kingdoms, for the following reaſons.

" 1. Becauſe his royal perſon would be ſubject not only to the caſualty of war, but to the ſecret practices and conſpiracies of the papiſts.

" 2. It would exceedingly encourage the rebels, who did generally profeſs and declare, That his majeſty countenanced their proceedings, and that this inſurrection was undertaken by the warrant of his commiſſion.

" 3. It would much increaſe the charge of the war, and hinder the advance of money for ſupporting it; many of the adventurers, who had already ſubſcribed, upon hearing his majeſty's intention, declaring their reſolution not to pay in their money; and others who were willing to have ſubſcribed, now profeſſing the contrary.

" 4. His abſence would very much interrupt the good proceedings of parliament.

[l] They were all incloſed in a cover to ſecretary Nicholas. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 554.

[m] It was propoſed, that two millions and a half of thoſe acres might be aſſigned, and divided amongſt the adventurers after this proportion, viz.

For each adventure of	200	1000 acres in Ulſter.
	300	1000 acres in Conaught.
	450	1000 acres in Munſter.
	600	1000 acres in Leinſter.

All according to the Engliſh meaſure, conſiſting of meadow, arable, and paſture, the bogs, woods, and barren mountains being caſt in over and above, to be holden in free and common ſoccage of the king with the conſtant rent, of one penny each acre in Ulſter, two pence half-penny in Conaught, two pence farthing in Munſter, and three pence in Leinſter. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 556.

Mr.

" 5. It would exceedingly increaſe, and render more probable, the jealouſies and fears of his people, of ſome force intended by evil councils near his majeſty, in oppoſition to the parliament.

" 6. It would bereave the parliament of that advantage, whereby they were induced to undertake that war, upon his majeſty's promiſe, that it ſhould be managed by their advice; which could not be done, if his majeſty, contrary to their counſels, ſhould undertake to order and govern it in his own perſon.

" Upon which reaſons both houſes declared, That they could not conſent to any levies of ſoldiers to be made by his majeſty for his intended expedition into Ireland, or to the payment of any army or ſoldiers there, but ſuch as ſhould be employed and governed according to their advice and direction: That if any ſuch levies ſhould be made by any commiſſion of his majeſty, (not agreed to by both houſes of parliament) they ſhould be forced to interpret the ſame to be raiſed to the terror of the people, and diſturbance of the public peace, and hold themſelves bound by the laws of the kingdom, to apply the authority of parliament to ſuppreſs the ſame. And they farther declared, That if his majeſty ſhould by ill counſel be perſuaded to go contrary to this advice of his parliament, they ſhould not in that caſe hold themſelves bound to ſubmit to any commiſſioners which his majeſty ſhould chuſe; but did reſolve to preſerve and govern the kingdom by the counſel and advice of parliament, for his majeſty and his poſterity, according to their allegiance and the laws of the land[o].

The king returned a long anſwer to this petition, and confuted all the parliament's reaſons, which indeed, conſidered in themſelves, were very weak. But if it is obſerved, that it was but ſix days ſince the king had reſolved to ſecure Hull, when the parliament preſented their petition to him, it will not be thought ſtrange that they rejected the king's offer. Wherefore they loſt no time in replying to the king, and the affair reſted there, without any farther mention of his majeſty's pretended expedition into Ireland. Only he made this advantage of it, that he could ſay he had offered to go in perſon and endeavour the reduction of Ireland, but that his offer was rejected.

[o] Mr. Whitelock obſerves, that this petition was looked upon by many as very ſtrange, and high, p. 57.

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XXI.

Containing the third and laſt Part of the Reign of CHARLES I. from the Year 1642 to 1648.

[1642] HITHERTO we have ſeen how the breach between the king and the parliament daily grew wider. The diſtruſt was ſo great on both ſides, that it was hardly poſſible they ſhould come to an agreement. The king could not doubt, there was a deſign to deprive him of great part of his authority; and the parliament perceiving the king was not ignorant of this deſign, could ſcarce queſtion, he would privately take all poſſible meaſures to prevent the execution thereof. But this was not all. The parliament had alſo reaſon to fear, the king would not confine himſelf to the defenſive, but under colour of ſtanding upon his guard, would put himſelf in a condition to attack. Before the accuſation of the members of parliament, whilſt the reſolution of depriving the king of his power was not abſolutely taken, and many members were yet wavering, it would not perhaps have been impoſſible to find expedients for a peace. But by this fatal accuſation, and his coming to the houſe of commons, the king gave ſuch an advantage to his enemies, who knew but too well how to improve it, that it was no longer practicable for him to recover the confidence of thoſe who till then had preſerved ſome good-will towards him. Before this, the deſign of diveſting the king of his authority was a ſecret among ſome of the leaders of the party, who were labouring to accompliſh it by degrees, without daring to be too open, ſo that it was not eaſy to know perfectly, they had really ſuch a deſign. But it was not ſo eaſy to deceive the king, who was chiefly concerned. He ſaw, that his authority was gradually undermining, and readily perceived, where this mine would end at laſt, if ſuffered to continue. In this perplexity, he found it incumbent on him to take precautions, in order to oppoſe his enemies: But on the other hand, he was ſenſible he ſhould make his cauſe bad, if he fell upon the parliament itſelf, which was ſeduced by theſe able leaders, and thereby ſet the whole nation againſt him. This conſideration, very likely, induced him to attack in particular the lord Kimbolton with five of the moſt powerful commoners, imagining they would be ſent to the Tower upon his accuſation, and then the parliament, as being no longer directed by theſe men, would be better inclined in his favour. He was not only deceived in his conjecture, but did himſelf alſo an irretrievable injury, in that the precaution he would have taken to ſecure himſelf from the ſecret practices of ſome private perſons, paſſed for a ſettled deſign upon the whole parliament. He thereby confirmed the ſuſpicions which were infuſing into the people, that he was ſeeking to render himſelf abſolute, as he had formerly been; and from thence it naturally followed, that therefore it was neceſſary to put it out of his power to execute that deſign.

Then it was that this reſolution, taken firſt by ſome few, was approved by the majority, and endeavoured to be effectually executed, by beginning with the important affair of the militia. For, depriving the king of the power to command the militia, and lodging this power in the hands of perſons devoted to the parliament, was properly diſarming him entirely. The king's condition growing much worſe, he eaſily perceived, that as his enemies managed, there was no medium for him, between being a ſlave or rendering himſelf maſter. He was unwilling to be a ſlave, and it was difficult to become maſter, in his circumſtances, and eſpecially, having to deal with very able and watchful enemies. Very probably, in the belief of the impoſſibility to free himſelf from his preſent danger but by a war, he reſolved to ſend the queen into Holland to buy arms and ammunition, to retire to York himſelf, and to try to ſecure Hull, though he coloured his deſigns with other pretences. He ſaw that the parliament reckoned among the pretended malignants, not only ſuch as openly appeared for the king, but alſo thoſe who were for preſerving any moderation, and that many ſuffered themſelves to be drawn into the ſame plot, out of fear, and becauſe they could not be ſecure of protection, in caſe they declared againſt the two houſes. He thought, therefore, he ſhould chiefly endeavour to render himſelf able to protect thoſe who dared to eſpouſe his cauſe openly. But morever, as the parliament never ceaſed to infuſe ſuſpicions into the people, it was abſolutely neceſſary for the king to try to efface theſe impreſſions, ſo prejudicial to him. Hence flowed, in all the papers publiſhed by him concerning the militia, thoſe ſo frequent expreſſions of his affection for his people, and his attachment to the laws. His aim was to ſhew the nation, that the parliament acted directly contrary to law, in uſurping an authority which belonged not to them. As it was by the very ſame thing that the king had given occaſion to the people to be prejudiced againſt him, he hoped, the uſurpations of the parliament would produce the ſame effect. But herein he was much much miſtaken. The people were perſuaded, that the king, without any provocation, had invaded the privileges of the ſubject, during the firſt fifteen years of his reign, whereas if the parliament had in any thing incroached upon the rights of the king, it was in maintenance of the nation's liberties, and for the revival of the laws.

Though it was hard to prove by unqueſtionable evidence, that the king had formed the project of ſeizing, at once, the Tower of London, Portſmouth, and Hull, there were, however, ſo great ſigns of it, that it would have been very imprudent in the parliament, not to think of ſecuring thoſe places in the preſent ſituation of affairs. Sir John Byron lieutenant of the Tower was a man devouted to the king. The earl of Newcaſtle had been ſent to Hull, under a borrowed name, and information was given, that he would have perſuaded the mayor to deliver that place to him. As for Portſmouth, the journey the queen was to take thither on ſome pretence, and the meeting of the officers at Kingſton, were more than ſufficient to breed ſtrong ſuſpicions on that account. In ſhort, the lord Clarendon freely owns the king's deſigns upon Portſmouth and Hull, though he mentions not the Tower. Had theſe deſigns ſucceeded, the king would have been maſter of the three principal forts of the kingdom, with the magazines of the Tower and Hull, and thereby enabled to ſubdue the parliament. Theſe projects failing, as I have ſaid, the king endeavoured, as well as he could, to ſtifle them, and make them paſs for imaginary. But the two houſes judged otherwiſe of them. Accordingly, the commons never reſted till the lieutenancy of the Tower was given to one they could confide in, and Hotham ſent to Hull. As for Portſmouth, the parliament not miſtruſting Goring the governor, becauſe he was the perſon that diſcovered the plot to ſeduce the army, were contented with ſending him ſufficient orders, as they thought, for the preſervation of the place. From that time, there was no more mention of Portſmouth, for the king found means to gain colonel Goring, who promiſed to declare for him at a proper time, as he did accordingly.

Notwithſtanding the king's ill ſucceſs in his ſecret undertakings, he perſiſted in his deſign to free himſelf by force from the ſlavery to which it was intended to reduce him, perceiving it would be impoſſible for him to ſucceed any other way. To that end, doubtleſs, he ſent the queen to Holland, and having but little money to give her, put into her hands the crown-jewels, which were uſed in buying arms and ammunition. If the queen's voyage had been only to conduct the princeſs Mary to the prince her ſpouſe and to drink the waters of the Spa, there would have been no occaſion to give her wherewithal to buy arms and ammunition. Very probably therefore the king, from that time, thought of war, whether it were offenſive or defenſive only. But his attempt upon Hull, where was a magazine of arms for ſixteen thouſand men, is a ſtill clearer evidence. The king himſelf had cauſed theſe arms to be brought to Hull, when he had reſolved to make war upon Scotland.

When the parliament ſent ſir John Hotham down to Hull, the king complained not of it, whether he was apprehenſive of being reproached with attempting to ſecure that place, or to amuſe the parliament and hinder them from taking great precautions. Mean while, both houſes finding the king at a diſtance from London, and fearing for Hull on account of the magazine there, petitioned him, to order the magazine to be removed to the Tower of London. The king anſwered, "He rather expected, that both houſes would have given him an account, why a governor and garriſon had been placed in Hull without his knowledge, than to be moved to conſent for the removal to the Tower of a magazine (which were his own proper goods) upon ſuch general reaſons, as gave no ſatisfaction to his judgment: that in ſhort, he would not agree to the removal of theſe arms, till he knew for what ſervice they were intended: and if any attempt ſhould be made in this matter without his approbation, he ſhould eſteem it as the greateſt violation of his right." A little after, ſome gentlemen of the county of York petitioned the king, that the magazine might not be removed, by reaſon they conceived the kingdom, and particularly the north, to be in danger. This petition was probably begged, ſince affairs were not yet in ſuch a ſituation, that private perſons ſhould dare to preſent an addreſs to the king, directly contrary to that of the parliament, had they not been encouraged thereto. It is certain, the king intended to ſeize Hull with the magazine. He was deſirous to have a place, which would enable him to protect his adherents, and depended upon this magazine to arm them in due time. This was the cauſe of his refuſing to remove the arms to the Tower, though he alleged other reaſons. The parliament alſo, on their part, urged for the removal, reaſons that were not the true ones. At laſt, finding the king would not conſent to it, they ordered moſt of the magazine to be brought to the Tower, without aſking his approbation any more.

The king and the parliament uſed all poſſible endeavours to make the people believe, that in all their proceedings, they had no other motive than their good and the kingdom's advantage. From theſe proteſtations it is, that the hiſtorians take their ſtrongeſt arguments to demonſtrate the innocence and ſincerity of the party, whoſe cauſe they undertake to ſupport. But the impartial reader muſt peruſe the manifeſtoes, and all the papers of that kind with great caution for fear of being drawn into error. It is certain, the king intended to become maſter of Hull, that he might not be at the parliament's mercy: but it is not ſo certain, that herein his view was only to maintain the conſtitution of the government, that the laws might be punctually executed. On the other hand, the parliament had ſent Hotham to Hull, to hinder the king from ſeizing the town: but who can affirm, that their real aim was to prevent the malignant party from making uſe of it, to eſtabliſh an arbitrary power and inſlave the kingdom?

The king's deſign broke out the 23d of April, when the affair of the militia was agitated with great heat on both ſides. The day before, he had ſent to Hull the duke of York his ſecond ſon, with the young elector Palatine his nephew, under colour of ſeeing the place, and very likely theſe two princes had a pretty numerous retinue. Hotham and the mayor received them with all the reſpect due to their rank. The princes were entertained the firſt day by the mayor, and invited to dine with the governor on the morrow being St. George's-day. But the entertainment was diſturbed by an officer, ſir Lewis Dives, who came a little before dinner, and told the governor, that his majeſty intended to dine with him, being then within four miles of the town, with a train of above three hundred horſe[a]. Hotham, ſurpriſed at this meſſage, conſulted with ſome of his friends[b], and it was reſolved among them, that a meſſenger ſhould be diſpatched to the king, humbly to beſeech him to forbear to come, for as much as he could not, without betraying the truſt committed to him, ſet open the gates to ſo great a guard as he came attended with. The meſſenger returning with a doubtful anſwer, and certifying of the king's advance to the town, Hotham drew up the bridge, ſhut the gates, and commanded the ſoldiers to ſtand to their arms round the walls. The king being come to Beverley-gate, called for the governor, who appearing on the walls, he commanded him to open the gate. The governor anſwered, "He was intruſted by the parliament for the ſecuring of the town for his majeſty's honour, and the kingdom's uſe, which he intended by God's help to do; proffering, however, that if his majeſty would be pleaſed to come in with twelve more, he ſhould be welcome, otherwiſe he could not, without betraying his truſt to the ſtate, admit entrance to ſo great a guard[c]." But the king refuſing to enter on theſe terms, repeated ſeveral times his command to open the gate, and ſtill received the ſame anſwer. Preſently after, the duke of York, and the prince elector went out of the town[d] and came to the king, who was pleaſed to give the governor one hour more to conſider what he did. But Hotham perſiſting in his reſolution, the king offered at laſt to enter with thirty horſe only[e], which was refuſed. In ſhort, about five in the evening, the king returning to the gate, commanded Hotham once more to open it, and upon his refuſal, cauſed him to be proclaimed traitor by two heralds he had brought with him. This done, he retired to Beverley, where he paſſed the night. The next morning, he ſent a herald to Hotham, to ſummon him once more to open the gates of Hull, with promiſe of

But the lord Clarendon, and Whitelock ſay nothing of this offer of Hotham's; but only that he ſhould ſay, he would not admit him, though with twenty horſe only. pardon for what was paſt, but could not prevail; ſo that he was forced to return to York.

When it is conſidered, the king had formed a deſign to ſecure Hull from the time he reſolved to retire from York, as the lord Clarendon expreſly owns, one would imagine, that at leaſt he had contrived proper means to accompliſh the undertaking, the ſucceſs whereof was ſo very important. But one knows not what to think, when this attempt is ſeen to be ſo ill-managed, that it was neither plauſible nor likely. The king was not ignorant, that Hotham was member of the houſe of commons, that the houſe had choſen him for the government of Hull, as a man they could confide in: that Hotham knew he was to keep the place againſt the king, however his commiſſion might be worded. And yet, he imagines, that this man will be awed by his preſence alone, and not dare to deny him entrance with three hundred horſe, beſides the train of the two princes already admitted: that he will ſuffer himſelf to be deprived of his government, upon the bare ſcruple of diſobeying the king, he who probably was choſen by the commons as one of the leaſt ſcrupulous. I own, I cannot conceive how the king could be adviſed to declare himſelf ſo openly in attempting to ſeize Hull, and indeed, from that time, all confidence intirely vaniſhed. It ſignified nothing to colour this proceeding, and to ſay, he had no other deſign than to viſit the place and examine the magazine, to know what might be taken for the ſervice of Ireland, and for arming the Scots, who were to ſerve in that country. This was not capable of deceiving the parliament, who ſaw but too plainly what was the king's deſign, and of what conſequence the execution would have been. There were no fewer papers, meſſages, anſwers, replies, about this affair, than about the militia.

The king was extremely troubled at this diſappointment, and ſeeing no other way to palliate his proceedings, he reſolved expreſly to deny, he had ever intended to become maſter of Hull. By this ſuppoſition, he meant to repreſent ſir John Hotham's actions as a manifeſt treaſon, and accordingly demanded an authentic reparation of the parliament. He cited the laws and ſtatutes which placed in the king the care of defending the realm, and the command of the forts and magazines. But he conſtantly ſuppoſed the kingdom to be in a ſtate of tranquility, as it was when theſe laws were made, which was by no means the caſe. He pretended, the forts and magazines were his own proper goods; and particularly that of Hull, being purchaſed with his own money, could not be with-held from him, without rendering his condition worſe than that of his meaneſt ſubject.

But the parliament did not grant theſe ſuppoſitions. They pretended, that the forts and magazines were committed to the king, as a truſt to be employed for the preſervation, and not for the deſtruction of the people, and that the king's claim to the property of the forts and magazines was groundleſs. It is no wonder that upon ſuch different principles, the papers ſhould abound on both ſides, without producing any great effects. The king however had this advantage, that the parliament could not evidently prove their aſſertions againſt him, and that the authority aſſumed by both houſes, was founded only on bare ſuſpicions of the king's ill deſigns, which would have rendered it plauſible, had they been averred. But they did not think proper to wait for demonſtrations, to be aſſured of the king's ſecret intentions. It was enough to have reaſons to ſuſpect him, which to them appeared ſufficiently ſtrong to oblige them to take precautions, which might come too late, in caſe more convincing proofs were expected.

This is the ſubſtance of all the papers publiſhed on both ſides, concerning Hull. As I have already inſerted a great many about the militia, I think it convenient to ſave the reader the pains of peruſing thoſe which were publiſhed on the preſent affair, and which run upon the ſame principles and ſuppoſitions ſo often mentioned.

The parliament openly ſupported ſir John Hotham; ſo that after many meſſages, declarations, anſwers, and replies, the king had no way left to become maſter of Hull, but by ſurpriſe or force. The laſt of theſe ways was not very practicable, becauſe he could depend but on a very ſmall number of troops, and had no artillery, arms, or ammunition. It is true, he expected ſome from Holland, but the time was very uncertain. And therefore he attempted to take Hull by correſpondence. In the execution of this deſign, he made uſe of Mr. Beckwith a gentleman of Beverley, who had a ſon-in-law, officer in Hull. But this officer diſcovered the plot to the governor, who was ſo civil as to ſend the king word he might ſave himſelf the trouble of carrying on the contrivance, and at the ſame time ſent an expreſs to the parliament. Beckwith retiring to the king at York, the parliament diſpatched a meſſenger to ſeize and bring him to London: but the meſſenger was not permitted to execute his orders.

From that time, the king and the parliament prepared for war, it being very eaſy to foreſee, they ſhould at laſt be forced to it. But as each ſtood in need of the people to bear the expence, ſo each uſed all poſſible endeavours to gain them, by demonſtrating the injuſtice of the contrary party, and by ſtriving to convince them, that their good was only intended. The parliament pretended, that the malignants, by whom the king ſuffered himſelf to be guided, had formed a deſign to inſlave the nation, wherein they could not ſucceed, but by inflaming the miſunderſtanding between the king and the parliament, in order to engage them in a civil war, which they hoped would prove ſucceſsful to the king. This was the parliament's ſuppoſition, from whence they inferred, that therefore it was neceſſary to prevent by good meaſures the execution of this deſign, and to put themſelves in a poſture of defence, in caſe the king continued to be directed by theſe malignants.

The king, on his ſide, pretended, that the parliament, in feigning to have only in view the good of the kingdom, really meant to alter the conſtitution of church and ſtate: that they deſigned to aboliſh the regal power, or render the king but a ſhadow, whilſt both houſes ſhould be poſſeſſed of the government. He inferred from this ſuppoſition, that he ought to expoſe himſelf to the greateſt hazards, rather than receive law from his ſubjects, his conſcience and the care of the realm, which God had entruſted him with, not permitting him to ſuffer the alterations deſigned to be made in church and ſtate. Whatever ſecret motives both might have, the reaſons they alleged were very plauſible, and thoſe who ſought only juſtice, were not a little embarraſſed which ſide to eſpouſe. But the parliament ſeemed to have a great advantage over the king, in that their party was much more numerous, and the forts and militia in their poſſeſſion, with plenty of arms and ammunition, whilſt the king was wholly unprovided. Nevertheleſs, the king was not without hopes. He had, as I have ſaid, privately gained colonel Goring governor of Portſmouth. The queen was now buſy in Holland in procuring artillery, arms, ammunition, and ſeveral officers of the Engliſh troops in the Dutch ſervice. Moſt of the Yorkſhire gentlemen, the largeſt county in England, were for him, and he did not queſtion, but by their means he ſhould engage the whole county to declare in his favour. With this aſſiſtance, he hoped to prevent the parliament, and raiſe a ſufficient number of forces to take Hull, before the parliament ſhould be able to oppoſe it. He expected alſo, that when he was maſter of Hull and Portſmouth, and had received arms from Holland, many, who were ſtill reſtrained by the fear of wanting protection, would openly take his part. Moreover, he gave private notice to all his friends, that it was time to repair to York, and ordered letters to be ſent in his name to ſuch members as adhered to him, to abſent themſelves from the parliament and retire to York, or to other places where they could be ſerviceable to him.

All theſe meaſures could not be taken ſo privately but the parliament had ſome information, and therefore the king endeavoured to give them ſome colour, to hinder his deſigns from being diſcovered. After his diſappointment at Hull, he ſummoned all the Yorkſhire tenants in chief, to appear at York the 12th of May.

Shortly after, both houſes ſent a committee to York[f], under pretence of bringing the king a meſſage about Hull and the militia, but, in reality, to be ſpies upon his actions. The meſſage was the more diſagreeable to him, as after having returned an anſwer and diſmiſſed the committee, they told him, they had orders to ſtay at York. Though it was eaſy for him to ſee with what view the parliament had ſent this committee, he thought not proper to uſe any violence to drive them from the city.

The 12th of May, the gentry of the county being come to York, his majeſty made a ſpeech to them, wherein he proteſted, "That the enjoying of quiet was the chief cauſe of his coming among them in the North, and not to make that part of the kingdom a ſeat of war, as malice would make them believe." He added, "that both houſes of parliament did, by their meſſengers brave him even in York; and that, as his magazine of Hull was going, directly againſt his will, to be taken from him, and the militia to be put in execution againſt law and his conſent; and laſtly, as ſir John Hotham's treaſon was countenanced, none could blame him for apprehending danger. Therefore he was reſolved to have a guard, in which he deſired their concurrence and aſſiſtance."

The Yorkſhire gentry being variouſly diſpoſed, it was not poſſible for the hearers of the king's ſpeech to agree in the ſame anſwer. Nay, it is ſaid, ſome violence was uſed by the court, to exclude from the debate ſuch as were known to be oppoſite to the king, and that theſe were forced to aſſemble elſewhere. For this reaſon the king received four different anſwers to his propoſition, two whereof were favourable, and the other two beſought him to hearken to the advice of his parliament. The guard however was raiſed, and the command thereof given to the prince of Wales [g].

The king would have alſo removed the courts of juſtice from Weſtminſter to York, and even ſent a proclamation to the lord-keeper Littleton for that purpoſe, with orders to publiſh it. But the parliament having notice of it, forbad him to execute the orders.

Serjeant major-general Skippon being an excellent officer, and the king knowing the parliament deſigned to employ him, ſent for him to attend him at York. But the parliament gave him orders to the contrary, which Skippon obeyed. This doubtleſs was foreſeen by the king, but he was very glad to ſhew that the parliament deſired a war, ſince they ſo haughtily contradicted his orders.

As matters ſtood between the king and the parliament, a war ſeemed unavoidable, and probably it was determined on both ſides. The ſole concern was to amuſe the public with good or bad reaſons, and try to caſt the blame on the oppoſite party. Mean while the king's two anſwers of March the 9th and the 20th, not being replied to, the parliament was apprehenſive, their ſilence would produce an ill effect in the minds of the people. Wherefore they took occaſion, in anſwering theſe two meſſages, to publiſh a manifeſto, under the name of remonſtrance or declaration, the 19th of May. As this manifeſto, and the king's anſwer, are very proper to inform the reader of the reaſons of both parties, or at leaſt of thoſe they allege to ſupport their cauſe and vindicate their conduct, I think it neceſſary to inſert theſe two papers, for fear the abridging them may be an injury to either.

The declaration or remonſtance of the lords and commons in parliament aſſembled, May 19, 1642.

"THE infinite mercy and providence of the Almighty God hath been abundantly manifeſted ſince the beginning of this parliament, in great variety of protections and bleſſings, whereby he hath not only delivered us from many wicked plots and deſigns, which, if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and deſtruction upon this kingdom; but out of thoſe attempts hath produced divers evident and remarkable advantages to the furtherance of thoſe ſervices, which we have been deſirous to perform to our ſovereign lord the king, and to this church and ſtate, in providing for the public peace and proſperity of his majeſty, and all his realms, which in the preſence of the ſame all-ſeeing Deity, we proteſt to have been, and ſtill to be, the only end of all our counſels and endeavours, wherein we have reſolved to continue freed and enlarged from all private aims, perſonal reſpects or paſſions whatſoever. (1.)

Remark (1. It may be preſumed, there were in both houſes, many members who acted with ſincerity, and believed, they really ſerved the public in whatever they did againſt the king. But it is hard to conceive, how both houſes, conſiſting of ſo many members, who were ignorant of one another's inward ſentiments, could call God to witneſs, that they acted only by juſt motives, free from paſſion and private views.

"In which reſolution we are nothing diſcouraged, although the heads of the malignant party, diſappointed of that prey, the religion and liberty of this kingdom, which they were ready to ſeize upon and devour before the beginning of this parliament, have ſtill perſiſted, by new practices, both of force and ſubtilty, to recover the ſame again; for which purpoſe they have made ſeveral attempts for the bringing up of the army; they afterwards projected the falſe accuſation of the lord Kimbolton and the five members of the houſe of commons, which being in itſelf of an odious nature, they yet ſo far prevailed with his majeſty, as to procure him to take it upon himſelf; but when the unchangeable duty and faithfulneſs of the parliament could not be wrought upon by ſuch a fact as that, to withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from his majeſty, they have, with much art and induſtry, adviſed his majeſty, to ſuffer divers unjuſt ſcandals and imputations upon the parliament, to be publiſhed in his name, whereby they might make it odious to the people, and by their help to deſtroy that which hath hitherto been the only means of their own preſervation.

"For this purpoſe, they have drawn his majeſty into the northern parts, far from the parliament, that ſo falſe rumours might have time to get credit, and the juſt defences of the parliament find a more tedious, difficult, and diſadvantageous acceſs, after thoſe falſe imputations and ſlanders had been firſt rooted in the apprehenſion of his majeſty, and his ſubjects; which the more ſpeedily to effect, they have cauſed a preſs to be tranſported to York, from whence ſeveral papers and writings of that kind are conveyed to all parts of the kingdom, without the authority of the great ſeal, in an unuſual and illegal manner, and without the advice of his majeſty's privy-council; from the greater and better part whereof having withdrawn himſelf, as well from his great council of parliament, he is thereby expoſed to the wicked and unfaithful counſels of ſuch as have made the wiſdom and juſtice of the parliament dangerous to themſelves; and this danger they labour to prevent, by hiding their own guilt under the name and ſhadow of the king, infuſing into him their own fears, and as much as in them lies, aſperſing his royal perſon and honour with their own infamy, from both which it hath always been as much the care, as it is the duty, of the parliament, to preſerve his majeſty, and fix the guilt of all evil actions and counſels, upon thoſe who have been the authors of them.

"Amongſt divers writings of this kind, we the lords and commons in parliament, have taken into our conſideration two printed papers; the firſt containing a declaration, which they received from his majeſty, in anſwer to that which was preſented to his majeſty from both houſes of parliament at Newmarket, the 9th of March 1641. The other, his majeſty's anſwer to the petition of both houſes, preſented to his majeſty at York, the 26th of March 1642, both which are filled with harſh cenſures, and cauſeleſs charges upon the parliament; concerning which, we hold it neceſſary to give ſatisfaction to the kingdom, ſeeing we find it very difficult to ſatisfy his majeſty, whom, to our great grief, we have found to be ſo engaged to, and poſſeſſed by thoſe miſapprehenſions, which evil counſellors have wrought in him, that our moſt humble and faithful remonſtrances have rather irritated and imbittered, than any thing allayed or mitigated the ſharp expreſſions, which his majeſty hath been pleaſed to make in anſwer to them; for the manifeſtation whereof, and of our own innocency, we deſire that all his majeſty's loving ſubjects may take notice of theſe particulars.

"We know no occaſion given by us, which might move his majeſty to tell us, That in our declaration, preſented at Newmarket, there were ſome expreſſions different from the uſual language to princes.

"Neither did we tell his majeſty, either in words or in effect, That if he did not join with us in an act, which his majeſty conceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to himſelf and the whole kingdom, we could make a law without him, and impoſe it upon the people. That which we deſired was, That in regard of the imminent danger of the kingdom, the militia, for the ſecurity of his majeſty and his people, might be put under the command of ſuch noble and faithful perſons, as they had all cauſe to confide in: and ſuch was the neceſſity of this preſervation, that we declare, That if his majeſty ſhould refuſe to join with us therein, the two houſes of parliament, being the ſupreme court, and higheſt council of the kingdom, were enabled, by their own authority, to provide for the repulſing of ſuch imminent and evident danger, not by any new law of their own making, as hath been untruly ſuggeſted to his majeſty, but by the moſt ancient law of this kingdom, even that which is fundamental and eſſential to the conſtitution and ſubſiſtence of it.

"Although we never deſired to encourage his majeſty to ſuch replies, as might produce any conteſtation betwixt him and his parliament, of which we never found better effect than loſs of time, and hindrance of the public affairs; yet we have been far from telling him, of how little value his words would be with us, much leſs when they are accompanied with actions of love and juſtice. His majeſty hath more reaſon to find fault with thoſe wicked counſellors, who have ſo often bereaved him of the honour, and his people of the fruit, of many gracious ſpeeches which he made to them, ſuch as thoſe in the end of the laſt parliament; 'That on the word of a king, and as he was a gentleman, he would redreſs the grievances of his people, as well out of parliament as in it.' Were the ſearching the ſtudies and chambers, yea, the pockets of ſome, both of the nobility and commons, the very next day; the commitment of Mr. Bellaſis, ſir John Hotham, and Mr. Crew; the continued oppreſſions by ſhip-money, coat and conduct-money; with the manifold impriſonments, and other vexations thereupon, and other enſuing violations of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, (all which were the effects of evil counſel, and abundantly declared our general remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom) actions of love and juſtice, ſuitable to ſuch words as thoſe?

"As gracious was his majeſty's ſpeech in the beginning of this parliament: 'That he was reſolved to put himſelf freely and clearly upon the love and affection of his Engliſh ſubjects.' Whether his cauſeleſs complaints and jealouſy, the unjuſt imputations ſo often caſt upon his parliament, his denial of their neceſſary defence by the ordinance of the militia, his dangerous abſenting himſelf from his great council, like to produce ſuch a miſchievous diviſion in the kingdom, have not been more ſuitable to other mens evil counſels, than to his own words, will eaſily appear to any indifferent judgment.

"Neither have his latter ſpeeches been better uſed and preſerved by theſe evil and wicked counſellors. Could any words be fuller of love and juſtice, than thoſe in his anſwer to the meſſage ſent the houſe of commons, the 31ſt of December 1641? 'We do engage unto you ſolemnly, on the word of a king, that the ſecurity of all, and every one of you, from violence, is, and ever ſhall be as much our care, as the preſervation of us and our children.' And could any actions be fuller of injuſtice and violence than that of the attorney-general, in falſly accuſing the ſix members of parliament, and the other proceedings thereupon, within three or four days after that meſſage? For the full view whereof let the declaration made of thoſe proceedings be peruſed; and by thoſe inſtances (we could add many more) let all the world judge, who deſerves to be taxed with diſvaluing his majeſty's words, they, who have as much as in them lies ſtained and ſullied them with ſuch foul counſels; or the parliament, who have ever manifeſted, with joy and delight, their humble thankfulneſs for thoſe gracious words and actions of love and juſtice which have been conformable thereunto.

"The king is pleaſed to diſavow the having any ſuch evil council or counſellors, as are mentioned in our declaration, to his knowledge; and we hold it our duty, humbly to avow there are ſuch, or elſe we muſt ſay, that all the ill things done of late in his majeſty's name, have been done by himſelf, wherein we ſhould neither follow the direction of the law, nor the affection of our own hearts, which is, as much as may be, to clear his majeſty from all imputation of miſ-government, and to lay the fault upon his miniſters; the falſe accuſing of ſix members of parliament; the juſtifying of maſter attorney in that falſe accuſation; the violent coming to the houſe of commons; the denial of the militia; the ſharp meſſages to both houſes, contrary to the cuſtoms of former kings; the long and remote abſence of his majeſty from parliament; the heavy and wrongful taxes upon both houſes; the cheriſhing and countenancing a diſcontented party in the kingdom againſt them: theſe certainly are the fruits of very ill counſel, apt to put the kingdom into a combuſtion, to hinder the ſupplies of Ireland, and to countenance the proceedings and pretenſions of the rebels there; and the authors of thoſe evil counſels, we conceive, muſt needs be known to his majeſty. And we hope our labouring with his majeſty to have theſe diſcovered and brought to a juſt cenſure, will not ſo much wound his honour, in the opinion of his good ſubjects, as his labouring to preſerve and conceal them.

"And whereas his majeſty ſaith, he could wiſh that his own immediate actions, which he avows on his own honour, might not be ſo roughly cenſured under that common ſtile of evil counſellors: we could alſo heartily wiſh, that we had not cauſe to make that ſtile ſo common: but how often and undutiful ſoever theſe wicked counſellors fix their diſhonour upon the king, by making his majeſty the author of thoſe evil actions, which are the effects of their own evil counſels, we his majeſty's loyal and dutiful ſubjects can uſe no other ſtile, according to that maxim in the law, 'The king can do no wrong;' but if any ill be committed in matter of ſtate, the council; if in matter of juſtice, the judges muſt anſwer for it.

"We lay no charge upon his majeſty, which ſhould put him upon that apology, concerning his faithful and zealous affection of the proteſtant profeſſion: neither doth his majeſty endeavour to clear thoſe in greateſt authority about him, by whom (we ſay) that deſign hath been potently carried on for divers years; and we rather wiſh, that the mercies of heaven, than the judgments, may be manifeſted upon them; but that there hath been ſuch, there are ſo plentiful and frequent evidences, that we believe there is none, either proteſtant or papiſt, who hath had any reaſonable view of the paſſages of latter times, but either in fear or hope, did expect a ſudden iſſue of this deſign.

"We have no way tranſgreſſed againſt the act of oblivion, by remembering the intended war againſt Scotland, as a branch of that deſign to alter religion, by thoſe wicked counſels, from which God did then deliver us, which we ought never to forget.

"That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and cheriſhed by the popiſh and malignant party in England, is not only affirmed by the rebels, but may be cleared by many other proofs: the ſame rebellious principles of pretended religion, the ſame politic ends, are apparent in both, and their malicious deſigns and practices are maſked and diſguiſed with the ſame falſe colour, of their earneſt zeal to vindicate his majeſty's prerogative from the ſuppoſed oppreſſion of the parliament. How much theſe treacherous pretences have been countenanced by ſome evil counſel about his majeſty, may appear in this, That the proclamation whereby they were declared traitors, was ſo long with-held as to the 2d of January, though the rebellion broke forth in October before, and then no more but forty copies appointed to be printed, with a ſpecial command from his majeſty not to exceed that number; and that none of them ſhould be publiſhed, till his majeſty's pleaſure was further ſignified, as by the warrant appears, a true copy whereof is hereunto added, ſo that few only could take notice of it; which was made more obſervable, by the late contrary proceedings againſt the Scots, who were in a very quick and ſharp manner proclaimed; and thoſe proclamations forthwith diſperſed, with as much diligence as might be, through all the kingdom, or ordered to be read in all churches, accompanied with public prayers and execrations.

"Another evidence of favour and countenance to the rebels, in ſome of power about his majeſty, is this, That they have put forth in his name a cauſeleſs complaint againſt the parliament, which ſpeaketh the ſame language of the parliament which the rebels do, whereby to raiſe a belief in mens minds, that his majeſty's affections are alienated, as well as his perſon is removed from that great council; all which doth exceedingly retard the ſupplies of Ireland, and more advance the proceedings of the rebels, than any jealouſy or miſapprehenſion, begotten in his ſubjects, by the declaration of the rebels injunctions of Roſetti, or information of Triſtram Whitecomb; ſo that, conſidering the preſent ſtate and temper of both kingdoms, his royal preſence is far more neceſſary here than it can be in Ireland, for redemption or protection of his ſubjects there.

"And whether there be any cauſe of his majeſty's great indignation, for being reproached to have intended force or threatening to the parliament, we deſire them to conſider, who ſhall read our declaration, in which there is no word tending to any ſuch reproach; and certainly we have been more tender of his majeſty's honour in this point, than he, whoſoever he was, that did write this declaration, wherein his majeſty's name, he doth call God to witneſs, he never had any ſuch thought, or knew of any ſuch reſolution of bringing up the army; which truly will ſeem ſtrange to thoſe, who ſhall read the depoſition of Mr. Goring, the information of Mr. Percy, and divers other examinations of Mr. Wilmot, Mr. Pollard, and others; the other examinations of captain Legg, ſir Jacob Aſhley, ſir John Coniers; and conſider the condition and nature of the petition which was ſent unto ſir Jacob Aſhley, under the approbation C. R. which his majeſty doth now acknowledge to be his own hand; and being full of ſcandal to the parliament, might have proved dangerous to the whole kingdom, if the army ſhould have interpoſed betwixt the king and them, as was deſired.

"We do not affirm, that his majeſty's warrant was granted for the paſſage of Mr. Jermin, after the deſire of both houſes for reſtraint of his ſervants, but only that he did paſs over, after that reſtraint, by virtue of ſuch a warrant. We know the warrant bears the date the day before our desire; yet it seems strange to those who knew how great respect and power Mr. Jermin had in court, that he should begin his journey in such haste, and in apparel so unfit for travel, as a black sattin suit, and white boots, if his going away were designed the day before.

"The accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, is called a breach of privilege; and truly so it was, and a very high one, far above any satisfaction that hath been yet given: how can it be said to be largely satisfied, so long as his majesty laboured to preserve master attorney from punishment, who was the visible actor in it; so long as his majesty hath not only justified him, but by his letters declared, that it was his duty to accuse them, and that he would have punished him, if he had not done it; so long as those members have not the means of clearing their innocency, and the authors of that malicious charge undiscovered, though both houses of parliament have several times petitioned his majesty to discover them, and that not only upon grounds of common justice, but by act of parliament, his majesty is bound to do it; so long as the king refuses to pass a bill for their discharge, alleging, That the narrative in that bill is against his honour, whereby he seems still to avow the matter of that false and scandalous accusation, though he deserts the prosecution, offering to pass a bill for their acquittal; yet with intimation, that they must desert the avowing their own innocency, which would more wound them in honour, than secure them in law.

"And in vindication of this great privilege of parliament, we do not know that we have invaded any privilege belonging to his majesty, as is alleged in this declaration.

"But we look not upon this only in the notion of a breach of privilege, which might be, though the accusation were true or false, but under the notion of a heinous crime in the attorney, and all other subjects who had a hand in it: a crime against the law of nature, against the rules of justice, that innocent men should be charged with so great an offence as treason, in the face of the highest judicatory of the kingdom, whereby their lives and estates, their blood and honour, are endangered, without witness, without evidence, without all possibility of reparation in a legal course, yet a crime of such a nature, that his majesty's command can no more warrant, than it can any other acts of injustice. It is true, that those things which are evil in their own nature, such as false testimony, or false accusation, cannot be the subject of any command, or induce any obligation of obedience upon any man, by any authority whatsoever; therefore the attorney in this case was bound to refuse to execute such a command, unless he had some such evidence or testimony, as might have warranted him against the parties, and be liable to make satisfaction if it should prove false; and it is sufficiently known to every man, and adjudged in parliament, That the king can be neither the relator, informer, or witness. If it rest as it is without further satisfaction, no future parliament can be safe, but that the members may be taken and destroyed at pleasure; yea, the very principles of government and justice will be in danger to be dissolved.

"We do not conceive, that numbers do make an assembly unlawful, but when either the end or manner of their carriage shall be unlawful. Divers just occasions might draw the citizens to Westminster, where many public and private petitions, and other causes, were depending in parliament; and why that should be found more faulty in the citizens, than the resort of great numbers every day in the term to the ordinary courts of justice, we know not. That those citizens were notoriously provoked and assaulted at Westminster, by colonel Lunsford, captain Hide, with divers others, and by some of the servants of the archbishop of York, is sufficiently proved: and that afterward they were more violently wounded, and most barbarously mangled with swords, by the officers and soldiers near Whitehall, many of them being without weapons, and giving no cause of distaste, as is likewise proved by several testimonies; but of any scandalous or seditious misdemeanours of theirs, that might give his majesty good cause to suppose his own person, or those of his royal consort, or children, to be in apparent danger, we have had no proof ever offered to either house; and if there had been any complaint of that kind, it is no doubt the houses would have been as forward to join in an order for the suppressing such tumults, as they were not long before upon another occasion, when they made an order to that purpose. Whereas those officers and soldiers, which committed that violence upon so many of the citizens at Whitehall, were cherished and fostered in his majesty's house: and when, not long after, the common-council of London presented a petition to his majesty, for reparation of those injuries; his majesty's answer was, (without hearing the proof of the complaints) that if any citizen was wounded or ill-treated, his majesty was confidently assured, that it happened by their own evil and corrupt demeanours.

"We hope it cannot be thought contrary to the duty and wisdom of a parliament, if many concurring, and frequently reiterated and renewed advertisements from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts; if the solicitations of the pope's nuncio, and our own discontented fugitives, do make us jealous and watchful for the safety of the state. And we have been very careful to make our expressions thereof so easy and so plain to the capacity and understanding of the people, that nothing might justly stick with them, with reflection upon the person of his majesty. Wherein we appeal to the judgment of any indifferent person, who shall read and peruse our own words. We must maintain the ground of our fears to be of that moment, that we cannot discharge the trust and duty which lies upon us, unless we do apply ourselves to the use of those means which the law hath enabled us in cases of this nature, for the necessary defence of the kingdom; and as his majesty doth graciously declare, the law shall be the measure of his power; so do we most heartily profess, that we shall always make it the rule of our obedience.

Prudent omissions in the king's answer.

"The next point of our declaration was with much caution artificially passed over by him who drew his majesty's answer, it being indeed the foundation of all our misery, and his majesty's trouble, that he is pleased to hear general taxes upon his parliament, without any particular charge to which they may give satisfaction, and that he hath often conceived displeasure against particular persons upon misinformation; and although those informations have been clearly proved to be false, yet he would never bring the accusers to question, which layeth an impossibility upon honest men of clearing themselves, and gives encouragement unto false and unworthy persons to trouble untrue and groundless informations; three particulars we mentioned in our declaration, which the penner of that answer had good cause to omit; the words supposed to be spoken at Kensington; the pretended articles against the queen; and the groundless accusation of the six members of parliament, there being nothing to be said in defence or denial of any of them.

"Concerning his majesty's desire to join with his parliament, and with his faithful subjects, in defence of religion, and public good of the kingdom; we doubt not but he will do it fully, when evil counsellors shall be removed from about him; and until that be, as we have shewed before of words, so must we also say of laws, that they cannot secure us; witness the petition of right, which was followed with such an inundation of illegal taxes, that we had just cause to think, that the payment of eight hundred and twenty thousand pounds was an easy burthen to the common-wealth, in exchange for them; and we cannot but justly think, that if there be a continuance of such ill counsellors, and favour to them, they will by some wicked device or other, make the bill for the triennial parliament, and those other excellent laws mentioned in his majesty's declaration, of less value than words.

"That excellent bill for the continuance of this parliament was so necessary, that without it, we could not have raised so great sums of money for the service of his majesty and the common-wealth as we have done, and without which the ruin and destruction of the kingdom must needs have followed. And we are resolved, the gracious favour of his majesty expressed in that bill, and the advantage and security which thereby we have from being dissolved, shall not encourage us to do any thing, which otherwise had not been fit to have been done. And we are ready to make it good before all the world, that although his majesty hath passed many bills very advantageous for the subject, yet in none of them have we bereaved his majesty of any just, necessary, or profitable prerogative of the crown. We so earnestly desire his majesty's return to London, for that upon it, we conceive, depends the very safety and being of both his kingdoms: and therefore we must protest, that as for the time past, neither the goverment of London, nor any laws of the land, have lost their life and force for his security; so for the future, we shall be ready to do or say, any thing that may stand with the duty or honour of a parliament, which may raise a mutual confidence betwixt his majesty and us, as we do wish, and as the affairs of the kingdom do require.

"Thus

" Thus far the anſwer to that which is called his majeſty's declaration, hath led us. Now we come to that which is intitled, 'His Majeſty's Anſwer to the Petition of both Houſes, preſented to him at York, the 26th of March 1642.' In the beginning whereof his majeſty wiſheth, that our privileges on all parts were ſo ſtated, that this way of correſpondency might be preſerved with that freedom which hath been uſed of old. We know nothing introduced by us that gives any impediment hereunto; neither have we affirmed our privileges to be broken, when his majeſty denies us any thing, or gives us a reaſon why he cannot grant it, or that thoſe who adviſed ſuch denial, were enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Iriſh rebellion, in which aſperſion, that is turned into a general aſſertion, which in our votes is applied to a particular caſe; wherefore we muſt maintain our votes, that thoſe who adviſe his majeſty to contradict that which both houſes, in the queſtion concerning the militia, had declared to be law and command, it ſhould not be obeyed, is a high breach of privilege; and that thoſe who adviſed his majeſty to abſent himſelf from his parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and juſtly to be ſuſpected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland. The reaſons of both are evident, becauſe in the firſt there is as great a derogation from the truſt and authority of parliament; and in the ſecond, as much advantage to the proceedings and hopes of the rebels as may be: and we hold it a very cauſeleſs imputation upon the parliament, that we have herein any way impeached, much leſs taken away, the freedom of his majeſty's vote, which doth not import a liberty for his majeſty to deny any thing, how neceſſary ſoever, for the preſervation of the kingdom, much leſs a licence to evil counſellors, to adviſe any thing, though never ſo deſtructive to his majeſty and his people. (2.)

Rem. (2.) I do not think it was ever decided to what acts the king may, or may not, deny his aſſent. So there ariſes an inexhauſtible fountain of diſputes, when the king and parliament do not agree.

" By the meſſage of the 20th of January, his majeſty did propound to both houſes of parliament, that they would with all ſpeed fall into a ſerious conſideration all thoſe particulars, which they thought neceſſary, as well for the upholding and maintaining his majeſty's juſt and regal authority, and for the ſettling his revenue, as for the preſent and future eſtabliſhing our privileges, the free and quiet enjoying our eſtates, the liberties of our perſons, the ſecurity of the true religion profeſſed in the church of England, and the ſettling of ceremonies in ſuch a manner as may take away all juſt offence, and digeſt it into one entire body.

" To that point of upholding and maintaining his royal authority, we ſay, nothing has been done to the prejudice of it, that ſhould require any new proviſion: to the other of ſettling the revenue, the parliament hath no way abridged or diſordered his juſt revenues; but it is true that much waſte and confuſion of his majeſty's eſtate hath been made by thoſe evil and unfaithful miniſters, whom he hath employed in the managing of it, whereby his own ordinary expences would have been diſappointed, and the ſafety of the kingdom more endangered, if the parliament had not in ſome meaſure provided for his houſhold, and for ſome of the forts, more than they were bound to do; and they are ſtill willing to ſettle ſuch a revenue upon his majeſty, as may make him live royally, plentifully, and ſafely; but they cannot in wiſdom and fidelity to the common-wealth do this, till he ſhall chuſe ſuch counſellors and officers as may order and diſpoſe it to the public good, and not apply it to the ruin and deſtruction of his people, as heretofore it hath been. But this and the other matters concerning ourſelves, being works of great importance, and full of intricacy, will require ſo long a time of deliberation, that the kingdom might be ruined before we ſhould effect them. Wherefore we thought it neceſſary, firſt to be ſuiters to his majeſty, ſo to order the militia, that the kingdom being ſecured, we might with more eaſe and ſafety apply ourſelves to debate of that meſſage wherein we have been interrupted by his majeſty's denial of the ordinance concerning the ſame, becauſe it would have been in vain for us to labour in other things, and in the mean time to leave ourſelves naked to the malice of ſo many enemies both at home and abroad; yet we have not been altogether negligent of thoſe things which his majeſty is pleaſed to propound in that meſſage: we have agreed upon a book of rates in a larger proportion than hath been granted to any of his majeſty's predeceſſors, which is a conſiderable ſupport of his majeſty's public charge; and have likewiſe prepared divers propoſitions and bills for preſervation of our religion and liberties, which we intend ſhortly to preſent to his majeſty, and to do whatſoever is fit for us to make up this unpleaſant breach betwixt his majeſty and his parliament.

" Whereas divers exceptions are here taken concerning the militia; firſt, that his majeſty never denied the thing, but accepted the perſons (except for corporations) only that he denied the way. To which we anſwer, that that exception takes off London, and all other great towns and cities, which makes a great part of the kingdom; and for the way of ordinance it is ancient, more ſpeedy, more eaſily alterable, and in all theſe and other reſpects, more proper and more applicable to the preſent occaſion, than a bill which his majeſty calls the only good old way of impoſing upon the ſubjects. It ſhall ſeem that neither his majeſty's royal predeceſſors, nor our anceſtors have heretofore been of that opinion; 37 Ed. 3. we find this record, 'The chancellor made declaration of the challenge of the parliament; the king deſires to know the griefs of his ſubjects, and to redreſs enormities. The laſt day of the parliament, the king demanded of the whole eſtates, whether they would have ſuch things as they agreed on, by way of ordinance or ſtatute? who anſwered, by way of ordinance; for that they might amend the ſame at their pleaſure, and ſo it was.'

" But his majeſty objects further, that there is ſomewhat in the preface, to which he could not conſent with juſtice to his honour and innocence, and that thereby he is excluded from any power in the diſpoſing of it. Theſe objections may ſeem ſomewhat, but indeed will appear nothing, when it ſhall be conſidered, that nothing in the preamble lays any charge upon his majeſty, or in the body of the ordinance, that excludes his royal authority in the diſpoſing or execution of it: but only it is provided, that it ſhould be ſignified by both houſes of parliament, as that channel through which it will be beſt derived, and moſt certainly to thoſe ends for which it is intended, and let all the world judge, whether we have not reaſon to inſiſt upon it, that the ſtrength of the kingdom ſhould rather be ordered according to the direction or advice of the great council of the land, equally intruſted by the king, and by the kingdom, than that the ſafety of the king, parliament, and kingdom, ſhould be left at the devotion of a few unknown councellors, many of them not intruſted at all by the king in any public way, and not at all confided in by the kingdom.

" We wiſh the danger were not imminent, or not ſtill continuing, but cannot conceive, that the long time ſpent in this debate is evidence ſufficient that there was no ſuch neceſſity or danger, but a bill might eaſily have been prepared; for when many cauſes do concur to the danger of a ſtate, the interruption of any one may hinder the execution of the reſt, and yet the deſign be ſtill kept on foot for better opportunities. Who knows whether the ill ſucceſs of the rebels in Ireland had not hindered the inſurrection of the papiſts here? whether the preſervation of the ſix members of the parliament falſely accuſed, hath not prevented that plot of the breaking the neck of the parliament, of which we were informed from France, not long before they were accuſed? yet ſince his majeſty hath been pleaſed to expreſs his pleaſure rather for a bill than an ordinance, and that he ſent in one for that purpoſe, we readily entertained it, and with ſome ſmall and neceſſary alterations, ſpeedily paſſed the ſame: but, contrary to the cuſtom of parliament, and our expectations grounded upon his majeſty's own invitation of us to that way, and the other reaſons manifeſted in our declaration concerning the militia of the 5th of May, inſtead of his royal aſſent, we met with an abſolute refuſal.

" If the matter of theſe our votes of the 15th and 16th of March, be according to the law, we hope his majeſty will allow the ſubjects to be bound by them, becauſe he hath ſaid, he will make the law the rule of his power; and if the queſtion be, whether that be law which the lords and commons have once declared to be ſo, who ſhall be the judge? not his majeſty; for the king judgeth not of matters of law, but by his courts; and his courts, though ſitting by his authority, expect not his aſſent in matters of law: nor any other courts, for they cannot judge in that caſe, becauſe they are inferior; no appeal lying to them for parliament, the judgment whereof is, in the eye of the law, the king's judgment in his higheſt court; though the king in his perſon be neither preſent nor aſſenting thereunto. (3.)

Rem. (3.) I obſerved elſewhere, the defect of this reaſoning, which is a mere fallacy, grounded upon the equivocal word parliament. For under colour, that is a certain ſenſe, the two houſes alone are called the parliament, they aſſume here to themſelves the rights belonging ſolely to the parliament compoſed of king, lords, and commons.

The

"The votes at which his majesty takes exceptions, are these:

"That the king's absence so far remote from the parliament, is not only an obstruction, but may be a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.

"That when the lords and commons shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament.

"That those persons that advised his majesty to absent himself from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and justly may be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland.

"That the kingdom hath been of late, and still is, in so imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a popish and discontented party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his majesty and his people.

"That the lords and commons fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty, to provide a suitable prevention, have in several petitions addressed themselves to his majesty, for the ordering and disposing of the militia of the kingdom, in such a way as was agreed upon by the wisdom of both houses, to be most effectual and proper for the present exigents of the kingdom, yet could not obtain it; but his majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto.

"That in this case of extreme danger, and his majesty's refusal, the ordinance of parliament agreed upon by both houses for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

"By all which it doth appear, that there is no colour that by this tax we go about to introduce a new law, much less to exercise an arbitrary power, but indeed to prevent it; for this law is as old as the kingdom, that the kingdom must not be without a means to preserve itself; which that it may be done without confusion, this nation hath intrusted certain hands with a power to provide, in an orderly and regular way, for the good and safety of the whole; which power, by the constitution of this kingdom, is in his majesty and in his parliament together. Yet since the prince, being but one person, is more subject to accidents of nature and chance, whereby the common-wealth may be deprived of the fruit of that trust which was in part reposed in him; in cases of such necessity, that the kingdom may not be inforced presently to return to its first principles, and every man left to do what is right in his own eyes, without either guide or rule, the wisdom of this state hath intrusted the houses of parliament with a power to supply what shall be wanting on the part of the prince; as is evident by the constant custom and practice thereof in cases of nonage, natural disability, and captivity; and the like reason doth and must hold for the exercise of the same power in such cases, where the royal trust cannot be, or is not discharged, and that the kingdom runs an evident or imminent danger thereby; which danger having been declared by the lords and commons in parliament, there needs not the authority of any person or court to affirm; nor is it in the power of any person or court to revoke that judgment. (4.)

Rem. (4.) All these reasonings of both houses are founded upon the supposition of an imminent danger. When they come to give proofs of the reality of this danger, they allege only suspicions, whereof they explain the causes. After which they affirm the danger to be real, because they have declared it so, and because there is no superior authority to contradict their judgment. But this declaration does not make the danger real, if it be not so indeed. It is easy therefore to perceive, by their way of proceeding, that they are embarrassed by this article.

"We know the king hath ways enough in his ordinary courts of justice to punish such seditious pamphlets and sermons, as are any ways prejudicial to his rights, honour and authority; and if any of them have been so insolently violated and vilified, his majesty's own council and officers, have been to blame, and not the parliament. We never did restrain any proceedings of this kind in other courts, nor refuse any fit complaint to us. The 'Protestation protested' was referred by the commons house to a committee, and the author being not produced, the printer was committed to prison, and the book voted by that committee to be burnt; but sir Edward Deering, who was to make that report of the votes of that committee, neglected to make it. The 'Apprentices Protestation' was never complained of; but the other seditious pamphlet (To your tents, O Israel) was once questioned, and the full prosecution of it was not interrupted by any fault of either house, whose forwardness to do his majesty all right therein, may plainly appear, that in a committee of lords and commons were purposely appointed to take such informations as the king's council should present, concerning seditious words, practices, or tumults, pamphlets or sermons, tending to the derogation, of his majesty's rights or prerogative; and his council were enjoined by that committee to enquire and present them; who several times met thereupon, and received this answer and declaration from the king's council, 'That they knew of no such thing as yet.'

"If his majesty had used the service of such a one in penning this answer, who understood the laws and government of this kingdom, he would not have thought it legally in his power to deny his parliament a guard, when they stood in need of it, since every ordinary court hath it; neither would his majesty, if he had been well informed of the laws, have refused such a guard as they desired, it being in the power of inferior courts to command their own guard; neither would he have imposed upon them such a guard, under a command which they could not confide in; which is clearly against the privileges of parliament, and of which they found very dangerous effects, and therefore desired to have it discharged. But such a guard, and so commanded, as the houses of parliament desired, they could never obtain of his majesty; and the placing of a guard about them, contrary to their desire, was not to grant a guard to them, but in effect, to set one upon them. All which considered; we believe in the judgments of any indifferent persons, it will not be thought strange, if they were a more than ordinary resort of people at Westminster, of such as came willingly of their own accord to be witnesses and helpers of the safety of them, whom all his majesty's good subjects are bound to defend from violence and danger; or that such a concourse as this, they carrying themselves quietly and peaceably (as they did) ought, in his majesty's apprehension, or can, in the interpretation of the law, be held tumultuary and seditious.

"When his majesty, in that question of violation of the laws, had expressed the observation of them indefinitely, without any limitation of time, although we never said or thought any thing that might look like a reproach to his majesty, yet we had reason to remember that it had been otherwise, lest we should seem to desert our former complaints and proceedings thereupon, as his majesty doth seem but little to like or approve of them; for although he doth acknowledge here, that great mischief that grew by that arbitrary power then complained of, yet such are continually preferred and countenanced as were friends or favourers, or related unto the chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power, and of those false colours, suggestions of imminent danger and necessity, whereby they did make it plausible unto his majesty. And on the other side, such as did appear against them, are daily discountenanced and disgraced; which, whilst it shall be so, we have no reason to judge the disease to be yet killed and dead at root, and therefore no reason to bury it in oblivion. And whilst we behold the spawns of those mischievous principles cherished and fostered in that new generation of counsellors, friends and abetters of the former, or at least, concurring with them in their malignancy against the proceedings of the parliament, we cannot think ourselves secure from the like or a worse danger.

"And here the penner of this answer bestows an admonition upon the parliament, bidding us take heed we fall not upon the same error, upon the same suggestions. But might have well spared this, till he could have shewed wherein we had exercised any power, otherwise than by the rule of the law, or could have found a more authentic or higher judge in matters of law, than the high court of parliament.

"It is declared in his majesty's name, that he is resolved to keep the rule himself, and to his power to require the same of all others. We must needs acknowledge, that such a resolution is like to bring much happiness and blessing to his majesty, and all his kingdom; yet with humility we must confess, we have not the fruit of it, in that case of my lord Kimbolton, and the other five members, accused contrary to law, both common law and the statute law, and yet remain unsatisfied; which case was remembered in our declaration, as a strange and unheard of violation of our laws. But the penner of this answer thought fit to pass it over, hoping that many would read his majesty's answer, (which hath been so carefully dispersed) which would not read our declaration.

Whereas

"Whereas after our ample thanks and acknowledgement of his majesty's favour in passing many good bills, we said that truth and necessity inforced us to add this, that in or about the time of passing those bills, some design or other hath been on foot, which, if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived us of the fruit of those bills, but would have reduced us to a worse condition of confusion, than that wherein the parliament found us. It is now told us, that the king must be most sensible of what we cast upon him, for requital of those good bills; whereas, out of their usual tenderness of his majesty's honour, we did not mention him at all: but so injurious are those wicked counsellors to the name and honour of their master and sovereign, that, as much as they can, they lay their own infamy and guilt upon his shoulders.

"Here God is also called to witness his majesty's upright intentions at the passing of those laws; this we will not question, neither did we give any occasion for such a solemn asseveration as this is. The devil is likewise defied to prove, there was any design with his majesty's knowledge or privity. This might well have been spared, for we spoke nothing of his majesty: but since we are so far taxed, as to have it affirmed, that we laid a notorious and false imputation upon his majesty, we have thought it necessary, for the just defence of our own innocency, to cause the oaths and examinations which had been taken concerning the design, to be published in a full narration, for satisfaction of all his majesty's subjects; out of which we shall now offer some few particulars, whereby the world may judge, whether we could have proceeded with more tenderness towards his majesty than we have done. Mr. Goring confesseth, that the king first asked him, whether he was engaged in any cabal concerning the army? and commanded him to join with Mr. Percy and Mr. Jermin, and some others, whom they should find within at Mr. Percy's chamber; where they took the oath of secrecy and then debated of a design propounded by Mr. Jermin, to secure the Tower, and to consider of bringing up the army to London, and captain Legg confessed, he had received the draught of a petition in the king's presence: and his majesty acknowledged it was from his own hand: and whosoever reads the sum of that petition, as it was proved by the testimony of sir Jacob Astley, sir John Coniers, and captain Legg, will easily perceive some points in it, apt to beget in them some discontent against the parliament. And can any man believe there was no design in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the rest, in which his majesty doth avow himself to be both a commander and an actor? these things being so, it will easily appear to be as much against the rule of prudence, that the penner of this answer should entangle his majesty in this unnecessary apology; as it is against the rules of justice, that any reparation from us should be either yielded or demanded.

"It is professed in his majesty's name, that he is truly sensible of the burdens of his people, which makes us hope, that he will take that course which will be most effectual to ease them of these burdens; that is, to join with his parliament in preserving the peace of the kingdom; which by his absence from them hath been much endangered, and which, by hindering the voluntary adventurers for the recovery of Ireland, and disabling the subjects to discharge the great tax laid upon them, is like to make the war much more heavy to the kingdom. And for his majesty's wants, the parliament hath been no cause of them; we have not diminished his just revenue, but have much eased his public charge, and somewhat his private. And we shall be ready, in a parliamentary way, to settle his revenue, in such an honourable proportion, as may be answerable to both, when he shall put himself into such a posture of government, that his subjects may be sure to enjoy his just protection for their religion, laws, and liberties.

"We never refused his majesty's gracious offer of a free and general pardon, only we said it could be no security to our present fears and jealousies: and we gave a reason for it, that those fears did not arise out of any guilt of our own actions, but out of the evil designs and attempts of others; and we leave it to the world to judge, whether we herein have deserved so heavy a tax and exclamation, ('That it was a strange world, when princes proffered favours are counted reproaches;' such are the words of his majesty's answer) who do esteem that offer as an act of princely grace and bounty, which, since this parliament began, we have humbly desired we might obtain, and do still hold it necessary and advantageous for the generality of the subjects, upon whom these taxes and subsidies lie heaviest; but we see, upon every occasion, how unhappy we are in his majesty's misapprehensions of our words and actions.

"We are fully of the king's mind, as it is here declared, that he may rest so secure of the affections of his subjects that he should not stand in need of foreign force to preserve him from oppression, and are confident, that he shall never want an abundant evidence of the good wishes and assistance of his whole kingdom, especially if he shall be pleased to hold to that gracious resolution, of building upon that sure foundation, the law of the land: but why his majesty should take it ill, that we having received information so deeply concerning the safety of the kingdom, should think them fit to be considered of, we cannot conceive; for although the name of the person was unknown, yet that which was more substantial to the probability of the report was known (that is) that he was servant to the lord Digby, who in his presumptious letters to the queen's majesty, and other letters to sir Lewis Dives, had intimated some wicked proposition, suitable to that information; but that this should require reparation, we hold it as far from justice as it is from truth, that we have mixed any malice with these rumours, thereby to feed the fears and jealousies of the people.

"It is affirmed, his majesty is driven (but not by us yet) from us; perchance hereafter, if there be opportunity of gaining more credit, there will not be wanting who will suggest unto his majesty, that it is done by us. And if his majesty were driven from us, we hope it was not by his own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby, and his retinue of cavaliers; (5.) and that no fears of any tumultuary violence but of their just punishment for their manifold insolence, and intended violence against the parliament.

Rem. (5.) By the lord Digby's cavaliers were meant the officers and gentlemen who assembled at Whitehall, to guard the king, in the head of whom was the lord Digby. I do not believe, that when this declaration was published, the term cavaliers was commonly used to denote the royal party. Perhaps this word, used here by the parliament, was the occasion of calling the king's party cavaliers, as the parliament's adherents were named round-heads. These two names were afterwards changed into Tories and Whigs.

"And this is expressed by the lord Digby himself, when he told those cavaliers, that the principal cause of his majesty's going out of town, was to save them from being trampled in the dirt; but of his majesty's person there was no cause of fear in the greatest heat of his people's indignation, after the accusation, and his majesty's violent coming to the house; there was no shew of any evil intention against his regal person, of which there can be no better evidence than this, that he came the next day without a guard into the city, where he heard nothing but prayers and petitions, no threatenings nor irreverent speeches, that might give him any just occasion of fear, that we have heard of, or that his majesty expresst: for he staid near a week after at Whitehall, in a secure and peaceable condition, whereby we are induced to believe, that there is no difficulty or doubt at all, but his majesty's residence near London, may be as safe as in any part of the kingdom. We are most assured of the faithfulness of the city and suburbs; and for ourselves, we shall quicken the vigour of the laws, the industry of the magistrates, the authority of the parliament, for the suppressing of all tumultuary insolence whatsoever, and for the vindicating of his honour from all insupportable and insolent scandals, if any such shall be found to be raised upon him, as are mentioned in this answer; and therefore we think it altogether unnecessary, and exceeding inconvenient, to adjourn the parliament to any other place.

"Where the desire of a good understanding betwixt the king and the parliament, is on both parts so earnest as is here professed by his majesty, to be in him, and we have sufficiently testified to be in ourselves, it seems strange we should be so long asunder, it can be nothing else but evil and malicious counsel, misrepresenting our carriage to him, and indisposing his favour to us: and as it shall be far from us, to take any advantage of his majesty's supposed straits, as to desire, much less to compel him to that which his honour or interest may render unpleasant and grievous to him; so we hope, that his majesty will not make his own understanding or reason the rule of his government, but will suffer himself to be assisted with a wise and prudent council, that may deal faithfully betwixt him and his people; and that he will remember, that his resolutions do concern kingdoms, and therefore ought not to be moulded by his own, much less by any other private person, which is not alike proportionable to ſo great a truſt. And therefore we ſtill deſire and hope, that his majeſty will not be guided by his own underſtanding, or think thoſe courſes, ſtraits and neceſſities, to which he ſhall be adviſed by the wiſdom of both houſes of parliament, which are the eyes in this politic body, whereby his majeſty is, by the conſtitution of this kingdom, to diſcern the differences of thoſe things which concern the public peace and ſafety thereof.

"We have given his majeſty no cauſe to ſay, that we do meanly value the diſcharge of his public duty. Whatſoever acts of grace or juſtice have been done, they proceed from his majeſty by the advice and counſel of his parliament; yet we have, and ſhall always anſwer them with conſtant gratitude, obedience, and affection: And although many things have been done ſince this parliament, of another nature, yet we ſhall not ceaſe to deſire the continued protection of Almighty God upon his majeſty; and moſt humbly petition him, to caſt from him all thoſe evil and contrary counſels, which have, in many particulars formerly mentioned, much detracted from the honour of his government, the happineſs of his own eſtate, and proſperity of his people.

"And having paſſed ſo many dangers from abroad, ſo many conſpiracies at home, and brought on the public work ſo far, through the greateſt difficulties that ever ſtood in oppoſition to a parliament, to ſuch a degree of ſucceſs, that nothing ſeems to be left in our way, able to hinder the full accompliſhment of our deſires and endeavours of the public good; unleſs God in his juſtice do ſend ſuch a grievous curſe upon us, as to turn the ſtrength of the kingdom againſt itſelf, and to effect that by their own folly and credulity, which the power and ſubtilty of their and our enemies could not attain, that is, to divide the people from the parliament, and to make them ſerviceable to the ends and aims of thoſe who would deſtroy them. Therefore we deſire the kingdom to take notice of this laſt and moſt deſperate and miſchievous plot of the malignant party, that is acted and proſecuted in many parts of the kingdom, under plauſible notions of ſtirring them up to a care of preſerving the king's prerogative, maintaining the diſcipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and ſolemnity of God's ſervice, and encouraging of learning. And upon theſe grounds, divers mutinous petitions have been framed in London, Kent, and other counties, and ſundry of his majeſty's ſubjects have been ſolicited to declare themſelves for the king againſt the parliament: and many falſe and foul aſperſions have been caſt upon our proceedings, as if we had been not only negligent, but averſe in theſe points: whereas we deſire nothing more, than to maintain the purity and power of religion, and to honour the king in all his juſt prerogatives; and for encouragement and advancement of piety and learning, we have very earneſtly endeavoured, and ſtill do, to the utmoſt of our power, that all pariſhes may have learned, pious, and ſufficient preachers, and all ſuch preachers competent livings. (6.)

Rem. (6.) The king complained, that the church of England was going to be deſtroyed to make way for preſbytery. The parliament dares not ſay the contrary, for fear of diſcouraging the preſbyterians, nor own it, becauſe it was not yet time to diſcover themſelves ſo openly. They endeavour therefore to get off, by general terms, which ſignify nothing, that is, they have reſolved to place in every pariſh pious miniſters, and provide for their ſubſiſtence.

"Many other bills and propoſitions are in preparation for the king's profit and honour, the people's ſafety and proſperity: in the proceedings whereof we are much hindered by his majeſty's abſence from the parliament, which is altogether contrary to the uſe of his predeceſſors, and the privileges of parliament, whereby our time is conſumed by a multitude of unneceſſary meſſages, and our innocency wounded by cauſeleſs and ſharp invectives. Yet we doubt not, but we ſhall overcome all this at laſt, if the people ſuffer not themſelves to be deluded with falſe and ſpecious ſhews, and ſo drawn to betray us to their own undoing, who have ever been willing to hazard the undoing of ourſelves, that they might not be betrayed by our neglect of the truſt repoſed in us: but if it were poſſible they ſhould prevail herein, yet we would not fail, through God's grace, ſtill to perſiſt in our duties, and to look beyond our own lives, eſtates, and advantages, as thoſe who think nothing worth the enjoying, without the liberty, peace, and ſafety of the kingdom; nor any thing too good to be hazarded in diſcharge of our conſciences, for the obtaining of it: and ſhall always repoſe ourſelves upon the protection of Almighty God, which we are confident ſhall never be wanting to us, (while we ſeek his glory) as we have found it hitherto wonderfully going along with us in all our proceedings."

The king quickly anſwered this manifeſto. He had ſtrong reaſons to prevent betimes the impreſſions it might make upon the minds of the people. As a war was unavoidable, the king and the parliament were equally concerned to gain the people, and for that theſe papers were intended. We have ſeen in the parliament's manifeſto, the objections againſt the king reiterated, and we ſhall ſee in the king's, the ſame anſwers he had before given to each of the articles. Theſe two papers therefore may be conſidered as a recapitulation of whatever had been alleged pro and con, in the diſpute between the king and the parliament. Both flattered themſelves, that their reaſons were unanſwerable, and propoſed them with great confidence. Nor was this intirely without foundation, for both ſides, reaſoning upon different principles, might be in the right, according to their reſpective ſuppoſitions.

His majeſty's anſwer to a book, entitled, The Declaration or Remonſtrance of the Lords and Commons of the 19th of May, 1642.

"IF we could be weary of taking any pains for the ſatisfaction of our people, and to undeceive them of thoſe ſpecious miſchievous infuſions which are daily inſtilled into them, to ſhake and corrupt their loyalty and affection to us and our government, after ſo full and ample declaration of ourſelf and intentions, and ſo fair and ſatisfactory anſwers to all ſuch matters as have been objected to us by a major part preſent of both houſes of parliament, we might well give over this labour of our pen, and ſit ſtill till it ſhall pleaſe God ſo to enlighten the affections and underſtandings of our good ſubjects on our behalf, (which we doubt not but that in his good time he will do) that they may ſee our ſufferings are their ſufferings. But ſince, inſtead of applying themſelves to the method propoſed by us, of making ſuch ſolid particular propoſitions as might eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between us, or of following the advice of our council of Scotland (with whom they communicate their affairs) in forbearing all means that may make the breach wider and wound deeper; they have choſen to purſue us with new reproaches, or rather to continue and improve the old, by adding and varying little circumſtances and language, in matters formerly urged by them, and fully anſwered by us. We prevailed with ourſelf, upon very mature and particular conſideration of it, to anſwer the late printed book, intitled, 'A declaration or remonſtrance of the lords and commons,' which was ordered the 19th of May laſt to be printed and publiſhed, hoping then, that they would put us to no more of this trouble, but that ſhould have been the laſt of ſuch a nature they would have communicated to our people, and that they would not, as they have done ſince, thought fit to aſſault us with a newer declaration, indeed of a very new nature and learning, which muſt have another anſwer. (1.)

Rem. (1.) This was another declaration of the ſecond of June, whence it may be inferred, that this anſwer of the king to the firſt was not publiſhed till after that time.

"And we doubt not, but that our good ſubjects in ſhort time will be ſo well inſtructed in the differences and miſtakeings between us, that they will plainly diſcern, without reſigning their reaſon and underſtanding to our prerogative, or the infallability of a now major part of both houſes of parliament (infected by a few malignant ſpirits) where the fault is. (2.)

Rem. (2.) The king begins in this paper to repreſent the reſolutions of the parliament, not as being agreeable to the ſentiments of the nation, but as coming only from a diſaffected party which prevailed in both houſes.
